The first edition of the Greek text has been already noticed. It was translated into Latin by Stephanus Niger, along with the Heroicus and parts of other authors, and published at Milan in 1521. It was translated into French along with the similar work of the younger Philostratus, and the Εἰκόνες of Callistratus, with engravings and a commentary by Blaise de Vigenere in 1578, and often reprinted. But Olearius speaks slightly of all that Vigenere has done. These three works have generally gone together. The best edition is that of Jacobs and Welecker, Leipzig, 1825, in which the latter explained the artistic details illustrative of the archaeological department. The text is revised, and a commentary of great value added by Jacobs. Heyne published illustrations of Philostratus and Callistratus, Göttingen, 1786—1801. The following list of illustrative works is taken from Kayser's Proemium:—Torkill Baden, Comment. de Arte, c. Philostrato in describ. Imagin. Hafn. 1792; C. O. Müller, in Archaeologia, passim, e. g. 16, 702; Welecker, Rheinisches Museum, 1834, p. 411; Raoul-Rochette, Peint. Ant. sculpt.. 160; Creuzer, Symbolik, ii. 62, iii. 427, &c. 3d edit.; Gerhardt, Ausserl. Vasenfig. i. 12; Heyne, Opusc. Acad. v. pp. 18, 26, 193; Ilg, Göth. Werke, vol. xxx. p. 426, Stuttgart, 1849; Fr. Passow, Zeitschr. f. d. Alterthums- schaft, 1836. p. 571, &c. The practicability of painting from the descriptions of Philostratus has been proved by Giulio Romano and by M. de Schwidtm, the latter of whom has adorned the walls of the Museum of Carlsruhe with several paintings borrowed from them. (Kayser, l.c.)

V. Epistolae (ἐπιστολαί). These were probably composed before he settled in Rome, as the best MSS. bear the title Φιλοστράτου Ἐπιστολαί. They are seventy-three in number, and are chiefly specimens of amatory letters; hence Suidas calls them ἐρωτικά; or perhaps he had not the full collection. Kayser thinks that he published in his life-time two editions, the one in his youth, of which the letters are full of fire, and the other more contemplative, and issued in his old age. The cast of them, however, seems to be no otherwise varied than to suit his aim of showing the versatility of his powers. They present, in general, the same subjects, and are treated in the same ways as amatory epigrams, with a few that are satirical, and one to Julia Domna in defence of the sophists. To these is added a letter on letter-writing, which Olearius attributes to Philostratus Lemnius, and Kayser to our Philostratus, with a fragment on the union of Nature and Art, which is probably a portion of a rhetorical exercise.

Sixty-three of these letters, including the letter to Aspasius, were published by Aldus, 1499. Meurinus added eight, which he published, with a dissertation on the Philostrati, at the Elzevir press in 1616, and supplied the lacunae of several others. Olearius added three more in his edition of the collected works. There is a separate edition of these letters by Jo. Fr. Boissoneade, Paris and Leipzig, 1842.

Of the collected works of Philostratus, there is:—1. The edition of Fed. Morellius, Paris, 1608, containing all the works above mentioned, along with Eusebius contra Hieroclem, the Εἰκόνες of the younger Philostratus, and the Ἐἰκόνες of Callis-
PHILOSTRATUS. 397

But for scholars which Zurich, stratus have name, Apollonius added to the list of works contained in the edition of Morellius, the additional letters spoken of above, and a revised Latin translation, Previous to this edition, Bentley and others had contemplated an edition. Indeed Bentley had gone so far as to publish a specimen sheet. Unhappily, the design was not executed; but he freely communicated to Olearius both his conjectural criticisms, and his notes of various readings. The edition is a very beautiful specimen of typography, and in spite of many faults, and the accusation that the editor has been guilty of gross plagiarism, which has been repeatedly brought against him, is very valuable, especially for its exegetical notes. 5. The last edition, and, critically, by far the best, is that of C. L. Kayser, Zurich, 1844, 4to. It contains introductory remarks on each book, the Greek text, and notes which are principally critical. As he has already published several of the treatises of Philostратus separately, the notices and notes are in some cases briefer than might have been desired. Philostратus seems to have occupied his attention for years, and scholars in various parts of Europe have aided him in collating manuscripts. He has retained all that Olearius has published, and has added the brief dialogue on Nero, commonly attributed to Lucian (Ed. Reiz. p. 636), which he assigns to Philostратus on grounds by no means convincing.

Of other works of Philostратus, Photius (Cod. 150) takes notice of a Λέξεως Ἡρατοτζον, and he Kayser has published as a fragment Περὶ Γυμναστικῆς (Heidelberg, 1840), but has not included it in the collected works.

Suidas mentions epigrams among his productions. Of these one only remains bearing his name, and which is probably his. The subject is a picture of Telephus wounded (Jacobs, AnttPod. Graec. vol. iii. p. 108). Both Olearius and Kayser have inserted it.

The works of Philostратus have been twice translated into German, by Seybold, 1776, and by Jacobs, Stuttgart, 1829—33.

3. The LEMNIAN. The account of the Philo-strati given by Suidas, to which it is here necessary to return, is that of the son of Veroς, the first Philostratus, lived in the time of Nero. His son, the second Philostratus, lived till the time of Philip.

The third was the grand-nephew of the second, by his brother's son, Nervianus, and was also his son-in-law and pupil. He, too, practised rhetoric at Athens; and he died and was buried at Lemnos. He wrote: —Εἰκόνας, Παναθηναίων, Τριονων, Πε- ῦρόφοραν τῆς Ὁμήρου ἀπόγονος, Μελέσα. And some attribute to him the lives of the sophists generally assigned to his grand-uncle.

This account is palpably inconsistent with itself, as it makes a man who lived in the time of Nero, a. d. 54—68, the father of another who was alive under Philip, a. d. 244—249. Besides, the connection between the second and the third Philostratus is unintelligible, and, if we are to take every thing as it stands, is contradicted by a passage in the Εἰκόνας of an author last-mentioned, where he speaks of the second as Μυθρᾶς, which Pa- bricius, following an alteration of Meursius on the text of Suidas, translates φωνεύως. These difficulculties are rendered insuperable by the fact that the second Philostratus, in his Lives of the Sophists, though he speaks of an Egyptian and a Lemnian Philostratus, does not give the remotest hint that his father had ever practised his own art. He was sufficiently impressed with the honour of the profession, which he often magnifies; and he shows his sense of this in his dedication of the Lives of the Sophists, in his allusion to the descent of Antonius Gondianus the consul from Herodes Atticus, whom he there expressly names "the sophist." It is inconceivable, then, that he should never have alluded to the distinctions gained, and the works written by his own father. With regard to the third Philostratus, he repeatedly names a Lemnian of that name, whose intimate friend he was. But he classes him along with other intimate friends, of whom, at the close of the work, he declines to say anything, on the ground of that very intimacy,—but not a word of relationship. No shifting of the names, such as that adopted by Meursius, and followed by Vossius and others, of referring the lives of the sophists to the third and not the second Philostratus, removes these difficulties, which are increased by the singular coincidence of three generations born in Lemnos, teaching in Athens, then in Rome, then returning to Lemnos, to perpetuate Lemnian sophists. If the Εἰκόνας attributed to the third Philostratus be actually his, then μυθρᾶς stapos stares us in the face. and, to make the tale intelligible, we must alter the text of Suidas as Meursius does, and understand the word in an unusual sense, or disbelieve Suidas in an important portion of his evidence, as is done by Kayser. But the truth seems to be that the mention of two other Philo-strati, in the Lives of the Sophists, and the very probable occurrence of imitations of the writings of the biographer, whose works, from the unbroken chain of quotations in succeeding authors, we know to have been exceedingly popular, led Suidas into an error which has been the source of so much perplexity. We can easily believe that, finding many works ascribed to men of that name, with fictitious genealogies, purposely contrived, he carelessly assumed the truth of the title, and inserted the name in his list without inquiry.

Confining ourselves to the evidence of the biographer, we find another distinguished sophist of his time, who was his intimate friend, and may have been a relation, though he takes no notice of it. He uniformly calls him the Lemnian. The first notice that we have of him is that when twenty-two years old he received instructions at the Olympic games held A. D. 213 (see Clinton, Fasti Rom. p. 225), from the aged and magnanimous Hippodromus (V. S. ii. 27. § 2). He received exemption from public duties at the hands of Car-nula, whom Philostratus calls Antoninus, the son of Julia, τῆς φιλοσοφῶν, —an exemption generally attached to the rhetorical chair of Athens; but, on this occasion, withheld from Philiscus, the professor, and bestowed on Philostratus. The Lemnian was then twenty-four years old, a. d. 215 (ii. 30). He once found Aelian reading with great vehemence a declaration against an unmanly emperor (Ὑπομόνη), recently deceased. Philostratus rebuked him, saying, "I could have admired you if you had attacked him for this, but, as only a man can assia living tyrant, any one can when dead" (ii. 32. § 2). Vossius and others had fallen into the error of supposing that this tyrant was Domitian, but Perizo-

nias pointed out the impossibility of a man who was twenty-four years old in the reign of Caracalla, being placed near the time of an emperor dead upwards of 110 years before. He conjectures (and his idea has since then been universally acquiesced in) that it was Elagabalus, slain a.d. 222, whom Aelian had attacked (V. H. praefat. p. 50). At the close of his work, Philostratus the biographer praises his powers in forensic, popular, and extemporaneous eloquence, in rhetorical exercises, and for his writings, and naming him with Nicogoras and Aipanes, he says, οὐκ ἐμε διὰ γράφειν, καὶ γὰρ ἐν καὶ ἀποτάσειν ὡς χαραστάμενος, ἐπείθη φιλία καὶ πρὸς αὐτὸν ἦν. It has been held that this last cause infers the death of the Lemnian, previously to the finishing of these memoirs. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 555.) But this by no means follows. Among the parties mentioned is Nicogoras, of whom he expressly says, that he is (ἔστι) herald in the Eleusinian rites (Kayser has ἔστηφθη, not on the best authority). Then χαραστάμενος, in its plain meaning, would lead us to suppose that Philostratus was afraid of appearing the vandal, not (χαραστάμενος) as his, but (μέφρων) as his. Thus is accounted for by the indirect narration, and as preceded by ἐν ἀποτάσειν. From this then we can infer nothing as to the time of his death. But Suidas says he died and was buried in Lemnos.

It is hardly possible that he can have been a grandson of the biographer, as Kayser in his preface supposes, as the latter was writing vigorously in the reign of Philip (A. D. 244—249), when, according to the computation already given, the Lemnian, born in 191, would have been between 53 and 58 years old. We have already seen that the biographer notices no relationship. Hence the Prooemium to the Elōvres, printed along with the Elōvres of the elder writer, is highly suspicious. He mentions that the work of the same nature, written by his namesake and grandfather τοῦ θεοῦ διώκων καὶ μητροπόταμος, led him to undertake his. If so we must add another to the Philostrati, and surmise that the Lemnian married the biographer's daughter, and that this writer was the issue of the marriage. But the truth is, that although this work is not destitute of merit, it has very much the appearance of a clever imitation by a later sophist, who found Philostratus a convenient name. This is confirmed by the fact, that while the Elōvres of the elder writer furnish favourable materials for imitation, quotation, and reference to subsequent poets, collectors, grammarians, and critics, not a single quotation from this by any subsequent writer can be traced, and only three MSS. have yet been discovered. The writer, whoever he was, after rather a clumsy Prooemium, discusses seventeen pictures, which are almost all mythological, and in describing them he appeals to the poets more than his predecessor does.

From the first, this work has been uniformly printed along with the Elōvres of the other Philostratus. It formed a part of Buisine de Vigenore's translation into French; with Callistritus, it forms the eighth volume of Jacob's translation, already mentioned.

4. The AEGYPTIAN, was in Africa with Juba when Cato and Scipio took the command against Julius Caesar, B. C. 47, on which occasion a rebuke given to Juba for the honours paid to Philostratus, led to the reconciliation of the two noble Romans, who had previously been at variance. (Plut. Cat. Min. 57.) He afterwards attached himself to the party of Antony and Cleopatra, and his morals were not improved by this connection. (Epigram. apud Philostrat. V. S. i. 5.) Hence the indignation of Augustus, when he entered Alexandria a. C. 30, at finding a professed follower of the Academic school so degraded. He granted him his life, however, that no odium might attach to the philosopher Areius, whom Philostratus, with long white beard and funereal garb, followed, importuning for mercy. (Plut. Ant. 30.) His familiarity with princes, and his wealth, the result of a life of labour, are contrasted with the condition to which, alive and dead, he was subjected by the Roman soldiers, in an epigram of Oringogoras. (Anthol. Graec. ed. Jacobs, vol. ii. p. 139, vol. viii. p. 415.) Philostratus ranks him among the sophistical philosophers, and speaks of him as devoting himself to the panegyrical and varied styles of rhetoric. (Ph. V. S. i. c.) Vossius, who has read the lives of the Philostrati very carelessly, places this contemporary of Augustus as contemporary with Philostratus the Late, and the work of W. M. Mut, which he translates vidis, instead of voces. Vidis is the translation of Morellius. This strange error has escaped the notice of Westermann. (De Hist. Graec. p. 280.)

5. An historian mentioned by Josephus (Ant. x. 11. § 2) as having written accounts of India and Phoenicia; and again (ap. Apion. i. 20, p. 1343, ed. Hudson) as having written in his history of the siege of Tyre. It is probable that it was in consequence of being confused with this writer that Philostratus the biographer was sometimes called the Tyrian. Even Vossius, through singular inadver- tence, thinks that Josephus refers to the writer of the life of Apollonius (de Hist. Graec. l. c.), at which passage Westermann, correcting the mistake, suggests that this writer is alluded to by Cassius Balsas. (Geopon. i. 14.)

6. An historian who flourished in the reign of the emperor Aurelian. (Synecclus, Chronograph. p. 384.)

PHILOSTRATUS, C. FUFIUS, an artist, whose name appears on a gem; but it cannot be said with certainty whether the name is that of the engraver or of the owner. (Spilolary Gems, No. 31; Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. c.) [P. S.]

PHILOTAS (Φιλότας), a descendant of Peneleus of Thbes, is said to have led a colony to Priene. (Paus. vii. 2. § 7; Strab. xiv. p. 633, &c.) [L. S.]

PHILOTAS (Φιλότας). 1. A Macedonian, father of Parmenion, the general of Alexander the Great (Arr. Anab. iii. 11. § 16). It appears that he had two other sons, ASANDER and AGATHON. (Id. ib. i. 17. § 8; Dio. xix. 75.)

2. Son of Parmenion, was one of the most dis-tinguished officers in the service of Alexander. He appears to have already enjoyed a high place in the friendship and confidence of that monarch before his accession to the throne (Ptol. v. 5. 21) and in the first military enterprises of the young king against the Thracians, Triballi, and Glauca, king of Illryia, Philotas bears a conspicuous part (Arr. Anab. i. 2. 5). In the organization of the army for the expedition to Asia, Philotas obtained the chief command of the whole body of the υπῆρχον, or native Macedonian cavalry, a post of such im- portance as to rank probably second only to that of his father Parmenon. But besides this special command, which he held without interruption, from the first landing in Asia until after the defeat and death of Dareius, we frequently find him entrusted with a more extensive authority, and placed in command of several independent bodies of troops. In this manner we find him rendering important services not only in the battles of the Granicus and Arbela, but at the sieges of Miletus and Halicarnassus, in the march through Cilicia, and again at the passage of the Pyrene Persicæ (Diod. xvi. 17, 57; Arr. Anab. i. 14, 19, 21, ii. 5, iii. 11, 18; Curt. v. 4. §§ 20, 30, vi. 9. § 26). The estimation in which Alexander held his military talents is sufficiently attested by these facts: nor does it appear that any thing had occurred up to this time to interrupt the familiar and friendly intercourse between them; though according to Plutarch (Alex. 49) information had been secretly given to the king at a much earlier period that Philotas was holding seditious language, if not entertaining treasonable designs, against him (see also Arrian, Anab. iii. 26. § 1). On the advance into Bactria (a. c. 330) Philotas was left behind with a detachment to pay funeral honours to his brother Nicanor, while Alexander himself pushed forward in pursuit of Bessus (Curt. vi. 6. § 19), but he soon rejoined the main army. It was not long after this, during the halt in Drangiana, that the events occurred which led to his destruction.

It appears certain that a plot had been at this time organised by a Macedonian named Dimmus, against the life of Alexander, though what was really its extent or nature it is now impossible to determine. The information of this conspiracy was accidentally brought out in the first instance by Philotas to one CRHALINUS; but he treated the whole matter with contempt on account of the character of the parties concerned, and neglected for two days to apprise the king of the intelligence. Alexander having subsequently become acquainted with this fact was indignant with Philotas for his carelessness, and the enemies of the latter, especially Craterus, took advantage of the opportunity to inflame the resentment of the king, and persuaded him that Philotas could not possibly have concealed so important a communication, had he not been himself implicated in the plot. Alexander yielded to their suggestions, and caused Philotas to be arrested in the night. The next day he was brought before the assembled Macedonian army, and vehemently accused by the king himself, who asserted, that Parmenon was likewise an accomplice in the meditated treason. No proof, however, of the guilt either of Philotas or his father was brought forward, for Dimmus had put an end to his own life, and Nicomachus, who had originally revealed the existence of the conspiracy, had not mentioned the name of Philotas among those supposed to be concerned in it. But in the following night a confession was wrung from the unhappy Philotas by the torture, in which, though he at first denied any knowledge of the plot of Dimmus, he admitted that he had previously joined with his father in entertaining treasonable designs against the king; and ultimately, overcome by the application of fresh tortures, he was brought to acknowledge his participation in the conspiracy of Dimmus also. On the strength of this confession he was the next day again brought before the assembled troops, and stoned to death after the Macedonian custom (Curt. vi. 7—11; Arr. Anab. iii. 26; Plut. Alex. 48, 49; Diod. xvii. 79, 80; Justin xii. 5). It is difficult to pronounce with certainty upon the guilt or innocence of Philotas, especially as we know not what authorities were followed by Curtius, the only author who has left us a detailed account of his trial; but there seems little doubt that he felt a victim to the machinations of his rivals and enemies among the Macedonian generals, at the head of whom was Craterus, whose conduct throughout the transaction presents itself in the darkest colours. That Alexander should have lent so ready an ear to their representations, will ever be a reproach to the memory of the great king; but it is clear that his mind had been already alienated from Philotas by the haughty and arrogant demeanour of the latter, and the boastful manner in which he assumed to himself a large share in the merits of Alexander's exploits. Similar defects of character had also it appears rendered Philotas unpopular with the army, and thus disposed the Macedonians to listen readily to the charges against him (Curt. vi. 8. §§ 3, 11. § 1—8; Plut. Alex. 48). Nor is it unlikely that in common with Cleitus and others of the elder Macedonians, he looked with disapprobation upon the course that Alexander was taking after the death of Dareius; but of his direct participation in any plots against the king's life, there is certainly no sufficient evidence. Among the tales subsequently circulated was one that represented him as holding communications with Culisthenes, which were interpreted as having reference to the assassination of Alexander (Arr. Anab. iv. 10.).

A Macedonian officer who commanded the garrison in the Cadmeia, at the time of the revolt of the Thebans against Alexander the Great, n. c. 335. Though closely blockaded in the city, and vigorously besieged by the citizens, he was able to hold out until the arrival of Alexander, and the capture of the city, when he contributed greatly to the discomfiture of the Thebans, by a vigorous sally from the citadel. (Diod. xvii. 8, 12.)

4. Son of Caris, a Thracian, was one of the pages in the service of Alexander the Great, who were induced by Hermolaus and Sostratus to join in the conspiracy against the king's life [HERMOLAUS]. He was put to death together with the other accomplices. (Arr. Anab. iv. 13; Curt. vii. 6. § 3.)

5. A Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great, who commanded one taxi or division of the phalanx during the advance into Sogdiana and India. (Arr. Anab. iii. 29, iv. 24.) It seems probable that he is the same person mentioned by Curtius (v. 2. § 5), as one of those rewarded by the king at Babylon (n. c. 331) for their distinguished services. There is little doubt also, that he is the same to whom the government of Cilicia was assigned in the distribution of the provinces after the death of Alexander, n. c. 323 (Arri. ap. Phot. p. 69, a; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, a; Curt. x. 10. § 2; Justin. xiii. 4; Diod. xviii. 3) who, however, in a subsequent passage (ib. 12), appears to speak of him as holding the lesser Phrygia, which was in fact given to Leontomus. See Droysen, Hellenism, vol. i. p. 68, note.) In n. c. 321, he was deprived of his government by Perdiccas and replaced by Philoxenus, but it would seem that this was only in order to employ him elsewhere, as we find him still closely attached to the party of Perdiccas, and after the death of the regent united with Alecetas, Attalus, and their partizans, in the contest against Antigonus. He was taken prisoner, together with Attalus, Docimus, and Polemon, in B.C. 320, and shared with them their imprisonment, as well as the daring enterprise by which they then recovered their liberty [Attalus, No. 2]. He again fell into the power of Antigonus, in B.C. 319. (Diod. xvii. 45, xix. 16; Just. xiii. 6; Droysen, l.c. pp. 115, 268.)

6. A Macedonian officer in the service of Antigonus, who was employed by him in B.C. 319, to endeavour by bribes and promises to corrupt the Argyraspids in the service of Eumenes, and especially their leaders Antigenes and Tentamus. But his efforts were unavailing: Teutamus was tempted for a moment, but was recalled to the path of duty by his firmer-minded colleague, and the Argyraspids continued faithful. (Diod. xviii. 62, 63.)

7. An officer in the service of Antiocius the Great, who commanded the garrison of Abidos in the war against the Romans. He was besieged by the Roman fleet under C. Livius (p. c. 190), and was desirous to capitulate; but before the terms could be agreed upon, the news of the defeat of the Rhodian fleet under Pamphilidas caused Livius to withdraw in all haste in order to oppose Polyxenidas. (Liv. xxxvii. 12.) [E. H. B.]

PHILO'TAS (Φιλότας), a dithyrambic poet and musician, the disciple of Philoxenus, is only worthy of notice as having once gained a victory over his great contemporary Timotheus. (Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichikunst, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 324.) [P. S.]

PHILO'TAS (Φιλότας), a physician of Amphiassa in Locris, who was born about the middle of the first century B.C. He studied at Alexandria, and was in city at the same time with the triumvir Antony, of whose profusion and extravagance he was an eye-witness. He became acquainted with the triumvir's son Antyllus, with whom he sometimes supped, about B.C. 30. On one occasion, when a certain physician had been annoyance the company by his logical method of argument, Philotus silenced him at last with the following eulogism:—"Cold water is to be given in a certain fever; but everyone who has a fever has a certain fever; therefore cold water is to be given in all fevers;" which so pleased Antyllus, who was at table, that he pointed to a side-board covered with large goblets, and said, "I give you all these, Philotus." As Antyllus was quite a lad at that time, Philotas scurped to accept such a gift, but was encouraged to do so by one of the attendants, who asked him if he did not know that the giver was a son of the triumvir Antonius, and that he had full power to make such presents. (Plut. Anton. 28.)

He may perhaps be the same physician, of whose medical formulae one is quoted by Celsius (De Med. v. 19. p. 89) and Asclepiades Pharmacian (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Ges. iv. vol. iii. 13, vol. viii. p. 745), and who before the first century B.C. (See also Gal. l.c. pp. 542; and De Compos. Medicam. sec. Legc. iv. 6, vol. iii. pp. 752, 838.) [W. A. G.]

PHILOTHEUS (Φιλοθέος), 1. Patriarch of ALEXANDRIA, a man of luxurious habits and a most scandalous course of life, lived about A.D. 995. He wrote four works, the titles of which, as translated from the Arabic, are, 1. Declarator; 2. Rara Commentatorum, et Depravatione Herculitorum; 3. Delecto Aenarorum; 4. Autobiographia. The whole of these works is lost, and it does not appear whether the author wrote in Arabic or in Greek. A sermon, De Mandatis Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ed. Greek and Latin by P. Possinus in his Aveticum, is ascribed to one S. Philotheus, perhaps the aforesaid. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 995.)

2. COCCINUS, patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE, a man of great and deserved renown. He was probably born in the beginning of the 14th century, and early took the monastic habit. After living for a considerable time as a monk in, and afterwards superior of, the convent of St. Laura on Mount Sinai, he was appointed archbishop of Heraclea (before 1354). In 1355 he was employed by the emperor John Cantacuzenus, in bringing about a reconciliation between Michael, the son, and John Palaeologus, the son-in-law of the emperor; and in the same year he was chosen patriarch of Constantinople, in the place of Calistus, who, however, recovered his see after John Palaeologus had taken possession of Constantinople. Calistus, however, died soon afterwards, and new Philotheus was once more placed on the patriarchal chair, which post he occupied with great dignity till 1371 according to Cave, or 1376 according to the Chronologia reformata of J. B. Riccioli quoted by Fabricius. We give below the titles of the most important of the numerous works of Philotheus, very few of which have been published. 1. Liturgia et Oratio instituiendi Diaconon, printed in Latin in the 26th vol. of Bibl. Pat. Max. 2. Libri XV. Antirrhetic, a defence of his friend the celebrated Palama, extant in different libraries. 3. Sermo Encomiasticus in tres Hierarchos, Basilium, Gregorium Theologum, et Ioannem Chrysostomum, Latin, in the 26th vol. of Bibl. Pat. Max., Gr. and Lat., by Jac. Pontanus, together with Philippus Solitarii Dippola, Ingolstadt, 1604, 8vo.; by Froento Duxucus, in the 2d vol. of Auctuar. Patr. Paris, 1624. 4. Oratio de Orac. Graec. et Lat. Posthum. auct., ed. by 1616, fol., vol. ii.; there is another Oratio de Orac. in the same volume, which is attributed by some to our Philotheus. 5. Oratio in tertium Jejuniorum Domincum, Gr. and Lat. ibid. 6. Refutatio Anthematinorum ad Harnemopolu scriptorum, Gr. and Lat. apud Leunclavius, Jus. Gr. Rom. lib. iv. 6. Confutatio Capitum XIV, Acindymi et Bartakuni, extant in MS. 7. Homilia. 8. Compendium de Oeconomicus Christi, &c. &c. Wharton in Cave and Fabricius give a catalogue of the numerous works of Philotheus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 513, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1362.)

3. MONACHUS or SANCTUS, an unknown monk, wrote De Mandatis Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ed. Gr. and Lat. in P. Possinus, Ascetica, Paris, 1684. Although this work bears the same title as the one quoted above under the head Philotheos Coc- cinus, the works as well as the authors are different persons. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 519; Cave, Hist. Lit. Dissertation. i. p. 17, ed. Oxon.)

4. Archbishop of Selymbria, of unknown age, wrote Oratio in T. Agathonicum, which is still extant in MS. [W. P.]
PHILOTEMUS (Φιλότεμος), is supposed to be the same person as Theophilus Protospatharius. (Therophilus Protops.) There is extant under his name a commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, which is in a great measure compiled from Galen's commentary on the same work, and is attributed to different persons in different MSS. It was first published in a Latin translation by Ludov. Coradus, Venet. 8vo. 1549, and again, Spire, 8vo. 1581: and it is in a great measure, if not entirely, the same work that has lately been published in Greek by F. R. Dietz in the second volume of his Scholia in Hippocratem et Galenum (Regim. Pruss. 8vo. 1834) under the name of Theophilus. A short work relating to a MS. of Philothemus at Altdorf is mentioned by Choulant, with the title, J. Andr. Nagel, Programma sistent Memoria, Donat. et Treuwanec, Altdorf 4to. 1788. (See Preface to vol. ii. of Dietz's Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medizin.)

[Theophilus]

PHILOTA or PHILOTIS (Φιλότα, Φιλότις), a woman of Epeirus, mother of Charophs the younger. She aided and seconded her son throughout in his cruelty and extortion, having quite thrown off her woman's nature, as Polybios and Diodorus tell us. (Polyb. xxxxi. 21; Diod. Exc. de Virt. et Vir. p. 587.)

[Polybius]

PHILOTIMUS (Φιλότημος), a freedman of Cicero, or rather of Terentius, is constantly mentioned in Cicero's correspondence. He had the chief management of Cicero's property. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 4, iv. 10, v. 3, et alibi.)

PHILOTIMUS (Φιλότημος), an eminent Greek physician, a pupil of Praxagoras (Galen, De Aliment. Facult. i. 12, vol. vi. p. 500), and a fellow pupil of Hippocrates (Id. De Med. Med. i. 3, vol. p. 28). He was also a contemporary of Ensiatimus (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." vi. 1, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 77), and is quoted by Heraceldes of Tarentum (ap. Gal. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 756), and therefore must probably have lived in the fourth and third centuries B.C. Celsus mentions him as one of the eminent physicians of antiquity (De Medici. viii. 20, p. 185); and he is quoted by several of the ancient medical writers, viz. by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 16, De Morb. Chron. i. 4. pp. 115, 323), Orbissiatus (Med. Coll. ii. 69, iv. 10, v. 32, pp. 236, 235, 279), and Aetius* (iii. 3, 12, p. 553), and very frequently by Galen. He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici or Logici (Galen, De Vener. Sect. adex. Erosistis. cc. 5, 6, vol. xi. pp. 163, 169; Cramer's Anecd. Graeciae Parisi, vol. iii. p. 395), and created several medical works, of which only a few fragments remain. Athenæus quotes a work on Cookery, ὄφαρτουνοι (vii. 81, p. 308), and another on Food, Πεπροφασ, consisting of at least thirteen books (iii. 20, 24, pp. 81, 82): this latter work is several times quoted by Galen (De Aliment. Facult. i. 11, iii. 30, 31, vol. pp. 507, 720, 726, et alibi.). Some modern critics suppose that he wrote a commentary on Hippocrates, Κατ' Ἱπποκράτης, De Officina Medicis; but this is a mistake, as M. Littre observes (Dictionnaire d'Hippocr. vol. i. pp. 82, 307), for Galen only says that he composed a work on the same subject, and with the same title. (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Offic. Med." i. praef., 5, vol. xviii. pt. ii. pp. 629, 666.) In an anatomical treatise which he wrote he pronounced the brain and heart to be useless organs (Galen, De Usu Part. viii. 3, vol. iii. p. 625), and the former to be merely an excessive development and offshoot (ὑπεράπαξη καὶ ἑπαρ- στίμα) of the spinal marrow. (Ibid. c. 12, p. 671.) Philotimus is quoted in various other parts of Galen's writings (see Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. p. 583, ed. vet.), and Plutarch relates an anecdote of him. (De Recta Rta. Aud. c. 10; De Adulat. et Amico, c. 33.) He is also quoted by the Scholiast on Homer (A. 424). [W. A. G.]

* Aetius relates of Philotimus (ii. 2, 9, p. 250) the same anecdote that is told by Alexander Traillius of Philodotus (Philodotus), and indeed it is most probable that in this latter passage Philotimus is the true reading.

PHILOXENUS (Φιλόξενος), a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great, who was appointed by him after his return from Egypt (n. c. 331) to superintend the collection of the tribute in the provinces north of Mount Taurus (Arr. Anab. iii. 6. § 6). It would appear, however, that he did not immediately assume this command, as shortly afterwards we find him sent forward by Alexander from the field of Arbela to take possession of Susa and the treasures there deposited, which he effected without opposition (Iid. iii. 16, § 9). After this he seems to have remained quiet in the discharge of his functions in Asia Minor (see Plat. Alex. 23; Paus. ii. 35, § 4), until the commencement of the year 323, when he conducted a reinforcement of troops from Caria to Babylon, where he arrived just before the last illness of Alexander (Iid. vii. 23, 24). In the distribution of the provinces which followed the death of that monarch we find no mention of Philoxenus, but in n. c. 321 he was appointed by Perdiccas to succeed Philotas in the government of Cilicia. By what means he afterwards conciliated the favour of Antipater we know not, but in the partition at Triparadeisus after the fall of Perdiccas he was still allowed to retain his satrapy of Cilicia (Justin. xiii. 6; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 71, b; Diod. xviii. 39). From this time we hear no more of him. [E. H. B.]

PHILOXENUS (Φιλόξενος). Among several literary persons of this name, by far the most important is Philoxenus of Cythera, who was one of the most distinguished dithyrambic poets of Greece. The accounts respecting his life and works, however, strangely confused, owing to the fact that there was another Philoxenus, a Leucadian, living at Athens about the same time or a little earlier: both these persons are ridiculed by the poets of the Old Comedy; both seem to have spent a part of their lives in Sicily; and it is evident that the grammarians were constantly confusing the one with the other. In order to exhibit the subject as clearly as possible, it is best to begin with the younger, but more important of these two persons.

1. Philoxenus, the son of Euleidas, was a native of Cythera, or, as others said, of Hereaclea on the Pontus (Suid. s. r.) ; but the former account is no doubt the correct one. We learn from the Parian Marble (No. 70) that he died in Ol. 100, B. C. 390, at the age of 55; he was, therefore, born in Ol. 86. 2, b. c. 435. The time when he most flourished was, according to Diodorus (xiv. 46), in Ol. 95. 2, b. c. 398.

The brief account of his life in Suidas involves some difficulties; he states that, when the Cythereans were reduced to slavery by the Lacedaemonians, Philoxenus was bought by a certain Agesylus, by whom he was brought up, and was called Philoxenus; and that, after the death of Agesylus, he was bought by the lyric poet Melanippides, by whom he was also educated. Now there is no record of the Lacedaemonians having reduced the Cythereans to slavery; but we know that the island was seized by an Athenian expedition under Nicias, in b. c. 424 (Thuc. iv. 53, 54; Diod. Sic. xii. 65; Plut. Nic. 6); and therefore some critics propose to read

This solution is not quite satisfactory, and another, of much ingenuity, is proposed by Schmidt (Dithyramb. pp. 5, 6); but it is not worth while here to discuss the question further, since the only important part of the statement, namely, that Philoxenus was really a slave in his youth, is quite sustained by other testimonies, especially by the allusions to him in the comic poets (see Hesych. s. v. Δουκάως; Meineke, l.c.). Schmidt (pp. 7, 8) very ingeniously conjectures that there is an allusion to Philoxenus in the Fros of Aristophanes (v. 1506), in the name Μύρωνίς, which we have seen that Suidas says to have been given to him by his first master, and which belongs to a class of words which seem to have been often used for the names of slaves. Others, however, suppose the name to have been a nickname given to him by the comic poets, to express the intimacy of his musical strains, the ἐκταστέλλως μυρωνίδας, as Pherocrates calls them (see below).

He was educated, says Suidas, by Melanippides, of course in that poet’s own profession, that of dithyrambic poetry, in which, if the above interpretation of the allusion in the Fros be correct, he had already attained to considerable eminence before b. c. 408; which agrees very well with the statement of Diodorus (l. c.), according to which he was at the height of his fame seven years later. Pherocrates calls him the name of the corruptors of music; at least Pindar applies to him a part of the passage; and if this application be correct, we have another allusion to his name Μύρωνίς, in the mention of ἐκταστέλλως μυρωνίδας (Plut. de Mus. 30, p. 1146, as explained and corrected by Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 326—335).

In the Gorgodes of Aristophanes, which was also on the prevalent corruptions of poetry and music, and which seems to have been acted some little time after the Fros, though Philoxenus is not mentioned by name, there are passages which are, to all appearance, parodies upon his poem entitled Δέιτνωρ (Fr. xii. xiii. ed. Bergk, ap. Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 1009, 1010). In the Ecclesiastes also, b. c. 392, is a passage which is almost certainly a similar parody (vv. 1167—1178; Bergk, Comment. de Rhet. Comosed. Att. Antip. p. 212). There is also a long passage in the Phasin of the comic poet Plato, which seems to have been acted in the year after the Ecclesiastes, b. c. 391, professing to be read from a book, which the person who has it calls Φιλόξενος κατὰ τις φάσματος, which is almost certainly a parody on the same poem, although Athenaeus and some modern critics suppose the allusion to be to a poem by Philoxenus, the Leucadian, on the art of cookery. It is true that the latter was known for his fondness of luxurious living; but the coincidence would be too remarkable, and the confusion between the two Philoxeni utterly hopeless, if we were to suppose, with Schmidt and others, that they both wrote poems of so similar a character about the same time. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 672—674; Bergk, Comment. pp. 211, 212; Schmidt, Dithyramb. p. 11, l.c.)

These testimonies all point to the very end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth centuries b. c., as the time when Philoxenus flourished. There is, indeed, a passage in the Clouds (332), which the scholar explains as referring to him, but which must allude to Philoxenus the Leucadian, if to either, as Philoxenus of Cythera was only in his 11th year at the time of the first exhibition of the Clouds, and in his 15th at the time of the second. Possibly, however, the comment results from a mere confusion in the mind of the scholar, who, seeing in the text of Aristophanes a joke on the voracity of the dithyrambic poets of his day, and having read of the glutony of Philoxenus of Leucadia, identified the latter with Philoxenus the dithyrambic poet, and therefore supposed him to be referred to by Aristophanes.

At what time Philoxenus left Athens and went to Sicily, cannot be determined. Schmidt (p. 15) supposes that he went as a colonist, after the first victories of Dionysius over the Carthaginians, b. c. 396; that he speedily obtained the favour of Dionysius, and took up his abode at his court at Syracuse, the luxury of which furnished him with the theme of his poem entitled Δέιτνωρ. However this may be, we know that he soon offended Dionysius, and was cast into prison; an act of oppression which most writers ascribe to the wounded vanity of the tyrant, whose poems Philoxenus not only refused to praise, but, on being asked to revise one of them, said that the best way of correcting it would be to draw a black line through the whole paper. Another account ascribes his disgrace to too close an intimacy with the tyrant’s mistress Galateia, but this looks like a fiction, arising out of a mistaken understanding of the oblique reference of his poem entitled Cyclop or Galateia. It appears that, after some time, he was released from prison, and restored outwardly to the favour of Dionysius; but either in consequence of some new quarrel, or because he had a distrust of the tyrant’s feelings towards him, he finally left his court: other accounts say nothing of his reconciliation, but simply that he escaped from prison, and went to the country of the Cythereans, where he composed his poem Galatæa (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plat. 290). According to Suidas he went to Tarentum (i.e. Φιλοξένος γραμματίος). There is a curious story related by Pindar, that he gave up his estate in Sicily, and left the island, in order that he might not be seduced, by the wealth he derived from it, into the luxury which prevailed around him (Plut. de Vi. Aer. alt. p. 831). Schmidt endeavours to reconcile this statement with the former, by supposing that, after he left the court of Dionysius, he resided for some time on his Sicilian estate, and afterwards gave it up, in the way mentioned by Pindar, and then departed finally from the island. It is doubtful whether the last years of his life were spent, whether in his native island, whither the scholarist just quoted says that he fled, or at Ephesus, where Suidas states that he died, and whither Schmidt thinks it likely that he may have gone, as the worship of Dionysus prevailed there. In this point, however, as in so many others, we encounter the difficulty arising from the confusion of the two Philoxeni, for the Leucadian is also said to have spent the latter part of his life in Ephesus. It is time to dismiss these doubtful questions; but still there is one tradition respecting Philoxenus, which passed into a proverb, and which must not be omitted. It is said that, after his quarrel with Dionysus at Syracuse, and during his subsequent residence at Tarentum or Cythera, he received an invitation from the tyrant to return to his court, in reply to which he wrote the single letter O, that is, either as the ancient mode of writing ο, or, as some think, what Philoxenus wrote was ο, as the contracted sign for ο. Hence a flat refusal was proverbially called Φιλοξένου γραμμάτιον (Suid., s. e.; Schmidt, p. 17).

Respecting the works of Philoxenus, Suidas relates that he wrote twenty-four dithyrambs, and a genealogy of the Aeclidæ. The latter poem is not mentioned by any other writer; but another poem, which Suidas does not mention, and which it is hardly likely that he reckoned among the twenty-four dithyrambs, is the Δίσειμον already mentioned, which appears to have been the most popular of his works, and of which we have more fragments than of any other. These fragments, which are almost all in Athenaeus, are so corrupted, owing to the very extraordinary style and phraseology, which the poet purposely adopted, that Casson gave up the emendation of them as hopeless (Animad., in Ath. iv. p. 470). Contributions to their restoration have, however, been made by Jacobs, Schweighauser, and Fiorillo, in their respective annotations upon Athenaeus, and by Bergk, in the Act. Soc. Gr. Lips. for 1836; and recently most of the fragments have been edited by Meineke (Prog. Com. Græc. vol. iii. Epitomiter de Philoxeni Cytheri Conoicio, pp. 635—646, comp. pp. 148, 637, 638, 639, and vol. ii. p. 306), and the whole by Bergk (Poet. Lyr. Græc. pp. 831—860), and by Schmidt (Dithyramb. pp. 29—51), who has also added a discussion on the metre, dialect, and style of the poem (pp. 52—54). The poem is a most minute and satirical description of a banquet, written in a style of language of which no idea can be formed without reading it, but of which the following specimen may convey some slight notion (v. 9):

παντείαλογηlobalατροτιolphτίτικεικειλονιοφιολιονι, with which a line from the parody of it by Aristophanes, in the Ecclesiæusae may be compared (v. 1169):

λεκάδασερασελαχώνενε—

and so on through six lines, forming but one word.

Of the dithyrams of Philoxenus, by far the most important is his Κύκλωφα Εκλατεία, the occasion of his composing which is variously related, but the most probable account has been already given. Aelian (V. H. xii. 44) calls it the most beautiful of his poems, and Hermesianax refers to it in terms of the highest praise (Ath. xiii. p. 598, e.; Fr. 1, ed. Bach). Its loss is greatly to be lamented. The few fragments which remain are collected by Bergk (Poët. Lyr. Græc. l. c.) and by Schmidt, who has added an interesting discussion respecting its plan (Dithyramb. pp. 54—68). The scholarist on the Pairus (l. c.) calls this poem a drama; and several other writers call Philoxenus a tragic poet; but this is probably only one of several instances in which the dithyrambic poets have been erroneously represented as tragedians (see Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græc. p. 262). We have a few other fragments of the poems of Philoxenus (pp. 68, 69), and the following titles of four others of his dithyrambs, though even these are not free from doubt—Μυραλ, Ζηυς, Κασαυρις, Φαλέους.

Of the character of the music to which his dithyrambs were set, we have little other information than the statement that they were publicly chanted in the theatres by the Arcadian youth on certain days of the year (Aristot. Politi. viii. 7; Polyb. iv. 20). He was, however, as we have already seen, included in the attacks which the comic poets made on all the musicians of the day, for their corruptions of the simplicity of the ancient music; and there are several passages in Plutarch's treatise on music, describing the nature of those innovations, in which he followed and even went beyond his master Melanippides, and in which Timonides again vied with him (Plut. de Mus. 12, 29, 30, 31; Schmidt, pp. 72, 73). A curious story is told of his musical composition by Aristotle, who, in confirmation of the statement that the dithyramb belongs essentially to the Phrygian mode, relates that Philoxenus attempted to compose one of his dithyrambs in the Dorian, but that it fell back by the force of its very nature into the proper Phrygian harmony (Aristot. Politi. viii. 7. § 12). In an obscure passage of Pollux (Onom. iv. 9. a. 65, ed. Bekker) the Locrian harmony is stated to be his invention; and the Hypodorian has also been ascribed to him (Schmidt, pp. 73, 74). There is a passage respecting his rhythms in Dionysius of Halicarnassus (de Comp. Verb. p. 131, Reiske).

We have abundant testimony to the high esteem in which the ancients held Philoxenus, both during his life and after his death. The most remarkable eulogy of him is the passage in which the comic poet Antiphares contrasts him with the musicians who came after him (Ath. xiv. p. 643). This, and the testimonies of Machon, Aelian, and others, are given fully by Schmidt (pp. 71, 72). Alexander the Great sent for his poems during his campaigns in Asia (Plut. Alex. 8, de Fort. Alex. p. 355, a.), the Alexandrian grammarians received him into the canon; and, moreover, the very attacks of the comic poets are evidence of his eminence and popularity, and the more so in proportion to their vehemence.

The most important works upon Philoxenus are those of D. Wyttenbach, in his Miscellanea Doctiss. ii. pp. 64—72; Burette, Sur Philoxene, in his Rémarques sur la Dialogue de l'Amour touchant la Musique, in the ed. ém. de l'Acad. des Ins. vol. xiii. pp. 294, &c.; Lnetke, Dissert. de Græc. Dithyramb. pp. 77, &c. Berol. 1829; L. A. Berglein, De Philoxeni Cythcrii Dithyramborum Poeta, Göttling. 1843, 8vo.; G. Bippart, Philoxeni, Theol. Teletis Dithyrambographorum Italiorum, Lips. 1843, 8vo.; G. M. Schmidt, Diastrile in Dithyrambum Poetarumque Dithyramborum Reliquias, c. i. Berol. 1845; the passages already referred to, and others, in the works of Meineke and PHILOXENUS.

2. The other Philoxenus already referred to, the Leoncadian, was the son of Eryxis, and seems himself also to have had a son of the name of Eryxis (Aristoph. Ran. 945). He was a most notorious parasite, glutton, and effeminate debauche; but he seems also to have had great wit and good-humour, which made him a great favourite at the tables which he frequented. The events of his life are of so little importance in themselves, and the statements concerning him are so scattered up with those which relate to Philoxenus of Cythera, that it is enough to refer to the further information to the works upon that poet, quoted above, especially Schmidt (p. 9, &c.). He seems to be the same person as the Philoxenus surnamed Πρεπξονος, and also the same as the Philoxenus of the Dioimien demus, both of whom are ridiculed by the comic poets for their effeminacy.

3. A poet of Siphnus, mentioned in a passage of Pollux (iv. 66), where however the name seems to be a false reading for Theoxenides (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 89; Schmidt, p. 22).

5. The author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology, on Telemomus, the son of Polycritus, who gained an Olympic victory in Ol. 131, n. c. 256 (Paus. v. 8). This must, therefore, be somewhere about the date of the poet, of whom nothing more is known. (Bruckn, Anal. vol. ii. p. 58; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 58, vol. xiii. p. 937.)

7. A Persian by birth, who afterwards was made a bishop, d. 485, and became one of the first leaders of the iconoclasts (Schmidt, p. 23). (P. S.)

PHILOXENUS (Φίλοξενος), an Egyptian surgeon, who, according to Celsius (De Med. vii. Praef. p. 137), wrote several valuable volumes on surgery. He is no doubt the same person whose medical formulae are frequently quoted by Galen, and who is called by him Claudius Philoxenus. (De Compos. Medicom. sec. Gen. ii. 17, iii. 9, vol. xiii. pp. 539, 645.) As he is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacun (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicom. sec. Loc. iv. 7, vol. xii. p. 731; De Compos Medicom. sec. Gen. iii. 9, iv. 13, vol. xiii. pp. 545, 738), he must have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He is quoted also by Soranus (De Arte Obstet. p. 136), Paulus Aegineta (De Med. iii. 32, viii. 11, pp. 453, 650), Aëtius (ii. 3. 77, iv. 3. 7, iv. 4. 43, pp. 331, 744, 800), and Nicolaus Myrepsus (De Compos. Medicom. i. 239, 240, p. 411), and also by Avicenna (Canon, v. 2. 2, vol. i. p. 249, ed. Arab.), where the name is corrupted into Philoxēn, in the old Latin version (vol. ii. p. 319, ed. 1553), and into Phileocanes by Sonthheimer in PHILOXENUS, a painter of Eretria, the discipie of Nicomachus, whose speed in painting he imitated and even surpassed, having discovered some new and rapid methods of colouring (such, at least, appears to be the meaning of Pliny's words, breviores etiamnum quasdam picturas compendiarum invent, H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 22). Nevertheless, Pliny states that there was a picture of his which was inferior to none, of a battle of Alexander with Dareius, which he painted for king Cassander. A similar subject is represented in a celebrated mosaic found at Pompeii, which, however, the best critics think has been copied, more probably, from Helena's picture of the battle of Issus (see Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 163, n. 6). As the disciple of Nicomachus, who flourished about n. c. 360, and as the painter of the battle above-mentioned, Philoxenus must have flourished under Alexander, about n. c. 330 and onwards. The words of Pliny, "Cassandro regi," if taken literally, would show that the date of his great picture must have been after n. c. 317 or 315, for from one of those two years the reign of Cassander must be dated. (Clifton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 236.)

PHILOXENUS, C. AVIANUS, recommended by Cicero to the procusn Actinius, n. c. 46. (Cic. ad Fam. xiiii. 35.)

PHILOZOEE. [TLEPOLEMEMUS.]

PHILETEAS (Φίλετας), of Calhe, an historical writer, the author of a work, in the Ionic dialect, entitled Ναξακας, of which the third book is quoted by Tzetzes (Schol. ad Lycorh. 633). He is also mentioned in a passage of Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 1885, 51), where, however, the name is corrupted into Philetass, and Eudosius, copying the error, places the Ναξακας among the works of Philetas of Cos (Violar. p. 424). That Phileteas is the true form of the name is clear from a passage in the Elynogonum Magnum (p. 785, 12), which, however, contains another error, in the words ὃ καλομενος λιτοραξς, where the Cod. Leid. has ὃ καλο-

PALEA, and the true reading is no doubt ὃ καλεκtaios, which should probably also be substituted for ἢτε Καλλιαος in the passage of Eustathius (see Meineke, Anal. Alex. pp. 351—353.)

PHILITIAS, a vase painter, whose name occurs on two of the vases in the Canino collection, in the forms ΨΙΤΗΑΣ and ΨΙΤΙΑΣ, which Raoul-Rochette and Gerhard at first read Phileitas, but which most authors, including R. Rochette, now read Phili-tias. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schom, p. 55, 2d ed.)

PHILUMENUS (Φιλομένος), a Greek physician, mentioned by an anonymous writer in Dr. Cramer's "Anecdota" (Anec. Graec. Paris. vol. iv. p. 196) as one of the most eminent members of his profession. Nothing is known of the events of his life, and with respect to his date, as the earliest author who quotes him is Oribasius (Coll. Med. viii. 45, p. 361; Synops. iii. pp. 45, 49, viii. 6, 11, 17, pp. 121, 122, 123, 124), it can only be said that he must have lived in or before the fourth century after Christ. None of his writings are extant, but numerous fragments are preserved by Aëtius (see Fabric. Bibli. Gr. vol. viii. p. 328, ed. vel.). He is quoted also by Alexander Trallianus (viii. 5, 9, pp. 246, 251), and Rhazes (Cont. v. 1).

[W. A. G.]
PHILUS, the name of a family of the patrician Furia gens.

1. P. Furius Sp. P. M. N. Philus, was consul B. c. 223 with C. Flaminius, and accompanied his colleague in his campaign against the Gauls in the north of Italy. [FAMINUS, No. 1.] He was elected praetor in the third year of the second Punk war, B. c. 216, when he obtained the jurisdictio inter class Romano et peregrinos; and after the fatal battle of Cannae in this year, he and his colleague M. Pomponius Matho summoned the senate to take measures for the defence of the city. Shortly afterwards he received the fleet from M. Claudius Marcellus, with which he proceeded to Africa, but having been severely wounded in an engagement off the coast he returned to Lilibeum. In B. c. 214 he was censor with M. Attilius Regulus, but he died at the beginning of the following year, before the solemn purification (lustrum) of the people had been performed; and Regulus accordingly, as was usual in such cases, resigned his office. These censors visited with severity all persons who had failed in their duty to their country during the great calamities which Rome had lately experienced. They reduced to the condition of aerariens all the young nobles, who had formed the project of leaving Italy after the battle of Cannae, among whom was L. Caecilius Metellus, who was qu aes tar in the year of their consaluh. B. c. 214. As, however, Metellus was elected tribune of the plebs for the following year notwithstanding this degradation, he attempted to bring the censors to trial before the people, immediately after entering upon his office, but was prevented by the other tribunes from prosecuting such an unprecedented course. [METELLUS, No. 3.] Philus was also one of the augurs at the time of his death. [Liv. xxi. 35, 55, 57, xxii. 21, xxiv. 11, 18, 43, xxv. 2; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 6.)

2. P. Furius Philus, the son of the preceding, informed Scipio in B. c. 216, after the battle of Cannae, of the design of L. Caecilius Metellus and others to leave Italy, to which reference has been made above. [Liv. xxiv. 53.)

3. P. Furius Philus, praetor B. c. 174, obtained Nearer Spain as his province. On his return to Rome he was accused by the provincials of repetundae. The elder Cato spoke against him: on the first hearing the case was adjourned (amplius), but bearing a condemnation, when it came on again, Philus went into exile to Praeneste, B. c. 171. [Liv. xili. 21, xili. 2; Cic. in Caecl. Dis. 20; Pseudo-Ascon. in loc. p. 124, ed. Orelli; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Fraqna. p. 97, 2nd ed.)

4. L. Furius Philus, probably brother of the preceding, was praetor B. c. 171, and obtained Sardinia as his province. He was one of the pontifices, and died in B. c. 170. [Liv. xili. 28, 31, xili. 13, July. [FLAMINUS, No. 1.] Philus was consul B. c. 136 with Sex. Attilius Serranus. He received Spain as his province, and was commissioned by the senate to deliver up to the Numantines C. Hostilius Mancinus, the consul of the preceding year. [MANNUS, No. 3.] On that occasion Philus had with him as legati Q. Pompeius and Q. Metellus, two of his greatest enemies, that they might be compelled to bear witness to his uprightness and integrity.

A contemporary of the younger Scipio and of Laelius, Philus participated with them in a love for Greek literature and refinement. He cultivated the society of the most learned Greeks, and was himself a man of no small learning for those times. He was particularly celebrated for the purity with which he spoke his mother-tongue. He is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Republica, and is described by the latter as a man "moderatissimus et continentissimus." [Dion Cass. Fragm. lxxiv. p. 36, ed. Reimar; Val. Max. iii. 7. § 5; Cic. de Offic. iii. 30, de Rep. iii. 18, Brut. 28; de Or. ii. 37, pro Arch. 7, de Leg. Agr. ii. 24, de Rep. i. 11, ad Att. iv. 16, Lael. 4, 6, 19, 27.) His praenomen was Luicius, and not Publius, as it is erroneously given in one passage of Cicero (ad Att. xii. 5. § 3), and by many modern writers.

6. M. Furius Philus, occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Janus with the legend M. FOVRI. L.P., the reverse Pallas or Rome crowning a trophy, and below PHIL.

COIN OF M. FURUS PHILUS.

L. Philus' Sicius, was proscribed by Sulla and escaped, but was again proscribed by the triumvirs in B. c. 43, and perished. (Dion Cass. xivii. 11.)

2. The wife of Nauplius, according to some traditions, for she is commonly called Clymene (Apol. i. i. § 4.).

Philyllyus (Phiailaios), an Athenian comic poet, contemporary with Diocles and Sannyrion. (Suid. s. v. Diaolah.) He belongs to the latter part of the Old Comic, and the beginning of the Middle; for, on the one hand, he seems to have attained to some distinction before the time when the Ecclesiastseuma of Aristophanes was acted, B. c. 392 (Schol. ad Aristoph. Plat. 1195), and, on the other, nearly all the titles of his plays belong evidently to the Middle Comic. He is said to have introduced some scenic innovations, such as bringing lighted torches on the stage (Schol. Plut. i. c.; Ath. xv. 700, c.). With regard to his language, Meineke mentions a few words and phrases, which are not pure Attic. His name is corrupted by the Greek lexicographers and others into Phallaios, Phallaios, Phylaios, and other forms. The following titles of his plays are given by Suidas and Eudocia, and in the following order:—

PHINEUS.

PHINEUS (Φίνεας). 1. A son of Belus and Anchise, and brother of Aegyptus, Danaus, and Cepheus. (Apollod. ii. 1 § 4 ; comp. Perseus.)

2. One of the sons of Lycaon. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1.)

3. A son of Agenor, and king of Salmydessus in Thrace (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 178, 237 ; Schol. ad epistul. ii. 177). Some traditions called him a son of Phoenix and Cassiopae, and a grandson of Agenor (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 178), while others again call him a son of Poseidon (Apollod. i. 3 § 21). Some accounts, moreover, make him a king in Phaphugonia or in Arcadia. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. l.c.; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 209.) He was first married to Cleopatra, the daughter of Boreas and Oreithyia, by whom he had two children, Orithys (Oartus) and Crambis (some called them Parthenius and Crambis, Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 140; Plexippus and Pandion, Apollod., iij. 15 § 3; Gerynbaus and Aspondus, Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 977; or Polydeuces and Polydorus, Or. Th. 273). Afterwards he was married to Idaea (some call her Dia, Eurytis, or Eidithos, Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. l.c.; Schol. ad Hom. Od. xiji. 70; Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 980), by whom he again had two sons, Thynus and Marinandas. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 140, 178; Apollod. iii. 15, § 3.)

Phineus was a blind soothsayer, who had received his prophetic powers from Apollo (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 160). The cause of his blindness is not the same in all accounts; according to some he was blinded by the gods for having imprudently communicated to mortals the divine counsels of Zeus about the future (Apollod. i. 3 § 31); accord- ing to others he was a Tyrant, or hearing of the story of Phrixus he became by Phineus, cursed him, and Helios hearing the curse, carried it into effect by blinding him (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 207, comp. 181); others again relate, that Boreas or the Argonauts blinded him for his conduct towards his sons (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 209). He is most celebrated in ancient story on account of his being exposed to the annoyances of the Harpies, who were sent to him by the gods for his cruelty towards his sons by the first marriage. His second wife charged them with having behaved improperly to her, and Phineus punished them by putting their eyes out (Soph. Antig. 973), or, according to others, by exposing them to be devoured by wild beasts (Orph. Argon. 671), or by ordering them to be half buried in the earth, and then to be scoured (Diod. iv. 44; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 207). Whenever Phineus wanted to take a meal the Harpies came, took away a portion of his food, and wrested the rest, so as to render it unfit to be eaten.

In this condition the unfortunate man was found by the Argonauts, whom he promised to instruct respecting their voyage, if they would deliver him from the monsters. A table accordingly was laid out with food, and when the Harpies appeared they were forthwith attacked by Zetes and Calais, the brothers of Cleopatra, who were provided with wings. There was a prophecy that the Harpies should perish by the hands of the sons of Boreas, but that the latter themselves must die if they should be unable to overtake the Harpies. In their flight one of the monsters fell into the river Tigris, which was henceforth called Harpya; the other reached the Echidian islands, which, from her returning from that spot, were called Strophades. But the Harpya, as well as her pursuer, was worn out with fatigue, and fell down. Both Harpies were allowed to live on condition that they would no longer molest Phineus (comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 286, 297; Tzet. Chil. i. 217). Phineus now explained to the Argonauts the further course they had to take, and especially cautioned them against the Symplegades (Apollod. i. 3 § 21, &c.). According to another story the Argonauts, on their arrival at the place of Phineus, found the sons of Phineus half buried, and demanded their liberation, which Phineus refused. The Argonauts used force, and a battle ensued, in which Phineus was slain by Hercules. The latter also delivered Cleopatra from her confinement, and restored the kingdom to the sons of Phineus, and on their advice he also married the second wife of Phineus back to her father, who ordered her to be put to death (Diod. iv. 43; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 207; Apollod. iii. 15, § 3). Some traditions, lastly, state that Phineus was killed by Boreas, or that he was carried off by the Harpies into the country of the Bistones or Vilichessians. (Orph. Argon. 675, &c.; Strab. vii. p. 302.) Those accounts in which Phineus is stated to have blinded his sons, add that they had their sight restored to them by the sons of Boreas, or by Asclepius. (Orph. Argon. 674; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. xiii. 96.) [L. S.]

PHINTIAS (Φιντίας). 1. A Pythagorean, the friend of Damon, who was condemned to die by Dionysius the elder. The well-known anecdote of their friendship, and the effect produced by it on the tyrant, has been already related under DAMON. Valerius Maximus writes the name Pythias; but it is probable that the Greek authors in adopting the form Phintias.

2. Tyrant of Agrigentum, who appears to have established his power over that city during the period of confusion which followed the death of Agathocles (b. c. 289), about the same time that Hicetas obtained the chief command at Syracuse. War soon broke out between these two despots, in which Phintias was defeated near Ibyla. But this success having induced Hicetas to engage with a more formidable enemy, the Carthaginians, he was defeated in his turn, and Phintias, who was probably in alliance with that power, was now able to extend his authority over a considerable part of Sicily. Among the cities subject to his rule we find mention of Atrium, which is a sufficient proof of the extent of his dominions. He at the same time made a display of his wealth and power by founding a new city, to which he gave his own name, and whither he removed all the inhabitants from Gela, which he razed to the ground. His oppressive and tyrannical government subsequently alienated the minds of his subjects, and caused the revolt of many of the dependent cities; but he had the wisdom to change his line of policy, and, by adopting a milder rule, retained possession of the sovereignty until his death. The period of this is not mentioned, but we may probably infer from the fragments of Diodorus, that it preceded the expulsion of Hicetas from Syracuse, and may therefore be referred to b. c. 279. (Diod. xxii. Exc. Hoesched. p. 495, Exc. Valer. p. 562.)

There are extant coins of Phintias, from which we learn that he assumed the title of king, in imitation of Agathocles. They all have the figure of a boar running on the reverse, and a head of Apollo or Diana on the obverse. Those which have been published with the head of Phintias himself are probably spurious. (See Eckhel, vol. i. p. 266.) [E. H. B.]

PHILEUS, archtect. [PHILEUS.]

PHLEGON [Φλῆγων], one of the horses of Sol. (Ov. Met. ii. 154; Hygin. Fab. 183.) [L. S.]

PHLEGON (Φλῆγων), a native of Tralles in Lydia, was a freedman of the emperor Hadrian, and not of Augustus, as has been erroneously asserted by some writers, on the authority of Suidas (comp. Phot. Cod. 97; Spartan. Hadr. 16, Sever. 20; Vopisc. Scurin. 7). Phleon probably survived Hadrian, since his work on the Olympiads came down to Ol. 229, that is, A. D. 197, which was the year before the death of this emperor. The following is a list of the writings of Phleon.

1. Περί Λαμπάδων, a small treatise on wonderful events, which has come down to us, but the begining of which is wanting. It is a poor performance, full of the most ridiculous tales, and with the exception of the work of Psellus, the worst of the Greek treatises on this subject.

2. Περί μακροβίων, which is likewise extant, consists of only a few pages, and gives a list of persons in Italy who had attained the age of a hundred years and upwards. It was copied from the registers of the censors (εἰς αὐτῶν τῶν ἀντίκει-σων), is a bare enumeration of names, and is not worthy to be compared with the work on the same subject ascribed to Lucian. At the end there is an extract from the Sibylline oracles of some sixty or seventy lines. These are the only works of Phleon which have come down to us.

3. Οἰλιμπιονικά καὶ χρονικοὶ συναγωγά, which is sometimes quoted under the title of χρονογραφίαι or Οἰλιμπιαδές, was in seventeen books, and gave an account of the Olympiads from Ol. 1 (b.c. 776) to Ol. 229 (A. D. 137). It was dedicated to Alcibiades, who was one of the body-guards of Hadrian. This was by far the most important of the works of Phleon. The commencement of the book is preserved in the manuscripts of the other works of Phleon, and an extract from it relying to the 177th Olympiad is given by Photius (Cod. 97); but with these exceptions, and a few references to it in Stephanus Byzantinus, Eusebius, Origia, and others, the work is entirely lost. The style of it is characterized by Photius as not very mean, but at the same time as not pure Attic;
and he blames likewise the excessive care and attention bestowed by the author upon oracles.

4. Οἰλιμπιαδές ἐν βιβλίοις η', was on the same subject as the preceding work, and must be regarded as a sort of abridgment of it: Clinton has remarked, with justice, that Photius probably quoted from this shorter work in eight books, and not from the larger work in sixteen. Photius tells us that the fifth book completed Olympiad 177; now we learn from other quarters that Phleon in his 13th book described Ol. 203; and it is therefore not likely that he employed 8 books (lib. 6—13) 26 Olympiads, and 5 on 177. But if Photius quoted the epitome in eight books, the first five might contain 177 Olympiads, and the last three the remaining 32. Photius himself did not read further than Ol. 177.

5. Εποτηρί Οἰλιμπιονικά ἐν βιβλίοις β', is expressly mentioned by Suidas as an epitome, and probably differed from the preceding abridgment in containing no historical information, but simply a list of the Olympic prizewinners.

6. Εκπραεις Σελευκας.

7. Περὶ τῶν παρὰ Ρωμαίοις έστητόν Βιβλία γ'.

8. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Ρώμῃ τῶν καὶ ἐν ἐπικέφαλtαι ὄνωματων. These works are mentioned only by Suidas.

9. A Life of Hadrian, was really written by the emperor himself, though published as the work of Phleon. (Spartan. Hadr. 16.)

10. Γυναῖκες ἐν τοιχομενί τοιχεία καὶ ἀνθρώπης, a small treatise, first published by Heeren (in Bibli.
d. Alten. Literat. und Kunst, part vi. Göttingen, 1789), by whom it is ascribed to Phleon; but Westermann, who has also printed it, with the other works of Phleon, thinks that it was not written by him.

The Edicta Principes of Phleon was edited by Xylander, along with Antonius Liberalis, Anti-genius, and similar writers, Basel, 1568. The next edition was by Meursius, Lugd. Batav. 1620, which was reprinted by Gronovius, in his Thesaurus of Greek Antiquities, vol. viii. and ix.
The third edition was by Fr. Franz, 1775, of which a new edition appeared in 1823, Halle, with the notes of Bast. The most recent edition is by Westermann in his Παραδοτογράφοι, Scriptores Rerum Mirabilium Graeci, Brunsvig. 1839. The fragments on the Olympiads have also been published in the edition of Pindar published at Oxford in 1697, fol., and in Krause's Ολυμπία, Wien, de Hist. Graec. p. 261, ed. Westermann ; Clinton, Fasti Romani, vol. i. p. 127; Westermann, Praefatio ad Paradoctogramos, p. xxxvii. &c.)

PHLEGYAS (Φλῆγυας), a king of the Lapithe, a son of Ares and Chryse, the daughter of Halune, succeeded Eteocles, who died without issue, in the government of the district of Orchoomenos, which he called after himself Phlegyantis. (Paus.
ix. 36. § 1; Apollod. iii. 5. § 5.) By Chryse he became the father of Coronis, who became by Apollo the mother of Asclepius. Enraged at this, Phlegeyas set fire to the temple of the God, who killed him with his arrows, and condemned him to severe punishment in the lower world. (Hom.
Hymn. xv. 5; Pind. Pyth. iii. 14; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3, ii. 26. § 4; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 618; Stat. Theb. i. 713.) According to another tradition Phlegeyas had no children, and was killed by Lycus and Nycteus. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 5.) Stobao

PHLEON (Φλῆον), i. e. the giver of plenty, is a surname of Dionysus, describing the god as promoting the fertility of plants and trees. (Aelian, V. H. iii. 41.) A similar surname of the god is Phyleus (from φλήον; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod.
i. ii. 115.) [L. S.]

COIN OF PHINTIAS.

PHLETEUS, architect. [PHILEUS.]

PHLEGETHON (Φλῆγηθόν), i. e. the flaming,
a river in the lower world, is described as a son of Cocytus; but he is more commonly called Pyrrhet-522.) [L. S.]

PHLEGON (Φλῆγων), one of the horses of Sol.
PHOCAS.

PHILIAS (Φιλιάς), a son of Dionysus and Chthonophyle, also called Phlius, was a native of Arathryeia in Argolis, and is mentioned as one of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 115, with the Schol.; Paus. ii. 12. § 6; Val. Flacc. i. 411.) According to Pausanias, he was a son of Ceius and Arathryea, and the husband of Chthonophyle, by whom he became the father of Andromachus; and Hyginus (Fab. 14) calls him Phliasus, and a son of Dionysus and Ariadne. The town of Phlius (formerly called Arathryeia) was believed to have derived its name from him. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Φιλιας.)

PHOBUS (Φόβος), Latin Metus, the personification of fear, is described as a son of Ares and Cytherea, a brother of Deimos, and is one of the ordinary companions of Ares. (Hom. Il. xi. 37, xiii. 299, xv. 119; Hes. Theog. 934.) Phobus was represented on the shield of Agamemnon, on the chest of Cypselus, with the head of a lion. (Paus. v. 19. § 1.)

PHOCAS (Φωκᾶς), emperor of Constantinople from A.D. 602 to 610. The circumstances under which this monster was raised to the throne are related at the end of the life of the emperor MAUERCIUS. Phocas was of base extraction, and a native of Cappadocia. He had once had to take up his abode in Persia, had been the contemporary of Ares and Cytherea, and was one of the brothers of the name of Ares. He was the son of a Cyprian nobleman, and was himself the judge of the city of Cyzicus. His brutal courage had gained him a name among the common soldiers, and among those of his companions who liked warfare as the art of butchering mankind. His coronation took place on the 23rd of November 602; his wife Leontia was likewise crowned. After he had momentarily quenched his thirst for revenge and murder in the blood of Mauricius, of his five sons, and of his most eminent adherents, such as Constantin Lardys, Comentilius and others, he bought an ignoble peace from the Avars, but was prevented from enjoying it by a fierce attack of the Persian king Chosroes. This prince considered the accession of a despicable murderer to the Byzantine throne as a fair opportunity of avenging himself for the many defeats he had suffered from Mauricius; and he was astonished to find that the Persian army was commanded by Narses, a faithful adherent of the late emperor, and then commander-in-chief on the Persian frontier. Anxious to escape the fate of so many of his friends, Narses made overtures to Chosroes, left the head-quarters of his army, and remained in a sort of neutral position at Hierapolis. Thus a war broke out with Persia which lasted twenty-four years, the first eighteen of which presented an uninterrupted series of misfortunes to the Romans, and which was decidedly the most disastrous that was ever carried on between the two empires. Asia Minor from the Euphrates to the very shores of the Bosphorus was laid waste by the Persians; a great number of its populous and flourishing cities was laid in ashes; and hundreds of thousands of its inhabitants were carried off into slavery beyond the Tigris. But for this war Asia Minor would have better withstood the attacks of the Arabs, who some years later achieved what the Persians had begun. Afraid to lose his crown if he absented himself from Constantinople, and feeling, as it seems, the inferiority of his military capacities, Phocas remained in his capital to enjoy executions and beastly pleasures, while the eunuch Leontius

PHOCAS. started for the theatre of war with a motley army composed of the most incongruous elements. He thus encountered the Persian veterans commanded by their king Chosroes, the greatest man of the East. At Darra the eunuch was utterly defeated. His successor Dometiulus, the emperor's brother, was likewise unable to stop the progress of the enemy, and from the Black Sea to the confines of Egypt the Persians ravaged the country. During this time Dometiulus entered into negotiations with Narses with a view of reconciling him with the emperor. Beguiled by the brilliant promises of Dometiulus, Narses imprudently left his stronghold, and finally proceeded to Constantinople. While he hoped to be placed again at the head of the Roman armies, he was suddenly arrested, and without further inquiries condemned to death. He was burnt alive. Thus perished the worthy namesake of the great Narses, with whom he has often been confounded, although the one was a centurian when the other first tried his sword against the Persians. This Narses was so much feared by the Persians that mothers used to frighten their children with his name. His murder increased the unpopularity of the emperor. Emperor Theodorus, who succeeded him, was a sterner prince than his predecessor. He believed, and no one could persuade him of the contrary, that the Persian empire was the natural base of the empire of the Romans. Theodorus, the eldest son of Mauricius, who had once had a chance of obtaining the crown, now persuaded the captive emperor Constantin to form a plot against the life of the tyrant. She consented, being under the impression that her son Theodorus was still alive, and accompanied by one Scholasticus, who seems to have been the scape-goat in this affair, she left her dwelling, together with her three daughters, and followed him to the church of St. Sophia. At her aspect the people were moved with pity. They took up arms, and a terrible riot ensued. But for the bad will of John, the leader of the Greens, who paid for his conduct by being burnt alive by the mob, the outbreak would have been crowned with success. As it was, however, Phocas had the upper hand. The riot was quelled; Scholasticus was put to death; and Germanus was forced to take the monastic habit; he had managed things so cleverly that his name was never associated with him; else he would have paid for the plot with his life. The empress Constantia found a protector in the person of the patriarch Cyrus, and her life was spared; but she was confined in a monastery with her three daughters. The general hatred against Phocas, however, was so great that Constantia braved the dangers of another conspiracy which broke out in 607, and in which she interested several of the principal personages of the empire: she still believed that her son Constantia was alive. A woman contrived this plot, and a woman frustrated it. This was Petronia, who, being in the entire confidence of the empress, was employed by her as a messenger between the different parties, and who sold the secret to Phocas as soon as she had gathered sufficient evidence against its leaders. The tyrant quelled the plot by bloody, but decisive measures. Constantia and her three daughters had their heads cut off at Chaledon, on the same spot where her husband and her five sons had suffered death. Among those of her chief adherents who paid for their rashness with their lives were Georgius, governor of Cappadocia; Romanus, advocatus curiae; Theodorus, praefectus Orientis; Joannes, primus e secretaries; Athanasius, the minister of finances; David, master of the palace, and many others besides great noblemen the Seres, who all suffered death under the most horrible torments. The tyrant's fury, the devastations of the Avars, the alarming success of the Persians, threw the empire into consternation and despair. Dara, the bulwark of the empire towards the Tigris, was taken by Chosroes in 606; Edessa, of no less importance, shared its fate; Syria was a heap of ruins; Mesopotamia yielded to the king; whosoever was suspected of having been a friend to Mauricius, or of being opposed to the present state of things, was seen bleeding under the axe of the executioner. At last Phocas insulted his former favourite Crispus, the husband of his only daughter Domentia, who had vainly endeavored to produce a change in the conduct of the emperor. Crispus, a sensible and well-disposed man, looked out for assistance, and fully aware of the chances which any conspiracy run that was carried on in the corrupted capital, he sought it at the farthest extremity of the empire, in Mauritania. Heraclius, exarch of Africa, was the person upon whom his choice fell. Confiding in his strength and the love of the Africans, Heraclius entered into the plans of Crispus, and began to show his sentiments by prohibiting the exportation of corn from the ports of Africa and Egypt, from whence Constantinople used to draw its principal supplies. The consequence was, as was expected, discontent in the capital. Although urged by Crispus to declare himself openly, Heraclius wisely continued his policy during two years. Meanwhile, the name of Phocas was extirpated throughout the whole empire; and owing to a mad order which he gave for the baptism of all the Jews in his dominions, a terrible riot broke out in Alexandria. Shortly before this, the Persians, after having routed Domentiolus near Edessa, inun dated all Asia Minor, appeared at Chalcedon, opposite Constanti nople, and laden with booty retired at the approach of the winter (609—610). This led to riots in Constantinople, and a bloody strife between the Blues and the Greens. Phocas was insulted by the populace, and the means he chose to restore quiet were only calculated to increase the troubles; for by a formal decree he incapacitated every adherent of the green faction from holding any office, either civil or military. Now, at the proper moment, Heraclius, the eldest son of the exarch Heraclius, left the shores of Africa with a fleet, and his cousin Nicetas set out at the head of an army for Constantinople, where Crispus was ready to receive and assist them without throwing away the slightest pretense of the approaching storm. Their success is related in the life of Heraclius. On the third of October, 610, Constantinople was in the hands of Heraclius, after a sharp contest with the mercenaries of Phocas, who spent the ensuing night in a fortified palace, which was defended by a strong body. The guard fled during the night. Early in the morning the senator Pho tius approached it with a small band, and finding the place unguarded, entered and seized upon Phocas, whom they put into a boat and paraded through the fleet. He was then brought before Heraclius on board the imperial galley. Heraclius, forgetting his dignity, felled the captive monster to the ground, trampled upon him with his feet, and charged him with his abominable government. "Wilt thou govern better," was the insolent answer of the fallen tyrant. After this triumph Heraclius routed Phocas, who had his head struck off. His body was dragged through the streets, and afterwards burned, together with that of Domentiolus, who had fallen in the battle. Phocas, the most blood-thirsty tyrant that ever disgraced the throne of Constantinople, was as ugly in body as monstrous in mind. He was short, beardless, with red hair, shaggy eyebrows; and a great scar disfigured his face all the more, as it became black when his passions were roused. Heraclius was crowned immediately after the death of his rival. (Theoph. p. 244, &c.; Cedren. p. 359, &c.; Chron. Pasch. p. 379—383; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 77, &c. in the Paris ed.; Simocatta, vii. c. 7, &c.)

PHOCAS, JOANES. [Joannes, No. 100.]

PHOCAS (ΦΟΚΑΣ), the name of an engraver of gems, which appears on a stone described by Caylus (Rerouil. vii. pl. xxvii.).

PHIO'CION (Φιοικίος), the Athenian general and statesman, son of Phocas, was a man of humble origin, and appears to have been born in n. c. 402 (see Clint. F. H. sub amis 376, 317). According to Plutarch he studied under Plato and Xenocrates, and if we may believe the statement in Suidas (ν. Χ. Φιλανδρος Αγνύντης), Diogenes also numbered him among his disciples. He distingui shed himself for the first time under his friend Chabrias, in n. c. 376, at the battle of Naxos, in which he commanded the left wing of the Athenian fleet, and contributed in a great measure to the victory [CHABRIAS]. After the battle Chabrias sent him to the islands to demand their contribu tions (συντρόφωρός), and offered him a squadron of twenty ships for the service; but Phocion refused them, with the remark that they were too few to act against an enemy, and too many to deal with friends; and sailing to the several allies with only one galley, he obtained a large supply by his frank and conciliatory bearing. Plutarch tells us that his skill and gallantry at the battle of Naxos caused his countrymen thenceforth to regard him as one likely to do them good service as a general. Yet for many years, during which Chabrias, Iphicrates, and Timotheus chiefly filled the public eye, we do not find Phocion mentioned as occupied prominently in any capacity. But we cannot suppose that he held himself aloof all this time from active business, though we know that he was never anxious to be employed by the state and may well believe that he had imbibed from Plato principles and views of social policy, which must in a measure have indisposed him for public life, though they did not actually keep him from it. In n. c. 351 he undertook, together with Evagoras, the command of the forces which had been collected by Iridius, prince of Caria, for the purpose of re ducing Cyprus into submission to Artaxerxes III. (Oechus), and they succeeded in conquering the whole island, with the exception of Salamis, where Pythagoras held out against them until he found means of reconciling himself to the Persian king. [EVAgoras, No. 2.] To the next year (n. c. 350) Phocion's expedition to Enoeae and the battle of Tamynae are referred by Clinton, whom we have followed above in Vol. I. p. 568, a; but his ground for this date are not at all satisfactory, and the events in question should probably be referred to

PHOCION.

B.C. 334. The vote for the expedition was passed against the advice of Demosthenes, and in consequence of an application from Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria, for assistance against CALLIAS. The Athenians, however, appear to have over-rated the strength of their party in the island, and neglected therefore to provide a sufficient force. The little army of Phocion was still further thinned by desertions, which he made no effort to check, remarking that those who fled were not good soldiers enough to be of use to the enemy, and that for his part he thought himself well rid of them, since their consciousness of their own misconduct would stop their mouths at home, and silence their slanders against him. In the course of the campaign he was drawn into a position at Tarnyme, where defeat would have been fatal, and his danger was moreover increased by the rashness or treachery of his ally Plutarchus: but he gained the day by his skill and coolness after an obstinate engagement, and, dealing thenceforth with Plutarchus as an enemy, drove him from Eretria, and occupied a fortress named Zaretara, conveniently situated between the eastern and western seas, in the narrowest part of the island. All the Greek prisoners who fell into his hands here, he released, lest the Athenians should wreak their vengeance on them; and on his departure, his loss was much felt by the allies of Athens, whose cause declined grievously under his successor, Molossus.

It was perhaps in B.C. 343 that, a conspiracy having been formed by Phocedorus and some of the other chief citizens in Megara to betray the town to Philip (Plut. Phoc. 15; comp. Dem. de Cor. pp. 242, 324, de Fals. Leg. pp. 435, 436), the Megarians applied to Athens for aid, and Phocion was sent thither in command of a force with which he fortified the port Nisaea, and joined it by two long walls to the city. The expedition, if it is to be referred to this occasion, was successful, and the design of the conspirators was baffled. In B.C. 341 Phocion commanded the troops which were despatched to Eubea, on the motion of Demosthenes, to act against the party of Philip, and succeeded in expelling Cleitarchus and Philistides from Eretria and Oreus respectively, and establishing the Athenian ascendancy in the island. [CALLIAS; CLEITARCHUS.] In B.C. 340, when the Athenians, indifferent at the refusal of the Byzantines to receive Chares, who had been sent to their aid against Philip, were disposed to interfere no further in the war, Phocion reminded them that their anger should be directed, not against their allies for their distrust, but against their own generals, whose conduct had excluded it. The people recognised the justice of this, and passed a vote for a fresh force, to the command of which Phocion himself was elected. On his arrival at Byzantium, he did not attempt to enter the city, but encamped outside the walls. Clean, however, a Byzantine, who had been his friend and fellow-pupil in the Academy, pledged himself to his countrymen for his integrity, and the Athenians were admitted into the town. Here they gained the good opinion of all by their orderly and irreproachable conduct, and exhibited the greatest courage and zeal against the besiegers. The result was that Philip was compelled to abandon his attempts on Perinthus and Byzantium, and to evacuate the Chersonesus, while Phocion took several of his ships, recovered some of the cities which were garrisoned with Macedonian troops, and made descents on many parts of the coast, over-running and ravaging the enemy's territory.

In the course of these operations, however, he received some severe wounds, and was obliged to sail away. According to Plutarch, Phocion, after this success of the Athenian arms, strongly recommended peace with Philip. His opinion we know was overruled, and the counsels of Demosthenes prevailed; and the last desperate struggle, which ended in 338 so fatally for Greece at Chaeroneia, was probably regarded by Phocion with little of enthusiasm. Indeed, we are told that he thought Philip had summoned all the Greek states to a general congress at Corinth, and Demades proposed that Athens should send deputies thither, Phocion advised his countrymen to pause until it should be ascertained what Philip would demand of the confederates. His counsel was again rejected, but the Athenians afterwards repented that they had not followed it, when they found contributions of ships and cavalry imposed on them by the congress. On the murder of Philip in 336 becoming known at Athens, Demosthenes proposed a public sacrifice of thanksgiving for the tides, and the establishment of religious honours to the memory of the assassin Pausanias; but Phocion resisted the proposal on the two-fold ground, that such signs of joy betokened a mean spirit, and that, after all, the army which had conquered at Chaeroneia was diminished only by one man. The second reason he could hardly expect to pass current, so transparent is its fallacy; but it seems that, on the whole, his representations succeeded in checking the unseemly exultation of the people. When, in B.C. 335, Alexander was marching towards Thebes, Phocion rebuked Demosthenes for his invectives against the king, and complained that he was recklessly endangering Athens, and after the destruction of Thebes, he advised the Athenians to comply with Alexander's demand for the surrender of Demosthenes and other chief orators of the anti-Macedonian party, urging at the same time on these objects of the conqueror's anger the propriety of devoting themselves for the public good, like those ancient heroines, the daughters of Leos and the Hycainthides. This proposal, however, the latter portion of which sounds like sarcastic irony, was clamorously and indignantly rejected by the people, and an embassy was sent to Alexander, which succeeded in deprecating his resentment [DEMADES]. According to Plutarch, there were two embassies, the first of which Alexander refused to receive, but to the second he gave a gracious audience, and granted its prayer, chiefly from regard to Phocion, who was at the head of it. (See Plut. Phoc. 17, Dem. 23; Arr. Anab. i. 10; Diod. xvii. 15.) From the same author we learn that Alexander ever continued to treat Phocion with the utmost consideration, and to cultivate his friendship, influenced no doubt, in great measure, by respect for his character, but not without an eye at the same time to his political sentiments, which were favourable to Macedonian ascendancy. Thus he addressed letters to him with a mode of salutation (xape̱ropo̱s), which he adopted to no one else except Antipater. He also pressed upon him valuable presents and desired Ctenarchus, whom he sent home with the veterans in B.C. 324, to give him his choice of four Asiatic cities. Phocion, however, persisted in refusing all such offers, legnyllus, with the remark that Menyllus was not a greater man than Alexander, whose gifts he had before declined; and he told Antipater, when he required of him some unbestowing action, that he could not have in him at once a friend and a flatterer.

On the death of Antipater in n. c. 319, Cassander, anxious to anticipate his rival Polysperchon in making himself master of Athens, sent Nicanor to supersede Menyllus in Munychia, as if by Antipater's authority, and when the real state of the case became known, Phocion did not escape the suspicion of having been privy to the deceit. He certainly had been guilty to the charge of intimacy with Nicanor, with whom however, as before with Menyllus, he used his influence in behalf of his fellow-citizens. But the discontent which his conduct had excited in them was still further increased by his obstinate refusal to distrust Nicanor or to take any steps against him, when the latter, instead of withdrawing the garrison in obedience to the decree of Polysperchon, continued to delude the Athenians with evasions and pretences, till he at length succeeded in occupying the Peiraeus as well as Munychia, and then declared openly that he meant to hold them both for Cassander. Shortly after this, Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, arrived at Athens, with the supposed intention of delivering it from Nicanor, and re-establishing democracy. Many Athenian exiles came with him, as well as a number of strangers and disfranchised citizens, and by the votes of these in the assembly Phocion was deposed from his office. He then, according to Diodorus, persuaded Alexander that he could not maintain his hold on the city without seizing Munychia and the Peiraeus for himself, a design, however, which Alexander had doubtless already formed before any communication with Phocion. But the Athenians at any rate regarded the latter as the author of it; and their suspicions being further roused by the private conferences of Alexander with Nicanor, Phocion was accused of treason by Agonides and fled, with several of his friends, to Alexander, who sent them with letters of recommendation to Polysperchon, then encamped at Phrygaea, a village of Phocis. Hither there came the same time an Athenian embassy, with Agonides at the head of it, to accuse Phocion and his adherents. Polysperchon, having doubtless made up his mind to sacrifice them as a peace-offering to the Athenians, whom he meant still to curb with a garrison, listened with favour to the charges, but would not hear the reply of the accused, and Phocion and his friends were sent back in wagons to Athens for the people to deal with them as they would. Here again, in an assembly mainly composed of a mixed mob of disfranchised citizens, and foreigners, and slaves, Phocion strove in vain to obtain a hearing. By some it was even proposed that he should be tortured; but this was not tolerated even by Agonides. The sentence of death, however, was carried by acclamation, and appeared to have been executed forthwith. To the last, Phocion maintained his calm, and dignified, and somewhat contemptuous bearing. When some wretched man spat upon him as he passed to the prison, "Will no one," said he, "check this fellow's indecency?" To one who asked him whether he had any message to leave for his son Phocus, he answered, "Only that he bear no grudge against the Athenians." And when the hemlock which had been prepared was found inadequate for all the condemned, and the jailer would not furnish more until he was paid for it.

"Give the man his money," said Phocion to one of his friends, "since at Athens one cannot even die for nothing." He perished in n. c. 317, at the age of 85. In accordance with the law against traitors, his body was cast out on the confines of Attica and Megara (see Diet. of Ant. s. v. Prodosia), and his friends were obliged to hire a man, who was in the habit of undertaking such services, to burn it. His bones were reverently gathered up and buried by a woman of Megara; and afterwards, when the people repented of their conduct, were brought back to Athens, and interred at the public expense. A brazen statue was then raised to his memory, Agonides was condemned to die, and two more of his accusers, Epicurus and Demophilus, having fled from the city, were over taken and slain by Phocus.
Phocion was twice married, and his second wife appears to have been as simple and frugal in her habits as himself; but he was less fortunate in his son Phocis, who, in spite of his father's lessons and example, was a thorough profligate. As for Phocion himself, our commentations on him must be almost wholly confined to his private qualities.
He is said to have been the last eminent Athenian who united the two characters of general and statesman; but he does not appear to advantage in the latter capacity. Contrasting, it may be, the Platonic ideal of a commonwealth with the actual corruption of his countrymen, he neither retired, lke his master, into his own thoughts, nor did he throw himself, with the noble energy of Demosthenes, into a practical struggle with the evil before him. His fellow-citizens may have been degenerate, but he made no effort to elevate them.
He could do nothing better than despair and rail.
We may therefore well believe that his patriotism was not very profound; we may be quite sure that it was not very wise. As a matter of fact, he mainly contributed to destroy the independence of Athens; and he serves to prove to us that private worth and purity, though essential conditions indeed of public virtue, are no infallible guarantee for it. (Plut. Phocion, Demosthenes, Reg. et Imp.

PHOCUS (Φόκος). 1. A son of Ornytus of Corinth, or according to others of Poseidön, is said to have been the leader of a colony from Corinth into the territory of Thibores and Mount Par­ nasus, which derived from him the name of Phocis. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3, 29. § 2, x i. § 1.) He is said to have cured Antiope of her madness, and to have made her his wife (ix. 17. § 4).
2. A son of Aenacus by the Nereid Psmathe, and husband of Asteria or Asteroia, by whom he became the father of Panopès and Crisus. (Hes.
Theog. 1094; Pind. Nem. v. 23; Tzetz. ad Lyc.
53, 939; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 33.) As Phocus surpassed his step-brothers Telamon and Peleus in warlike games and exercises, they being stirred up by their mother Endes, resolved to destroy him, and Telamon, or, according to others, Peleus killed him with a discus (some say with a spear during the chase). The brothers carefully concealed the deed, but it was nevertheless found out, and they were obliged to emigrate from Aegina. (Apollod.
iii. 12. § 6; Paus. ii. 29. § 7; Plut. Parall. Min.
25.) Psmathe afterwards took vengeance for the murder of her son, by sending a wolf among the flocks of Peleus, but she was prevailed upon by Thetis to change the animal into a stone. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 901; Anton. Lib. 38.) The tomb of Phocus was shown in Aegina. (Paus. ii. 29. § 7) Phocis is said shortly before his death to have emigrated to Phocis, but to have soon returned to Aegina; but the country of Phocis, part of which was already called by his name, is said to have been extended by him. While in Phocis he concluded an intimate friendship with Iasus, which was confirmed by the present of a seal-ring;
and this scene was represented in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. ii. 29. § 2, &c., x. 1. § 1, 30. § 2.)
Panopus and Crises, the sons of Phocis, are likewise said to have emigrated to Phocis (i. 29.
§ 2). [L. S.]

PHOCY'LIDES (Φώκυλίδης), of Miletus, an Ionian poet, contemporary with Theognis, both having been born, according to Suidas (s. v.) in the 55th Olympiad, b. c. 500, which agrees with Eusebius, who places Phocylides at Ol. 60 (b. c. 540)
as a contemporary of the lyric poet Simonides.
According to Suidas, he wrote epic poems and elegies;
among which were Παραπάνες or Ρήματα which were also called Κεφαλαία. This gnomic poetry shows the reason why Suidas calls him a philosopher. Most of the few fragments we possess are of this character; and they display that contempt for birth and station, and that love for substantial enjoyment, which always marked the Ionian character. One of his gnomic precepts, on the virtue of moderation, is quoted with praise by Aristotle (Polit. iv. 8):—
Πολλά μέσων ἐπιτρέπεται: μέσος δὲ λείον ἐν τῷ ἄλοιπῳ.
The didactic character of his poetry is shown by the frequent occurrence of verses beginning, Καὶ τὸδε Φώκυλίδης. These words no doubt formed the heading of each of those sections (κεφαλαία), in which, as we have seen from Suidas, the poems of Phocylides were arranged.
We possess only about eighteen short fragments of his poems, of which only two are in elegiac verse, and the rest in hexameters. The editions of them are too numerous to mention; the titles of these editions, and of the versions into Latin, German, French, Italian, English, and Spanish, fill seven columns of Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographicum (s. v.).
They have, in fact, been included in all the chief collections of the lyric and gnomic poets, from that of Constantine Lascaris, Venet. 1494, 1495, 4to., down to those of Gaisford, Boissoneau, Schneide­ win, and Bergk. Some of these collections, however, contain a didactic poem, in 217 hexameters, titled ποίημα νοβετυχοί, which is undoubtedly a forgery, made since the Christian era; but the fact of the name of Phocylides being attached to such a composition is a proof of the estimation in which he was held as a didactic poet. So also, when Suidas states that some of his verses were stolen from the Sibylline Oracles, the meaning is either that some genuine verses of Phocylides had been preserved in that apocryphal collection, or that both the Oracles and the ποίημα νοβετυχοί

PHOENICIDES.

[8. S.]

PHOEBA DIUS, bishop of Agen, in Southwestern Gaul, about the middle of the fourth century, was an eager champion of orthodoxy, but at the council of Ariminum, in A.D. 359, was entrapped, along with Servatio, a Belgian bishop, by the artifices of the prefect Taurus, into signing an Arian confession of faith, which, upon discovering the fraud, he openly and indignantly abjured. He subsequently took an active part in the council of Valence, held in A.D. 374, and, as we learn from Jerome, lived to a great age.

One work unquestionably composed by Phoebadia has descended to us, entitled Contra Arianos Liber, a tract written about A.D. 358, in a clear, animated, and impressive style for the purpose of exposing the errors contained in a document well known in ecclesiastical history as the Second Sirmian Creed, that is, the Arian Confession of Faith, drawn up by Potamius and Hosius, and adopted by the third council of Sirmium, in 357, in which the word Consubstantialis is altogether rejected, and it is maintained that the Father is greater than the Son, and that the Son had a beginning. This essay was discovered by Peter Pithou, and first published at Geneva in 1570, by Beza, in an octavo volume, containing also some pieces by Athanasius, Basil, and Cyril; it was subsequently printed by Pithou himself, in his Veterum aliquid Galliae Theoligorum Scripta, 4to, 1586, and is contained in almost all the large collections of Fathers. It was edited in a separate form by Barth, 8vo. Franct. 1623, and appears under its best form in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. v. p. 250, fol. Venet. 1763.

In addition to the above, a Liber de Fide Orthodoxa and a Libellus Fidei, both found among the works of Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. xlix. 4), the former among the works of Ambrose also (Append. vol. ii. p. 345, ed. Bened.) have, with considerable probability, been ascribed to Phoebadianus. These, as well as the Liber contra Arianos, are included in the volume of Galland referred to above. See also his Prolegomena, cap. xv. p. xxiv. (Hieron. de Viris Ill. 108; Schönemann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. i. cap. iii. § 11; Bähr, Geschicht. der Röm. Literatur. suppl. Band. 2te Abthell. § 63.)

PHOEBE (Φοίβη). 1. A daughter of Uranus and Ge, became by Coeus the mother of Asteria and Leto. (Hes. Theog. 136, 404, &c.; Apollod. i. 1. § 3, 2. § 2.) According to Aeschylus (Eum. 6) she was in possession of the Delphic oracle after Themis, and prior to Apollo.

2. A daughter of Tyndareos and Leda, and a sister of Clytemnestra. (Erinp. Iph. Aul. 50; Orv. Heroid. viii. 77.)

3. A nymph married to Danaus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

4. A daughter of Leucippus, and sister of Hilaria, a priestess of Athena, was carried off with her sister by the Dioscuri, and became by Polydeuces the mother of Mnesileos. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. ii. 22. § 6; comp. Dioscouri.)

5. An Amazon who was slain by Heracles. (Diod. iv. 16.)

6. A surname of Artemis in her capacity as the goddess of the moon (Luna), the moon being regarded as the female Phoebus or sun. (Virg. Georg. i. 451, Aen. x. 215; Ov. Heroid. xx. 229.)
PHOENIX.

260, as he ridiculed the league of Antigonus and Ptolemy in one of his comedies (Herrach. s. a. βιογραφίας Ρωμαίων). Meineke, therefore, fixes the time at which he exhibited comedy at Athens about OL. 127, a. c. 272. The following titles of his dramas are preserved: — Αδηπησόεις, Μακαυωνία or Μοιρω-

PHOENIX (Φοίνιξ). 1. According to Homer the father of Europa (Hom. Il. xiv. 321) but acco-

ting to others he was a son of Agenor by Agriope or Telephassa, and therefore a brother of Europa. Being sent out by his father in search of his sister, who was carried off by Zeus, he went to Africa, and there gave his name to a people who called after him Phœnicles. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 1; Eustath. ad Dionys. Perig. 905; Hygin. Fab. 178.) According to some traditions he became, by Perimele, the daughter of Oeneus, the father of Astypalae and Europa (Paus. vii. 4. § 2), by Telephe the father of Peirus, Astypale, Europa, and Phœnix (Schol. ad Eurip. Phœn. 5), and by Alambousa, the father of Adonis. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 4.)

2. A son of Antymyrtus by Cleobule or Hippodameia, was king of the Dolopes, and took part not only in the Calydonian hunt (Tzetza. ad Lyceph. 421; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 769; Hygin. Fab. 173; Ov. Met. viii. 307), but being a friend of Peleus, he accompanied Achilles on his expedition against Troy. (Hygin. Fab. 257; Ov. Heroid. iii. 27; Apollod. iii. 13. § 8.) His father Antymyrtus neglected his legitimate wife, and attached himself to a mistress, but the former desired her son to dishonour her rival. Phoenix yielded to the request of his mother, and Antymyrtus, who discovered it, cursed him, and prayed that he might never be blessed with any offspring. Phoenix now desired to quit his father's house, but his relations compelled him to remain. At last, however, he fled to Peleus, who received him kindly, made him the ruler of the country of the Dolopes, on the frontiers of Phthia, and entrusted Achilles, whom he was to educate. (Hom. Il. ix. 447, &c.)

According to another tradition, Phoenix did not disown his father's mistress (Pthia or Clytia), but she merely accused him of having made improper overtures to her, in consequence of which his father put out his eyes. But Peleus took him to Cheiron, who restored to him his sight. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8.) Phoenix moreover is said to have called the son of Achilles Neoptolemus, after Lycomedes had called him Pyrrhus. (Paus. x. 26, § 1.) Neoptolemus was believed to have buried Phoenix at Eion in Macedonia or at Thracis in Thrasyll. (Tzetza. ad Lyc. 417; Strab. ix. p. 428.) It must further be observed, that Phoenix is one of the mythical beings to whom the ancients ascribed the invention of the alphabet. (Tzetza. Chil. xii. 68.)

3. We must notice here the fabulous bird Phoenix, who, according to a belief which Herodotus (v. 73) heard at Teias in Egypt, visited that place once in every five hundred years, on his father's death, and buried him in the sanctuary of Helios. For this purpose Phoenix was believed to come from Arabia, and to make an egg of myrrh as large as possible; this egg he then hollowed out and put into it his father, closing it up carefully, and the egg was believed then to be of exactly the same weight as before. This bird was represented resembling an eagle, with feathers partly red and partly golden. (Comp. Achil. Tat. iii. 25.) Of this bird it is further related, that when his life drew to a close, he built a nest for himself in Arabia, to which he imparted the power of generation, so that after his death a new phoenix rose out of it. As soon as the latter was grown up, he, like his predecessor, proceeded to Heliopolis in Egypt, and burned and buried his father in the temple of Helios. (Tuc. Ann. vi. 28.) According to a story which has gained more currency in modern times, Phoenix, when he arrived at a very old age (some say 500 and others 1461 years), committed himself to the flames. (Lucian, De Mort. Per. 27; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iii. 49.) Others, again, state that only one Phoenix lived at a time, and that when he died a worm crept forth from his body, and was developed into a new Phoenix by the heat of the sun. His death, further, took place in Egypt after a life of 7006 years. (Tzetza. Chil. v. 397, &c.; Plin. H. N. x. 2; Ov. Met. x. 399.) Another modification of the same story relates, that when Phoenix arrived at the age of 500 years, he built for himself a funeral pile, consisting of spices, settled upon it, and died. Out of the decomposing body he then rose again, and having grown up, he wrapped the remains of his old body up in myrrh, carried them to Heliopolis, and burnt them there. (Pompon. Mela. iii. 8, in fin.; Stat. Silv. ii. 4. 36.) Similar stories of marvellous birds occur in many parts of the East, as in Persia, the legend of the bird Simorg, and in India of the bird Semendar. (Comp. Bochart, Hieroz. iii. p. 809.) [L. S.]

PHOENIX (Φοίνιξ), historical. 1. A Theban, who was one of the leaders in the insurrection against Alexander, on which account the king, when he appeared before the city, sent to demand his surrender, together with Prothyas. The Thebans treated the request with derision, and demanded in return that Alexander should give up to them Philotas and Antigater. (Plut. Alexa. 11.)

2. A native of Tomedos, who held a high rank in the army of Eumenes, b. c. 321. In the great battle fought by the latter against Craterus and Neoptolemus, the command of the left wing, which was opposed to Craterus, was entrusted to Phoenix and Pharnabazus, and composed principally of Asiatic troops; Eumenes being apprehensive of opposing any Macedonians to a general so popular with his countrymen. As soon as they came in sight of the enemy the two commanders charged the army of Craterus, which was unable to withstand the shock, and the aged general himself perished in the confusion (Plut. Enom. 7). Shortly after we find Phoenix despatched by Eumenes with a select force against his revolted general Perdiccas, whom he surprised by a rapid night march, and took him prisoner almost without opposition (Diod. xvii. 40). After the fall of Eumenes Phoenix appears to have entered the service of Antigonus, but in b. c. 310 he was persuaded by Ptolemy (the nephew and general of the king of Asia), to whom he was attached by the closest friendship, to join the latter in his defection from Antigonus. Phoenix at this time held the important command of the Hellespontine Phrygia, on which account Antigonus hastened to send an army against him under the command of his younger son Philippos (Id. xx. 19). The result of the operations is not mentioned; but Phoenix seems to have been not only pardoned by Antigonus, but received again into favour: and in the campaign which preceded the battle of Issus (a.c. 302), we find him holding the command of Sardis, which he was, however, induced to surrender to Prepelaus, the general of Lysimachus (Id. xx. 107). This is the last time his name is mentioned.

3. The youngest son of Antigonus, king of Asia, is called by Diodorus in one passage (xx. 73), Phoenix, but it seems that this is a mistake, and that his true name was Philip. (Comp. Diod. xx. 19; and see Droysen, Hellemism. vol. i. p. 465.) [Philippus, No. 17.]

PHOENIX (Φόνιξ), of Colophon, a chalcolithic poet of unknown time, of whose poems Athenaeus preserves some fragments, the chief of which is in ridicule of the arts of certain beggars, who demanded alms in the name of a raven which they carried about on their hands. (Bode, Gesch. d. Lyr. Dichtk. vol. i. p. 337; Melineke, Cholamb. Poes. Graec. pp. 140—145.) [P.S.]

PHOENIX (Φωνίξ), a stately, or unknown of which, was the pupil of Lysippos, and therefore flourished about Ol. 120, B.C. 300. He made a celebrated statue of the Olympic boxing victor, Epitherses. (Plin. H.N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19; § 20; Paus. vi. 15. § 3.) [P.S.]

PHOLUS (Φόλος), a Centaur, a son of Seilenus and the nymph Melia, from whom Mount Pholie, between Arcadia and Elis, was believed to have derived its name. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 4; Theocr. vi. 149.) [L.S.]

PHORBAS (Φόρβας). 1. A son of Lapithes and Orsinome, and a brother of Periphas. The Rhodians, in pursuance of an oracle, are said to have invited him into their island to deliver it from snakes, and afterwards to have honoured him with heroic worship. (Diodor. v. 58.) From this circumstance he was called Ophiuchus, and is said by some to have been placed among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 14, who calls him a son of Triopas and Hiscilla; comp. Paus. vii. 26. § 6.)

According to another tradition, Phorbas went from Thessaly to Olenos, where Alector, king of Elis, made use of his assistance against Pelops, and shared his kingdom with him. Phorbas then gave his daughter Diogena in marriage to Alector, and he himself married Hyrmne, a sister of Alector, by whom he became the father of Augas and Actor. (Diodor. iv. 69; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 303; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 172; Paus. vi. 1. § 6; Apollod. ii. 5. § 5.) He is also described as a bird-boxer, and to have plundered the temple of Delphi along with the Phlegyes, but to have been defeated by Apollo. (Schol. ad Hom. ii. xxiii. 660; Ov. Met. xi. 414, xii. 322.)

2. A son of Argos or Criasus, was a brother of Peirinas, and married to Euboea, by whom he became the father of Triopas, whence he seems to have been a grandson of No. 1. (Paus. ii. 16. § 1, iv. 1. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 920.)

3. A son of Criasus and Melantha, a brother of Ereuthalion and Cleoebos, is described as the father of Arestor. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoenix. 1116, Or. 920.)

4. A Lesbian, and father of Diomed, whom Achilles carried off. (Hom. II. ix. 663; Dict. Cret. ii. 16.)

5. An Acanrian, who, together with Eumolpus, went to Eleusis. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1156; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoenix. 354.)

PHORMION.

6. The father of Ilieneus. (Hom. II. xiv. 490; Virg. Aen. v. 842.)

7. A son of Methion of Syene, one of the companions of Phineus. (Ov. Met. v. 74.) [L.S.]

PHORBENUS or PHOBENUS, GEORGIUS (Γεωργιος ο βορειος), a Greek jurist of uncertain date. A MS, which Ducange has cited (Glossar. Med. et Infin. Graecoscil. Index Auct. col. 26), describes him as Δικαιοφυλας Θεσσαλονικ. "Judge at Thessalonica." He wrote two very short dissertations:—1. Περι ουκοδομδ, De Donatione super Nuptias; and 2. Περι χωρειας, De Casso. He wrote also Scholia on the Iliad, of which possibly the above dissertations may have formed part. Allstius, De Georgios, c. 4; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 721, and vol. xii. pp. 483, 564, ed. vet.) [J.C.M.]

PHORCIDES (Φορκίδης), PHORCYDES, or PHORCYNIDES, that is, daughters of Phorcos and Ceto, or the Gorgons and Graene. (Aeschyl. Prom. 794; Ov. Met. iv. 742, 774, v. 230; Hygin. Fab. Praef. p. 9; comp. Gorgones and Graeae.) [L.S.]

PHORCUS, PHORCYRS, or PHORCYN (Φορκος, Φορκυρ, Φορκυς*). 1. According to the Homeric poems, an old man ruling over the sea, or "the old man of the sea," to whom a harbour in Ithaca was dedicated. He is described as the father of the nymph Thoosa (Od. i. 71, xiii. 96, 345). Later writers call him a son of Pontus and Ge, and a brother of Thaumas, Nereus, Eurybin, and Ceto (Hes. Theog. 237; Apollod. i. 2. § 6). By his sister Ceto he became the father of the Graeae and Gorgones (Hes. Theog. 270, &c.), the Hesperian dragon (Hdt. 333, &c.), and the Hesperides (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1399); and by Hecate or Cratais, he was the father of Sceyll. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 823; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1714; Tzetz. ad Lyceol. 45.) Servius (ad Aen. v. 824) calls him a son of Neptune and Thoosa. (Comp. Muncker, ad Hygin. Fab. praef. p. 4.)

2. A son of Phaenops, commander of the Phrygians of Asia, assisted Priam in the Trojan war, but was slain by Ajax. (Hom. II. ii. 862, xvii. 218, 312, &c.; Paus. x. 26. § 2.) [L.S.]

PHOR'MION (Φορμιόν), historical. 1. An Athenian general, the son of Asopus (or Asopichus, as Pausanias calls him). His family was a distinguished one. He belonged to the same Phaeacia. In B.C. 440 he was one of the three generals who were sent out with reinforcements to the Athenian troops blockading Samos. In 432, after the revolt of Potidæa, he was sent out with reinforcements for the troops under Callias, and, taking the command, proceeded to blockade the city. When the circumvallation was completed he led his troops to ravage Chalcidice and Bottice. He was still here in 431, when he was joined by Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, in some operations against the Chalcidians. He left before the summer of 430. Towards the close of that same year he was sent with 20 ships to assist the Acairanians against the Ambracions, who had seized the Amphiloichian Argos. In the succeeding winter he was sent with 20 ships to Naupactus to prevent the Corinthian vessels from sailing out of the gulf, and to stop all vessels bound for Corinth. He was still here in the summer of 429, when a Peloponnesian fleet was sent to aid the allies of Sparta in the West. By his skilful manoeuvres with very inferior forces he gained a decisive victory over the Peloponnesian fleet. In a second engagement, which ensued not long after, though at first compelled to retreat, by seizing an opportunity afforded by the confusion into which the fleet of the enemy was thrown by means of a dexterous manoeuvre of one of the Athenian ships which was being chased, Phormion gained another brilliant victory. For the details, the reader is referred to Thucydides, where they are given at length. In the ensuing winter Phormion led an expedition along the coast of Aca- rania, and, disembarking, advanced into the interior, where he gained some successes. (Thucyd. i. 64, 65, 117, ii. 204, 326, 68, 69, 90—92, 102, 103; Dio. xii. 37, 47, 48.)

On one occasion, when called on to submit to the κληρον, he was commanded to pay a fine of 100 minae. Not being able to do so, he was made άτυμος, and retired to Paeania. While here a request came from the Acarnanians that he might be sent out as commander to them. To this the Athenians consented, but Phormion urged that it was contrary to law to send out in that way a man who was under sentence of άτυμη. As the ostensible remission of the fine was not lawful, the device was resorted to (as in the case of Demo- sthenes, Plut. Dem. c. 27) of assigning to him some trifling public service (which in his case seems to have been a sacrifice to Dionysus), for which he was paid the amount of his fine. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 346; Paus. i. 23. § 10; Böckh, ap. Meineke, Fragm. Poet. Com. Ant. ii. i. p. 527.) Phormion was no longer alive in B.c. 428, when the Acarnanians, out of respect to his memory, requested that his son Asopus might be sent to them as general. (Thucyd. iii. 7.) The tomb of Phormion was on the road leading to the Academy, near those of Pericles and Charibrias. (Paus. i. 29. § 3.) He was a man of remarkably temperate habits, and a strict disciplinarian. (Aristoph. Eqiit. 560, Pox, 348, Lys. 804; Schol. ad Arist. Pac. 347; Suidas s. v. Φωρομέων στήβας; Athen. x. p. 419, a.)

2. A freedman of Pasion the banker. After the death of the latter he married his widow, and became guardian to his younger son Pasicles. It was not however till eleven years after the death of Pasion that he received the franchise of an Athenian citizen. (Dem. adv. Steph. p. 1126.) He was a ship-owner; and on one occasion, when the people of Byzantium had detained some of his ships, he sent Stephanus to complain of the wrong. (Th. i. 1121.) Apollodorus, the eldest son of Pasion, brought an action against Phormion, who was defended by Demostenes in the speech ἔργο Φωρομέων. Subsequently Apollodorus brought the witnesses of Phormion to trial for perjury, when Demostenes supported the other side, and composed for Apollodorus the speeches against Stephanus. [APOLLODORUS.] (Demonst. l.c.; Aesch. de fids. Leg. p. 50; Plut. Demosth. c. 15; Clinton, F. H. ii. vol. ii. p. 358.)

2. Sex. Clodius Phormio, a money lender mentioned by Cicero (pro Cæcina, 9. § 27), who does not speak of him in very flattering terms. [C. P. M.]

PHORMIUS (Φωρομιος), literary. 1. A disciple of Plato, sent by the latter to the Eleusans for the purpose of giving them some laws. (Plut. adv. Colot. p. 1126, c.)

2. A peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, of whom it is told the story that he discoursed for several hours before Hannibal on the military art and the duties of a general. When his admiring auditory asked Hannibal what he thought of him, the latter replied, that of all the old blockheads whom he had seen, none could match Phormion. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 16.)

[C. P. M.]

PHORMIUS or PHORMUS (Φωρομιος, Aristot. Pausan.; Φωρομιος, Athen. Suid.). Bentley is of opinion that the former is the correct mode of spelling (Dissert. upon Phalaris, vol. i. p. 252, ed. 1638). In Themistius he is called Αμορφος. He came originally from Maenalus in Arcadia, and having removed to Sicily, became intimate with Gelon, whose son he was. This Gelon distinguished himself as a soldier, both under Gelon and Hieron his brother, who succeeded, B. C. 478. In gratitude for his martial successes, he dedicated gifts to Zeus at Olympia, and to Apollo at Delphi. Pausanias (v. 27) gives a description of the former of these— two horses and charioteers; and he describes a statue of Phormus engaged in fight, dedicated by Lycortas, a Syracusean. Though the matter has been called in question, there seems to be little or no doubt that this is the same person who is associated by Aristotle with Epicharmus, as one of the originators of comedy, or of a particular form of it. We have the names of eight comedies written by him, in Suidas (s. v.), who also states that he was the first to introduce actors with robes reaching to the ankles, and to ornament the stage with skins dyed purple— as drapery it may be presumed. From the titles of the plays, we may safely infer that he selected the same mythological subject as Epicharmus. They are, "Αμορφος, "Αλκιώνης, "Αλκάνως, "Ολυν Πλοποντας, "Επτος, "Κεφαλιας, "Πεγειας, "Ασταλλίας. (Aristotle. Poet. c. 5; Paus., Suidas, ii. cc.; Athen. xiv. p. 652, a; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 315.)

[W. M. G.]

PHORONEUS (Φωρονεύοντις), a son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia or Archia, was a brother of Aegaeus and the ruler of Peloponnesus. He was married to the nymph Laodice, by whom he became the father of Niobe, Apis, and Car. (Hygin. Fab. 143; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 920; Apollod. ii. i. § 1; Paus. i. 39. § 4.) Pausanias (ii. 21. § 1) calls his wife Cerdo, and the Scholast on Euripides calls his first wife Petho, and her children Aegaeus and Apia, and the second Europe, who was the mother of Niobe. According to Helleni- cuς (ap. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 353) he had three sons, Pelasgus, Issus, and Agenor, who, after their father's death, distributed the kingdom of Argos among themselves. Phoroneus is said by some to have been the first who offered sacrifices to Hera at Argos, and to have united the people, who until then had lived in scattered habitations, into a city which was called after him ομοιοφωρονεύοντις. (Paus. ii. 15, in fin.; Hygin. Fab. 274.) He is further said to have discovered the use of fire (Paus. ii. 19. § 5); his tomb was shown at Argos, where funeral sacrifices were offered to him (ii. 20. § 3). The patronymic Phoroneidai is sometimes used for Argives in general, but especially to designate Amphiarous and Adrastus (Paus. vii. 17. § 3; Theocrit. xxv. 200.) [L. S.]
PHOTIUS.

PHORONIS (Φωρόνης), a surname of Io, being according to some a descendant, and according to others a sister of Phoroneus. (Ov. Met. i. 668; Hygin. Fab. 145.)

PHORUS (Φωρός), or as the poets call him Ἰωρός or Φαερός (Lat. Lucifer), that is, the bringer of light or of Eos, is the name of the planet Venus, when seen in the morning before sunrise (Hom. I. xxiii. 226; Virg. Georg. i. 288; Ov. Met. ii. 115, Trist. i. 3. 72.) The same planet was called Hesperus (*φερός, Vesper, Noctifer or Nocturnus) when it appeared in the heavens after sunset. (Hom. I. xxiiii. 318; Plin. H. N. ii. 8; Cic. De Nat. Deor. ii. 20; Catull. 62, 64; Horat. Carm. ii. 9. 10.) Phosphorus as a personification is called a son of Astoreus and Eos (Hes. Theog. 381), of Cephalus and Eos (Hyg. Poet. Aest. ii. 42), or of Atlas (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 879). By Philonis he is said to have been the father of Ceyx (Hygin. Fab. 65; Ov. Met. xi. 271), and he is also called the father of Daedalioin (Ov. Met. xi. 293), of the Hesperides (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 484), or of Hesperis, who became by his brother Atlas the mother of the Hesperides. (Diod. iv. 27; Serv. ad Aen. i. 530.)

Phosphorus also occurs as a surname of several goddesses of light, as Artemis (Diana Lucifera, Paus. iv. 31. § 8; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116) Eos (Eurip. Ion. 1157) and Hecate. (Eurip. Helen. 569.)

PHOTIUS (Φωτίος). 1. Of Constantinople (1). In the Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. i. p. 274, &c, is given an account of the martyrdom of St. Lucilianus, and several others who are said to have suffered at Byzantium, in the persecution under Aurelian. The account bears this title:—Φωτίος τού μακαριστάτου σκευοφύλακα τῶν Ἁγίων Ἀποστόλων καὶ λογοθέτου ἕσχαμος εἰς τῶν Ἁγίων Ιεροσαλημίων εὐσεβεῖς ἀγαθοπληροής. Sancti Martyris Luciliiani Encomium, autore beatusissimo Photio, Sanctorum Apostolorum Sacrificii loco ad Logotheta. Of the writer Photius, nothing further appears to be known than is contained in the title, namely, that he was keeper of the sacred vessels in the great Church of the Apostles at Constantinople, which was second in importance only to that of St. Sophia; and that he must be placed after the time of Constantine, by whom the church was built. The Encomium is given in the Acta Sanctorum in the original Greek, with a Commentarius praevius, a Latin version, and notes by Connuus Janninus, (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 271, 678.)

2. Of Constantinople (2). Photius, a presbyter of the church at Constantinople, was one of the most decided and active supporters of the unfortunate heresiarch, Nestorius [NESTORIUS], in the fifth century. When Antonius and Jacobus were sent, some time before the council of Ephesus, A. D. 431, to convert, by persecution, the Quartoedicans and Novatians of Asia Minor, they presented to some of their converts at Philadelphia, not the Nicene Creed, but one that contained a passage deemed heretical on the incarnation, which excited against them Charsius, who was oeconomus of the church at Philadelphia. In these proceedings Antonius and Jacobus were supported by Photius, who not only gave them letters at the commencement of their mission, attesting their orthodoxy, but procured the deposition of their opponent Charsius, who thereupon presented a complaint to the council of Ephesus (Concilia, vol. iii. col. 673, &c. ed. Labbe). Tillemont is disposed to ascribe to Photius the answer which was drawn up to the Epistola ad Solitarios of Cyril of Alexandria. A Photius, a supporter of Nestorius, was banished to Petra, about A. D. 436 (Lupus, Ad Epheosis Concil. v. P. PP. Epistolae, cap. clxxixii.), whom, notwithstanding the objections of Lupus (not. in loc.) we agree with Tillemont in identifying with the presbyter of Constantinople. (Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xiv. pp. 300, 332, 494, 607, 787.)

3. Of Constantinople (3). Of the eminent men whose names occur in the long series of the Byzantine annals, there is hardly one who combines so many claims upon our attention as Photius. The varied information, much of it not to be found elsewhere, contained in his works, and the sound critical judgment displayed by him, raise him to the very highest rank among the Byzantine writers: his position, as one of the great promoters of the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches, gives him an almost equal eminence in ecclesiastical history; and his position, striking vicissitudes of fortune, and connection with the leading political characters of his day, make him a personage of importance in the domestic history of the Byzantine empire.

The year and place of his birth, and the name of his father, a presbyter and heresiarch, of whose name was Irene; his brother was Athanasius, one of the sisters of Theodora, wife of the emperor Theophilus (Theoph. Contin. lib. iv. 22): so that Photius was connected by affinity with the imperial family. We have the testimony of Nicetas David, the Paphlogonian, that his lineage was illustrious. He had at least four brothers (Mountag, Nat. ad Epist. Photii, 135), Tarasius, Constantine, Theodore, and Sergius, of whom the first enjoyed the dignity of patrician. Photius himself, in speaking of his father and mother, celebrates their crown of martyrdom, and the patient spirit by which they were adorned; but the rhetorical style of the letter in which the notice occurs (Epist. 254, Tarasio Patricio fratris) prevents our drawing any very distinct inference from his words; though they may perhaps indicate that his parents suffered some severities or privations during the reign of Theophilus or some other of the Iconoclast emperors. This is the more likely, as Photius elsewhere (Epist. 2. Encycl. § 42, and Epistol. ad Nicod. Papam) claims Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, who was one of the great champions of image worship, as his relative, which shows the side taken by his family in the controversy. What the relation between himself and Tarasius was is not clear. Photius (ll. cc.) calls him πατρόφιος, which probably means great-uncle. But the ability of Photius would have adored any lineage, and his capacious mind was cultivated, as both the testimony even of his opponents and his extant works show, with great diligence.

He was accounted," says Nicetas David, the biographer and panegyrist of N. of Constantinople, "to be of all men most eminent for his secular acquirements and his understanding of political affairs. For so superior were his attainments in grammar and poetry, in rhetoric and philosophy, yea, even in medicine and in almost all the branches of knowledge beyond the limits of theology, that he not only appeared to excel all the men of his own day, but even to bear comparison with the ancients. For all things combined in his favour: natural adaptation, diligence, wealth, which enabled him to form an all-comprehensive library; and more than all these, the love of glory, which induced him to pass whole nights without sleep, that he might have time for reading. And when the time came (which ought never to have arrived for him to judge himself into the church, he became a most diligent reader of theological works." (Nicet. Vita Ignatii apud Concil. vol. viii. ed. Labbe.)

It must not, however, be supposed that Photius had wholly neglected the study of theology before his entrance on an ecclesiastical life: so far was this from being the case, that he had read and carefully analysed, as his Bibliothecas attests, the chief works of the Greek ecclesiastical writers of all ages, so that his attainments in sacred literature might have shamed many a professional divine. There is not sufficient evidence to support the statement of Baronius, that Photius was an eunuch.

Thus highly connected, and with a mind so richly endowed and highly cultivated, Photius obtained high advancement at the Byzantine court. He held the dignity of a Proto-a-Secretis or chief justice (Codin. De Offic. CP. p. 350, ed. Domi); and, in the person of Nicetas David (L.c.), of Protopsatharius, a name originally denoting the chief sword-bearer or captain of the guards, but which became, in later times, a merely nominal office. (Codin. ibid. p. 233.) To these dignities may be added, on the authority of Anastasius Bibliothecario (Concil. Octavi Hist. apud Concil. vol. viii. col. 962, ed. Labbe), that of senator; but this is perhaps only another title for the office of Proto-a-Secretis." (Gretser. et G. Not. in cod. p. 242.)

Though his official duties would chiefly confine him to the capital, it is probable that he was occasionally employed elsewhere. It was during an embassy "to the Assyrians" (a vague and unsuitable term, denoting apparently the court of the Caliphs or of some of the other powers of Upper Asia) that he read the works enumerated in his Bibliothecas, and wrote the critical notices of them which were part of a striking instance of the energy and diligence with which he continued to cultivate literature in the midst of his secular duties. Of the date of this embassy, while engaged in which he must have resided several years at the Assyrian court, as well of the other incidents of his life, before his elevation to the patriarchate of Constantinople, we have no means of judging. He could hardly have been a young man at the time he became patriarch.

The patriarchal throne of Constantinople was occupied in the middle of the ninth century by Ignatius [Ignatii, No. 3], who had the misfortune to incur the enmity of some few bishops and monks, of whom the principal was Gregory Asbestus, an intriguing bishop, whom he had opposed at the see of Syracuse in Sicily [Gregorii, No. 35], and also of Bardas, who was all-powerful at the court of his nephew Michael, then a minor. [Michael III.] Ignatius had excommunicated Bardas, on a rumour of his being guilty of incest, and Bardas, in retaliation, threatened the patriarch with deposition. It was important from the high character of Ignatius, that whoever was proposed as his successor should be able to compete with him in reputation, and the choice of Bardas fell upon Photius, who had already given countenance to Gregory and the other opponents of the patriarch. Ignatius was deposed, and Photius elected in his place. The latter was a layman, and, according to some statements, was under excommunication for supporting Gregory; many less than a week served, according to Nicetas David (ibid.), for his rapid passage through all the needful subordinate gradations: the first day witnessed his conversion from a layman to a monk; the second day he was made reader; the third day, sub-deacon; the fourth, deacon; the fifth, presbyter; and the sixth, Christmas-day A.D. 858, beheld his promotion to the patriarchate, the highest ecclesiastical dignity in the empire. Nicetas (ibid.), states that his office was irregularly committed to him by secular hands. Photius himself, however, in his apologetic epistle to Pope Nicolaus I. (apud Baron. Annu. ad ann. 859, § 1 xi. &c.), states that the patriarchate was pressed upon his acceptance by a numerous assembly of the metropolitans, and of the other clergy of his patriarchate; nor is it likely that the Byzantine court would fail to secure a sufficient number of subservient bishops, to give to the appointment every possible appearance of regularity.

A constant idea was that the whole transaction was violent and indefensible, whatever care might be taken to give it the appearance of regularity, made it desirous for the victorious party to obtain from the deposed patriarch a resignation of his office; but Ignatius was a man of too lofty a spirit to consent to his own degradation, and his pertinacious refusal entailed severe persecution both on himself and his friends. [Ignatii, No. 3.] Photius, however, retained his high dignity; the secular power was on his side; the clergy of the patriarchate, in successive councils, confirmed his appointment, though we are told by Nicetas David (ibid.) that the metropolitans exacted from him a written engagement that he would treat his deposed rival with filial reverence, and follow his advice; and even the legates of the Holy See were induced to side with him, a subserviency for which they were afterwards deposed by the Pope Nicolaus I. The constant idea to treat Ignatius with kindness was not kept; in such a struggle its observance could hardly be expected; but how far the severities inflicted on him are to be ascribed to Photius cannot now be determined. The critical position of the latter would be likely to aggravate any disposition which he might feel to treat his rival harshly; for Nicolaus, in a council at Rome, embraced the side of Ignatius, and anathematized Photius and his adherents; various enemies rose up against him among the civil officers as well as the clergy of the empire; and the minds of many, including, if we may trust Nicetas (ibid.), the kindred and friends of Photius himself, were shocked by the treatment of the unhappy Ignatius. To add to his troubles, the Caesar Bardas appears to have had disputes with him, either influenced by the natural jealousy between the secular and ecclesiastical powers, or, perhaps, disappointed at not finding in Photius the subserviency he had anticipated. The letters of Photius addressed to Bardas (Epistolae, 3, 6, 8) contain abundant complaints of the diminution of his authority, of the ill-treatment of those for whom he was interested, and of the inefficacy of his own intercessions and complaints. However, the opposition among his own clergy was gradually weakened, until only five bishops remained who supported the cause of Ignatius.

The quarrel between Nicolaus and Photius of course separated the Eastern and Western Churches for the time. Photius wrote to Nicolaus to endeavour to conciliate his favour, but without effect. Photius was anathematized, and deposed by Nicolaus (A.D. 863); and a counter anathema and sentence of deposition was pronounced against Nicolaus by a council assembled at Constantinople by Photius. The schism, as neither party had power to carry its sentence into effect, continued until the actual deposition of Photius.

Of the conduct of Photius as patriarch, in matters not connected with the struggle to maintain his position, it is not easy to judge. That he aided Bardas, who was elevated to the dignity of Caesar, in his efforts for the revival of learning, perhaps suggested those efforts to him, is highly probable from his indisputable love of literature. (Theoph. Contin. De Mich. Theophili Filio, c. 26.) That he possessed many kindly dispositions is indicated by his letters. The charges of the forgery of letters, and of cruelty in his struggles with the party of Ignatius, are, there is reason to believe, too true; but as almost all the original sources of information respecting his character and conduct are from parties hostile to his claims, we cannot confidently receive their charges as true in all their extent.

The murder of Caesar Bardas (A.D. 866 or 867), by the emperor's order [Michael III.], was speedily followed by the assassination of Michael himself (A.D. 867) and the accession of his colleague and murderer—Basil I. (the Macedonian) [BASILII I. MACANO]. Photius had consecrated Basil and the following Michael as patriarchs, but he became a murder of the latter he refused to admit him to the communion, reproaching him as a robber and a murderer, and unworthy to partake of the sacred elements. Photius was immediately banished to a monastery, and Ignatius restored: various papers which the servants of Photius were about to conceal in a neighbouring reed-bed were seized, and afterwards produced against Photius, first in the senate of Constantinople, and afterward at the council held against him. This hasty change in the occupants of the patriarchate had been too obviously the result of the change of the imperial dynasty to be sufficient of itself. But the imperial power had now the same interest as the Western Church in the deposition of Photius. A council (recognised by the Romish Church as the eighth oecumenical or fourth Constantinopolitan) was therefore summoned A.D. 869, at which the deposition of Photius and the restoration of Ignatius were confirmed. The cause was in fact prejudged by the circumstance that Ignatius took his place as patriarch at the commencement of the council. Photius, who appeared before the council, and his partisans were anathematized and stigmatized with the most opprobrious epithets. He subsequently acquired the favour of Basil, but that he soon acquired a complete ascendancy over him; he was appointed tutor to the sons of Basil, had apartments in the palace assigned to him; and, on the death of Ignatius, about A.D. 877 [IGNATIUS, No. 3], was immediately restored to the patriarchal throne. With writers of the Ignatian party and of the Romish Church, this restoration is, of course, nothing less than a new irritation of the wolf into the sheepfold. According to Nicetas he commenced his patriarchate by beating, banishing, and in various ways afflicting the servants and household of his defunct rival, and by using ten thousand arts against those who objected to his restoration as uncanonical and irregular. Some he bribed by gifts and honours and by translation to wealthier or more eligible sees than those they occupied; others he terrified by reproaches and accusations, which, on their embracing his party, were speedily and altogether dropped. That, in the corrupt state of the Byzantine empire and church, something of this must have happened at such a crisis, there can be little doubt; though there can be as little doubt that these statements are much exaggerated.

It is probable that one great purpose of Basil in restoring Photius to the patriarchate was to do away with divisions in the church, for it is not to be supposed that Photius was without his partisans. But to effect this purpose he had to gain over the Western Church. Nicolaus had been succeeded by Hadrian II., and he by John VIII. (some reckon him to be John IX.), who now occupied the papal chair. John was more plant than Nicolaus, and Basil a more energetic prince than the dissolute Michael; the pope therefore yielded to the urgent entreaties of a prince whom it would have been dangerous to disoblige; recognised Photius as lawful patriarch, and excommunicated those who refused to hold communion with him. But the recognition was on condition that he should resign his claim to the ecclesiastical superiority of the Bulgarians, whose archbishops and bishops were claimed as subordinates by both Rome and Constantinople; and is said to have been accompanied by strong assertions of the superiority of the Roman see. The copy of the letter in which John's consent was given, is a re-translation from the Greek, and is asserted by Romish writers to have been falsified by Photius and his party. It is obvious, however, that this charge remains to be proved; and that we have no more security that the truth lies on the side of Rome than on that of Constantinople. The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Bulgaria was no new cause of disension: it had been asserted as strongly by the pious Ignatius as by his successor. (Comp. Joan. VIII. Papae Epistol. 78, apud Concil. p. 63, &c.) Letters from the pope to the clergy of Constantinople and to Photius himself were also sent, but the extant copies of these are said to have been equally corrupted by Photius. Legates were sent by the pope, and even the copies of their Commissorium, or letter of instruction, are also said to be falsified; but these charges need to be carefully sifted. Among the asserted additions is one in which the legates are instructed to declare the council of A.D. 869 (reputed by the Romish Church to be the eighth oecumenical or fourth Constantinopolitan), at which Photius had been deposed to be null and void. Another addition asserts, which the Greeks assert to be the eighth oecumenical one, but which the Romishans reject, was held at Constantinople A.D. 879. The papal legates were present, but Photius presided, and had everything his own way. The restoration of Photius and the nullity of the council of A.D. 869 were affirmed: the words "filoque," which formed one of the standing subjects of contention between the two churches, were ordered to be omitted from the act, and the jurisdiction of the Bulgarian Church was referred to the emperor as a question affecting the boundaries of the empire. The pope refused to recognize the acts of the council, with the exception of the restoration of Photius, though they had been assented to by his legates, whom on their return he condemned, and he anathematized Photius afresh. (Baron. Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 880. xi. xiii.) The schism and rivalry of the churches became greater than ever, and has never since been really healed.

Photius, according to Nicetas (ibid.), had been assisted in regaining the favour of Basil by the monk Theodore or Santabaren; but other writers reverse the process, and ascribe to Photius the introduction of Santabaren to Basil. Photius certainly made him archbishop of Euchaita in Pontus; and he enjoyed, during Photius' patriarchate, considerable influence with him. By the ascension, true or false, made this man against Leo, the emperor's eldest surviving son and destined successor, of conspiring his father's death, Basil had been excited to imprison his son. So far, however, was Photius from joining in the designs of Santabaren, that it was chiefly upon his urgent entreaties the emperor spared the eyes of Leo, which he had intended to put out. Basil died A.D. 886, and Leo [Leo VI.] succeeded to the throne. He immediately set about the ruin of Santabaren; and, forgetful of Photius' intercession, scrupled not to involve the patriarch in his fall. Andrew and Stephen, two officers of the court, whom Santabaren had formerly accused of some offence, now charged Photius and Santabaren with conspiring to depose the emperor, and to place a kinsman of Photius on the throne. The charge appears to have been utterly unfounded, but it answered the purpose. An officer of the court was sent to the church of St. Sophia, who ascended the ambo or pulpit, and read to the assembled people articles of accusation against the patriarch. Photius was immediately led into confinement, first in a monastery, afterwards in the palace of Pegae; and Santabaren was brought in custody from Euchaita and confronted with him: the two accusers, with three other persons, were appointed to conduct the examination, a circumstance sufficient to show the nature and spirit of the whole transaction. The firmness of the prisoners, and the impossibility of proving the charge against them, provoked the emperor's rage. Santabaren was cruelly beaten, deprived of his eyes, and banished; but was afterwards recalled, and survived till the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, the successor of Leo. Photius was banished to the monastery of Bordi in Armenia (or rather in the theme Armeniacum), where he seems to have remained till his death. He was buried in the church of a nunnery at Merosagares. The year in which his death occurred is not ascertained. Pagi, Fabricius, and Mosheim, fix it in A.D. 891; but the evidence on which their statement rests is not conclusive. He must have been an aged man when he died, for he must have been in middle age when first chosen patriarch, and he survived that event thirty years, and probably more. He was succeeded in the patriarchate by the emperor's brother Stephen, first his pupil, then his succecssor, and one of his clergy. (Theoph. Contin. lib. v. c. 100, lib. vi. 1—5; Symeon Magister, De Basil. Maced. c. 21, De Leone Basil. fil. c. 1; Georg. Monach. De Basil. c. 24, De Leone, c. 1—7.) The character of Photius is by no means worthy of much respect. He was an able man of the world, but not influenced by the high principles which befitted his sacred office. Yet he was probably not below the average of the statesmen and prelates of his day; and certainly was not the monster that the historians and other writers of the Roman church, whose representations have been too readily adopted by some moderns, would make him. A writer in the Edinburgh Review, vol. xxi. p. 329, says, "He seems to have been very learned and very wicked—a great scholar and a consummate hypocrite—not only neglecting occasions of doing good, but perverting the finest talents to the worst purposes." This is unjust: he lived in a corrupt age, and was placed in a trying position; and, without hiding or extenuating his crimes, it must be said they have not been characteristically unequalled; the very story of his being an eunuch shows that he was not open to the charge of licentiousness; his firmness is attested by his repulse of Basil from the communion of the church, and his mercifulness by his intercession for the ungrateful Leo. It must be borne in mind also that his history has come down to us chiefly in the representations of his enemies. The principal ancient authorities have been referred to in the course of this narrative, though we have by no means cited all the places. We may add, Leo Grammaticus, Chronographia, pp. 463—476, ed. Paris; Zonar. xiv. 4, 8, 11, 12; Cedren. Compend. pp. 551, 569, 573, 593, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 172, 203, 213, 248, ed. Bonn; Glysia, Annals, pars iv. pp. 293, 294, 297, &c., ed. Paris, pp. 230, 239, 239, &c., ed. Venice, pp. 544, 547, 552, ed. Bonn; Genesis, Roger. lib. iv. p. 48, ed. Venice, p. 100, ed. Bonn; Constantin. Manuscript Chronic, vols. vi. 5133—5136, 5153, 5153, &c., 5399, &c.; Joel, Chron. Compend. p. 179, ed. Paris, pp. 55, 56, ed. Bonn; Ephraem, De Patriarchia O. P. vi. 10,012—10,625, ed. Bonn. Various notices and documents relating to his history generally, but especially to his conduct in reference to the schism of the churches, may be found in the Concilia, vols. viii. ed. Labbe, vols. v. vi. ed. Hardouin, vols. xv. xvi. ed. Mansi. Of modern writers, Baronius (Annum. Eccles. A. D. 858—886) is probably the fullest, but at the same time one of the most unjust. Hankius (De Byzant. Rerum Scriptoribus, par. i. c. 18) has a very ample memoir of Photius, which may be advantageously compared with that of Baronius, as its bias is in the opposite direction. See also Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, t. 270, 270, 270, ed. 1821. An essay by Francesco Fontani, De Photo Novae Romae Episcopi ejusque Scriptorum Disquisitione, prefixed to the first volume of his Novae Eruditorum Deliciae, 12mo, Florence, 1785, is far more candid than most of the other works by members of the Roman Church; and is in this respect far beyond the Mémoire sur le Patriarche Photius, by M. Wegeulin, in the Mémoires de l'Académie Royale (de Prusse) des Sciences et Belles-Lettres, Ann. mdccclxxxvii. 4to. Berlin, 1779, p. 440, &c. Shorter accounts may be found in Mosheim (Eccles. PHOTOIUS.
Hist. by Murdock, book iii. cent. ix. pt. ii. c. iii. § 27—32), and in the works cited at the close of this article. Fabricius has given a list of the councils held to determine questions arising out of the struggle of Ignatius and Photius for the patriarchate or out of the contests of the Eastern and Western Churches with regard to Photius. He has also given a list of writers respecting Photius, divided into 1. Those hostile to Photius; and 2. Those more favorable to him. Of the historians of the lower empire, Le Beau (Des Empire, liv. lxx, 38, &c., lxxxvi. lxxxvi. 1—3) is outrageously partial, inflaming the crimes of Photius, and rejecting as untrue, or passing over without notice, the record of those incidents which are honourable to him. Gibbon (Decline and Fall, c. 53, 60), more favorable, has two separate, but brief and unsatisfactory, notices of the patriarch.

The published works of Photius are the following:—1. Μυριωδιθίων Σεβαλοθην, Мyzviladiktion seu Bibliotheca. This is the most important and valuable of the works of Photius. It may be described as an extensive review of ancient Greek literature by a scholar of immense erudition and sound judgment. It is an extraordinary monument of literary energy, for it was written while the author was engaged in his embassy to Assyria, at the request of Photius' brother Tarsius, who was much grieved at the separation, and desired an account of the books which Photius had read in his absence. It thus conveys a pleasing impression, not only of the literary acquirements and extraordinary industry, but of the fraternal affection of the writer. It opens with a prefatory address to Tarsius, recapitulating the circumstances in which it was composed, and stating that it contained a new account; hundred and seven-nine volumes. The extant copies contain a notice of two hundred and eighty: the discrepancy, which is of little moment, may have originated either in the mistake of Photius himself, or in some alteration of the divisions by some transcriber. It has been doubted whether we have the work entire. An extant analysis, by Photius, of the Historia Ecclesiastica of Philostorgius [Philostorgius], by which alone some knowledge of the contents of that important work has been preserved to us, is so much fuller than the brief analysis of that work contained in the present text of the Bibliotheca, as to lead to the supposition that the latter is imperfect.

"It is to be lamented," said Valesius (De Critica, i. 29), "that many such abridgments and collections of extracts are now lost. If these were extant in the state in which they were completed by Photius, we should greatly value them, as having been collected by many ancient writers." But Leiche has shown (Dissertae in Phot. Biblioth.) that we have no just reason for suspecting that the Bibliotheca is imperfect; and that the fuller analysis of Philostorgius probably never formed part of it; but was made at a later period. A hasty and supercilious writer in the Edinburgh Review (vol. xxx. p. 329, &c.), whose harsh and unjust censure of Photius we have already noticed, affirms on the other hand that the work has been swelled out to its present size by spurious additions. "Our younger readers, however, who take the Myriothikion in hand, are not to suppose that the book which at present goes under that name, is really the production of Photius; we believe that not more than half of it can be safely attributed to that learned and turbulent bishop; and we think it would not be very difficult to discriminate between the genuine and supposititious parts of that voluminous production." As the reviewer has not attempted to support his assertion by evidence, and as it is contradicted by the express testimony of Photius himself, who has mentioned the number of volumes examined, his judgment is entitled to but little weight. The two hundred and eighty divisions of the Bibliotheca must be understood to express the number of volumes (codices) or manuscripts, and not of writers or of works: the works of some writers, e. g. of Philon Judaeus (codd. 103—105), occupy several divisions; and on the other hand, one division (e. g. cod. 125, Instaui Martyris Scripta Varia), sometimes comprehends a notice of several different works written in one codex. The writers examined are of all classes: the greater number, however, are theologians, writers of ecclesiastical history, and of the biography of eminent churchmen; but several are secular historians, philosophers, and orators, heathen or Christian, of remote or recent times, lexicographers, and medical writers; only one or two are poets, and others on religious subjects, and there are also one or two writers of romances or love tales. There is no formal classification of these various writers; though a series of writers or writings of the same class frequently occurs, e.g. the Acta of various councils (codd. 15—20); the writers on the Resurrection (codd. 21—23); and the secular historians of the Byzantine empire (codd. 62—67). In fact the works appear to be arranged in the order in which they were read. The notices of the writers vary much in length: those in the earlier part are very briefly noticed, the later ones more fully; their recent perusal apparently enabling us to give them better value than we should have imagined; so that this circumstance confirms our observation as to the arrangement of the work. Several valuable works, now lost, are known to us chiefly by the analyses or extracts which Photius has given of them; among them are the Persica and Indica of Ctesias [Ctesias] in cod. 72; the De Rebus post Alexandrum Magnum gestis, and the Parthica and the Bithynica of Arrian (Arrianus, No. 4), in codd. 58, 92, and 93; the Historiae of Olympiodorus [Olympiodorus, No. 3], in cod. 80; the Narrationes of Conon [Conon, No. 1], in cod. 186; the Nova Historia of Polynemus Hephæstion (Prolemarus), in cod. 190; the De Heraclea Pontica Rebus of Memnon (Memnon), in cod. 224; the Vita Isidori [Isidorus, No. 5, of Gaya] by Damascius [Damascius, in cod. 242]; the lost Declamationes of Himerius [Himerius, No. 1], in cod. 67; the lost books of the Bibliotheca of Diodorus Siculus [Diodorus, No. 12], in cod. 244; the De Etythmae of (s. Rubro) Mari of Agatharchides [Agatharchides], in cod. 250; the anonymous Vita Pauli CQPoüian and Vita Athenaei, in cod. 257 and 258; the lost Orationes, genuine or spurious, of Antiphon [Antiphon, No. 1], Isocrates [Isocrates, No. 1], Lysias [Lysias], Isaeus [Isaeus, No. 1], Demosthenes [Demosthenes], Hyperides [Hyperides], Deinarchus [Deinarchus, No. 1], and Lycurgus [Lycurgus, p. 638], in cod. 259—268; and of the Christomatheia of Hellenas of Antinoopolis [Helle[n]ias, No. 2] in cod. 279; besides several theological and ecclesiastical and some medical works. The above enumeration will suffice to show the inestimable value of the Bibliotheca of Photius, especially when we reflect:
how much the value of his notices is enhanced by the soundness of his judgment. The first edition of the Bibliotheca was published by David Hoeschelius, under the title of Bibliotheca toti Photou, Librorum quos legit Photia Patrarcha Excerpta et Comment. fol. Augsburg, 1601. Some of the Epistolae of Photius were subjoined. The text of the Bibliotheca was formed on a collation of four MSS., and was accompanied with notes by the editor; but there was no Latin version. A Latin version and scholion, by Andreas Schottus of Antwerp, were published, fol. Augsburg, 1606; but the version is inaccurate, and has been severely criticized. It was however reprinted, with the Greek text, under the title of Photiâv Mivridârev râ Vêa43ôd6 Têh, Photii Myriothiôn eis Bibliotheca, fol. Geneva, 1612, and fol. Rouen, 1653. This last edition is a very splendid one, but inconvenient from its size. An edition, with a revised text, formed on a collation of four MSS. (whether any of them were the same as those employed by Hoeschelius is not mentioned) was published by Immanuel Bekker, 2 thin vols. 4to. Berlin, 1824—1825: it is convenient from its size and the copiousness of its index, but has neither version nor notes.

2. Epistolaris en tâs evklyseistikôs itorôn Filoxagou apô phwnv Photou patrârikôn, Compendium Historiae Ecclesiasticae Philologii quod dictavit Photius patriarcha. Cave regards this as a fragment of another work similar to the Bibliotheca; but his conjecture rests on no solid foundation. The Compendium is of great importance as preserving to us, though very imperfectly, an Arian statement of the ecclesiastical transactions of the busy period of the Arian controversy in the fourth century. It was first published, with a Latin version and copious notes, by Jacobus Gothofredus (Godefroi), 4to. Geneva, 1643; and was reprinted with the other ancient Greek ecclesiastical historians by Henricus Valesius (Henri Valois), folio, Paris, 1673, and by Reading, fol. Cambridge, 1748.

3. Nounokanôv ou Nounôkanov, Nomocanon, s. Nounsouanon, s. Nounsouanov, s. Nomocanon, s. Nomocanonum, s. Canonum Ecclesiasticorum et Legum Imperialium de Ecclesiastica Disciplina Consiliati s. Harmonia. This work, which bears ample testimony to the extraordinary legal attainments of its author, is arranged under fourteen titlos, Tituli, and was prefixed to a Synagwga twn kanouv, Canonum Synagwga, or collection of the Canones of the Apostles and of the ecclesiastical councils recognised by the Greek Church, compiled by Photius; from which circumstance it is sometimes called Prokâwov, Procession. It has been repeatedly published, with the commentaries of Theodore Balsamon, who strongly recommended it, in preference to similar works of an earlier date: it appeared in the Latin version of Gentianus Hervetus, fol. Paris, 1561, and in another Latin version of Henricus Agylaus, fol. Basel, 1561, and in the original Greek text with the version of Agylaus, edited by Christophorus Justellus, 4to. Paris, 1615. It was reprinted, with the version of Agylaus, in the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici, published by Guillermus Voelius and Henricus Justellus, vol. ii. p. 785, &c. fol. Paris, 1661. The Nomocanon of Photius was epitomised in the kind of verses called politici [see Philipus, No. 27, note] by Michael Psellus, whose work was published, with one or two other of his pieces, by Franciscus Boequetus, 8vo. Paris, 1632.

4. Peri twn 5 eikoumenikwn svndwv, De Syn- ton Concilii Occcurrentis. This piece subjoined, with a Latin version, to the Nomocanon in the Paris editions of 1615 and 1661, and often published elsewhere, is really part of one of the Epistolae of Photius, and is noticed in our account of them.

5. Epistolae, Epistolae. There are extant a considerable number of the letters of Photius. The MSS. containing them are enumerated by Fabricius, Bibl. Gracc. vol. xi. p. 11. It is much to be regretted that no complete collection of them has been published. David Hoeschelius subjoined to his edition of the Bibliotheca (fol. Augsburg, 1601) mentioned above, thirty-five letters selected from a MS. collection which had belonged to Maximus Marginius, bishop of Cerego, who lived about the end of the sixteenth century. One consolatory letter to the nun Eusebia on her sister’s death, was published by Conrad Rittershausia, with a Latin version, with some other pieces, 8vo. Nürnberg, 1601. But the largest collection is that prepared with a Latin version and notes by Richard Muntagius (Latinized Montacutius), bishop of Norwich, and published after his death, fol. London, 1651. The Greek text was from a MS. in the Bodleian library. The collection comprehends two hundred and forty-eight letters translated by the bishop, and a supplement of five letters brought from the East by Christianus Ravius, of which also a Latin version by another person is given. The first letter in Muntagius’s collection is addressed to Michael, prince of the Bulgarians, on the question Ti ἐστιν ἐργάν ἄρ- χοτος, De Oficio Principis: it is very long, and contains the account of the seven general councils already mentioned (No. 4), as subjoined to the printed editions of the Nomocanon. This letter to Prince Michael was translated into French verse by Bernard, a Theatin monk, dedicated to Louis XV. and published, 4to. Paris, 1716. The second letter, also of considerable length, is an encyclical letter on various disputed topics, especially on that of the procession of the Holy Spirit, the leading theological question in dispute between the Eastern and Western Churches. Muntagius’s version has been severely criticized by Combes. (Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. i. p. 701 note f f l.) Several important letters are not included in the collection, especially two to Pope Nicolaus I., and one to the archbishop or patriarch of Aquileia, on the procession of the Holy Spirit, of all which Baronius had given a Latin version in his Annales Ecclesiastici (ad ann. 858, lxi. &c., 861, xxxiv. &c., and 883, v. &c.). Fragments of the Greek text of the letters to Pope Nicolaus were cited by Allatius in different parts of his works; the original of the letter to the archbishop of Aquileia was published in the Acta eccles. Novissimae of Combes, pars i. p. 527, &c. (fol. Paris, 1672), with a new Latin version and notes by the editor; and the original of all the three letters, together with a previously unpublished letter, Ad Eccoumnum Ecclesiae Antiochiae, and the encyclical letter on the procession of the Holy Spirit (included in Muntagius’s collection), the Acta of the eighth ecumenical council (that held in 879, at which the second appointment of Photius to the patriarchate was ratified), and some other pieces, with notes by Dosithaeus, patriarch of Jerusalem, were published by Anthimus “Episcopus Remnicus,” i. e. bishop of Rinnik, in Walachia, in Ad Theophanum Monachum, i.e. to Theophanes Ceramæus, with a Latin version by Sirmond, was published by the Jesuit Francis Scours, in his Proveniendum Secundum, § 3, to the Homiliae of Ceramæus, vol. I, Paris, 1644 [Ceramæus, Theophanis, and another letter, Swaraco Staphanorhoës, and was included in the Ecclesiæ Graecæ Monuments of Cotelierius, vol. I, p. 104, together with a short piece, Peri toû µâv drâs ònu toû Bîp λυπηρών ἐπιστρεφεῖν, Quod non opporteat ad praesentis vitae molestias attendere, which, though not bearing the form of a letter (perhaps it is a fragment of one), is in the MS. classed with the Epistolae. A Latin version, from the Armenian, of some fragment's of an Epistola Phœtii ad Zachariam Armeniæ Patriarcham, in support of the doctrine of the Council of Chalcedon, is given in the Concilii Ecclesiæ Armeniæ in Romanam of Gallæus, Gal., Rom. 1650. To all these we may add the Epistola Terasio Prati, usually subjoined to the Bibliotheca. The Epistola ad Zachariam, just mentioned, and another letter, Ad Principem Armeniæ Assiatum, are extant in MS. in an Armenian version. (Comp. Mai, Scrib. div. Nov. Collecta, Proleg. in vol. I. 4to. Rom. 1825.)

6. Λέξεων συναγωγή ν. Λεκίων, Lexicon. Marquardus Gandii of Hamburg had an anonymous MS. lexicon, which he believed and asserted to be that of Photius; but the correctness of his opinion was first doubted by some, and is now given up by most scholars; and another lexicon, much shorter, and which in the MSS. ascribed to Photius, is now admitted to be the genuine work of that eminent man. A writer in the Classical Journal (No. 54. p. 338) has indeed expressed his conviction that, "in the composition of it the patriarch never stirred a finger," and that it received his name merely from having been in his possession; but we are not aware that his opinion has found any supporters. Of this Lexicon there exist several MSS., but that known as the Codex Galæanæus, because given by Thomas Gale to the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, is considered to be the archetype from which the others have been transcribed; but this MS. is itself very imperfect, containing in fact not much more than half the original work. Nearly the whole of the Lexicon, known as the Lexicon Sasanævanæum, a portion of which was published in the Anecdota Graecæ of Immanuel Bekker, vol. I. p. 319, &c. 8vo. Berlin, 1814, appears to have been incorporated in the Lexicon of Photius, of which, when entire, it is estimated to have formed a third part (Proefat. to Porson's edition). The Lexicon of Photius was first published, from Continental MSS., by Goeth- fredus Herrmannus, 4to Leipzig, 1808. It formed the third volume of a set, of which the two first volumes contained the Lexicon ascribed to Joannes Zonaras [Zonaras, Joannes]. The publication of the Lexicon was followed by that of a *Lexicon Animadversionum ad Phætii Lexicon, 4to. Leipzig, 1810, and Carus Norissimae sive *Appendices Notarum et Enthematon in Phætii Lexicon, 4to. Leipzig, 1812, both by Jo. Frud. Schleusner. But the edition of Herrmann having failed to satisfy the wants of the learned, an edition from a transcript of the Codex Galæanæus, made by Porson, was published after the death of that eminent scholar, 4to. and 8vo. London, 1822. (Comp. Edibib. Rev. vol. xxi. p. 329, &c. No. 42, July 1813, and Class. Journ. I. c.)

7. Αμφιλόχια, Amphilochia. This work, which Allatius, not a friendly censor, declared to be "a work filled with vast and varied learning, and very needful for theologians and expositors of Scripture," is in the form of answers to certain questions, and is addressed to Amphilochius, archbishop of Cyzicus. The title is thus given in full by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Coislin., fol. Paris, 1715, p. 326): Τὸ Αμφιλοχία ή λόγων ιερών καὶ θυτημάτων Ιερολογία πρὸς Αμφιλόχιον τοῦ ὀισιᾶτον ἠττροπολύτην Κυζίκου ὑπὸ τοῦ καθὼ τῶν περιμαχῶν, θυτημάτων διαφόρων ἐς άρίθμων πράκτορικον συντελέσαι ἐπίλυσιν αἰτιώμας, Amphilochia s. Sermones et Questions Sceræ ad Amphilochoei Metropolitam Cyzicenm in Tempore Tentationum; Quæstiones Variae sunt Numerio trecenta. The answers are said in one MS. (apud Fabric. Bibliac. Graec. vol. xi. p. 26) to be two hundred and ninety-seven in number; but Montfaucon (I. c.) published an index of three hundred and eight, and a Vaticum MS., according to Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Collecta, vol. I. proleg. p. xxxix.), contains three hundred and thirteen. Further additions were made by Combeh, in his SS. Patrum Amphilochei, s. Opera, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1644 (by a strange error he ascribed the work not to Photius, but to Amphiloctius of Iconium, a much older writer, from whose works he supposed Photius had made a selection), and in his Novum Auctarium, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1648; but Montfaucon, in his Bibliotheca Cœlestiana, fol. Paris, 1715; and by Jo. Justus Spier, in Wittenbergischen Anmerkungen über theol. philosophische, historische, philosophische, und kritische Materien, part I. 8vo. Wittenberg, 1733 (Harles, Intro. in Historiam Lingua Graec. Supplem. vol. Ii. p. 47). But the principal addition was made by Jo. Chr. Wolff, of forty-six Questions, published, with a Latin version, in his Cursus Philologisch, vol. v. ad fin. 4to. Hamb. 1735: these were reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. xiii. vol. Venice, 1779. A further portion of eighteen Questions, under the title Εἴκ τῶν Φωτίων Αμφιλοχίων τινα, Ex Phœtii Amphilochei quaedam, was published, with a Latin version, by Angelus Antonius Schottus, 4to. Naples, 1817; and some further portions, one of twenty Questions, with a Latin version by Mai, in his Scriptorium Veterum Nova Collecta, vol. I. p. 193, &c., and another of a hundred and thirty Questions, in vol. Ix. p. 1, &c. As many of the Questions were mere extracts from the Epistolæ and other published works of Photius, Mai considers that with those and with the portions published by him, the whole of the Amphilochias has now been published. He thinks (Script-tor. Vet. Nova Collect. vol. i. proleg. p. xii.) that the patriarch, toward the close of his life, compiled the work from his own letters, homilies, commentaries, &c., and addressed it to his friend Amphilochius, as a mark of respect, and not because the questions which were solved had actually been proposed to him by that prelate; and he thus accounts for the identity of many passages with those in the author’s other works.

II. Photius Manicheus s. Paulicicvus Libri Quatuor. No Greek title of the whole work occurs, but the four books are respectively thus described: 1. Δηλωθης περί της Μανιχαϊως αναθητησεως, Narratio de Manicheis versus repulslantibus. 2. Αποριας καλ λοιτες των Μανιχαιων, Dubia et Solutiones Manicheorum. 3. Του Φωτος λόγος Γ, Photii Sermo III. 4. Κατα της των Μανιχαιων αριτμου πληρης, Αρσυνι τω γυνωτατω μοναχω πραγματω τινων ιερων, Contra repulslantem Manicheorum Errorum ad Arsenium Monachum Sanctissimam Presbyterum et Praessuantm Sacrorum. The title of the second book is considered by Wolff to apply to the second, third, and fourth books, which formed the argumentative part of the work, and to which the first book formed an historical introduction. The second book is intended to show that the same God who created spiritual intelligenes, also created the bodies with which they are united, and the material world generally; the third vindicates the divine original of the Old Testament; and the fourth reiterates some points of the second and third books, and answers the objections of the Paulicians. The first book has several points in common with the historical work of Petrus Siculus [PETRUS, No. 7] on the same subject, so as to make it probable that one writer used the work of the other, and it is most likely Photius availed himself of that of Petrus. This important work of Photius was designed for publication by several scholars (vid. Wolff, Frascat. in Auedol. Graec. vol. i. and Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. vii. p. 329, vol. xi. p. 18), but they were prevented by death from fulfilling their purpose. Montfaucon published the first book, with a Latin version, in his Bibliotheca Coddiniana, p. 349, &c.; and the whole work was given by Jo. Christoph. Wolff, with a Latin version and notes, in his Aucdola Graecae, vol. i. ii. 12mo. Hamb. 1722, from which it was reprinted in vol. xiii. of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland. 1779. A sort of epitome of this work of Photius is found in the Panoply of Euthymius Zigabenus. Ouidin contended that the work of Metrophanes of Smyrna, on the Manicheans and on the Holy Spirit, was identical with this work of Photius; but this opinion, which is countenanced in a foregoing article [Metrophanes], is erroneous.

9. Κατα των της παλαίας Ραβμος οτι εκ Πατρος μονον εκπορευται το Πρειγαμα το θυγον αλλα ουχι και εκ του Θεου, Adversus Latinos de Procesione Spiriti Sancti. This work is incorporated in the Greek text of the Panoplia of Euthymius Zigabenus (fol. Tergovist. 1710, fol. 112, 113), of which it constitutes the thirteenth Ττης or section. It is omitted in the Latin versions of Euthymius. The work of Photius contains several syllogistic propositions, which are quoted and answered so-ratim, in the De Unione Ecclesiarum Oratio I. of

Joannes Veccus [VEXCUS], published in the Grecia

Orthodoxa of Allatius, vol. i. p. 154, &c. 4to.

Rome, 1652. It is apparently the work entitled by Cave Disputatio Compendiaria de Procesione Spiritus Sancti a solo Patre.

10. Ομολογια, Homiliae. Several of these have been published:—1. "Εκφρασε της εν των Βασιlιων νασ υποθεσης της υπεραγαγεσ Θεωτου ου πα

tio Nova Sanctissimae Dei Genituriae Ecclesiae, in Pa-latio a Basilio Macedone exstractus; a discourse de-divered on the day of the dedication of the church was printed by Lambecius, in his notes to the work of Georgius Codinus, De Or igini Politianus, p. 187, fol. Paris, 1655, and is contained, with a Latin version, in the Bonn republished of Codinius, 8vo. 1839. It is also connained in the Originum OPoltianiian Manipulus of Com-béris, 4to. Paris, 1664, p. 296, with a Latin version and notes; and in the Imperium Orientalis of Bandurias, pars iii. p. 117, fol. Paris, 1711. 2. Ετ lished by Combéris, in his Auctarium Novum, vol.

turum Domini, a fragment, probably from this, is given by Mai (Scriptor. Vet. Nova Collect. proleg.

in vol. i. p. xii). 4. Περι του μεν βεν προ της εν της

Σκηψης υποθεσης του Θεοτου, Quod non orien-tur in Iesu Christi Vocis Mysteriorum adversa

untre. This piece, which is perhaps not a homily, but a fragment of a letter, was published in the Ecclesiast Graeca Monumeta of Cotelerius, and has been already noticed in speaking of the Epistolas of Photius.

11. Ευρωπητα δεκα τον ουας ταις αποκρι-δεσις, Interrogationes decem cum totidem Responsi-nibus, s. Συναγωγα και άποδεικες ακριβες συνε-

e demonstranda de Episcopis et Metropolitanis et reliquis aliis necessariss Quoacitionibus ex Synodici et Historici Monumenti excerpta. This piece was published, with a Latin version and notes, by Francesco Fontani, in the first volume of his Novae Eruditorum Deliciae, 12mo. Florence, 1785. The notes were such as to give considerable offence to the stricter Romanists. (Mai, Scriptor. Vet. Nova Collect. proleg. ad vol. Miv., p. xiv. 12. Εις των Λαυκα θρησκευην, In Lauea Exrosiones. Some brief Scholia on the gospel of Luke from MSS. Catena, are given, with a Latin version, in vol. 3. of the Scriptorium Veterum Nova Collecta of Mai, p. 189, &c., but from which of Photius’s works they are taken does not appear.

13. Cannonicas Responsas, addressed to Leo, archibishop of Calabria; also published, with a Latin version, by Mai (ibid. p. 362), from a Palimpsest in the Vatican library.

Many works of this great writer still remain in MS. 1. Commentarius in D. Pauli Epistolos, a mutilated copy of which is (or was, according to Cave) in the public library at Cambridge. It is largely cited by Occumenius. 2. Catena in Psalmmus, formerly in the Coislinian library, of which, according to Montfaucon (Bibl. Coislin, pp. 58, 59), Photius appears to have been the compiler. But the Commentary on the Prophets, Prophetae Liber, ascribed to him by Cave, Fabricius, and others, appears to have no real or lasting existence, as was proved on the misapprehension of a passage in Possessio's Apparatus Sacer. (Mai, Proleg. p. 1.) Some works have perished, e.g. one against the heretic Leontius of Antioch, mentioned by Syncellus. (c. e. vol. xii. 6.) Photius wrote also against the emperor Julian (Phot. Epit. 187, ed. Montac.), and in defence of the use of images. Some writings, or fragments of writings of his on this subject (Adversus Iconomachos et Paulucianum, and De Differentia inter sacras Imagines atque Idolae) are extant in the Imperial Library at Vienna, but whether in distinct works, or under what title, does not appear to be known.

In the Synodicon of Bishop Beveridge (vol. ii. ad fin. part i.) a short piece is given, of which the running title is Balsamon in Photii Interrogationes quorundam Monachorum; but the insertion of the name of Photius is altogether incorrect; the work belongs to the time of the emperor Alexius I. Comnenus. The Exegetic, or Commentary of Elias Cretensius (Elia, No. 5) on the Seulae Paradisi of Joannes Climacus, is in a MS. of the Canisian library (Montfaucon, Bibli. Coislin. p. 141), improperly ascribed to Photius.

Two learned Romanists, Joanna Andresius and Jacobus Morellius, have in recent times contemplated the publication of a complete edition of the works of Photius; but the latter proceeded so far as to draw up a Conjectus of his proposed edition (Mai, Proleg. p. xlvii.) But unfortunately the design has never been completed; and the works of the greatest genius of his age have yet to be sought in the various volumes and collections, older or more recent, in which they have appeared. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 47, &c. ed. Oxford, 1740—1743; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. i. p. 701, vol. vi. p. 603, vol. vii. p. 803, vol. x. p. 670, to vol. xii. p. 185, 210, 216, 349; Oudin, Comment. de Scrip- toribus, et Scriptis Eccles. vol. ii. col. 200; Azn. Han- kius, de Rerum, Byzantin. Scriptoribus, pars i. c. 18; Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Eccles. XIXe Siècle, p. 346, 2me édit. 1693; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacer., vol. xix. p. 426, &c.; Itigius, De Bibliothecis Patrum, passim; Gallandius, Biblioth. Patrum, prolegom. in vol. xiii.; Fontani, De Photio Novae Romae Episcopo ejusque Scriptis Dissertatio, prefixed to vol. i. of the Nova Eruditorum Deliciae Mai; Scrip. Vet. Nova Collectio, proleg. in vol. i.; Assemani, Bibliotheca Juris Orientalis, lib. i. c. 2, 7, 8, 9; Vossius, De Historico Graecis, lib. ii. c. 25.)

3. Of Tyre. On the deposition of Irenaeus, bishop of Tyre, in A. D. 446, Photius was appointed his successor. Evagrius (H. E. i. 10) makes the deposition of Irenaeus one of the events of the council of Ephesus, held in A. D. 449, and known as the "Concilium Latrocinale," but Tillemont more correctly considers that the council only confirmed the previous deposition. (Mémoires, vol. xv. p. 268.) Photius of Tyre was one of the judges appointed by the emperor Theo- dosius II., in conjunction with Eustathius, bishop of Berytus and Uranius, bishop of Ilirime in Osrhoene, to hear the charges against Ibas, bishop of Edessa. Photius, Eustathius, and Uranius, met at Berytus, and Photius and Eustathius again met at Tyre, in the year 448 or 449, heard the charges, acquitted Ibas, and brought about a reconciliation between him and his accusers, who were presby- ters of his own church at Edessa. (Cave, vol. iii. col. 627, &c.; ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 593, &c., ed. Durandou.) There is a considerable difficulty as to the chronology of these meetings, which is discussed by Tillemont in two of his careful notes. (Mém. vol. xvi. p. 897, &c.) Photius was present at the Council of Ephesus, known as the "Concilium latrocinale," where he joined in acquitting the archimandrite Eutyches, and restoring him to his ecclesiastical rank from which he had been depose (Concil. iv. col. 260, ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 220, ed. Hardouin.) About the same time Photius had a contest with Eustathius, bishop of Berytus, who had obtained an edict of the emperor Theodosius II., erecting Berytus into a metropolitanean see, and to the extent of their respective jurisdictions. Tillemont judges that the dignity accorded to the see of Berytus, was designed to be merely titular, and that the struggle was occasioned by the attempt of Eustathius to assume metropolitan jurisdiction over some bishoprics previously under the jurisdiction of Tyre. In this attempt, being supported by the patriarchs, Anatolius of Constantinople, and Maximus of Antioch, he effected his purpose: and Photius, after a struggle, was constrained, not so much by an excommunication which was speedily recalled, as by threats of deposition, to submit. The jurisdiction of the dioceses abstracted was, however, restored to Photius by the Council of Chalcedon, A. d. 451. (Concil. iv. col. 539, ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 435, &c., ed. Hardouin.) Photius was among those who at the same council voted that Theodoret was orthodox, and should be restored to his see. (Concil. col. 613, ed. Labbe, col. 495, ed. Hardouin.) He also took part in some of the other transactions of the assembly. Nothing further is known of him. There is extant one piece of Photius, entitled De Euprates, Proces s. Supplex Libellus, addressed to the emperors Valentinian III. and Marcellus, respecting the dispute with Eustathius of Berytus. It is given in the Actio Quartae of the Council of Chalcedon. (Concil., iv. col. 542, &c., ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 436, &c., ed. Hardouin.)

A Synopsis of Concilii, extant in MS., is ascribed to Photius of Tyre: this cannot be, as some have supposed, the same work as the Epitome Actorum Conciliorum, also extant in MS., and ascribed to the more celebrated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople. (Tillemont, Mém. ii. cc.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 451, vol. i. p. 443; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 676, vol. xii. p. 358.)

PHOIXIDAS (φοίξις), a leader of Greek mercenaries in the service of Tolemy Philopator. He is called by Polybius, in one passage, an Achaean, in another a Melitean, by which he is probably meant a native of Melitea, in Phthiotis (Schweigh. ad Polyb. v. 63). Having had much experience in war under Demetrius II., and Antigonus Doson, he was one of the officers selected by Agathocles and Sosibius, the ministers of the Egyptian king, to levy and discipline an army with which to oppose the progress of Antiochus III. He appears to have ably discharged the duties entrusted to him, and when the army was at length able to take the field, held the command of a body of 8000 Greek mercenaries, with which he rendered important services at the great battle of Raphia (b.c. 217), and contributed essentially to the victory of the Egyptian monarch on that occasion. (Polyb. v. 63 65, 65.)

PHIRAATACES, king of Parthia. [Arsaces XVI.]
Asia. The first edition is a bad Latin translation of an extract of the work, divided into three books, by Jacob Pontanus (ad calcem Theol. Symocatnæ), Ingolstadt, 1694, 4to, and this bad edition Gibbon was compelled to peruse when he wrote the last volume of his "Decline and Fall." He complains bitterly of it. "While," says he (vol. xii. p. 68, ed. 1613, 8vo), "so many MSS. of the Greek original are extant in the libraries of Rome, Milan, the Escurial, &c." (he might have added of Munich, which is the best), "it is a matter of shame and reproach that so should be reduced to the Latin version or abstract of J. Pontanus, so deficient in accuracy and elegance." While Gibbon thus complained, professor Alter of Vienna was preparing his edition of the Greek text, which he published at Vienna, 1796, fol. This is the standard edition. Immanuel Bekker published another in 1836, 8vo, which is a revised reprint of Alter's text, with a good Latin version by Edward Brockhöf, and revised by the editor; this edition belongs to the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines. Hammond has written an excellent commentary to Phranza, which is dispersed in his numerous notes to the first and second volumes of his Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches. Phranza wrote also Expositio Symboli, a religious treatise printed in Alter's edition of the "Chronicon." (Alter's Proemium to the Chronicon: Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 74, vol. xii. p. 192; Hankius. Script. Byzant.) Phraortes (Φραορτης) was, according to Herodotus, the second king of Media, and the son of Deioces, whom he succeeded. He reigned twenty-two years (B.C. 656—634). He first conquered the Persians, and then subdued the greater part of Asia, but was at length defeated and killed while laying siege to Nineveh (Nineveh), the capital of the Assyrian empire. He was succeeded by his son Cyaxares. (Herod. i. 73, 102.) This Phraortes is said to be the same as the Trateno of the Zendavesta, and to be called Feridun in the Shah-Nameh. (Hammer in Wien. Jahrh. vol. ix. p. 13, &c.) Phrasaortes (Φρασαορτῆς), son of Rhomithres, a Persian, who was appointed by Alexander the Great satrap of the province of Persis Proper, B.C. 331. He died during the expedition of the king to India. (Arr. Anab. iii. 18, vi. 20.) Phra'sius (Φραίσιος), a Cyprian soothsayer, who advised Busrías to sacrifice the strangers that came to his dominions for the purpose of averting a scarcity; but Phra'sius himself fell a victim to his own advice. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Arcadius, x. 82.) Phratagune (Φραταγωγὴ), a wife of Dareius I, king of Persis, whose two children by this monarch fell at the battle of Thermopylae. (Herod. vii. 224.) [ABROCOMES.] Phrataphernes (Φραταφρήνης). 1. A Persian who held the government of Parthia and Hyrcania, under Dareius Codomannus, and joined that monarch with the contingents from the provinces subject to his rule, shortly before the battle of Arbela, B.C. 331. He afterwards accompanied the king on his flight into Hyrcania, but, after the death of Dareius, surrendered voluntarily to Alexander, by whom he was kindly received, and appears to have been shortly after reinstated in his satrapy. At least he is termed by Arrian satrap of Parthia, during the advance of Alexander against Bessus, when he was detached by the king, together with Eribynis and Caranus to crush the revolt of Sardarazes, in Asia. He rejoined the king at Zariaspas, the following year. The next winter (n. c. 323—327), during the stay of Alexander at Nautaca, we find Phraptapheues again despatched to reduce the disobedient satrap of the Mardi and Tapuri, Autophradates, a service which he successfully performed, and brought the rebel a captive to the king, by whom he was subsequently put to death. He rejoined Alexander in India, shortly after the defeat of Porus; but seems to have again returned to his satrapy, from whence we find him sending his son Pharasmanes with a large train of camels and beasts of burthen, laden with provisions for the supply of the army during the toilsome march through Gedrosia (Arr. Ann. iii. 9, 25, 26, iv. 7, 18, v. 20, vi. 27; Curti. vi. 4. § 25, vii. 3, § 17, ix. 10. § 17). From this time we hear no more of him until after the death of Alexander.

In the first division of the provinces consequent on that event, he retained his government (Diod. xviii. 2) but it is probable that he died previously to the second partition at Triparadeisus (n. c. 321), as on that occasion we find the satrapy of Parthia bestowed on Philip, who had been previously governor of Sogdiana. (Drayson, Hellenismum, vol. i. pp. 49, 151.)

2. The king of the Chorasmanians who is called Pharasmanes by Arrian [Pharasmanes, No. 1], bears in Curtius (vii. i. § 8) the name of Phrataphernes. [E. H. B.]

PHRIXUS (Φρίξος), a son of Athanas and Nephele or of Athanass and Themisto (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1144), and brother of Helle, and a grandson of Aeolus (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1141). In consequence of the intrigues of his stepmother, Jno (others state that he offered himself), he was to be sacrificed to Zeus; but Nephele removed him and Helle, and the two then rode away on the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes, through the air. According to Hyginus (Fab. 3), Phrixus and Helle were thrown by Dionysos into a state of madness, and while wandering about in a forest, they were removed by Nephele. BetweenSegoe and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea which was afterwards called after her the Hellepool; but Phrixus arrived in Colchis, in the kingdom of Aeetes, who gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage (comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1123, 1149). Phrixus sacrificed the ram which had carried him, to Zeus Phryxus or Laphystius (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 653; Paus. i. 24. § 2), and gave its skin to Aeetes, who fastened it to an oak tree in the grove of Artemis.

By Chalciope Phrixus became the father of Argus, Melas, Phrontis, Cythius, and Presbon (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 14; Paus. ix. 34. § 5; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1123; Tzetza. Ad Lyc. 22; Diod. iv. 47). Phrixus died in old age in the kingdom of Aeetes, or, according to others, he was killed by Aeetes in consequence of an oracle (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1151; Hygin. Fab. 3), or he returned to Orchomenus, in the country of the Minyas. (Paus. ix. 34. § 5; comp. Athanas; Jason.) [L. S.]

PHRONTIS (Φρόντις). 1. A son of Phrixus and Chalciope. (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1157; Hygin. Fab. 14.)

PHRYLUS. 2. A son of Onetor, was the helmsman of Menelans. (Hom. Od. iii. 202; Paus. x. 25. § 2.)

3. The wife of Panthous, of whom Homer speaks. (I. xvii. 40.) [L. S.]

PHRONTON (Φρόντων), the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Bruncn, Anat. vol. i. p. 346; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 56, xiii. p. 938). Jacobs supposes him to be the rhetorician of Emissa, mentioned by Suidas (α. τ.), who lived in Rome in the reign of Severus, and died at Athens at the age of sixty, and who was the uncle of the celebrated critic Longinus. He is constantly confounded with the distinguished Roman orator, M. Cornelius Fronto, the tutor of M. Antoninus. (See Ruhnken, Dissert. Philol. de Longino, § iii. p. 6, Opusc. p. 491.) [P. S.]

PHRYGIA (Φρυγία), a daughter of Cecrops, from whom the country of Phrygia was believed to have derived its name (Plin. H. N. v. 82). Phrygia is also used for Cyprus, and also for a man, who was worshipped above all others in Phrygia (Verg. Aen. vii. 139; Strab. x. p. 469), and as a surname of Athena (Minerva) on account of the Palladium which was brought from Phrygia. (Ov. Met. xiii. 337; compare Apollod. iii. 12. § 3.) [L. S.]

PHRYGILLUS, an artist, who appears to have been one of the most ancient, as well as one of the most celebrated medallists and engravers of precious stones. There is a very beautiful intaglio by him, representing Love seated and supporting himself on the ground, in the attitude of those figures of boys playing the game of astragals, which so often occurs in the works of ancient art. The form of the letters of the name ΠΨΥΓΙΑΟΣ, the large size of the wings of the figure of Love, and the whole style of the gem, concur to show that the artist belonged to the earlier Greek school. There is also engraved upon this gem a bivalve shell, which also occurs on the coins of Syracuse; whence it may be inferred that the artist was a Syracusean. This conjecture becomes a certainty through the fact, recently published by Raoul-Rochette, that there exist medals of Syracuse, on which the name of Phrygillus is inscribed. One medal of this type is in the possession of R. Rochette himself, who has given an engraving of it on the title-page of his Lettre à M. Schorn, by the side of an engraving of the gem already mentioned. Another medal of this type is in the collection of the Duc de Luynes. The same collection contains another very beautiful Syracusean medal, in bronze, bearing the inscription ΠΨΤ, which no one can now hesitate to recognise as the initial letters of the name Phrygillus. Raoul-Rochette accounts these three medals to be among the most precious remains of ancient numismatic art.

The identification, in this instance, of a distinguishing medalist and gem-engraver, goes far to settle the question, which has been long discussed, whether those professiones were pursued by the same or by different classes of artists among the Greeks. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 79—83, 148, 2d edition.) [P. S.]

PHRYLUS, a painter, whom Pliny places at Ol. 90, b. c. 420, with Aglaophen, Cephisodorus, and Evenor, the father of Parrhasius; of all of whom he says, that they were distinguished, but not deserving of any lengthened discussion (omnia jam illustres, non tamen in quibus haercer expresso defect, H. N. xxx. 9. s. 36).
PHRYNE (Φρύνη), one of the most celebrated Athenian hetairae, was the daughter of Epicles, and a native of Thebes in Boeotia. She was of very humble origin, and originally gained her livelihood by gathering capers; but her beauty procured for her afterwards so much wealth that she is said to have offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes, after they had been destroyed by Alexander, if she might be allowed to put up this inscription on the walls:—

"Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne, the hetairae, rebuilt them." She had among her admirers many of the most celebrated men of the age of Philip and Alexander, and the beauty of her form gave rise to some of the greatest works of art. The orator Hyperides was one of her lovers, and he defended her when she was accused by Euthius on one occasion of some capital charge; but when the eloquence of her advocate failed to move the judges, he bore her uncovered her breast, and thus ensured her acquittal. The most celebrated picture of Apelles, his "Venus Anadyomene" (APELLIES, p. 222, b.), is said to have been a representation of Phryne, who, at a public festival at Eleusis, entered the sea with dishevelled hair. The celebrated Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles, who was one of her lovers, was taken from her [PRAXITELES], and he expressed his love for her in an epigram which he inscribed on the base of a statue of Cupid, which he gave to her, and which she dedicated at Thebes. Such admiration did she excite, that her neighbours dedicated at Delphi a statue of her, made of gold, and resting on a base of Pentelic marble. According to Apollodoros (ap. Athen. xiii. p. 591, c.) there were two hetairae of the name of Phryne, one of whom was named Claudislegos and the other Saperdium; and according to Heroicus (Ubd.) there were also two, one the Theophas, and the other the named Sestus. The Theophas Phryne, however, is the only one of whom we have any account. (Athen. xiii. pp. 590, 591, 558, c. 567, c. 583, b. 585, e. c.; Adian, V. II. ix. 32; Alciphron, Ep. i. 31; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19; § 10; Propert. ii. 5; Jacobs, Att. Mus. vol. iii. pp. 18, &c. 36, &c.)

PHRYNICIUS (Φρύνιχος), an Athenian general, the son of Stratonides (SchoI. ad Aristoph. Lys. 313). In B. C. 412 he was sent out with two others in command of a fleet of 40 ships to the coast of Asia Minor. The troops encamped in the territory of Miletus. A battle ensued in which the Athenians were victorious. A Peloponnesian fleet having arrived soon after, the colleagues of Phrynichus were for risking an engagement, from which Phrynichus (wisely, as Thucydides thinks) dissuaded them (Thuc. viii. 25, 27, &c.). In 411, when proposals were made to the Athenians at Samos on the part of Alcibiades, who offered to secure for them Persian aid if an oligarchy were established instead of a democracy, Phrynichus again offered some sanguine advice, pointing out the dangers into which such a course would plunge them, and expressing his belief that Alcibiades was not at heart more friendly to an oligarchy than to a democracy, and his doubts as to his power of executing his promises. Peisander and the other members of the oligarchical faction, however, adopted his advice, and sent a deputation to Athens. Phrynichus, being informed that in case Alcibiades should be restored, sent a message to Astyochus, informing him of the machinations of Alcibiades. Astyochus betrayed the communication to Tissaphernes and Alcibiades, and the latter complained to his friends in the Athenian armament. Of the treachery of Phrynichus, and demanded that he should be put to death. Thirlwall (vol. iv. p. 34) is at a loss to decide whether the conduct of Phrynichus upon this occasion was the result of a blind want of caution, or a bold and subtle artifice. He wrote again to Astyochus, offering to betray the Athenian armament into his hands, and before the letter of Alcibiades, to whom Astyochus again showed the letter of Phrynichus, who sent a fresh charge against Phrynichus, could reach the Athenians, Phrynichus warned the Athenians that the enemy were preparing to surprise their encampment. By these means he made it appear that the charges of Alcibiades were groundless, and preferred against him out of personal enmity. Soon afterwards Peisander, wishing to get Phrynichus out of the way, procured his recall. In the subsequent progress of the oligarchical intrigue, when the oligarchical faction found that the hopes held out to them by Alcibiades were groundless, and that they could get on better without him than with him, Phrynichus again joined them, and, in conjunction with Antiphon, Peisander, and Themænes, took a prominent part in the revolution which issued in the establishment of the oligarchy of the Four Hundred. When, on the junction effected between Alcibiades and the Athenians at Samos, Themænes and others counselled the oligarchs to make the best terms they could with their antagonists, Phrynichus was one of the foremost in opposing every thing of the kind, and with Antiphon and ten others was sent to Sparta to negotiate a peace. On his return he was assassinated in the agora by a young Athenian, who was assisted by an Argive. The former escaped, but the latter was seized and put to the torture. It appeared that the assassination was the result of a conspiracy among those opposed to the oligarchs, and the latter found it the most prudent plan not to pursue the investigation (Thuc. viii. 48, 50, &c. 54, 68, 90, 92). Lycurgus (ad. Locr. p. 217, ed. Raiske) gives a different account of his assassination. [C. P. M.]

PHRYNICIUS (Φρύνιχος), literary. 1. The son of Polyphrumpdon (or, according to others, of Minymis), an Athenian, was one of the poets to whom the invention of tragedy is ascribed: he is said to have been the disciple of Thespis (Suid. s. v.). He is also spoken of as before Aeschylus (SchoI. in Aristoph. Ran. 941). He is mentioned by the chroniclers as flourishing at Ol. 74, i. c. 458 (Cyrill. Julian. i. p. 13, b.). Ensch. Chron. a. 1534; Clinton, F. H. s. a.) He gained his first tragic victory in Ol. 67, i. c. 511 (Suid. s. v.), twenty-four years after Thespis (i. c. 535), twelve years after Choræus (i. c. 523), and twelve years before Aeschylus (i. c. 499); and in his last in Ol. 76, i. c. 476, on which occasion Themistocles was his choragus, and recorded the event by an inscription (Phnt. Themisth. 5). Phrynichus must, therefore, have flourished at least 55 years. He probably went, like other poets of the age, to the court of Hiero, and there died; for the statement of the anonymous writer on Comedy, in his account of Phrynichus, the comic poet (p. 29), that Phrynichus, a native of Thurii, died in Sicily, evidently refers properly to the tragic poet, on account of his father's name.

In all the accounts of the rise and development of tragedy, the chief place after Thespis is assigned to Phrynichus. The external and mechanical improvements in the drama are indeed ascribed to each of the great tragedians who lived at the end of the sixth and beginning of the fifth centuries B.C., namely, Chorēsia, Phrynichus, Pratinas, and Aeschylus; and there might well be doubts on such matters, as every formal improvement made by either of these poets must, of necessity, have been adopted by the others; so that the tragedy which Phrynichus exhibited in B.C. 476, after the introduction of those improvements which are usually ascribed to Aeschylus, must have been altogether a different kind of drama from that with which he gained his first prize in B.C. 511. Of such inventions, the one ascribed to Phrynichus is the introduction of masks representing female persons in the drama. But those improvements which are ascribed specially to Phrynichus affect the internal poetical character of the drama, and entitle him to be considered as the real inventor of tragedy, an honour which the ancients were in doubt whether to assign to him or to Thespis (Plato, Minos, p. 321). For the light, ludicrous, Bacchane- malian stories of the latter, he substituted regular and serious subjects, taken either from the heroic age, or the heroic deeds which illustrated the history of his own time. In these he aimed, not so much to amuse the audience as to move their passions; and so powerful was the effect of his tragedy on the capture of Miletus, that the audience burst into tears, and fined the poet a thousand drachmae, because he had exhibited the sufferings of a kindred people, and even passed a law that no one should ever again make use of that drama (Herod. vi. 21). It has been supposed by some that the subjects chosen by Phrynichus, and his mode of treating them, may have been influenced by the recent publication, under the care of Peisistratus, of the collected poems of Homer; which poems, in fact, Aristotle regards as the source of the first idea of tragedy. Aeschylus, the great successor of Phrynichus, used to acknowledge his obligations to Homer, by saying that his tragedies were only τεμάχυ των ὀμήνων μεγάλων δείπνων. (Ath. viii. p. 348.)

In the poetry of the drama, also, Phrynichus made very great improvements. To the light mimetic chorus of Thespis he added the sublime music of the dithyrambic choruses; and the effect of this alteration must have been to expel from the chorus much of the former element, and to cause a better arrangement of the parts which were assigned respectively to the chorus and the actor. We have several allusions to the sublime grandeur, and the sweet harmony of his choral songs. Aristophanes more than once contrasts those ancient and beautiful melodies with the involved refinements of later poets (Aen. 748, Vesp. 219, 269, Rom. 911, 1294, Thesm. 164; comp. Schol. ad loc. and ad Rom. 941); some writers ascribe to Phrynichus the ancient hymn to Pallas which Aristophanes refers to as a model of the old poetry (Nub. 964; comp. LامPROCLES); and his were among the poems which it was customary to sing at the close of banquet and of sacrifices (Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pt. 1, p. 70).

Phrynichus appears moreover to have paid particular attention to the dances of the chorus; and there is an epigram ascribed to him, celebrating his skill in the invention of figures (Plut. Sympos. iii. 9). Suidas also says that he composed pyrrhic dances (s.v.).

In the drama of Phrynichus, however, the chorus still retained its principal place, and it was reserved for Aeschylus and Sophocles to bring the dialogue and action into their due position. Thus Aristophanes, while attacking Aeschylus for this very fault, intimates that it was a remnant of the drama of Phrynichus (Ran. 906, &c.) and one of the problems of Aristotles is, "Why were the poets of the age of Phrynichus more lyric than the later tragedians?" to which his answer is that the lyric parts were much more extensive than the narrative in their tragedies. (Prob. xix. 31.)

Of the several plays of Phrynichus we have very little information. Suidas, who (as in other instances) has two articles upon him, derived, no doubt, from different sources, gives the following titles.—Πανορωμα — (or Παλωρων, Paus. x. 31. 2), Αυγο διακοινος, Ακηρασ, Αθηνα λεον Πανορωμα, Νεοδικτοι, Πανορωμα, Αναβίωνα, Περσανη, and Αλοισιος Μηλεοσιος (or Μηλεοσιος Άλοισιος). The last of these plays, which has already been referred to, must have been acted after B.C. 494, the year in which Miletus was taken by the Persians. Suidas omits one of his last, which, and apparently one of his best plays, namely, the Phoenissae, which had for its subject the defeat of the Persian invaders, and to which Aeschylus is said by an ancient writer to have been greatly indebted in his Persae (Aryst. in Aesch. Pers.). The conjecture of Bentley seems very probable, that this was the play with which Phrynichus gained his last recorded victory, with Themistocles for his choruses. Phrynichus had a son, Polyphradmon, who was also a tragic poet. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 316; Bentley, An- swer to Boyle; Welcker, Die Griech. Trag. pp. 18, 127; Müller; Bode; Bernhardt.)

2. A tragic actor, son of Chorocles, whom Suidas confounds with the great tragic poet, but who is distinguished from him by a scholarist on Aristophanes (Av. 750), who mentions four Phrynichus, the tragic poet, the tragic actor, the comic poet, and a general. This actor is no doubt the person whose dancing is ridiculed by Aristophanes, in passages which Bentley erroneously referred to the tragic poet (Vesp. 1481, 1515). He is also mentioned by Andocides as Φρυνοίχος ου δρασμάτων (De Myst. p. 24); and an attack in the Clouds of Aristophanes (1092), on the tragic actors of the day is explained by the scholarist as referring to Phrynichus. (See Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 148, 149.)

3. A comic poet of the Old Comedy (τῶν ἐπιθέων ὥς τῆς ἁραίας κοιμαίδας), was, according to the most probable statement, the son of Eunomides (Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 94). He first exhibited, according to Suidas, in Ol. 86, b. c. 435, where, however, we should perhaps read Ol. 87, for the anonymous writer on Comedy (p. 29) places him, with Eupolis, at Ol. 87, b. c. 429 (Clinton, F. H. sub ann.). Nothing more is known of the life of Phrynichus, for the statement of the anonymous writer, that he died in Sicily, refers, in all probability, to the tragic poet (see above), and the story of a scholarist (ad Aristoph. Ran. 700) about his being elected a general, is an error which has been sufficiently exposed by Bentley and Meineke.

Phrynichus was ranked by the grammarians among the most distinguished poets of the Old
Comedy (Anon. de Com. p. 23), and the elegance and vigour of his extant fragments sustain this judgment. Aristophanes, indeed, attacks him together with other comic poets, for the use of low and obsolete buffoonery (Ian. 14), but the scholar on the passage asserts that there was nothing of the sort in his extant plays. He was also charged with corrupting both language and metre, and with plagiarism; the last of these charges was brought against him by the comic poet Hermippus, in his Φιλοδόφορος (Schol. ad Aristoph. l. c., and Av. 750). These accusations are probably to be regarded rather as indications of the height to which the rivalry of the comic poets was carried, than as the statement of actual truths. We find Eupolis also charged by Aristophanes with plagiarisms from Phrynichus (Nub. 553). On the subject of metre, we are informed that Phrynichus invented the Ιονικά μικροειδή strophe, which was named after him (Marci Victor, p. 2542; Putsch; Hepharetz, p. 67, Gaisf.); about another metre, the Φίλεστρον, there is some doubt (see Meineke, pp. 150, 151). His language is generally terse and elegant, but he sometimes uses words of peculiar formation (Meineke, p. 151). The celebrated grammarians, Didymus of Alexandria, wrote commentaries on Phrynichus, one of which, on the Κρόνος, is quoted by Athenaeus (ix. p. 371, f.).

The number of his comedies is stated by the anonymous writer on comedy (p. 34) at ten; and Suidas gives the same number of titles, namely, Ἐρφάτης, Κόνος, Κρόνος, Καμαστος, Ζότυρος, Τριγόνος Ἐρφάτης, Μονόροφος, Μούσα, Μόστης, Πρόσατρος, the subjects of which are fully discussed by Meineke. The Μονόροφος was acted, with the Βίδρες of Aristophanes and the Κοσαμαντεία of Ameipsias, in Ol. 91. 2, b. c. 414, and obtained the third prize; and the Μούσα was acted, with the Φρυγικά of Aristophanes and the Κλεα- δέανος of Plato, in Ol. 93. 3, b. c. 405, and obtained the second prize. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 483, 484; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 146—160, ii. pp. 580—609; Bergk, Reliq. Com. Att. Ant. pp. 366, &c.)

PHRYNIS. [PHRYNIS.]

PHRYNISCUΣ (φρύνικος), an Achaean, who was engaged in the expedition of Cyrus the Younger. When the Cyrenians had been deceived by the adventurer Coenatadas at Byzantium, n. c. 400, Phryniscus was one of those who advised that they should enter the service of Suthes, the Odryssian prince, who wanted their aid for the recovery of his dominions. We find Phryniscus afterwards, together with Timimoun and Cleanor, joining cordially with Xenophon in the design to obtain from Suthes the pay that was due, and devoting the attempt of Heracleides of Maroneia to divide the Greek generals (Xen. Anab. vii. 2, §§ 1, 2, 5, §§ 4, 10). [Herculeides, No. 16.] [E. E.]

PHRYNIS (φρύνις), or PHRYNIS (φρύνις), a celebrated dithyrambic poet, of the time of the Peloponnesian war, was a native of Mytilene, but flourished at Athens. His father's name seems to have been Camon, or Cambon, but the true form is very doubtful. Respecting his own name, also, there is a doubt, but the form Phryn is the genuine Aeolic form. He belonged to the Lesbian school of citharoeic music, having been instructed by Aristocletus, a musician of the time of the Persian wars, who claimed a lineal descent from Terpander. Before receiving the instructions of this musician, Phrynias had been a flute-player, which may partly account for the liberties he took with the music of the cithara. His innovations, effeminacies, and frigidity are repeatedly attacked by the comic poets, especially Pherecrates (op. Plut. de Mus. p. 1146; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 326, &c.) and Aristophanes (Nub. 971, comp. Schol.). Among the innovations which he is said to have made, was the addition of two strings to the heptachord; and Putsch relates that, when he went to Sparta, the Ephors cut off two of his nine strings, only leaving him the choice, whether he would sacrifice the two lowest or the two highest. The whole story, however, is doubtful; for it is not improbable that the number of strings had been increased at an earlier period. (For a fuller discussion of his musical innovations, see Schmidt, Dilig. gramm. pp. 89—95.)

Phrynias was the first who gained the victory in the musical contests established by Pericles, in connection with the Panathenaic festival (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. l. c.), probably in b. c. 445 (Müller, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. p. 286). He was one of the instructors of Timothens, who, however, defeated him on one occasion. (Müller, l. c.) [P. S.]

PHRYNION. [Alcaeus.]

PHRYNION, a satyrus, whom Pliny mentions as the disciple of Polyceutis, and who must, therefore, have lived about b. c. 408. His country is not mentioned. (H. N. xxvii. 8, s. 19; respecting the true reading see Thiersch, Epochen, p. 276.)

PHRYNUS, artists.

1. A Greek satyrus, whose name is only known by an inscription in ancient characters, on a small bronze figure found at Locri. (Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. iv. pl. xix. p. 66.)

2. A maker of vases, whose name occurs on a vase of an ancient style, found at Vulci, and now in the collection of M. Durand. The inscription is as follows:

ΦΡΥΝΟΣΕΠΟΙΔΕΣΕΝΧΑΙΠΕΜΕΝ.

PHTHIA (φθια). 1. A daughter of Amphion and Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6.)

2. The beloved of Apollo, by whom she became the mother of Dorus, Laodocus, and Polytopetes. (Apollod. i. 7. § 6; comp. AETOL.)

3. The name in some traditions given to the mistress of Amyntor. (Ivottz. ad Lyc. 421; comp. PHOENIX, No. 2.) [L. S.]

PHTHIA (φθια). 1. A daughter of Menon of Pharsala, the Thessalian hipparch [MENON, No. 4], and wife of Aeacides, king of Epeirus, by whom she became the mother of the celebrated Pyrrhus, as well as of two daughters: Deidameia, the wife of Demetrius Poliorcetes and Troian, of whom nothing more is known (Plut. Pyrrh. 1). Her portrait is found on some of the coins of her son Pyrrhus. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 170.)

2. A daughter of Alexander II., king of Epeirus, who was married to Demetrius II., king of Macedon. The match was arranged by her mother Olympias, who was desirous of thus securing the powerful assistance of the Macedonian king to support herself on the throne of Epeirus after the death of Alexander. (Justin. xxvii. 1.) [E.H.B.]

PHILIPUS (Φίλιππος). 1. A son of Poseidon by Larissa, from whom Phthisa in Thessaly was said to have derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 320; Dionys. i. 17.)

2. One of the sons of Lycon. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.) [L. S.]

PHURNUTUS (Φουρνότους), is no other than L. Annaeus Cornutus [Cornutus, p. 859], whose mythological treatise was first published under this name, by Aldus, Venice, 1505, with the alias, however, of Cornutus. He is also called Πολυδέκατος Φουρνότους, and Gesner says that a treatise under this name, treating of the labours of Hercules, was extant in his time in one of the Venetian libraries (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 550). We transcribe the title of the last edition of this work, from Engemann's Bibliotheca: "Phurnutus (s. Cornutus) L. Annaeus, De Natura Deorum ex sedibus J. Bapt. d'Ausse de Villingon recens. commentariis inl. Frid. Ossannus. Adjecta est J. de Villingon de Theologia Physica Stoicorum comm. Gottingae." 1844. [W. M. G.]

PHYMA. [Pleistarchus, p. 170, a.]

PHYLACUS (Φυλάκος). 1. A son of Deion and Diomedes, was married to Pericleyne or Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, by whom he became the father of Iphicles and Alcimedon (Hom. II. ii. 705; Apollod. i. 9. §§ 4, 12). He was believed to be the founder of the town of Phylace, in Thessaly (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 523). The patronymic Phylacidae is applied to his daughter Alcimede (Apollon. Rhod. i. 47), and his descendants, Phylacius, Iphicles, and Prosiatela are called Phylaieneides. (Hom. II. ii. 705; Propert. i. 19; comp. Hom. Od. xiv. 231.)

A son of Iphicles, and grandson of No. 1. (Eustath. ad Hom. i. c.)

3. A Delphian hero, to whom a sanctuary was dedicated at Delphi. (Paus. x. 23. §§ 3, 6. § 4; Herod. viii. 39.)

4. A Trojan, who was slain by Leitus. (Hom. II. xvi. 181.) [L. S.]

PHYLARCHUS (Φυλαρχος). 1. A native of Centuriaca in Sicily, plundered by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 12, 23.)

2. Of Halus, taken by the pirates off the coast of Sicily. (Cic. Verr. v. 34, 46.)

PHYLARCHUS (Φυλαρχος), a Greek historical writer, was a contemporary of Aratus. The name is sometimes written Philarchus, but there is no reason to adopt the supposition of Wytenbach (ad Plut. de Is. et Osir. p. 211), that there were two different writers, one Philarchus and the other Philarchus. His birthplace is doubtful. We learn from Suidas (s. e.) that three different cities are mentioned as his native place, Athens, Naukratis in Egypt, or Sicily: but as Athenaeus calls him (ii. p. 58, c) an Athenian or Naukratian, we may leave the claims of Sicyn out of the question. We may therefore conclude that he was born either at Athens or Naukratis; and it is probable that the latter was his native town, and that he afterwards removed to Athens, where he spent the greater part of his life. Respecting the date of Phylarchus there is less uncertainty. We learn from Polybius (i. 56) that Phylarchus was a contemporary of Aratus, and gave an account of the same events as the latter did in his history. Aratus died B.C. 218, and his work ended at B.C. 220; we may therefore place Phylarchus at about B.C. 215.

The credit of Phylarchus as an historian is vehemently attacked by Polybius (i. 56, &c.), who charges him with falsifying history through his partiality to Cleomenes, and his hatred against Aratus and the Achaeans. The accusation is probably not unfounded, but it might be retorted with equal justice upon Polybius, who has fallen into the opposite error of exaggerating the merits of Aratus and his party, and depreciating Cleomenes, whom he has certainly both misrepresented and misunderstood. (Comp. Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, vol. i. p. 270, note.) The accusation of Polybius is repeated by Plutarch (Arat. 38), but it comes with rather a bad grace from the latter writer, since there can be little doubt, as Lucht has shown, that his lives of Agis and Cleomenes are taken almost entirely from Phylarchus, to whom he is likewise indebted for the latter part of his life of Pyrrhus. The vivid and graphic style of Phylarchus, of which we shall say a few words below, was well suited to Plutarch's purpose. It has likewise been remarked by Heerem (Comment. Societ. Gotting. vol. xxv. p. 185, &c.), that Trogus Pompeius took from Phylarchus that portion of his work which treated of the same times as were contained in the history of Phylarchus. That Plutarch and Trogus borrowed almost the very words of Phylarchus, appears from a comparison of Justin, xxviii. 4, with Plutarch, Cleom. 29.

The style of Phylarchus is also strongly censured by Polybius (i. c.), who blames him for writing history for the purpose of effect, and for seeking to harrow up the feelings of his readers by the narrative of deeds of violence and horror. This charge is to some extent supported by the fragments of his work which have come down to us; but whether he deserves all the reprehension which Polybius has bestowed upon him may well be questioned, since the unpoetical character of this great historian's mind would not enable him to feel much sympathy with a writer like Phylarchus, who seems to have possessed no small share of imagination and fancy. It would appear that the style of Phylarchus was too ambitious; it was oratorical, and perhaps declamatory; but at the same time it was lively and attractive, and brought the events of the history vividly before the reader's mind. He was, however, very negligent in the arrangement of his words, as Dionysius has remarked. (Dionys. De Compos. Verb. c. 4.)

1. Τοποθεία, in 28 books, of which we have already spoken, and which were by far the most important of his writings. This work is thus described by Suidas:— "The expedition of Pyrrhus the Epieirat against Peloponnesus in 28 books; and it comes down to Ptolemaeus who was called Euergetes, and to the end of Berenice, and as far as Cleomenes the Lacedaemonian, against whom Antigonus made war." When Suidas entitles it "the expedition of Pyrrhus, &c." he merely describes the first event in the work. The expedition of Pyrrhus into Peloponnesus was in B.C. 272; the death of Cleomenes in B.C. 220: the work therefore embraced a period of fifty-two years. From some of the fragments of the work which have been preserved (e.g. Athen. viii. p. 334, a, xii. p. 539, b), it has been conjectured by some modern writers that Phylarchus commenced at an earlier period, perhaps as early as the death of Alexander the Great; but since digressions on earlier events might easily have been introduced by Phylarchus, we are not warranted in rejecting the express testimony of Suidas. As far as we can judge from the fragments, the work gave the history not only of Greece and Macedonia, but likewise of Egypt, Cyrene, and the other states of the time; and in narrating the history of Greece, Phylarchus paid particular attention to that of Cleomenes and the Lacedaemonians. The fragments are given in the works of Lucht, Brückner, and Müller cited below.

2. Τὰ κατὰ τῶν Ἀντίοχων καὶ τῶν Περσαίων Εὐδέων, was probably a portion of the preceding work, since the war between Eumenes I. and Antiochus Soter was hardly of sufficient importance to give rise to a separate history, and that between Eumenes II. and Antiochus the Great was subsequent to the time of Phylarchus.

3. 4. Ἐπιστομῇ μουθί περὶ τῆς τοῦ Δώον ἐπιστασιάς, was one work, although cited by Suidas as two: the general title was Ἐπιστομῇ μουθί, and that of the first part Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Δώον ἐπιστασιάς.

5. Περὶ ὁμομάτων, on which subject Epiphor and Philochoros also wrote.

6. Παρεκκλήσεως διδολία βδολα, θ', which is corrupt, since the word παρεκκλησία is unknown.

7. Ἀγαφά, not mentioned by Suidas, and only by the Scholast on Aelian Aristides (p. 103, ed. Fronnuel), was probably a work on the more abstruse points of mythology, of no written account had ever been given.

PHYLAS (Φύλας). 1. A king of the Dryopes, was attacked and slain by Hercules, because he had violated the sanctuary of Delphi. By his daughter Midea, Hercules became the father of Antiochus. (Paus. i. 5. § 2, iv. 34. § 6, x. 10. § 1; Diod. iv. 37.)

2. A son of Antiochus, and grandson of Hercules and Midea, was married to Deiphile, by whom he had two sons, Hippotas and Thero. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3, ix. 40. § 3; Apollod. ii. 8. § 3.)

3. A king of Ephyra in Thessalia, and the father of Polyneue and Astyoche, by the latter of whom Hercules was the father of Telephorus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 6; Hom. L. xvi. 180; comp. Diod. iv. 36.)

[LYS]

PHYLÉS (Φυλές), of Haliacarnassus, the son of Polygnotus, was a statuary, whose name has been recently discovered by means of the inscriptions on the bases of two of his works. One of these is at Astypalea, and belonged originally to a statue of bronze, which the people of that place erected in honour of their fellow-citizen, Polygeus, the son of Meleippsius; the other was found at Delos, and was the base of a statue erected in honour of a citizen of Rhodes. (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. vol. ii. pp. 1039, 1098; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 386.)

[PS]

PHYLÉUS (Φύλεας), a son of Augeias, was expelled by his father from Ephyra, because he gave his evidence in favour of Hercules. He then emigrated to Dulichium (Hom. ii. 629, xv. 530, xvii. 637.) By Clymene or Timandra Phyleus became the father of Meges, who is hence called Phyleides. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 305; Paus. v. 3. § 4; Apollod. ii. § 5. § 5; Strab. x. p. 455.)

PHYLIDAS, or more properly PHYLIDAS (Φυλίδας, Φιλίδας), an Aetolian, was sent by Dori-machus, in the winter of n. c. 219, or perhaps rather early in the following year, to aid the Eleians against Philip V. of Macedon, in Triphilia. The king, however, made himself master successively of Alipheira, Typaneae, Hypana, and Phigalae, and Phildas, quite unable to check his progress, threw himself into Lepreum. But the inhabitants were hostile to him, and, on Philip's approach, he was obliged to evacuate the town. Philip pursued him with his light troops and captured all his baggage, but Phildas himself, with his forces, effected his escape to Samicum. Philip, however, began to invest the place, and the besieged army capitulated on condition of being allowed to march out with their arms. (Polyb. iv. 77—80.)

PHYLIDAS (Φυλίδας), a Thewan, was secretary to the polemarch who held office under Spartan protection, after the seizure of the Cadmeia by Phoebidas, in b. c. 382. He was, however, a secret enemy of the new government, and appears to have made interest for the office which he occupied with the view of aiding the cause of freedom. Having been sent by his masters on some business to Athens, where the exiles had taken refuge, he arranged with them the particulars of their intended enterprise against the tyrants, and afterwards most effectually aided its execution in n. c. 379. Thus, having especially ingratiated himself with Archias and Philippus, of whose pleasures he pretended to be the ready minister, he introduced, in the disguise of women, the conspirators who despatched them; he gained admittance, according to Xenophon, for Pelopidas and his two companions to the house of Leonidas; and, before what had happened could be publicly known, he effected, with two others, his entrance into the prison, under pretence of an order from the polemarch, and, having slain the jailor, released those who were confined there as enemies to the government. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 2—8; Plut. Pelop. 7, &c., de Gen. Soc. 4, 24, 26, 29, 32; Diod. xv. 25.)

PHYLILIS (Φυλιλίς), a daughter of King Sithon, in Thrace, fell in love with Demophon on his return from Troy to Greece. Demophon promised her, by a certain day, to come back from Athens and PHYLLIS, the nurse of Domitian, buried him after his assassination. (Dion Cass. iv. viii. 18; Suet. Dom. 17.)

PHYLLIS, musician. [PHILLIS.]

PHYROMACHUS (Φυρόμαχος), an Athenian son of the Cephiscean demus, whose name occurs on an inscription discovered at Athens in 1835, as the maker of the bas-reliefs on the frieze of the celebrated temple of Athena Polias, which was built in Ol. 91, B. C. 416—412 (Schölli, Archäologische Mittheilungen aus Griechenland, p. 125; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schörm, p. 386, 2d ed.). There are also passages of the ancient writers, in which mention is made of one or more artists under the names of Phylomachus, Phyromachus, and Pyromachus, three names which might evidently be easily confounded. It will be more convenient to examine these passages under the article PYROMACHUS, as that is the form in which most of them give the name, and as the above inscription is the only case in which we can be quite certain that Phyromachus is the right form. [R. S.]

PHYSAEDEA (Φυταλίδα), a daughter of Danaus, from whom the well of Physaeida near Argos, was believed to have derived its name. (Callim. Hymn. in Poll. 47.) [L. S.]

PHYSICON. [Ptolemaeus.]

PHYSIASS (Φυσιάς), an Elean citizen of distinction who was taken prisoner by the Achaeans under Lycus of Pharnae, when the latter defeated the allied forces of the Eleans and Aetolians under Eurypidas, B. C. 217. (Polyb. v. 94.) [E. H. B.]

PHYTALUS (Φηταλος), an Eleanian hero, who is said to have kindly received Demeter on her wanderings, and was rewarded by the goddess with a fig-tree (Paus. i. 37, § 2). To him the noble Athenian family of the Phytalidae traced their origin. (Plut. These. 12, 22.) [L. S.]

PHYTON (Φύτων), a citizen of Rhegium, who was chosen by his countrymen to be their general, when the city was besieged by the elder Dionysius, B. C. 338. He animated the Rhegians to the most vigorous defence, and displayed all the qualities and resources of an able general, as well as a brave warrior; and it was in great measure owing to him that the siege was protracted for a space of more than eleven months. At length, however, the besieged were compelled by famine to surrender, and the heroic Phyton fell into the hands of the tyrant, who, after treating him with the most cruel indignities, put him to death, together with his son and all his other relations (Diod. xiv. 108, 111, 112). Diodorus tells us that the virtues and unhappily fate of Phyton were a favourite subject of lamentation with the Greek poets, but none of these passages have come down to us. The only other author now extant who mentions the name of Phyton is Philostratus (Vit. Apoll. i. 35, vii. 2), who appears to have followed a version of his story which differed from that of Diodorus. According to this, Phyton was an exile from Rhegium, who had taken refuge at the court of Dionysius, and enjoyed high favour with the tyrant, but on discovering his designs against Rhegium gave information of them to his countrymen, and was put to death by Dionysius in consequence. [E. H. B.]

PHYXIIUS (Φύξιος), i. e., the god who protects fugitives, occurs as a surname of Zeus in Thessaly (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1147, iv. 699; Pass. ii. 21, § 3, iii. 17, § 8), and of Apollo. (Philosr. Her. x. 4.)

PICTOR, the name of a family of the Fabian gens, which was given to them from the eminence which their ancestor obtained as a painter. [See below, No. 1.]

1. C. FABIIUS PICTOR, painted the temple of Salus (aemula Salutis pixavit), which the dictator C. Junius Brutus Bubulus contracted for in his censorship, B. C. 307, and dedicated in his dictatorship, B. C. 302. This painting, which must have been on the walls of the temple, was probably a representation of the battle which Bubulus had gained against the Samnites [Bubulus, No. 1]. This is the earliest Roman painting of which we have any record. It was preserved till the reign of Claudius, when the temple was destroyed by fire. Dionysius, in a passage to which Niebuhr calls attention, praises the great correctness of the drawing in this picture, the graceful ness of the colouring and the absence of all mannerism and affectation. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 7; Val. Max. viii. 14. § 6; Dionys. xvi. 6, in Mai's Exc.; Cic. Tusc. i. 2. § 4; comp. Liv. x. 1; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 356.)

2. C. FABIIUS PICTOR, son of No. 1, was consul B. C. 266, with Q. Qtilnius Gallus. The events of his consulate are related under GALLUS, p. 228.

3. N. (i. e. Numerius) FABIIUS PICTOR, also son of No. 1, was consul B. C. 266 with D. Junius Per. and triumphed twice in this year, like his colleague, the first time over the Sassinates, and the second time over the Sallentini and Messapii (Pasti). It appears to have been this Fabius Pictor, and not his brother, who was one of the three ambassadors sent by the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus, in B. C. 276 (Val. Max. iv. 3. § 9, with the Commentators). For an account of this embassy see OULINUS.

Cicero says that N. Fabius Pictor related the dream of Aeneas in his Greek Annals (Cic. Div. i. 21). This is the only passage in which mention is made of this annalist. Vossius (de Hist. Latin. i. 14) and Kraace (Vitae et Fragram. Hist. Roman. p. 83) suppose him to be a son of the consul of B. C. 266, but Orelli (Onom. Toll. p. 246) and others consider him to be the same as the consul. One is almost tempted to suspect that there is a mistake in the pnenomen, and that it ought to be Quintus.

4. Q. FABIIUS PICTOR, the son of No. 2, and the grandson of No. 1, was the most ancient writer of Roman history in prose, and is therefore usually placed at the head of the Roman annalists. He is called by Livy scriptorum antiquissimus (i. 44) and longo antiquissimus auctor (ii. 44). He served in the Gallic war, B. C. 225 (Eutrop. iii. 5; Oros. iv. 13; comp. Plin. H. N. x. 24, s. 34), and also in the second Punic war; and that he enjoyed considerable reputation among his contemporaries is evident from the circumstance of his being sent to Delphi, after the disastrous battle of Cannae in B. C. 216, to consult the oracle by what means the Romans could propitiate the gods (Liv. xxii. 57, xxiii. 11; Appian, Annib. 27). We learn from Polybius (iii. 9, § 4) that he had a seat in the senate, and consequently he must have filled the office of quaestor; but we possess no other particulars respecting his life. The year of his death is uncertain; for the C Fabius Pictor whose death Livy speaks of (xiv. 44) in b.c. 167, is a different person from the historian (see No. 5). One might conjecture, from his not obtaining any of the higher dignities of the state, that he died soon after his return from Delphi; but, as Polybius (iii. 9) speaks of him as one of the historians of the second Punic war, he can hardly have died so soon; and it is probable that his literary habits rendered him disinclined to engage in the active services required of the Roman magistrates at that time.

The history of Fabius Pictor probably began with the arrival of Aeneas in Italy, and came down to his own time. The earlier events were related with brevity; but that portion of the history of which he was a contemporary, was given with much greater minuteness (Dionys. i. 6). We do not know the number of books into which the work was divided, nor how far it came down. It contained an account of the battle of the lake Trasimenus (p. 32, xxv.) and Polybius, as we have already remarked, speaks of him as one of the historians of the second Punic War. We have the express testimony of Dionysius (l.c.) that the work of Fabius was written in Greek; but it has been supposed from Cicero (de orat. ii. 12, de legat. i. 2), Gellius (v. 4, x. 15), Quintilian (i. 6, § 12), and Nonius (a. v. Pium. unus), that it must have been written in Latin also. This, however, is very improbable; and as we know there were two Latin writers of the name of Fabius, namely, Ser. Fabius Pictor, and Q. Fabius Maximus Serrullinus, it is more likely that the passages above quoted refer to one of these, and not to Quintus. [See below, No. 6.]

The work of Q. Fabius Pictor was one of great value, and is frequently referred to by Livy, Polybius, and Dionysius. Polybius (i. 14, iii. 9), indeed, charges Fabius with great partiality towards the Romans; and as he wrote for the Greeks, he was probably anxious to make his countrymen appear in the best light. The work seems to have contained a very accurate account of the constitutional changes at Rome; Niebuhr attributes the excellence of Dion Cassius in this department of his history, to his having closely followed the statements of Fabius (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. note 367). In his account of the early Roman legends Fabius is said to have adopted the views of Diocles of Paphrapethus [Diocles, literary, No. 5]. (Müller, De Q. Fabio Pictore, Allor, 1690; Whiste, De Fabio Pictore etrorumque Fabii Historicae, Hafniae, 1652; Vossius, De Hist. Lat. p. 12; Krause, Vitis et Fragment Hist. Rom. p. 33, &c.; Niebuhr, Lectures on Roman History, vol. i. p. 27, ed. Schmitz.)

5. Q. Fabius Pictor, probably son of No. 4, was praetor B.C. 189. The lot gave him Sardinia as his province, but as he had been consecrated Flamen Quirinalis in the preceding year, the pontifex maximus, P. Licinius, compelled him to remain in Rome. Fabius was so enraged at losing his province that he attempted to abdicate, but the senate compelled him to retain his office, and assigned to him the jurisdiction inter peregrinos. He died B.C. 167. (Liv. xxxvii. 47, 50, 51, xiv. 44.)

6. Ser. Fabius Pictor, probably a son of No. 8, was a contemporary of A. Postumius Albinus, who was consul B.C. 151, and is said by Cicero to have been well skilled in law, literature, and antiq (Brut. 21). He appears to be the same as the Fabius Pictor who wrote a work De Jure Pontificii, in several books, which is quoted by Nonius (a. v. Pium. unus et Poladrum). We also have quotations from this work in Gellius (i. 12, x. 15) and Macrobius (Sat. iii. 2). This Ser. Fabius probably wrote Annals likewise in the Latin language, since Cicero (de orat. ii. 12) speaks of a Latin annalist, Pictor, whom he places after Cato, but before Piso; which corresponds with the time at which Ser. Pictor lived, but could not be applicable to Q. Pictor, who lived in the time of the second Punic War. Now as we know that Q. Pictor wrote his history in Greek, it is probable, as has been already remarked under No. 4, that the passages referring to a Latin history of Fabius Pictor relate to this Ser. Pictor. (Krause, Ibid. p. 132, &c.)

The annulled coin was struck by some member of this family, but it cannot be assigned with certainty to any of the persons above mentioned. It bears on the obverse a head of Pallas, and on the reverse a figure of Rome, accompanied with the legend of N. FABII PICTORI. On the shield we find quinain, which probably indicates that the person who struck it was Flamen Quirinalis.

PICUMNUS and PILUMNVS, were regarded as two brothers, and as the beneficent gods of matrimony in the rustic religion of the ancient Romans. A couch was prepared for them in the house in which there was a newly-born child. Pilumnus was believed to ward off all the sufferings from childhood from the infant with his pilum, with which he taught to pound the grain; and Pilumnus, who, under the name of Sterquilinus, was believed to have discovered the use of manure for the fields, conferred upon the infant strength and prosperity, whilst both were also looked upon as the gods of good deeds, and were identified with Castor and Pollux. (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 4, x. 76; August. De Civ. Dei. vi. 9, xviii. 15; Or. Met. xiv. 321, &c.; Virg. Aen. vii. 189). When Danae landed in Italy, Pilumnus is said to have built with her the town of Ardea, and to have become by her the father of Daunus. [L.] S.]

PICUS (Pictus), a Latin prophetic divinity, is described as a son of Saturnus or Sterculus, as the husband of Canena, and the father of Fannus (Or. Met. xiv. 290, 293, Fast. iii. 291; Virg. Aen. vii. 48; Serv. ad Aen. x. 76). In some traditions he was called the king of Italy (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1232). He was a famous soothsayer and augur, and, as he made use in these things of a picus (a wood-pecker), he himself also was called Picus. He was represented in a rude and primitive manner as a wooden pillar with a wood-pecker on the top of it, but afterwards as a young man with a wood-pecker on his head (Dionys. i. 14; Or. Met. xiv. 314; Virg. Aen. vii. 167.) The whole legend of Picus is founded on the notion that the wood-pecker is a prophetic bird, sacred to Mars. Pomona, it is said, was beloved by him, and when Circe’s love for him was not required, she changed him into a wood-pecker, who, however, retained the prophetic powers which he had formerly possessed as a man. (Virg. Aen. viii. 190; Ov. Met. xiv. 346; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 21; Ov. Pauis. fast. iii. 37.)

PIERIDES (Πιερίδες), and sometimes also in the singular, Pieris, a surname of the Muses, which they derived from Mount Olympus, where they were first worshipped among the Thracians (Hea. Thesp. 53; Horat. Carm. iv. 3. 18; Pind. Pyth. vi. 49). Some derived the name from an ancient king Pierus, who is said to have established from Thrace into Boeotia, and estimated their worship at Theseus. (Paus. ix. 29. § 2; Eurip. Med. 831; Pind. Ol. xi. 100; Ov. Trist. v. 3. 10; Cic. De Nat. Deor. illi. 21.)

PIERUS (Πιερός). 1. A son of Magnes of Thrace, father of Hyacinthus, by the Muse Cleo. (Apollod. i. 3. § 3.)

2. An autochthon, king of Emathia (Macedon), begot by Euippe or Antiope nine daughters, to whom he gave the names of the nine Muses. They afterwards entered into a contest with the Muses, and being conquered, they were metamorphosed into birds called Cygomas, Iynx, Cenchris, Cissis, Chloris, Acanthias, Nessa, Pipo, and Dracontis. (Anton. Lib. 9; Paus. ix. 29. § 2; Ov. Met. v. 295, &c.)

PIETAS, a personification of faithful attachment, love, and veneration among the Romans, where at first she had a small sanctuary, but in B.C. 191 a larger one was built (Plin. H. N. vii. 36; Val. Max. v. 4. § 7; Liv. xl. 34). She is seen represented on Roman coins, as a matron throwing incense upon an altar, and her attributes are a stork and children. Pietas was sometimes represented as a female figure offering her breast to an aged parent. (Val. Max. l.c.; Zumpt, in the Class. Mus. vol. iii. p. 452.)

PIETAS, a surname of L. Antonius, consul B.C. 41. (Antonius, No. 14.)

PIGREGES (Πιγρέγες), historical. 1. A Carian, the son of Seoldonius, the commander of a detachment of ships in the armament of Xerxes. (Herod. viii. 37.)

2. A Paeonian, who, with his brother Mantyus and his sister, came to Sardes, where Dareius was at the time, hoping that by the favour of Dareius, he and his brother might be established as tyrants over the Paeonians. Dareius, however, was so pleased with the exhibition of industry and dexterity which he saw in their sister, that he sent orders to Mecabaxus to transport the whole race into Asia. (Herod. v. 12, &c.)

3. An interpreter in the service of Cyrus the Younger, mentioned on several occasions by Xenophon (Anab. i. 2. § 17, &c.). (C. P. M.)

PIGREGES (Πιγρέγες), literary. A native of Halicarnassus, either the brother or the son of the celebrated Artemisia, queen of Caria. He is spoken of by Suidas (s. v. where, however, he makes the mistake of calling Artemisia, the wife of Mnesus) as the author of the Margites, and the Batrachomyomachia. The latter poem is also attributed to him by Plutarch (de Herod. malign. 43. p. 873, f.), and was probably his work. One of his performances was a very singular one, namely, inserting a pentameter line after each hexameter in the Iliad, thus: —

Μῆλῳ ἄδει νείδαι Πηληθάδων Ἀχλήρας.
Μοῦσα γὰρ ἐν πάσῃ πείσατ’ ἔχεις σοφίαν.

Bode (Gesch. der Heiden. Dichtkunst, i. p. 279) believes that the Margites, though not composed by Pigres, suffered some alterations at his hands, and in that altered shape passed down to posterity. Some suppose that the Iambic lines, which alternated with the hexameters in the Margites, were inserted by Pigres. He was the first poet, apparently, who introduced the Iambic trimeter. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. p. 519, &c.)

PIILIA, the wife of T. Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. We know nothing of her origin, and scarcely any thing of her relations. The M. Pilius, who is said to have sold an estate to C. Albanus, about B.C. 45 (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 31), is supposed by some to have been her father, but this is quite uncertain. The Q. Pilius, who went to Caesar in Gaul in B.C. 54 (ad Att. iv. 17), was undoubtedly her brother; and he must be the same as the Pilius who accused M. Servilius of repetundae in B.C. 51 (Cael. ad Fam. viii. 6). His full name was Q. Pilius Celer; for the Q. Celer, whose speech against M. Servilius Cicero asks Atticus to send him in B.C. 50 (Cic. ad Att. vi. 3. § 10), must have been the same person as the one already mentioned, as Drumnus has observed, and not Q. Metellus Celer, as the commentators have stated, since the latter had died as early as B.C. 50. With the exception, however, of the M. Pilius and Q. Pilius, whom we have spoken of, no other of this name occurs.

Pilia was married to Atticus on the 12th of February, B.C. 56 (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3. § 7), and in the summer of the following year, she bore her husband a daughter (ad Att. v. 19, vi. 1. § 22) who subsequently married Vipsanius Agrippa. This appears to have been the only child that she had. Cicero, in his letters to Atticus, frequently speaks of Pilia; and from the terms in which he mentions her, it is evident that the marriage was a happy one, and that Atticus was sincerely attached to her. From her frequent indisposition, to which Cicero alludes, it appears that her health was not good. She is not mentioned by Cornelius Nepos in his life of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16, 46, vi. 11, v. 3. vii. 7; Drummon's Rom. vol. v. pp. 87, 88.)

PILIVUS. (Pilivus.)

PILUMNUS (Pilumnus.)

PIMPLES (Πιμπλῆς), or Pimplae, a surname of the Muses, derived from Mount Pimpius in Pleria, which was sacred to them. Some place this mountain in Boeotia, and call Mount Helicon Πηληθαία κοινή. (Strab. x. p. 471; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 25; Lycoeph. 275; Horat. Carm. i. 26. 9; Anthol. Palat. v. 206.)

PINARIA GENS. 1. The daughter of Publius, a Vestal virgin in the reign of Tarquininus Priscus, was put to death for violating her vow of chastity. (Dionys. iii. 67.)

2. The first wife of the celebrated tribune P. Clodius. That Clodius married a wife of this name has been shown under NATA, No. 2.

PINAIRIA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician families at Rome, traced its origin to a time long previous to the foundation of the city. The legend related that when Hercules came into Italy he was hospitably received on the spot, where Rome was afterwards built, by the Potitii and the Pinarii, two of the most distinguished families in the country. The hero, in return, taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped; but as the Pinarii were not at hand when the sacrificial banquet was ready, and did not come till the entrails of the victim were eaten, Hercules, in anger, determined that the Pinarii should in all future time be excluded from partaking of the entrails of the victims, and that in all matters relating to his worship they should be inferior to the Potitii. These two families continued to be the hereditary priests of Hercules till the censorship of App. Claudius (B. C. 312), who purchased from the Pinarii the knowledge of the sacred rites, and entrusted them to public slaves, as is related elsewhere. [Potitii gens.] The Pinarii did not share in the guilt of communicating the sacred knowledge, and therefore did not receive the same punishment as the Potitii, but continued in existence to the latest times. (Dionys. i. 40; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. viii. 228; Festus, p. 237, ed. Muller; Macrob. Sat. iii. 6; Liv. i. 7; Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 30.) It has been remarked, we may judge, that the worship of Hercules by the Potitii and Pinarii was a sacrum gentilium belonging to these gentes, and that in the time of App. Claudius these sacra privata were made sacra publica. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 83; Götting, Gesch. der Röm. Staatsverf. p. 178.)

The Pinarii are mentioned in the kingly period [Pinaria, No. 1; Pinaria, No. 1], and were elevated to the consulsiphip soon after the commencement of the republic. The first member of the gens, who obtained this dignity, was P. Pinar- rius Marcellinus Rufus in B. C. 489. At this early time, Mâmcrinus is the name of the only family that is mentioned: at a subsequent period, we find families of the name of Natta, Posca, Rusca, and Scarpus, but no members of them obtained the consulship. On coins, Natta and Scarrus are the only cognomina that occur. The few Pinarii, who occur without a surname, are given below.

2. L. PINARIUS, the commander of the Roman garrison at Enna in the second Punic war, B. C. 214, suppressed with vigour an attempt at insurrection which the inhabitants made. (Livy xxiv. 57—59.)

3. T. PINARIUS, is only known from his having been ridiculed by the orator C. Julius Caesar Strabo, who was curule aedile, B. C. 90. (Cic. de or. ii. 66.)

4. T. PINARIUS, a friend of Cicero, who mentions him three or four times (ad Att. vi. 1. § 23, viii. 15, ad Fam. xii. 24). In one passage (ad Q. Fr. iii. 1. § 6), Cicero speaks of his brother, who was probably the same as the following person [No. 5].

5. L. PINARIUS, the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, being the grandson of Julia, Caesar's eldest sister. In the will of the dictator, Pinarrius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavius and L. Pinarius, Octavius obtaining three-fourths of the property, and the remaining fourth being divided between Pinarrius and Pedius. Pinarrius afterward served in the army of the triumvirs in the war against Brutus and Cassius. (Suet. Cic. 83; Appian, B. C. iii. 22, iv. 107.)

6. PINARIUS, a Roman eques, whom Augustus ordered to be put to death upon a certain occasion. (Suet. Aug. 27.)

PINDARIUS (ΠΙΝΔΑΡΟΣ), the greatest lyric poet of Greece, according to the universal testimony of the ancients. Just as Homer was called simply ὁ Ἐορτής, Aristophanes ὁ καμίδ, and Thucydides ὁ συγγραφέας, in like manner Pindar was distinguished above all other lyric poets by the title of ὁ λυκός. Our information however respecting his life is very scanty and meagre, being almost entirely derived from some ancient biographies of uncertain value and authority. Of these we possess five; one prefixed by Thomas Magister to his Scholia on the poet; a second in Suidas; a third usually called the metrical life, because it is written in thirty-five hexameter lines; a fourth first published by Schneider in his edition of Nicander, and subsequently reprinted by Böckh along with the three other preceding lives in his edition of Pindar; and a fifth by Eustathius, which was published for the first time by Tafel in his edition of the Opuscula of Eustathius, Frankfort, 1892.

Pindar was a native of Boeotia. The ancient biographies leave it uncertain whether he was born at Thebes or at Cynoscephalae, a village in the territory of Thebes. All the ancient biographies agree that his parents belonged to Cynoscephalae; but they might easily have resided at Thebes, just as in Attica an Acharnian or a Salaminian might have lived at Athens or Eleusis. The name of Pindar's parents is also differently stated. His father is variously called Daiphanus, Pagondas, or Scopolenus, his mother Cleidice, Cleodice or Myrto; but some of these persons, such as Scopolenus and Myrto, were probably only his teachers in music and poetry; and it is most likely that the names of his real parents were Daiphanus and Cleidice, which are alone mentioned in the "Metrical Life" of Pindar already referred to. The year of his birth is likewise a disputed point. He was born, as we know from his own testimony (Fragment. 102, ed. Disen), during the celebration of the Pythian games. Clinton places his birth in Ol. 65. 3, B. C. 513, Böckh in Ol. 64. 3, B. C. 522, but neither of these dates is certain, though the latter is perhaps the most probable. He probably died in his 80th year, though other accounts make him much younger at the time of his death. If he was born in B. C. 522, his death would fall in B. C. 442. He was in the prime of life at the battles of Marathon and Salamis, and was nearly of the same age as the poet Aeschylus; but, as K. O. Müller has well remarked, the causes which determined Pindar's poetical character are to be sought in a period previous to the Persian war, and in the Doric and Aeolic parts of Greece rather than in Athens; and thus we may separate Pindar from his contemporary Aeschylus, by placing the former at the close of the early period, the latter at the head of the new period of literature. One of the ancient biographies mentions that Pindar married Megaclein, the daughter of Lysiteues and Callins; another gives Timoxena as the name of his wife; but he may have married each in succession. He had a son, Daiphanus, and two daughters, Eumelis and Protomachia. The family of Pindar ranked among the noblest still she herself is said to have contended with him five times, and on each occasion to have gained the prize. Pausanias indeed does not speak (ix. 22. § 3) of more than one victory, and mentions a picture which he saw at Tanagra, in which Corinna is represented binding her hair with a fillet in token of her victory, which he attributes as much to her beauty and to the circumstance that she wrote in the Aeolic dialect as to her poetical talents.

Pindar commenced his professional career as a poet at an early age, and acquired so great a reputation, that he was soon employed by different states and princes in all parts of the Hellenic world to compose for them choral songs for special occasions. He received money and presents for his works; but he never degenerated into a common mercenary poet, and he continued to preserve to his latest days the friendship of all parts of Greece. His earliest poem which has come down to us (the 10th Pythian) he composed at the age of twenty. It is an Epinician ode in honour of Hippocles, a Thessalian youth belonging to the powerful Alcuedo family, who had gained the prize at the Pythian games. Supposing Pindar to have been born in B.c. 529, this ode was composed in B.c. 502. The next ode of Pindar in point of time is the 6th Pythian, which he wrote in his twenty-seventh year, B.c. 494, in honour of Xenocrates of Agrigentum, who had gained the prize at the chariot-race at the Pythian games, by means of his son Thrasybulus. It would be tedious to relate at length the different occasions on which he composed his other odes. It may suffice to mention that he composed poems for Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse, Alexander, son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, Arscilas, king of Cyrene, as well as for many other free states and private persons. He was courted especially by Alexander, king of Macedonla, and Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse; and the praises which he bestowed upon the former are said to have been the chief reason which led his descendant, Alexander, the son of Philip, to spare the house of the poet, when he destroyed the rest of Thebes (Dion Chrysost. Orat. de Regno, ii. p. 25). About B.c. 473, Pindar visited the court of Hieron, in consequence of the pressing invitation of the monarch; but it appears that he did not remain more than four years at Syracuse, as he loved an independent life, and did not care to cultivate the courtly arts which rendered his contemporary, Simonides, a more welcome guest at the table of their patron. But the estimation in which Pindar was held by his contemporaries is still more strikingly shown by the honours conferred upon him by the free states of Greece. Although a Theban, he was always a great favourite with the Athenians, whom he frequently praised in his poems, and whose city he often visited. In one of his dithyrambs (Delph. fr. 4) he called it "the support (érpesma) of Greece, glorious Athens, the divine city." The Athenians testified their gratitude by making him their public guest (πρόεσωρ), and giving to him ten thousand drachmas (Iscic. νεκρ. Attid. p. 304, ed. Dind.); and at a later period they erected a statue to his honour (Paus. i. 8. § 4), but this was not done in his lifetime, as the pseudo-Aeschines states (Epist. 4). The inhabitants of Ceos employed Pindar to compose for them a προσδομον or processional song, although they had two celebrated poets of their own, Bucylides and Simonides. The Rhodians had his seventh Olympian ode written in letters of gold in the temple of the Lindian Athena.

Pindar's stated residence was at Thebes (πας ἢσταῖος ἵππων πόλις, Od. vi. 35), though he frequently left home in order to witness the great public games, and to visit the states and distinguished men who courted his friendship and employed his services. In the public events of the time he appears to have taken no share. Polybius (iv. 31. § 5) quotes some lines of Pindar to prove that the poet recommended his countrymen to remain quiet and abstain from uniting with the other Greeks in opposition to the Persians; but there can be little doubt that Pindar in these lines exhorts his fellow-citizens to maintain peace and concord, and to abstain from the internal dissensions which threatened to ruin the city. It is true that he did not make the unavailing effort to win over his fellow-citizens to the cause of Greek independence; but his heart was with the free party, and after the conclusion of the war he openly expressed his admiration for the victors. Indeed the praises which he bestowed upon Athens, the ancient rival of Thebes, displeased his fellow-citizens, who are said even to have fined him in consequence. It is further stated that the Athenians paid the fine (Eustath. Vit. Pind.; Pseudo-Aeschin. έp. 4); but the tale does not deserve much credit.

The poems of Pindar show that he was penetrated with a strong religious feeling. He had not imbibed any of the scepticism which began to take root at Athens after the close of the Persian war. The old myths were for the most part realities to him, and he accepted them with implicit credence, except when they exhibited the gods in a point of view which was repugnant to his moral feelings. For, in consequence of the strong ethical sense which Pindar possessed, he was unwilling to believe the myths which represented the gods and heroes as guilty of immoral acts; and he accordingly frequently rejects some tales and changes others, because they are inconsistent with his conceptions of the gods (comp. Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 507, &c.). Pindar was a strict observer of the worship of the gods. He dedicated a shrine to the mother of the gods near his own house at Thebes (Paus. ix. 25. § 3; Philostr. Sen. Imag. ii. 12; comp. Pind. Pyth. iii. 77). He also dedicated to Zeus Ammon, in Libya, a statue made by Camalites (Paus. ix. 16. § 1), and likewise a statue in the Thebes to Hermes of the Agora (Paus. ix. 17. § 1). He was in the habit of frequently visiting Delphi; and there seated on an iron chair, which was reserved for him, he used to sing hymns in honour of Apollo. (Paus. x. 24. § 4.)

The only poems of Pindar which have come down to us entire are his Epinicia, or triumphal odes. But these were only a small portion of his works. Besides his triumphal odes he wrote hymns to the gods, psalms, dithyrambs, odes for processions (ποροσύλες), songs of maidens (παρενεήμα), mimic dancing songs (ικορχαμάτα), drinking-songs (ασκο-Aid), dirges (δραψίον), and encomia (ἐγκυών), or panegyrics on princes. Of these we have numerous fragments. Most of them are mentioned in the well-known lines of Horace (Carm. iv. 2):

"Seu per audaces nova dithyrambos
Verba devolvit numerique fertur
Lege solutis:

VOL. III.

PINDARUS.

Seu deos (hymns and psalms) regesve (encomia) canit, decurum Sanguinem:
Sive quo Elen domum reducit
Palma caelestes (the Epinicia):—
Plebili sponsae juvenevum raptum
Plorat " (the dirges)."

In all of these varieties Pindar equally excelled, as we see from the numerous quotations made from them by the ancient writers, though they are generally too fragmentary a kind to allow us to form a judgment respecting them. Our estimate of Pindar as a poet must be formed almost exclusively from his Epinicia, which were all composed in commemoration of some victory in the public games, with the exception of the eleventh Nemean, which was written for the installation of Aristogons in the office of Prytanes at Tenedos. The Epinicia are divided into four books, celebrating respectively the victories gained in the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. In order to understand them properly we must bear in mind the nature of the occasion for which they were composed, and the object which the poet had in view. A victory gained in one of the four great national festivals conferred honour not only upon the conqueror and his family, but also upon the city to which he belonged. It was accordingly celebrated with great pomp and ceremony. Such a celebration began with a procession to a temple, where a sacrifice was offered, and it ended with a banquet and the joyous revelry, called by the Greeks καίμος. For this celebration a poem was expressly composed, which was sung by a chorus, trained for the purpose, either by the poet himself, or some one acting on his behalf. The poems were sung either during the procession to the temple or at the comus at the close of the banquet. Those of Pindar's Epinician odes which consist of strophes without epodes were sung during the procession, but the majority of them appear to have been sung at the comus. For this reason they partake to some extent of the joyous nature of the occasion, and accordingly contain at times jocularities which are hardly in accordance with the modern notions of lyric poetry. In these odes Pindar rarely describes the victory itself, as the scene was familiar to all the spectators, but he dwells upon the glory of the victor, and celebrates chiefly either his wealth (άλαπος) or his skill (δρεπτη)—his wealth, if he had gained the victory in the chariot-race, since it was only the wealthy that could contend for the prize in this contest; his skill, if he had been exposed to peril in the contest. He frequently celebrates also the piety and goodness of the victor; for with the deep religious feeling, which pre-eminently characterizes Pindar, he believed that the moral and religious character of the conqueror conciliated the favour of the gods, and gained for him their support and assistance in the contest. For the same reason he dwells at great length upon the mythical origin of the person whose victory he extols, and connects his exploits with the similar exploits of the heroic ancestors of the race or nation to which he belongs. These mythic narratives occupy a very prominent feature in almost all of Pindar's odes; they are not introduced for the sake of ornament, but have a close and intimate connection with the whole object and purpose of each poem, as is clearly pointed out by PINDARUS.

Dissen, in his admirable essay, "De Ratione Poetica Carmine Pinardicorum, &c." prefixed to his edition of Pindar, an essay which deserves, and will well repay the attentive perusal of the student. The metres of Pindar are too extensive and difficult a subject to admit of explanation in the present work. No two odes possess the same metrical structure. The Doric rhythm chiefly prevails, but he also makes frequent use of the Aeolian and Ethiopian.

The Edict of the Emperors of Pindar was printed at the Aldine press at Venice in 1513, 8vo., without the Scholia, but the same volume contained likewise the poems of Callimachus, Dionysius, and Lyco-phon. The second edition was published at Rome by Zacharias Callieri, with the Scholia, in 1515, 4to. These two editions, which were taken from different families of manuscripts, are still of considerable value for the formation of the text. The other editions of Pindar published in the course of the sixteenth century were little more than reprints of the two above-named, and therefore require no further notice here. The first edition, containing a new recension of the text, with explanatory notes, a Latin version, &c. was that published by Émusius Schmidius, Vitemberge, 1616, 4to. Next appeared the edition of Joannes Benedictus, Salmuri, 1620, 4to., and then the one published at Oxford, 1627, fol. From this time Pindar appears to have been in general reprinted. Next came Heiney's celebrated edition of the poet at Göttingen in 1775, 4to. A second and much improved edition was published at Göttingen in 1794—1799, 3 vols. 8vo., containing a valuable treatise on the metres of Pindar by Godofred Hermann. Heiney's third edition was published after his death by G. H. Schäfer, Leipzig, 1817, 3 vols. 8vo. But the best edition of Pindar is that by A. Böckh, Leipzig, 1811—1821, 2 vols. 4to., which contains a most valuable commentary and dissertations, and is indispensable to the student who wishes to obtain a thorough insight into the musical system of the Greeks, and the artistic construction of their lyric poetry. The commentary on the Nemean and Isthmian odes in this edition was written by Dissen. Dissen also published in the Bibliotheca Graecæ a smaller edition of the poet, Gotha, 1830, 2 vols. 8vo., taken from the text of Böckh, with a most valuable explanatory commentary. This edition is the most useful to the student from its size, though it does not supersede that of Böckh. A second edition of Dissen's is now in course of publication under the care of Schneidewin: the first volume has already appeared, Gotha, 1843. There is also a valuable edition of Pindar by Fr. Thiiersch, Leipzig, 1820, 2 vols. 8vo., with a German translation, and an important introduction. The text of the poet is given with great accuracy by Th. Bergk in his Poetae Lyrici Graeci, Leipzig, 1843. The translations of Pindar into English are not numerous. The most recent is by the Rev. H. F. Cary, London, 1853, which is superior to the older translations by West and Moore.

PNDARUS, the freedman of C. Cassius Longinus, put an end to his master's life at the request of the latter after the loss of the battle of Philippi. (Dion Cass. xlv. 46; Appian, B. C. iv. 113; Plut. Ant. 22, Brut. 43; Val. Max. vi. 8. § 4.)

PINNA, CAECILIUS, one of the Roman commanders in the Social or Marsic war, is said to have defeated the Marsi in several battles, in conjunction with L. Morena (Livy. Epit. 76). As this Caecilius Pinnus is not mentioned elsewhere, and is not the friend of Cæcilius Pius, since we know that Cæcilius Metellus Pius played a distinguished part in this war.

PINNES, PINNEUS, or PINEUS, was the son of Agron, king of Illyria, by his first wife, Triteuta. At the death of Agron (B. c. 231), Pines, who was then a child, was left in the guardianship of his step-mother Teuta, whom Agron had married after divorcing Triteuta. When Teuta was defeated by the Romans, the care of Pinnes devolved upon Demetrios of Phars, who had received from the Romans a great part of the dominions of Teuta, and had likewise married Triteuta, the mother of Pinnes. Demetrios was in his turn tempted to try his fortune against Rome, but was quickly crushed by the consul, L. Aemilius Paulus, B. c. 219, and was obliged to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. The Romans placed Pinnes upon the throne, but imposed on him a tribute, which we read of their sending for in B. C. 216. (Dion Cass. xxxiv. 46, 151; Appian, Ilyg. 7, 8; Flor. ii. 5; Liv. xxii. 33.) [AGRON; DEMETRIUS OF PHAROS; TEUTA.]

PINNES or PINNETES, one of the principal Pannonian chiefs in the reign of Augustus, was betrayed to the Romans by the Breuican Bato. (Dion Cass. iv. 32; Vell. Pat. ii. 114.)

PINNIUS, the name of two unimportant persons, Q. Pinnius, a friend of Varro (R. R. iii. 1), and T. Pinnius, a friend of Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 61).

PIN'THIA, L. LUTATTUS, a Roman eques, lived about a century before the downfall of the republic. (Cic. de Off. iii. 19.)

PINUS, CORNELIUS, a Roman painter, who, with Attius Priscus, decorated with paintings the walls of the temple of Honos and Virtus, when it was restored by Vespasian. He therefore lived about a. d. 70. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10, s. 37.)

PIN'NYTUS (Πυνντος), an epigrammatic poet, the author of an epitaph on Sappho, consisting of a single distich, in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 293; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 264.) Nothing more is known of him, unless he be the grammarian of Bithynium in Bithynia, who was the freedman of Nero's favourite, Euphrodi tus, and who taught grammar at Rome. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Bithyn.; Reim. ad Dion. Cass. cxvii. 14, p. 1113.)

PI'ONIS (Ποίνος), a descendant of Heracles, from whom the town of Ponia in Mysia was believed to have derived its name. (Strab. xiii. p. 610; Paus. ix. 18. § 3.)

PIPA, the wife of Aescharion of Syracuse, was the mistress of Verres in Sicily (Cic. Ferr. iii. 35, v. 31.)

(Comp. Plin. H. N. xviii. 3.) Many of the Pisones bore this cognomen alone, but others were distinguished by the surnames of Caesonianus and Frugi respectively. The family first rose from obscurity during the second Punic war, and from that time it became one of the most distinguished families in the Roman state. It preserved its celebrity under the empire, and during the first century of the Christian era was second to the imperial family alone. The following stemma contains a list of all the Pisones mentioned in history, and will serve as an index to the following account. Of most of them it is impossible to ascertain the descent.

1. Calpurnius Piso, was taken prisoner at the battle of Cannae, B. C. 216, and is said to have been sent with two others to Rome to negotiate the release of the prisoners, which proposition the senate refused to entertain. He was praetor urbanus in B. C. 211, and on the expiration of his year of office was sent as pro-praetor into Etruria B. C. 210. From thence he was commanded by the dictator, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, to take the command of the army at Capua; but next year (B. C. 209) the senate again entrust Etruria to him. (Liv. xxii. 61, xxv. 41, xxvi. 10, 15, 21, 28, xxviii. 6, 7, 21.) Piso in his praetorship proposed to the senate, that the Ludi Apollinares, which had been exhibited for the first time in the preceding year (B. C. 212), should be repeated, and should be celebrated in future annually. The senate passed a decree to this effect. (Liv. xxvi. 23; Macrob. Sat. i. 19;

Piso Frugi was that caused them to be struck, cannot be determined. (Eckhel, vol. v p. 158.)

2. C. CALPURNIUS C. F. C. N. PISO CARSONIUS, son of No. 1, was praetor b. c. 186, and received further Spain as his province. He continued in his province as propraetor in b. c. 185, and on his return to Rome in 184 obtained a triumph for a victory he had gained over the Lusitani and Celtiberi. In b. c. 181 he was one of the three commissioners for founding the colony of Gravacai in Etruria, and in b. c. 180 he was consul with A. Postumius Albinus. Piso died during his consulship; he was no doubt carried off by the pestilence which was then raging at Rome, but the people suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Quarta Hostilia, because her son by a former marriage, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, succeeded Piso as consul suffectus. (Livy. xxxix. 6, 8, 21, 30, 31, 42, xl. 35, 37.)

3. L. CALPURNIUS (Piso), probably a younger son of No. 1, was sent as ambassador to the Achaenae at Sicyon. (Livy. xxxvi. 19.)

4. L. CALPURNIUS C. F. C. N. PISO CARSONIUS. His last name shows that he originally belonged to the Caesonia gens, and was adopted by one of the Pisones, probably by No. 3, as is indicated in the Factorum sumptuorum. Thus he escaped the disgrace on his family by his want of ability and of energy in war. He was praetor in n. c. 154, and obtained the province of Further Spain, but was defeated by the Lusitani. He was consul in n. c. 148 with Sp. Postumius Albinus, and was sent to conduct the war against Carthage, which he carried on with such little activity that the people became greatly discontented with his conduct, and he was superseded in the following year by Scipio. (Appian, Hisp. 56. Panic. 110—112.)

5. L. CALPURNIUS L. F. C. N. PISO CARSONIUS, son of No. 4, was consul b. c. 112 with M. Livius Drusus. In b. c. 107 he served as legatus to the consul, L. Cassius Longinus, who was sent into Gaul to oppose the Cimbri and their allies, and he fell together with the consul in the battle, in which the Roman army was utterly defeated by the Ticinini in the territory of the Allobroges. [Longinus, No. 5.] This Piso was the grandfather of Caesar's father-in-law, a circumstance to which Caesar himself alludes in recording his own victory over the Tigurini at a later time. (Caes. B. G. i. 7. 12; Oros. v. 15.)

6. L. CALPURNIUS PISO CARSONIUS, son of No. 5, never rose to any of the offices of state, and is only known from the account given of him by Cicero in his violent invective against his son [No. 7]. He had the charge of the manufactories of arms at Rome during the Marius war. He married the daughter of Calvintius, a native of Cialpine Gaul, who came from Placentia and settled at Rome; and hence Cicero calls his son in contempt a semi-Placentian. (Cic. in Pis. 26, 28, 26, 27.) [Calvuntius.]

7. L. CALPURNIUS C. F. L. N. PISO CARSONIUS, the son of No. 6, and father-in-law of the dictator Caesar. Asconius says (in Cic. Pis. p. 3, ed. Orellii) that this Piso belonged to the family of the Frugi; but this is a mistake, as Drummann has shown (Gesch. Rom., vol. ii. p. 62). Our principal information respecting Piso is derived from several of the orations of Cicero, who paints him in the blackest colours; but as Piso was both a politician and a personal enemy of the orator, we must make great deductions from his description which is evidently exaggerated. Still, after making every deduction, we know enough of his life to convince us that he was an unprincipled debauchee and a cruel and corrupt magistrate, a fair sample of his noble contemporaries, neither better nor worse than the majority of them. He is first mentioned in b. c. 59, when he was brought to trial by P. Clodius for plundering a province, of which he had the administration after his praetorship, and he was only acquitted by throwing himself at the feet of the judges (Val. Max. viii. 1 § 6). In the same year Caesar married his daughter Calpurnia. Through his influence Piso obtained the consulship for the following year n. c. 58, having for his colleague A. Gabinius, who was indebted for the honour to Pompey. The new consuls were the mere instruments of the triumvirs, and took care that the senate should do nothing in opposition to the wishes of their patrons. When the triumvirs had resolved to sacrifice Cicero, the consuls of course threw no obstacle in their way; but Clodius, to make sure of their support, promised Piso the province of Macedonia, and Gabinius that of Syria, and brought a bill before the people to that effect, although the senate was the constitutional body which should propose the province of Cicero soon followed. Piso took an active part in the measures of Clodius, and joined him in celebrating their victory. Cicero accuses him of transferring to his own house the spoils of Cicero's dwellings. The conduct of Piso in support of Clodius produced that extreme resentment in the mind of Cicero, which he displayed against Piso on many subsequent occasions. At the expiration of his consulship Piso went to his province of Macedonia, where he remained during two years, b. c. 57 and 56, plundering the province in the most shameless manner. In the latter of these years the senate resolved that a successor should be appointed, and accordingly, to his great mortification and rage, he had to resign the government in b. c. 55 to Q. Anchuris. In the debate in the senate, which led to his recall and likewise to that of Gabinius, Cicero had an opportunity of giving vent to the wrath which had long been raging within him, and accordingly in the speech which he delivered on the occasion, and which has come down to us (De Provinciis Consularibus), he poured forth a torrent of invective against Piso, accusing him of every possible crime in the government of his province. Piso on his return, b. c. 55, complained in the senate of the attack of Cicero, and justified the administration of his province, whereupon Cicero reiterated his charges in a speech (In Pisonem, in which he portrays the whole public and private life of his enemy with the choicest words of vituperation and abuse that the Latin language could supply. Cicero, however, did not venture to bring to trial the father-in-law of Caesar.

In b. c. 59 Piso was censor with Ap. Claudius Pulcher, and undertook this office at the request of Caesar. At the beginning of the following year, b. c. 49, Piso, who had not yet laid down his censorship, offered to go to Caesar to act as mediator; but the aristocratical party would not hear of any accommodation, and hostilities accordingly commenced. Piso accompanied Pompey in his flight from the city; and although he did not go with him across the sea, he still kept aloof from Caesar. Cicero accordingly praises him, and actually writes to Atticus, "I love Piso" (Cic. ad Att. viii. 13, a. 110, Panm. xiv. 14). Piso subsequently returned to Rome, and though he took no part in the civil war, was notwithstanding treated with respect by Caesar. On the murder of the latter, in b. c. 44, Piso exerted himself to obtain the preservation of the laws and institutions of his father-in-law, and was almost the only person that dared to oppose the arbitrary conduct of Antony. Afterwards, however, he appeared as one of the most zealous adherents of Antony; and when the latter went to Cisalpine Gaul, at the end of the year, to prosecute the war against Decimus Brutus, Piso remained at Rome, to defend his cause and promote his views. At the beginning of the following year, b. c. 43, he was one of the ambassadors sent to Antony at Mutina. After this time his name does not occur. (Orelli, Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 123, &c.; Caes. B. G. ii. 14; Livius Cass. xii. 16; Appian, B. C. ii. 14, 135, 143, iii. 50, 54, &c.)

8. L. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, consul b. c. 133. His descent is quite uncertain, since neither the Fasti nor coins mention the name of his father. From his integrity and conscientiousness he received the surname of Frugi, which is perhaps nearly equivalent to our "man of honour," but the exact force of which is explained at length by Cicero (Tusc. iii. 18). Piso was tribune of the plebs, b. c. 149, in which year he proposed the first law for the punishment of extortion in the provinces (Lex Calpurnia de Repetundis, Cic. Brut. 27, Tusc. iii. 84, iv. 25, de Off. ii. 21). In b. c. 133 he was consul with P. Mucius Scaevola, and was sent into Italy against the slaves. He gained a victory over them, but did not subdue them, and was succeeded in the command by the consul P. Rutilius (Oros. v. 9; Val. Max. ii. 7 § 9). Piso was a staunch supporter of the aristocratical party; and though he would not look over their crimes, as his law against extortion shews, still he was not as little disposed to tolerate any invasion of their rights and privileges. He therefore offered a strong opposition to the measures of C. Gracchus, and is especially mentioned as a vehement opponent of the lex frumentaria of the latter (Cic. pro Font. 13, Tusc. iii. 20). He is called Censorius by several ancient writers; and though the date of his censorship is uncertain, it may perhaps be referred to b. c. 120. Piso left behind him orations, which had disappeared in Cicero's time, and Annals, which contained the history of Rome from the earliest period to the age in which Piso himself lived. This work, which, according to Cicero's judgment (Brut. 27), was written in a meagre style, is frequently referred to by ancient writers. Piso was, in Niebuhr's opinion, the first Roman writer who introduced the practice of giving a rationalistic interpretation to the myths and legends of early Roman history. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 235, 237, vol. ii. p. 9; Laehm., De Fontibus T. Livii, p. 92; Krause, Vitae et Fragm. Hist. Roman. p. 139; Liebaldt, De L. Pisoni Annalium Scripore, Naumburg, 1836.)

10. L. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, the son of No. 9, and a worthy inheritor of his surname, served with distinction under his father in Sicily, in b. c. 133, and died in Spain about b. c. 111, whither he had gone as propraetor. (Cic. Verr. iv. 25; Val. Max. iv. 3 § 10; Appian, Hisp. 99.)

11. L. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, the son of No. 10, was, like his father and grandfather, a man of honour and integrity. He was a colleague of Verres in the praetorship, b. c. 74, when he thwarted many of the unrighteous schemes of the latter. (Cic. Verr. i. 46.)

12. C. CALPURNIUS PISO FRUGI, a son of No. 11, married Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, in b. c. 63, but was betrothed to her as early as b. c. 67 (Cic. ad Att. i. 3). In Caesar's consaulship, b. c. 59, Piso was accused by L. Vettius as one of the conspirators in the pretended plot against Pompey's life. He was questor in the following year, b. c. 58, when he used every exertion to obtain the recal of his father-in-law from banishment, and for that reason would not go into the provinces of Pontus and Bithynia, which had been allotted him. He did not, however, live to see the return of Cicero, who arrived at Rome on the 4th of September, B.c. 57. He probably died in the summer of the same year. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero in terms of gratitude on account of the zeal which he had manifested in his behalf during his banishment. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 24, in Vatin. 11, pro Sest. 24, 31, ad Q. Fr. i. 4, ad Fam. xiv. 1, 2, post Red. in Sen. 15, post Red. ad Quir. 3.)

13. C. CALPURNIUS PISO, of whom we know nothing, except that he was consul B.c. 139, with M. Popillius Laenas. (Val. Max. i. 3 § 2.)

14. Q. CALPURNIUS PISO, consul B.c. 135, with Ser. Fulvius Flaccus, was sent against Numantia. He did not, however, attack the city, but contented himself with making a plundering excursion into the territory of Pallantia. (Appian. Hisp. 63; Oros. 5, 61, 62; Obsec. 85.)

15. CALPURNIUS PISO, of unknown descent, praetor about B.c. 135, was defeated by the slaves in Sicily. (Flor. iii. 19.)

16. CALPURNIUS PISO, of whom we know nothing, except that he fought with success against the Thracians, about B.c. 104. (Flor. iii. 4 § 6, iv. 12 § 17.)

17. C. CALPURNIUS PISO, was consul B.c. 67, with M. Acilius Glabrio. He belonged to the high aristocratical party, and, as consul, led the opposition to the proposed law of the tribune Gabinius, by which Pompey was to be entrusted with extraordinary powers for the purpose of conducting the war against the pirates. Piso even went so far as to threaten Pompey's life, telling him, "that if he emulated Romulus, he would not escape the end of Romulus," for which imprudent speech he was nearly torn to pieces by the people. The law, however, was carried, notwithstanding all the opposition of Piso and his party; and when shortly afterwards the orders which Pompey had issued, were not carried into execution in Narbonese Gaul, in consequence, as it was supposed, of the intrigues of Piso, Gabinius proposed to deprive the latter of his consulsip, an extreme measure which Pompey's prudence would not allow to be brought forward. Piso had not an easy life in this consulsip. In the same year the tribune, C. Cornelius, proposed several laws, which were directed against the shameless abuses of the aristocracy. [CORNELIUS, Vol. I. p. 657.] All these Piso resisted with the utmost vehemence, and none more strongly than a stringent enactment to put down bribery at elections. But as the senate could not with any decency refuse to lend their aid in suppressing this corrupt practice, they pretended that the law of Cornelius was so severe, that no ascensura would come forward, and no justice could condemn a criminal; and they therefore made the consuls bring forward a less stringent law (LEX ACILIA CALPURNIA), imposing a fine on the offender, with exclusion from the senate and all public offices. It was with no desire to diminish corruption at elections that Piso joined his colleague in proposing the law, for an accusation had been brought against him in the preceding year of obtaining by bribery his own election to the consulsip.

In b.c. 66 and 65, Piso administered the province of Narbonese Gaul as proconsul, and while there suppressed an insurrection of the Allobroges. Like the other Roman nobles, he plundered his province, and was defended by Cicero in b.c. 63, when he was accused of robbing the Allobroges and of executing unjustly a Transpadane Gaul. The latter charge was brought against him at the instigation of Caesar; and Piso, in revenge, implored Cicero, but without success, to accuse Caesar as one of the conspirators of Catiline. Piso must have died before the breaking out of the civil war, but in what year is uncertain. Cicero ascribes (Brut. 68) to him considerable orontorical abilities. (Plut. Pomp. 25, 27; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 7, 20—23; Ascon. in Cic. Cornel. pp. 66, 75, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. i. 13, pro Flacc. 39; Sall. Cat. 49.)

He may be the same as the L. Piso, who was aedile in the case of Q. Roscius, b.c. 67 (Cic. pro Rosc. Com. 3, 6), and as the L. Piso, who defended Asinius Pompeius (Cic. pro Cæc. Dom. 13). He retained, however, his family-name Piso, just as Scipio, after his adoption by Metellus, was called Metellus Scipio. [METELLUS, No. 22.] There was, however, no occasion for the addition of Calpurnianus to his name, as that of Piso showed sufficiently his original family. Piso had attained some importance as early as the first civil war. On the death of L. Cinna, in b.c. 64, he married his wife Annia, and in the following year, 63, was appointed quaestor to the consul L. Scipio; but he quickly deserted this party, and went over to Sulla, who compelled him to divorce his wife on account of her previous connection with Cinna (Cic. Verr. i. 14; Vell. Pat. ii. 41). He failed in obtaining the aedileship (Cic. pro Flacc. 5, 21), and the year of his praetorship is uncertain. After his praetorship he succeeded the proconsul of Spain with the title of proconsul, and on his return to Rome in 69, enjoyed the honour of a triumph, although it was asserted by some that he had no claim to this distinction. (Cic. pro Flacc. 3, in Pis. 26; Ascon, in Pis. p. 15.) Piso served in the Mithridatic war as a legatus of Pompey, who sent him to Rome in b.c. 62, to become a candidate for the consulsip, as he was anxious to obtain the ratification of his acts in Asia, and therefore wished to have one of his friends at the head of the state. Piso was accordingly elected consul for the following year, b.c. 61, with M. Valerius Messalla Niger. In his consulsip he gave great offence to Cicero, by not asking him first in the senate for his opinion, and still further increased the anger of the orator by taking P. Claudius under his protection after his violation of the mysteries of the Bonæ Deæ. Cicero revenged himself on Piso, by preventing him from obtaining the province of Syria, which he had desired, and his excommunication (Dion. Cass. xxxvi. 44; Cic. ad Att. i. 12—18.) Piso must have died, in all probability, before the breaking out of the second civil war, for in b.c. 47 Antony inhabited his house at Rome. (Cic. Phil. ii. 25.) Piso, in his younger days, had so high a reputation as an orator, that Cicero was taken to him by his father, in order to receive instruction from him. He possessed some natural ability, but was chiefly indebted for his excellence to study, especially of Greek literature, in the knowledge of which he surpassed all previous orators. He did not, however, prosecute oratory long, partly on account of ill-health, and partly because his irritable temper would not submit to the rude encounters of the forum. He belonged to the Peripatetic school in philosophy, in which he received instructions from Staseas. (Cic. Brut. 67, 90, de Or. i. 22, de Nat. Deor. i. 7; Ascon. l.c.)

19. M. Piso, perhaps the son of No. 18, was praetor, b. c. 44, when he was raised by Cicero on account of his opposition to Antony. (Phil. ill. 10.)

20. CN. CALPURNIUS PISO, was a young noble who dissipated his fortune by his extravagance and profligacy, and being a man of a most daring and unscrupulous character, attempted to improve his circumstances by a revolution in the state. He therefore formed with Catiline, in b. c. 66, a conspiracy to murder the new consuls when they entered upon their office on the 1st of January in the following year. The history of this conspiracy, and the manner in which it failed, are related elsewhere. [Catiline, p. 629, b.] Although no doubt was entertained of the existence of the conspiracy, still there were not sufficient proofs to convict the parties, and they were not therefore brought to trial. It had been arranged by the conspirators, that after the murder of the consuls, Piso was to be despatched, with an army, to seize the Spains; and the senate, in order to get rid of this dangerous agitator, now sent him into Nearer Spain as quaestor, but with the rank and title of propraetor. By his removal the senate hoped to weaken his faction at Rome, and they gave him an opportunity of acquiring, by the plunder of the province, the money of which he was so much in need. His expectations, however, in the province soon made him so hateful to the inhabitants, that he was murdered by them. Some persons, however, supposed that he was murdered at the instigation of Pompey, who possessed great influence in the country ever since the conquest of Sertorius. Crassus had been in favour of sending Piso to Spain, that he might, by Piso's means, persecute the friends of his great enemy and rival, Pompey; and it was therefore thought that the latter had revenged himself, by making away with the new governor. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Sall. Cat. 18, 19; Cic. pro Sull. 24, pro Mar. 39; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 66, in Tog. Consid. pp. 63, 94.)

21. CN. CALPURNIUS PISO, legatus and proconsul of Pompey in the war against the pirates, commanded a division of the fleet at the Hellespont, b. c. 67. He afterwards followed Pompey in the Mithridatic war, and was present at the surrender of Jerusalem in 63. (Appian, Mithr. 95, who erroneously calls him Publius; Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 4. § 2.) The following coin commemorates the connection of Piso with the war against the pirates. The obverse contains the legend CN. PISO. PRO. C., with the head of Numa (on which we find the letters SVM), because the Calpurnii gens claimed descent from Calpul, the son of Numa [CALPURNIA GENSI]; the reverse represents the prow of a ship with the legend MAGN. (PRO. COS., i.e. (Pompeius) Magnus proc. consul. (Eckehl, vol. v. p. 160.)

22. CN. CALPURNIUS CN. F. CN. N. PISO, consul b. c. 23, was, in all probability, the son of No. 21. He belonged to the high aristocratical party, and was naturally of a proud and imperious temper. He fought against Caesar in Africa, in b. c. 46, and after the death of the dictator, joined Brutus and Cassius. He was subsequently pardoned and returned to Rome; but he disliked being asked for and received the honours of the state, and was, without solicitation, raised to the consulship in b. c. 23. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43, Bell. Afr. 18.) This Cn. Piso appears to be the same as the Cn. Piso spoken of by Valerius Maximus (vi. 2. 84).

23. CN. CALPURNIUS CN. F. CN. N. PISO, son of No. 22, inherited all the pride and haughtiness of his father. He was consul b. c. 7, with Tiberius, the future emperor, and was sent by Augustus as legate into Spain, where he made himself hated by his cruelty and avarice. Tiberius after his accession was chiefly jealous of Germanicus, his brother's son, whom he had adopted, and who was idolized both by the soldiery and the people. Accordingly, when the eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus in a. d. 18, Tiberius chose Piso as a fit instrument to thwart the plans and check the power of Germanicus, and therefore conferred upon him the command of Syria. It was believed that the emperor had given him secret instructions to that effect; and his wife Plancina, who was as proud and haughty as her husband, was urged on by Livia, the mother of the emperor, to vie with and annoy Agrippina. Piso and Plancina fulfilled their mission most completely; the former opposed all the wishes and measures of Germanicus, and the latter heaped every kind of insult upon Agrippina. Germanicus, on his return from Egypt, in a. d. 19, found that all his orders had been neglected or disobeyed. Hence arose vehement altercation between him and Piso; and when the former fell ill in the autumn of this year, he believed that he had been poisoned by Piso and Plancina. Before his death he had ordered Piso to quit Syria, and had appointed Cn. Sentius as his successor. Piso now made an attempt to recover his province, but the Roman soldiers refused to obey him, and Sentius drove him out of the country. Relying on the protection of Tiberius, Piso now went to Rome (a. d. 20); but he was received by the people with marks of the utmost dislike and horror. Whether Piso had poisoned Germanicus cannot now be determined; Tacitus candidly admits that there were no proofs of his having done so; but the popular belief in his guilt was so strong that Tiberius could not refuse an investigation into the matter, which was conducted by the senate. As it proceeded the emperor seemed to have made up his mind to sacrifice his tool to the general indignation; but before the investigation came to an end, Piso was found one morning in his room with his throat cut, and his sword driven through his body. It was generally supposed that, despairing of the emperor's protection, he had put an end to his own life; but others believed that Tiberius dreaded his revealing his secrets, and had accordingly caused him to be put to death. The powerful influence of Livia secured the acquittal of Plancina for the present. [Plan-cina.] His two sons Cneius and Marcus, the latter of whom had been with him in Syria, were involved in the accusation of their father, but were pardoned by Tiberius, who mitigated the sentence which the senate pronounced after the death of Piso. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43, 55, 57, 69, 74, 75, 80, iii. 10—18; Sene. de Ira, i. 16; Dion Cass. ixi. 18; Suet. Tib. 13, 52, Cal. 2.)

24. L. Calpurnius Piso, probably the eldest son of No. 23. In the judgment which the senate pronounced upon the sons of Cn. Piso [see above, No. 23], it was decreed that the eldest Cneius should change his praenomen (Tac. Ann. iii. 17); and it would appear that he assumed a surname of Lucius, since Dion Cassius (lx. 20) speaks of a Lucius (not Cneius) Piso, the son of Cn. Piso and Plancina, who was governor of Africa in the reign of Caligula. This supposition is confirmed by the fact that Tacitus speaks of only two sons, Cneius and Marcus. We may therefore conclude that he is the same as the L. Piso, who was consul in A. d. 27, with M. Licinius Crassus Frugi. (Tac. Ann. iv. 62.)

25. M. Calpurnius Piso, the younger son of No. 23, accompanied his father into Syria, and was accused along with him in A. d. 20. [See above, No. 23.]

26. L. Calpurnius Piso, the son of No. 24, was consul in A. d. 57 with the emperor Nero, and in A. d. 66 had the charge of the public finances entrusted to him, together with two other consulars. He was afterwards appointed proconsul of Africa, and was slain there in A. d. 70, because it was reported that he was forming a design against Vespasian, who had just obtained the empire. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28, 31, xv. 18, Hist. iv. 33, 48—50; Plin. Ep. iii. 7.)

27. L. Calpurnius Piso, consul B. C. 1, with Cossus Cornelius Lentulus. (Dion Cass. Index, lib. iv.)

28. L. Calpurnius Piso, was characterised by the same haughtiness and independence as the rest of his family under the empire. He is first mentioned in A. d. 16, as complaining of the corruption of the law-courts, and threatening to leave the city and spend the rest of his life in some distant retreat in the country; and he was a person of so much importance that the emperor thought it advisable to endeavour to soothe his anger and to induce his friends to prevail upon him to remain at Rome. In the same year he gave another instance of the little respect which he entertained for the imperial family. Urguliana, the favourite of the emperor, had wounded Piso a certain sum of money; and when she refused to obey the summons to appear before the praetor, Piso followed her to the palace of Livia, and insisted upon being paid. Although Tiberius, at the commencement of his reign, had not thought it advisable to resent the conduct of Piso, yet he was not of a temper to forgive it, and only waited for a favourable opportunity to revenge himself upon his haughty subject. Accordingly, when he considered his power sufficiently established, Q. Granius appeared in A. d. 24, as the accuser of Piso, charging him with entertaining designs against the emperor’s life; but Piso died just before the trial came on (Tac. Ann. ii. 34, iv. 21). He is probably the same as the L. Piso, who came forward to defend Cn. Piso [No. 23] in A. d. 20, when so many shrank from the unpopular office. (Tac. Ann. iii. 11.)

29. L. Calpurnius Piso, praetor in Nearer Spain in A. d. 25, was murdered in the province while travelling. (Tac. Ann. iv. 45.)

30. C. Calpurnius Piso, the leader of the well-known conspiracy against Nero in A. d. 65. He is first mentioned in A. d. 37, when Caligula was invited to his nuptial banquet on the day of his marriage with Livia Orestilla; but the emperor took a fancy to the bride, whom he married, and shortly afterwards banished the husband. He was recalled by Claudius, and raised to the consulship, but in what year is uncertain, as his name does not occur in the Fasti. When the crimes and follies of Nero had so far increased the emperor’s hatred and despised by his subjects, a formidable conspiracy was formed against the tyrant, and the conspirators destined Piso as his successor. Piso himself did not form the plot; but as soon as he had joined it, his great popularity gained him many partisans. He possessed most of the qualities which the Romans prized, high birth, an eloquent address, liberality and affability; and he also displayed a sufficient love of magnificence and luxury to suit the taste of the day, which would not have tolerated austerity of manner or character. The conspiracy was discovered by Milichus, a freedman of Flavius Scevusinus, one of the conspirators. Piso thereupon opened his veins, and thus died. (Schol. ad Juv. v. 109; Dion Cass. l. ix. 3; Tac. Ann. iv. 65, xv. 46—59; Dion Cass. lxxii. 24, &c.; Suet. Nero. 36.) There is extant a poem in 261 lines, containing a panegyric on a certain Calpurnius Piso, which Wernsdorf supposes with considerable probability to be the same as the leader of the consspiracy against Nero. The poem is printed in the fourth volume of Wernsdorf’s Poetae Latini Menores, where it is attributed to Saleius Bas-sus. (Bassus, p. 473.) Piso left a son, whom Tacitus calls Calpurnius Galerianus, and who would appear from his surname to have been adopted by Piso. The ambition of the father caused the death of the son; for Mucianus, the prefect of Vespasian, fearing lest Galerianus might follow in his father’s steps, put him to death, when he obtained possession of the city in A. d. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 11.)

31. L. Calpurnius Piso Licinianus, was the son of M. Licinius Crassus Frugi, who was consul with L. Piso in A. d. 27, and of Scribonia, a grand-daughter of Sex. Pompeius. His brothers were Cn. Pompeius Magnus, who was killed by Claudius, M. Licinius Crassus, slain by Nero, and Licinius Crassus Scribonianus, who was offered the emperor’s hand to Piso’s daughter, but refused to accept it. By which of the Pisones Licinianus was adopted, is uncertain. On the accession of the aged Galba to the throne on the death of Nero, he adopted as his son and successor Piso Licinianus; but the latter only enjoyed the distinction four days, for Otho, who had hoped to receive this honour, induced the praetorians to rise against the emperor. Piso fled for refuge into the temple of Vesta, but was dragged out by the soldiers, and despatched at the threshold of the temple, A. d. 69. His head was cut off and carried to Otho, who feasted his eyes with the sight, but afterwards surrendered it for a large sum of money to Ve-rania, the wife of Piso, who buried it with his body.
PISTIUS.

Piso was thirty-one at the time of his death, and enjoyed a reputation for the strictest integrity, uprightness, and morality. (Tac. Hist. i. 14, 15, 34, 43, 48; Dion Cass. ixiv. 5, 6; Suet. Gallb. 17; Plut. Gallb. 23, 28; Plin. Ep. ii. 20.)

32. Piso, consul with Julius A. d. 175 in the reign of Commodus (Lamprid. Commod. 13).

33. Piso, one of the Thirty Tyrants, who assumed the imperial purple after the capture of Valerian, A. d. 260. He traced his descent from the ancient family of the same name, and was a man of unblemished character. After the capture of Valerian, he was sent by Macrinus with orders for the death of Valens, proconsul of Achaia; but upon learning that the latter in anticipation of the danger had assumed the purple, he withdrew into Thessaly, and was there himself saluted emperor by a small body of supporters, who bestowed on him the title of Thessalicus. His career was soon, however, brought to a close by Valens, who, in giving orders for his death, did not scruple to pay a tribute to his conspicuous merit. The proceedings in the senate, when intelligence arrived of the death of both Piso and Valens, as chronicled by Pollio, are scarce credible, although he professes to give the very words of the first speaker. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. Tyr. 20.)

The two following coins of the republican period cannot be referred with certainty to any of the Pisones that have been mentioned above. The former bears on the obverse the head of Terminus, and on the reverse a patera, with the legend M. PISO M. (F.) FRUGI; the latter has on the obverse a bearded head with the legend PISO CARPIO C., and on the reverse two men seated, with an ear of corn on each side of them, and the legend AD FRV. EMV. EX S. C., that is, Piso, Caepio, Quaestores ad frumentum emundum ex senatusconsulto. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 159, 160.)

COIN OF M. PISO.

PISTOK, that is, the baker, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, where its origin was thus related: when the Gauls were besieging Rome, the god suggested to the besiegers the idea of throwing loaves of bread among the enemies, to make them believe that the Romans had plenty of provisions, and thus cause them to give up the siege. (Ov. Fast. vi. 350, 394; Lactant. i. 20.) This surname shows that there existed a connection between Jupiter, Vesta, and the Penates, for an altar had been dedicated to Jupiter Pistor on the very day which was sacred to Vesta.

PISTOXENUS, a vase-maker, known by a single vase found at Ceri, and now in the possession of M. Capmnesi at Rome, bearing the inscription Pisto XENOX EPOIESEN. (H. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 56, 2d ed.)

PITANATIS (Πιτανάτης), a surname of Arminius, derived from the little town of Pitana in Laconia, where she had a temple. (Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 172; Paus. iii. 16. § 9; Eurip. Troad. 1101.)

PITANE (Πιτάνη), a daughter of the river god Eurotas, became by Poseidon the mother of Evadne. From her the town of Pitana had its name. (Pind. Ol. vi. 46.)

PITHOLAUS or PETHOLAUS, or PYTHOLAUS (Πυθόλαος, Πηθόλαος), was one of the three brothers-in-law and murderers of Alexander of Pherae. In n. c. 352 Peitholaus and his brother Lycophron were expelled from Pherae by Philip of Macedon [LYCOPHRON, No. 5]; but Peitholaus re-established himself in the township, and was again driven out by Philip in n. c. 349 (Diod. xvi. 52). He was honoured at one time with the Athenian franchise, but was afterwards deprived of it on the ground that he had been obtained by false pretences. (Dem. c. Neer. p. 1376.) For Peitholaus, see also Arist. Rhet. iii. 9, § 8, 10, § 7; Plat. Aeat. 23. (E. E.)

PITHON (Πιθών). Great confusion exists in the MSS. editions of various authors between the different forms, Πείθων, Πηθών, and Πῆθων, and it is frequently impossible to say which is the more correct form. (See Ellendt ad Arr. Anab. vi. 7. § 4.)

1. Son of Agenor, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great. It is not easy to distinguish the services rendered by him from those of his namesake, the son of Crates; but it is remarkable that no mention occurs of either until the campaigns in India, though they then appear as holding important commands, and playing a prominent part. It is apparently the son of Agenor who is mentioned as commanding one division of the πεζοστρατόµενοι, or foot-guards, in the campaign against the Malli, n. c. 327 (Arr. Anab. vi. 6. § 1, 7, 8), and it was certainly to him that Alexander shortly after confided the government of part of the Indian provinces, apparently those bordering on the satrapy of Philip. (Id. vi. 15.) Almost immediately after this we find him detached with a considerable army to reduce the Indian king Musicanus, a service which he successfully performed, and brought the chief himself prisoner to Alexander. He again bore an important part in the descent of the Indus, during which he held the separate command of a body of cavalry that marched along the right bank of the river, and rejoined the main army at Patala. (Arr. Arab. vi. 17, 20; Curt. ix. 6. § 16.) From this time we hear no more of him during the life of Alexander, but he doubtless remained in his satrapy, the government of which was confirmed to him both in the first partition of the provinces immediately on the king's death, and in the subsequent arrangements at Triparadiseus, b.c. 321. (Diod. xviii. 3, 39: Dexippus ap. Phot. p. 64, b.; Arrian. ibid. p. 71, b; Curt. x. 10. § 4; Justin. xiii. 4.) It is remarkable that we do not find him taking any part in the war between Eumenes and Antigonus, and it seems probable that he had at that period been dispossessed of his government by Eudemos, who had established his power over great part of the Indian satrapies. But it is clear that he was unfavourably disposed towards Eumenes, and after the fall of that general, b.c. 316, Pithon was rewarded by Antigonus with the important satrapy of Babylon. From thence however he was recalled in b.c. 314, in order to form one of the council of experienced officers who were selected by Antigonus to assist and control his son Demetrius, to whom he had for the first time entrusted the command of an army. Two years later we again find him filling a similar situation and united with the youthful Demetrius in the command of the army in Syria. But he in vain opposed the impetuousity of the young prince, who gave battle to Ptolemy at Gaza, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of Pithon and the other old generals. A complete defeat was the consequence, and Pithon himself fell on the field of battle, b.c. 312. (Diod. xix. 56, 69, 82, 85.) 2. Son of Crateus or Cretacus, a Macedonian of Eordaean, in the service of Alexander, whom we find holding the important post of one of the seven select officers called Somatophylaces, the immediate successors of the king's person. (Arr. Arab. vi. the country. We have no information as to the time anee that took place, or the services by which he obtained them. However, we may fairly assume that he deavoured to distinguish himself, as all friends to the cause of Alexander, it is not always possible to say how he distinguished himself. In the same year, the son of Agenor is the person the country, the campaigns of Alexander. He family. Urgula-ning the officers in close attendance of the supreme commander, owed his last illness (Id. vii. 26; when he refused to take a considerable part in before the praetor, Plowed his decease, b.c. 323. of Livia, and insisted upon taking the post of Tiberius, at the commencement of his career he considered it advisable to appoint his regents and guarded against having no enemy in sight, the expected child of Pithon. (Curt. x. 7. §§ 4, 8; Q. Granius appeared in. a.) His services on this Pithon, charging him with treason by Perdiccias, who in the opinion of Polybius, but not necessarily to Pithon the trial came on (Tac. Am. Media. Olympic vicer celebrates his strength and courage; this feat Pittacus performed by entangling his adversary in a net, and then dispatching him with a trident and a dagger, exactly after the fashion in which the gladiators called retiarii long afterwards fought at Rome. For this achievement he received from the Mytileneans high honours and substantial rewards; but of the latter he would accept only as much land as he could cast his spear over; and this land he dedicated to sacred uses, and it was known in later ages as "the Mytilenean land." (Diog. Laërt. i. 75; Herod. v. 94, 95; Eusib. Chron. a. 1410; Strabo, xiii. p. 600;

Aelian, Hist. Anim. ii. 14; Suid. s. v. Πιττοκος; Pint. Mor. p. 636, a. b.; Festus, s. v. Retaiarus; Alcæus.) This war was terminated by the mediation of Periander, who assigned the disputed territory to the Athenians (Herod. Diog. ll. o.c.); but the internal troubles of Mytilene still continued. The supreme power was firmly disputed between a succession of tyrants, such as Myrsilus, Megalagyrus, and the Cleocadids, and the aristocratic party, headed by Alcaeus and his brother Antimenes; and the latter were driven into exile. (Strabo, xiii. p. 617.) It would seem that the city enjoyed some years of comparative tranquillity, until the exiles tried to effect their return by force of arms. To resist this attempt the popular party chose Pittacus as their ruler, with absolute power, under the title of admynırlı, a position which differed from that of a τυράννος, inasmuch as it depended on popular election, and was restricted in its prerogatives, and sometimes in the time for which it was held, though sometimes it was for life; in short, it was the Greek tyranny, ας διπλα τεσσερα απερηγ ρυμωνίας (Aristot. Polit. iii. 9. s. 14.) Pittacus held this office for ten years, n. c. 569 to 579, and then volun-trarily resigned it, having by his administration restored order to the state, and prepared it for the safe enjoyment of a republican form of government.
The oligarchical party, however, represented him as an ordinary tyrant, and Alcaeus poured out invective against him in the poems which he compiled in his exile, calling him την κακοτρίδα Πιττάκου, deriding the zeal and unanimity with which the people chose him for their tyrant, and even ridiculing his personal peculiarities (Fr. 37, 38, ed. Bergk; Aristot. l. c.; Diog. Laërt. i. 81): there is, however, some reason to suppose that Alcaeus was afterwards reconciled to Pittacus.
(AIcæus.) He lived in great honour at Mytilene for ten years after the resignation of his government; and died in n. c. 569, at a very advanced age, upwards of 70 years according to Laërtius (i. 79), upwards of 80 according to Suidas, and 100 according to Lucian. (MacroL 16.)

There are other traditions respecting Pittacus, some of which are of very doubtful authority.
Diogenes Laërtius mentions various communications between him and Croesus, and preserves a short letter, which was said to have been written by Pittacus, declining an invitation to Sardis to see the treasures of the Lydian king (l. 75, 77, 81); and Herodotus mentions a piece of sage advice which was given to Croesus, as some said, by Bias, or, according to others, by Pittacus (l. 27); but all these accounts are rather doubtful by the fact that Croesus was only 25 years old at the death of Pittacus. Other anecdotes of his clemency, wisdom, and contempt of riches, are related by Diogenes Laërtius, Pittarch, Aelian, and other writers.
Of the proverbial maxims of practical wisdom, which were current under the names of the seven wise men of Greece, two were ascribed to Pitacus, namely, Χαλκεύν εὐθεῖα ἐμμεναι, and Καὶρὸν γνωθί. The former furnishes the subject of an ode of Simonides, of which Plato has a very ingenious, though sophistical discussion, in his Protagoras (p. 338, e.; Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Græc. p. 747). Others of his celebrated sayings are recorded by Diogenes (i. 77, 78).

Pitacus was very celebrated as an elegiac poet. According to Diogenes (i. 79), he composed as many as six hundred of elegiac verses, forming a collection of didactic statements concerning the laws, addressed to his fellow-citizens. The only extant fragment of his poetry is the few lines preserved by Diogenes (i. 78), who says that they were the most celebrated of his verses:—

"Εχοντα δε τῶν (οτε τόξα) καὶ ἱδόνικον φαρέτρων στείχειν ἐπὶ φώτα κακῶν—ποιτὸν γὰρ οὐθέν γλῶσσα διὰ στόματος λαλεῖ δικαίωνον ἐχονα καρδίν νόημα.

PITTHÉUS (Πιθέος), a son of Pelops and Dia, was king of Troezen, father of Aethra, and grandfather and father of Theseus. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 144, Eurip. Hippol. 1, Med. 683; Paus. ii. 30. § 6, i. 27. § 6; Apollod. iii. 15. § 7; Strab. viii. p. 374.) When Theseus married Phaedra, Pittheus took Hippolytus into his house. (Paus. i. 22. § 2.) His tomb and the chair on which he had sat in judgment were shown at Troezen down to a late time. (Paus. ii. 31. § 8.) He is said to have taught the art of speaking, and even to have written a book upon it. (ii. 31. § 4; comp. THESEUS.) Aethra as his daughter is called Pittheis. (Ov. Heroid. x. 31.)

PITYREUS (Πιτυρεύς), a descendant of Ion and father of Procles, was the last king in Peloponnesus before the invasion of the Dorians. (Paus. ii. 26. § 2, vii. 4. § 3.)

PITY'S (Πίτυς), a nymph beloved by Pan, was changed into a fir tree. (Lucian, Dial. Deor. 22. 4; Virg. Elog. vii. 24, with Voss's note.)

PIUS, a surname of several Romans, 1. Of the emperor Antoninus [Antonius]. 2. Of a senator Aurelius, who lived at the commencement of the reign of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. i. 75). 3. Of L. Cestius [Cesttus]. 4. Of Q. Metellus, consul b. c. 80, by whom it was handed down to his adopted son Metellus Scipio. [Metellus, Nos. 19, 22.]

PIX'ODARUS (Πιξόδαρος). 1. Son of Maussolus, a Carian of the city of Cindys, who was married to the daughter of Syennesis, king of Cilicia. Having taken part in the great revolt of his countrymen and the Ionians against the Persian king (b. c. 490), he advised the Carians boldly to cross the Maeander, and engage the Persian general Darius with that river in their rear: but this counsel, though regarded by Herodotus as the best that could be given, was not followed, and the Carians were defeated in two successive battles. (Herod. v. 110.)

2. Prince or king of Caria, was the youngest of the three sons of Hectormanus, all of whom successively held the sovereignty of their native country. Pixodarus obtained possession of the throne by the expulsion of his sister Ada, the widow and successor of her brother Idreus, and held it without opposition for a period of five years, b. c. 340—335. He cultivated the friendship of Persia, gave his daughter in marriage to a Persian named Orontobates, whom he even seems to have admitted to some share in the sovereign power during his own lifetime. But he did not neglect to court the alliance of other powers also, and endeavoured to secure the powerful friendship of Philip king of Macedonia, by offering the hand of his eldest daughter in marriage to Archelaus, the bastard son of the Macedonian monarch. The discontent of the young Alexander at this period led him to offer himself as a suitor for the Carian princess instead of his natural brother—an overture which was eagerly embraced by Pixodarus, but the ignominious interference of Philip put an end to the whole scheme. Pixodarus died—apparently a natural death—some time before the landing of Alexander in Asia, b. c. 334: and was succeeded by his son-in-law Orontobates. (Diod. xvi. 74; Arr. Anab. i. 23. § 10; Strab. xiv. pp. 656, 657; Pint. Alex. 10.)

The name is very variously written in the MSS. and editions of Arrian and Plutarch: the latter, for the most part, have Πωςδαρος (Sintenis, ad Plut. i. c.; Ebellis, ad Arr. i. c.), but the correctness of the form Πὐςδαρος is attested both by his coins, which resemble those of his predecessors Maussolus and Idreus in their type and general design, and by a fragment of the contemporary comic poet Epigenes (op. Athen. xi. p. 472 f.), from which we learn that the penultima is short. It would appear from this fragment, that Pixodarus had been sent on an embassy to Athens during the lifetime of his father Hectormanus. [E. H. B.]

PLACITUS.

PLACITIA, GALLA. [Galla, No. 3.]

PLACITIUS VALENTINIANUS. [Valentinianus.]

PLACIUS, one of the generals of Vespasian in the war against the Jews, frequently mentioned by Josephus. (Vil. 43, 74, B. J. iii. 7. §§ 3, 34, iv. 1. § 8, &c.)

PLACIDUS, JULIUS, the tribune of a cohort of Vespasian's army, who dragged Vitellius out of the lurking-place in which he had concealed himself. (Tac. Hist. iii. 85; comp. Dion Cass. liv. 20; Suet. Vitell. 16.)

PLACITUS, SEX., the author of a short Latin work, entitled "De Medicina (or Medicamentis) ex Animalibus," consisting of thirty-four chapters, each of which treats of some animal whose body was supposed to possess certain medical properties. As might be expected, it contains numerous absurdities, and is of little or no value or interest. The author has been sometimes confounded with other persons of the name of Scatus (see Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 618, PLAETORIUS.

ed. vet.), and is generally distinguished from them by the additional name of Pappriensis or Papelissis. He appears from various parts of his work (e.g. c. 27) to have been a physician, but nothing else is known of his personal history. His date is uncertain, but he is supposed to have lived in the fourth century after Christ. He is said to have borrowed much from Pliny's Natural History, and to have been copied in turn by Constantius Africanus. The work has several times been published, both separately, and in different medical collections. It first appeared in 1538, 4to. Norimberg., ed. Fr. Emericus; and again in the same year, 8vo. Basil. ed. Alb. Torinus. It is inserted (after Orbibasius) in the first volume of H. Stephani "Medicæ Artis Præicip.," Paris, fol. 1567; in the thirteenth volume of the old edition of Fabricii Bibl. Graecæ; in Ackermann's "Parabiblum Medicamentorum Scriptores Antiqui," Norimb. 1788, 8vo.; and elsewhere. (Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Ältere Medicin.)

PLAETORIA GENIS. plebeian, did not produce any men of distinction, and none of its members obtained the consulship. On coins we find the surname Cestianus; see below.

PLAETORIUS. 1. C. PLAETORIUS, one of the three commissioners for founding a colony at Croton in southern Italy, B.C. 194. (Liv. xxxiv. 45.)

2. C. PLAETORIUS, perhaps the same as the preceding, a member of the embassy sent to Quintus, king of the Ilyrians, B.C. 172. (Liv. xlii. 26.)

3. M. PLAETORIUS, slain by Sulla. (Val. Max. ix. 2 § 1.)

4. L. PLAETORIUS, a senator mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Cluentius (c. 39).

5. M. PLAETORIUS, was the accuser, in B.C. 69, of M. Fonteius, whom Cicero defended [Fonteius. No. 5]. About the same time he was curule aedile, an ædile with C. Flaminius, and it was before these ædiles that Cicero defended D. Matusinus. In B.C. 67 he was praetor with the same colleague as he had in his ædileship. In B.C. 51 he was condemned (incendio Plaetorio, i.e. damnatione, Cic. ad Att. v. 20. § 8), but we do not know for what offence. We find him a neighbour of Atticus in B.C. 44, and this is the last that we hear of him (Cic. pro Font. 12, pro Quint. 45, 53, ad Att. xv. 17). The following coins, struck by M. Plaetorius, a curule ædile, probably refer to the above-mentioned Plaetorius, as we know of no other Plaetorius who held this office. From these we learn that he was the son of Marcus, and that he bore the cognomen Cestianus. The first coin bears on the obverse a woman’s head covered with a helmet, with the legend CESTIANVS S.C., and on the reverse an eagle standing on a thunderbolt, with the legend M. PLAETORIVS M. P. AED. CVR. The second coin represents on the obverse the head of Cybele, covered with a turreted coronet, with the legend CESTIANVS, and on the reverse a sela curulis, with the legend M. PLAETORIVS AED. CVR. EX S. C. The third coin has on the obverse the head of a youthful female, and on the reverse the bust of the goddess Sors, with the legend M. PLAETORIVS CEST. S.C.; but as it bears no reference to the ædileship of Plaetorius, it may belong to a different person. The eagle and the head of Cybele on the first and second coins have reference to the games sacred to Jupiter and to Cybele, the exhibition of which belonged to the ædiles.

COINS OF M. PLAETORIUS.

6. C. PLAETORIUS, served as quaestor in Asia in B.C. 47, under Domitius Calvinus, and belonged to Caesar’s party. (Hirt. B. Alex. 34.)

7. PLAETORIUS RUSTIANUS, a Pompeian, perished, along with Metellus Scipio, when their little fleet was overpowered by P. Sittius at Hippo Regius, B.C. 46. (B. Afric. 96.)

8. L. PLAETORIUS L. F., is mentioned only on coins, from which we learn that he was quaestor. The obverse represents the head of Moneta, the reverse a man running, with the legend L. PLAETORIVS L. F. Q. S. C.

COIN OF L. PLAETORIUS.

9. PLAETORIUS NEPOS, a senator and a friend of Hadrian, whom this emperor thought at one time of appointing as his successor. (Spartian. Hadr. 4, 23.)

PLAGULEIUS, one of the partisans of the tribune Clodius. (Cic. pro Dom. 93, comp. ad Att. x. 8.)

PLANCUS, CN. 1. Defended by Cicero in an oration still extant, was descended from a respectable equestrian family at Atina, a praefectura not far from Arpinum in Latium. His father was a Roman eques, and one of the most important and influential farmers of the public revenue (publican); he served under M. Crassus, who was consul B.C. 97, and he subsequently earned the hatred of the aristocracy by the energy with which he pressed for a reduction of the sum which the publicani had agreed to pay for the PLANCINA.

PLANCUS.

PLANCUS, the name of the most distinguished family of the plebeian Munatia gens, is said to have signified a person having flat splay feet without any bend in them. (Plin. H.N. xi. 45. s. 105; Festus, s. v. Planclus.) Instead of Plancus we frequently find Plancius both in manuscripts and editions of the ancient writers. For a detailed account of the persons mentioned below, see Drumann's Rom. vol. iv. p. 205, &c.

1. CN. Munatius Plancus, was accused by M. Brutus, and defended by the orator L. Crassus, about B.C. 106 (Cic. pro Orat. ii. 54, pro Cluent. 51; Quintil. vi. 3. § 44.)

2. L. Munatius L. F. L. N. Plancus, was a friend of Julius Caesar, and served under him both in the Gallic and the civil wars. He was married to Flaminia, as one of Caesar's legati in Gaul in the winter of B.C. 54 and 53; and he was in conjunction with C. Fabius, the commander of Caesar's troops near Hiero in Spain at the beginning of B.C. 49. He accompanied Caesar in his African campaign in B.C. 46, and attempted, but without success, to induce C. Considius, the Pompeian commander, to surrender to him the town of Adrumetum. At the end of this year he was appointed one of the praefects of the city, to whom the charge of Rome was entrusted during Caesar's absence in Spain next year. He received a still further proof of Caesar's confidence in being nominated to the government of Transalpine Gaul for B.C. 44, with the exception of the Narbonese and Belgic portions of the province, and also to the consulship for B.C. 42, with D. Brutus as his colleague. On the death of Caesar in B.C. 44 the political life of Plancus may be said to come to an end. After death the eulogy in favour of an amnesty he had instigated into Gaul to take possession of his province as speedily as possible. While here he carried on an active correspondence with Cicero, who pressed him with the greatest eagerness to join the senatorial party, and to cross the Alps to the relief of D. Brutus, who was now besieged by Antony in Mutina. After some hesitation and delay Plancus, at length in the month of April B.C. 43, commenced his march southwards, but he had not crossed the Alps when he received intelligence of the defeat of Antony and the relief of Mutina by Octavian and the consuls Hirtius and Pansa. Thereupon he halted in the territory of the Allobroges, and being joined by D. Brutus and his army, prepared to carry on the war against Antony. But taxes in Asia, and by the support which he gave in B.C. 59 to Julius Caesar, who granted the demands of the equites. The younger Plancius, the subject of this notice, first served in Africa under the proconsul Q. Metellus in Crete, and next in B.C. 62 as military tribune in the army of C. Antonius in Macedonia. In B.C. 58 he was quaestor in the last-mentioned province under the propraetor L. Appuleius, and here he showed great kindness and attention to Cicero, when the latter came to Macedonia during his banishment in the course of this year. Plancius was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 56. In B.C. 55, in the second consulate of Pompey and Crassus, he became a candidate for the curule aedilship with A. Plotius, Q. Pedius, and M. Juventius Laterensis. The elections were put off this year; but in the following year, B.C. 54, Plancius and Plotius were elected, and had consequently to serve as aediles for the remainder of the year. But before they entered upon their office Juventius Laterensis, in conjunction with L. Cassius Longinus, accused Plancius of the crime of sodalitium, or the bribery of the tribunes by means of illegal associations, in accordance with the Lex Licinia, which had been proposed by the consul Licinius Crassus in the preceding year. By this law the accuser had not only the power of choosing the president (quaestor) of the court that was to try the case, but also of selecting four tribes, from which the judges were to be taken, and of which alone the accused had the privilege of rejecting. The praetor C. Allius Flavus was the quaestor selected by Laterensis. Cicero defended Plancius, and obtained his acquittal. He subsequently espoused the Pompeian party in the civil wars, and after Caesar had gained the supremacy lived in exile at Corecy. While he was living there Cicero wrote to him two letters of condolence which have come down to us. (Cic. pro Planc. passim, ad Q. Fr. ii. 1. § 3, ad Att. iii. 14, 22, ad Fam. xiv. 1, ad Q. Fr. iii. 1. § 4, ad Fam. iv. 14, 15, vi. 20, xvi. 2.)

2. Mentioned as curule aedile on the following coin, most of course be different from the preceding Cn. Plancius, since we have seen that he failed in obtaining the curule aedilship. The obverse represents a female head, probably that of Diana, with the legend CN. PLANCIVS AED. CYR. s. c., and the reverse a she-goat, a bow and a quiver. (Eckhol, vol. v. p. 275.)

COIN OF CN. PLANCUS.

PLANCIADES, FULGENTIUS. [FULGENTIUS.]

PLANCIA'NUS, LAETO'RIUS. [LAETORIUS, No. 4.]

PLANC'NA, MUNAT'IA, the wife of Cn. Piso, who was appointed governor of Syria in A.D. 18 [Piso, No. 23], was probably the daughter of L. Munatius Plancus, consul B.C. 42. She possessed all the pride and haughtiness of her husband, and while he used every effort to thwart Germanicus, she exerted herself equally to annoy and insult Agrippina. She was encouraged in this conduct by Livia, the mother of the emperors, who hated Agrippina most cordially. On the return of her husband to Rome in A.D. 20, after the death of Germanicus, whom it was believed that she and Piso had poisoned, she was involved in the same accusation as her husband, but was pardoned by the senate in consequence of the entreaties of the empress-mother. As long as the latter was alive, Plancina was safe, and she was suffered to remain unmolested for a few years even after the death of Livia, which took place in A.D. 29. But being accused in A.D. 33, she no longer possessed any hope of escape, and accordingly put an end to her own life. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43, 55, 75, iii. 9, 15, 17, vii. 26; Dion Cass. ivii. 18, viii. 22.)
PLANCUS.

When shortly afterwards Lepidus joined Antony, and their united forces threatened to overwhelm Plancus, the latter, despairing of any assistance from the senate, was easily persuaded by Asinius Pollio to follow his example, and unite with Antony and Lepidus. He therefore abandoned D. Brutus to his fate, and the latter was shortly afterwards slain in the Alps. Plancus during his government of Gaul founded the colonies of Lugdunum and Raurica (Orelli, Inscrip. No. 590; Dion Cass. xlvi. 50 ; Sen. Ep. 91 ; Strab. iv. pp. 186, 192.)

In the autumn of the same year, B. C. 43, the triumvirate was formed, and Plancus agreed to the proscription of his own brother L. Plautius. [See Plautius.] He returned to Rome at the end of the year, and on the 29th of December he celebrated a triumph for some victory gained in Gaul. In the inscription given below it is said to have been ex Raetia; and the victory was probably only an insignificant advantage gained over some Alpine tribes, in consequence of which he had assumed the title of imperator even before the battle of Mutina, as we see from his correspondence with Cicero (ad Fam. x. 8, 24).

In b. c. 42 Plancus was consul according to the arrangement made by the dictator Caesar, and had as his colleague M. Lepidus in place of D. Brutus. The Perusinian war in the following year, b. c. 41, placed Plancus in great difficulty. He had the command of Antony's troops in Italy; and accordingly when L. Antonius, the brother, and Fulvia, the wife of the triumvir, declared war against Octavian, they naturally expected assistance from Plancus; but as he did not know the views of his superior, he kept aloof from the contest as far as possible. On the fall of Perusia in b. c. 40, he fled with Fulvia to Athens, leaving his army to shift for itself as it best could. He returned to Italy with Antony, and again accompanied him when he went back to the East. Antony then gave him the government of the province of Asia, which he abandoned on the invasion of the Parthians under T. Lamienus, and took refuge in the islands. He subsequently obtained the consulship a second time (Plin. H. N. xiii. 3. 5), but the year is not mentioned: he may have been one of the consuls suffecti in b. c. 36. In b. c. 35 he governed the province of Syria for Antony, and was thought by many to have been the cause of the murder of Sex. Pompeius. On his return to Alexandria he was coolly received by Antony on account of the shameless manner in which he had plundered the province. He remained at Alexandria some time longer, taking part in the orgies of the court, and even condescending on one occasion to play the part of a mime, and represent in a ballet the story of Glauceus. But foreseeing the fall of his patron he resolved to secure himself, and therefore repaired secretly to Rome in b. c. 32, taking with him his nephew Titius. From Plancus Octavian received some equally useful information respecting Antony, especially in relation to his will, which he employed in exasperating the Romans against his rival. Plancus himself, like other renegades, endeavoured to purchase the favour of his new master by vilifying his old one; and on one occasion brought in the senate such abominable charges against Antony, from whom he had received innumerable favours, that Coponius publicly upbraided him with his conduct (Vell. Pat. ii. 53).

Plancus had no occasion to change again, and quietly settled down to enjoy the fortune he had acquired by the plunder of Syria, caring nothing about the state of public affairs, and quite contented to play the courtier in the new monarchy. It was on his proposal that Octavian received the title of Augustus in b. c. 27; and the emperor conferred upon him the censorship in b. c. 22 with Paulus Aemilius Lepidus. He built the temple of Saturn to please the emperor, who expected the wealthy nobles of his court to adorn the city with public buildings. The year in which Plancus died is uncertain.

The character of Plancus, both public and private, is drawn in the blackest colours by Velleius Paterculus, who, however, evidently takes delight in exaggerating his crimes and his vices. But still, after making every deduction from his colouring, the sketch which we have given of the life of Plancus shows that he was a man without any fixed principles, and not only ready to desert his friends when it served his interests, but also to betray their secrets for his own advantage. His private life was equally contemptible: his adulteries were notorious. The ancient writers speak of him as one of the ornaments of the time, but we know nothing of him in that capacity. One of Horace's odes (Carm. i. 7) is addressed to him. In personal appearance he resembled an actor of the name of Rubrius, who was therefore nicknamed Plancus. The various honours which Plancus held are enumerated in the following inscription (Orelli, No. 590) : "L. Munat. L. f. L. n. L. pron. Plancus Cos. Cens. Imp. iter. VII. vir Epul. triumph. ex Raetia aedem Saturni fecit de manubia agros divisit in Italia Beneventi, in Gallia colonies deduxit Lugdunum et Rauricam." Plancus had three brothers and a sister, a son and a daughter. His brothers and son are spoken of below: his sister Munatia married M. Titius (Tritius), his daughter Munatia Plancina married Cn. Piso (Plancina). (Cass. B. G. v. 24, &c., B. C. i. 49; Hirt. B. Aët. 4; Cic. ad Fam. x. 1—24, xi. 9, 11, 13—15, xii. 8, Phil. iii. 15, xiii. 19; Plut. Brut. 19, Anton. 55, 58; Appian, B. C. iii. 46, 74, 81, 97, iv. 12, 37, 45, v. 33, 55, 50, 55, 61, 144; Dion Cass. xlv. 29, 50, 53, xlvii. 16, xviii. 24, i. 3; Vell. Pat. ii. 63, 74, 83; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 2; Suet. Ill. Itelth. 6; Plin. H. N. vii. 10, s. 12; Solin. i. 75.)

There are several coins of Plancus. The following was not struck in b. c. 40, as Eckhel supposes (vol. vi. p. 44), but in b. c. 34 to com-

Plancus, and Plut., and, and De ground. Cicero commended to Plancus with much earnestness the interests of his friend. In the following year, b.c. 43, Plancus was ptoetor, and was allowed by the senate to join his brother Lucius in Transalpine Gaul, where he negotiated on his brother's behalf with Lepidus, and distinguished himself by his activity in the command of the cavalry of his brother's army. His exertions brought on a fever; for this reason, and also because the two consuls had perished, he was sent back to Rome by Lucius. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 10, ad Fam. x. 6. 11, 15, 17, 21.)

5. L. PLAUTIUS PLANCUS, brother of the three preceding, was adopted by a L. Plautius, and therefore took his praenomen as well as nomen, but retained his original cognomen, as was the case with Metellus Scipio [METELLUS, No. 22], and Pupius Piso. [PISO, No. 18.] Before his adoption his praenomen was Caius, and hence he is called by Valerius Maximus C. Plautius Plancus. He was included in the proscription of the triumvirs, b.c. 43, with the consent of his brother Lucius [No. 2]. He concealed himself in the neighbourhood of Salernum; but the perfumes which he used and his refined mode of living betrayed his lurking-place to his pursuers, and to save his slaves, who were being tortured to death because they would not betray him, he voluntarily surrendered himself to his executioners. (Plin. H. N. xiiii. 3. s. 5 ; Val. Max. vi. 8 § 5 ; Appian, B. C. iv. 12 ; Vell. Pat. ii. 67.) The following coin, which bears the legends L. PLAVTIVS PLANCUS, must have been struck by this Plancus, as no other Plautius is mentioned with this cognomen. This coin, representing on the obverse a mask, and on the reverse Aurora leading four horses, refers to a circumstance which happened in the censorship of C. Plautius Venoix, who filled this office with Ap. Claudius Caecus in b.c. 312. It is related that the tribunes having quarrelled with the censor Ap. Claudius left Rome and went to Tibur; but as the people felt the loss of them, the other censor, Plautius, had them placed in wagons one night when they were drunk, and conveyed to Rome, where they arrived early next morning; and, that they might not be recognised by the magistrates, he caused their faces to be covered with masks. The tale is related at length by Ovid (Fast. vi. 651), and the following lines in particular throw light upon the subject of the coin:

"Jumque per Esquilias Romanam intraverat urbem, Et manе in medio plaustra fuere foro."

PLANUDES.

PLAUTUS, ut possent specie numeroque senatum Fallere, personis imperat ora tegi."

(Comp. Eckhel, vol. v. p. 276, &c.)

6. L. Munatus Planus, son of No. 2, was consul A. D. 13 with C. Silius. In the following year he was sent by the senate after the death of Augustus to the mutinous legions of Germanicus in the territory of the Ubii, and there narrowly escaped death at the hands of the soldiers (Dion Cass. lvi. 28; Suet. Aug. 101; Tac. Ann. i. 59.)

PLANTA, POMPEIUS, prefect of Egypt in the reign of Trajan. (Plin. Ep. x. 7 or 5)

PLANUDES (Πλανοῦδες), surnamed Maxi-

mus, was one of the most distinguished Constantinopolitan monks of the last age of the Greek empire, and was greatly distinguished as a theologian, grammarian, and rhetorician; but his name is now chiefly interesting as that of the compiler of the latest of those collections of minor Greek poems, which were known by the names of Gar-lands or Anthologies (Στέφανοι, Ἀνθολογίαι). Plan-

udes flourished at Constantinople in the first half of the fourteenth century, under the emperors Andronicus II. and III. Palaeologoi. In A. D. 1327 he was sent by Andronicus II. as ambassador to Venice. Nothing more is known of his life with any certainty, except that he was somewhat disposed to the tenets of the Roman Church, which, however, a short imprisonment seems to have induced him to renounce. (See Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. xi. p. 682, and the authorities quoted in Harles's note.) His works, of which several only exist in MS., are not of sufficient importance to be enumerated individually. They consist of celebrations and homilies; translations from Latin into Greek of Cicero's Sorninium Scipionis, Cesaer de Bello Gallico, Ovid's Metamorphoses, Cato's Dis-

tica Moralia, Boeclthius de Consolatione, St. Augustin de Trinitate and de Civitate Dei, and Dona-thus's Grammatica Parva; two grammatical works; a collection of Aesop's Fables, with a worthless Life of Aesop; some arithmetical works, especially Scholias, of no great value, on the first two books of the Arithmetie of Diophantus; a few works on natural history; Commentaries on the Rhetoric of Hermogenes, and on other Greek writers; a poem in forty-seven hexameters, on Claudius Pтолeameus, and a few other poems; and his Anthology. (See Fabric. l. c. pp. 662—693, vol. i. p. 641, vol. vi. p. 348; Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliographicum Script. Graec. s. v.) As the Anthology of Planudes was not only the latest compiled, but was also that which was recognised as the Greek Anthology, until the discovery of the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, this is chosen as the fittest place for an account of the LITERARY HISTORY OF THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY.

1. Materials. The various collections, to which their compilers gave the name of Garlands and Anthologies, were made up of short poems, chiefly of an epigrammatic character, and in the elegiac metre. The earliest examples of such poetry were, doubtless, furnished by the inscriptions on monuments, such as those erected to commemorate heroic deeds, the statues of distinguished men, especially victors in the public games, sepulchral monuments, and dedicatory offerings in temples (ἀναθήματα); to which may be added odes and proverbial sayings. At an early period in the history of Greek literature, poets of the highest fame cultivated this species of composition, which received its most perfect development from the hand of Simonides. Thenceforth, as a set form of poetry, it became a fit vehicle for the brief expression of thoughts and sentiments on any subject; until at last the form came to be cultivated for its own sake, and the literal of Alexandria and Byzantium deemed the ability to make epigrams an essential part of the character of a scholar. Hence the mere trifling, the stupid jokes, and the wretched personalities, which form so large a part of the epigrammatic poetry contained in the Greek Anthology.

The monumental inscriptions, to which reference has already been made, are often quoted by the ancient writers as historical authorities, as, for example, by Herodotus and Thucydides; and by later writers, such as Diodorus and Plutarch, partly as authorities, partly to embellish their works. This use of inscriptions would naturally suggest the idea of collecting them. The earliest known collection was made by the geographer Polemon (b.c. 200), in a work περὶ τῶν κατὰ πόλεις ἐπηγραμμένων (Ath. x. p. 436, d, p. 412, e.). He also wrote other works, on votive offerings, which are likely to have contained the epigrammatic inscriptions on them. [POLEMON.]

Similar collections were made by Aelatus, περὶ τῶν ἐν Δελφοῖς ἀναθημάτων (Ath. xiii. p. 591, c.), by Menestor, ἐν τῇ περὶ ἀναθημάτων (Ath. xiii. p. 594, d.), and perhaps by Apellas Ponticus. These persons collected chiefly the inscriptions on offerings (ἀναθήματα): epigrams of other kinds were also collected, as the Theban Epigrams, by Aristodemus (Suid. in Apoll. Rhod. ii. 906), the Attic by Philochorus (Suid. s. v., the reading is, however, somewhat doubtful), and others by Neoptolemus Paros (Ath. x. p. 454, f.), and Eux- hemerus (Laquant. Insit. Div. i. 9; Cie. de Nat. Deor. i. 42).

2. The Garland of Meleager. The above compilers chiefly collected epigrams of particular classes, and with reference to their use as historical authorities. The first person who made such a collection solely for its own sake, and to preserve epigrams of all kinds, was MELEAGER, a cynical philosopher of Gadara, in Palestine, about b. c. 60. His collection contained epigrams by no less than forty-six poets, of all ages of Greek poetry, up to the most ancient lyric period. He entitled it The Garland (Στέφανος), with reference, of course, to the common comparison of small beautiful poems to flowers; and in the introduction to his work, he attaches the names of various flowers, shrubs, and herbs, as emblems, to the names of the several poets. The same idea is kept up in the word Anthology (Ἀνθολογία), which was adopted by the next compiler as the title of his work. The Garland of Meleager was arranged in alphabetical order, according to the initial letters of the first line of each epigram.

3. The Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica.—In the time of Trajan, as it seems, PHILIP OF THESSALONICA compiled his Anthology (Ἀνθολογία), avowedly in imitation of the Garland of Meleager, and chiefly with the view of adding to that collection the epigrams of more recent writers. The arrangement of the work was the same as that of Meleager. It was also entitled στέφανος, as well as Ἀνθολογία. Another title by which it is quoted is συλλογὴ νέων ἐπηγραμμένων.
The MS. was transferred to Paris, upon the peace of Tolentino, in 1797; and, after the peace of 1815, it was restored to its old home at Heidelberg, where it now lies in the University library.

In this respect, as well as in the number of books, the actual arrangement is the same as that of the index given above; but the titles of the books are not the same throughout, as will be seen by the following table, which represents the contents of the fifteen books of the Palantine Anthology, and the number of epigrams in each of them, and the pages of the MS., as printed in Jacob's edition:

Jacobs supposes that the chapter containing the μούσα παιδική of Stratton was the last in the Anthology of Cephalas, and that the remaining parts were added by copyists, excepting perhaps the section which contains the epigrams in various metres. His reason is, that these latter portions of the work are without prefaces.

Of the compiler, Constantine, and his labours, the only mention made is in the MS. itself. In one passage (p. 81) a marginal scholion states that Constantine arranged the Garland of Meleager, dividing it into different chapters; namely, amatory, dedicatory, monumental, and epideictic. The work itself, however, shows that this is not all that Constantine did, and that the mention of Meleager and of the titles of each section are only given by way of example. There are also prefaces to each book or section, in which the copyist quotes Constantine (sometimes by name, sometimes not) as explaining the character and design of the work (pp. 141, 207, bis. 358, 489, 507, 517). In one of these passages he is called δ ἁμαιρός καὶ δειμωτός καὶ τρισθόρος ἀνθρώπων. There are also three passages, in which an unknown person of the name of Gregory is mentioned (if the meaning is rightly interpreted) as having copied inscriptions which Cephalas received from him and included in his work (pp. 254, 255). Another mention of Gregory furnishes an indication of the age of Cephalas. It is this:—p. 273, τοῦτο τ' Ἐπιγραμμα ὁ Κεφάλας προεδρεύεται ἐν τῇ σχολῇ τῆς Νέας Εκκλησίας ἐπὶ τῶν μακρύρων τριγυρίων τῶν Μαγιστρῶν. Now, this New Church was built by the emperor Basilius I. Macedo, who reigned from 867 to 886 A.D. It could not, therefore, have been till towards the end of the 9th century that Cephalas frequented this school. Now, at the beginning of the 10th century, literature suddenly revived under Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, who devoted especial attention to the making of abridgements and extracts and compilations from the ancient authors. This, therefore, seems the most probable time, to which the Anthology of Cephalas can be referred. The conjecture of Reiske, that Cephalas was the same person as his contemporary Constantinus Rhodius, has really no evidence for or against it, when we remember how common the name of Constantine was at this period.

The Anthology of Cephalas seems to have been compiled from the old Anthologies, as a basis, with the addition of other epigrams. He appears to have extracted in turn from Meleager, Philip, Agathias, &c., those epigrams which suited his purpose, and his work often exhibits traces of the alphabetical order of the Garland of Meleager. With respect to arrangement, he seems to have taken the Κώλος of Agathias as a foundation, for both works are alike in the division of their subjects, and in the titles prefixed to the epigrams. The order of the books, however, is different, and one book of Agathias, namely, the descriptions of works of art, is altogether omitted by Constantine. It is also to be observed that the Palantine Anthology contains ancient epigrams, which had not appeared in any of the preceding Anthologies, but had been preserved in some other way. For example, Diogenes Laërtius, as above mentioned, composed a book full of epigrams, and the same thing is supposed of Palladas and Lucilius. These writers were later than Philip, but yet not too old to be included among the "recent poets" of Agathias. Their epigrams are generally found together in the Vatican Codex.

There remains to be mentioned an interesting point in the history of the Vatican Codex. We learn from the Codex itself (pp. 273, 274) that a certain Michael Maximus had made a copy of the book of Cephalas, and that this copy was followed in some parts by the transcriber of the Vatican Codex.

All other important details respecting the Vatican Codex, with a careful estimate of its merits, and a proof of its great excellence, will be found in Jacobs's Prolegomena, and in the preface to his edition of the Palantine Anthology.

7. The Anthology of PLANUSES is arranged in seven books, each of which, except the fifth and seventh, is divided into chapters according to subjects, and these chapters are arranged in alphabetical order. The chapters of the first book, for example, run thus:—1. Εἰς Ἀγαθίας. 2. Εἰς Ἐμελεόν, 3. Εἰς Ἀναθημάτα, and so on to 91. Εἰς Ὀρύς. The contents of the books are as follows:—

This species of poetry, in 91 chapters. The first printed edition was published about 150 years after the compilation of the work by Planudes, under the following title:—Anthologia diafroów Epigrammatów, ἄνθρωπων συγγενέων σοφῶν, ἐπὶ διαφόρων ἐπιθέμεν, ἐφιμαύη ἐξήνων ἐπιθέμεν καὶ πραγμάτων ἤ γενομένων, ἤ ὥς γενομένων ἐκφύσης. Διήμερον δε εἰς ἑπτά τριμήνα τοῦ βιβλίου καὶ τούτων εἰς κεφαλαία κατὰ στοιχείων διείσδυσαν, νῦν ἑπεξεργάζει ὁ ἂντιδίδος τοῦ πρῶτου ἡμῶν. Αὐτός ἡμών:—then follow the epigrams: it was edited by Janus Lascaris, and printed at Florence, 1494, 4to.; it is printed in capital letters. This Edictum Princps is by far the best of the early editions; the errors of the press are much fewer than in the Aldine and Wechelian editions; and the text is a faithful representation of the MS. from which it is printed. At the end of the work is a Greek poem by Lascaris, and a Latin letter by him to Pietro di Medicis, occupying seven pages, which are wanting in several of the still existing copies of this rare work: these seven pages were reprinted by Maittaire, in his Anal. Typ. vol. I., pp. 272—283.

2. The first and best of the Aldine editions was printed at Venice, 1503, 8vo., under the title: Florilegium diversorum Epigrammatum in Seuim Libros—'Anthologia diafroów Epigrammatów, and so on, nearly as in the title of Lascaris. The text is a reprint of the edition of Lascaris, but less accurate. It contains nineteen additional epigrams; but its great value consists in an appendix of various readings from MS. codices. Reprints of this edition in 1517 and 1519 are mentioned by some bibliographers, but it is very probable that the dates are erroneously given, and that the edition of 1503 is the one meant to be described.

3. The next edition was the Junite, 1519, under the title: Florilegium diversorum Epigrammatum, &c., as in the Aldine: and at the end, Impressum Florentiae per heredes Philippi Junite Florentinis. Anno a Virgini medio die diea supra millenium. It is a mere reprint of the Aldine, with some differences of arrangement, and with more misprints.

4. Two years later, Aldus himself published a second edition: Florilegium, &c. Soderti super repurgatam curat. MDXXI. 8vo. The title-page goes on to state that the errors of the former edition were corrected in this: but the fact is that this is a still more inaccurate reprint of the former edition, with a few variations, especially the reception into the text of some very bad various readings from the Appendix to the first edition.

5. The edition of Badius or the Ascension, Paris, 1531, 8vo., is an inaccurate reprint of the second Aldine. It is very scarce.

6. A few years later, the first attempt at a commentary on the Anthology was made by Vincentius Opsequensis, in his work entitled: In Graecorum Epigrammatum Libros quatuor Annotationes longe doctissimae quam primum in lucem editae. Vincenio Opsequo Auctore. Cum Indice. Basil. 1549, 4to. Its value is very small.

1550. 8vo. It is extremely rare: Jacobs even states in his Prolegomena that he had not seen it: Brunck, however, used a copy of it.

9. About the same time the third Aldine edition was printed by the sons of Aldus, Venet. 1550—1551, 8vo. It is the fullest, and the most sought after of the Aldine editions, but not the best. Though some of the errors of the second Aldine edition are corrected, those of the first are generally retained, and a new source of the worst sort of errors is supplied by numerous conjectural emendations. The additions are very trifling. Stephanus calls the edition rich in nothing but faults, of which, he says, there are many thousands.

10. The next and the best known of the old editions is that of H. Stephanus, 1566: 'Αριστολογια διαφωνων επιγραμμιων πωλαιων εις έκτα Βιβλια διηρημενα. Florilegium diversorum epigrammatum veterum, in septem libros divisum, magno epigrammatum numero et dudum indicibus auctum. Anno M.D.LXVI. Excudebat Henricus Stephanus, 4to. The distich which Stephanus inscribed on his title-page,

"Pristinus a mendis fuerat lepor ante fugatus:

Nune profugae mendae, nunc lepor ille reddit," gives a higher estimate of the value of his labours than modern critics have been able to assign to them. Its excellencies consist in the addition of a large number of epigrams, not contained in any of the former editions, of the Scholia of Maximus Planudes, and of a commentary by Stephanus himself. Its chief faults are the arbitrary alterations in the arrangement of the epigrams, many rash conjectural emendations of the text, and the imperfections of the notes, which, though confessed by Stephanus himself to be brief, contain, on the other hand, much irrelevant matter. This work stands at the head of what may be called the third family of editions of the Anthology; the first comprising that of Lascaris, the first Aldine, and the Juntine; and the second, the second Aldine and the Ascension.

11. The Wechelian edition (Francofurti apud Claudium Marriam et Jo. Aubriam, 1600, fol.) is, in the text, a mere reprint of that of Stephanus, with few of its errors corrected, and many new ones introduced. It is, however, of considerable value, as it contains, besides some new Scholia, and the notes of Opasoepus and Stephanus, the whole of the excellent commentary of Brodaeus. In spite of its faults, it remained for nearly two centuries, until the publication of Brunck's Analecta, the standard edition of the Greek Anthology.

12. The Compiègne edition, 1604, 4to. (reprinted at Cologne, 1614), only deserves mention on account of the literal Latin version, by Eilhard Lubinus.

13. The last and most perfect of the editions of the Planudean Anthology is that which was commenced by Hieronymus de Bosch, and finished, after his death, by Jacobus Van Lennen, in 5 vols. 4to. Ultraj. 1795, 1797, 1798, 1810, 1822. This splendid edition (at least as to its outward form) is not only useful for those who wish to read the Greek Anthology in the form in which it was compiled by Planudes, but it is valuable on account of the large mass of illustrative matter which it contains, including the notes of Huec, Sylburg, and other scholars; but above all for the metrical Latin versions of Hugo Grotius, which are esteemed by far the best of his productions in that department of scholarship, and which have never been printed except in this edition. The Greek text, however, is only a reprint of the Wechelian edition, with many of its worst errors uncorrected.

It is now necessary to go back to the period when the discovery of the Palantine Codex placed the Greek Anthology in an entirely new light.

b. Editions of the Palantine Anthology.

It is a curious fact that, for more than two hundred years from the discovery of the Palatine Anthology by Salmius, every project for publishing a complete edition of it was left unfinished, and this important service to literature was only performed about thirty years ago, by the late Frederick Jacobs.

1. Salmius, as might naturally be expected from the discovery of such a treasure, continued to devote the utmost attention to the Anthology, so that, his biographer tells us, he scarcely spent a day without reading and making notes upon it. By other avocations, however, and by quarrels with the Leyden printers, who refused to publish the Greek text without a Latin version, and with Valesius, who would not assist in the labour except on the condition of having his own name prefixed to the work, Salmius was prevented from completing his intended edition. He left behind him, however, a large mass of notes and of unedited epigrams, which were only discovered by Brunck in the year 1777, after he had published his Analecta. We believe they have never been published; but they were used by Jacobs in his Notes.

2. After the repeated delay of the promised edition of Salmius, Lucas Langermannus undertook, at the instance of Isaac Vossius, a journey to Rome, for the purpose of making a new collation of the Vatican MS., with the Planudean Anthology; and Fabricius states (Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 440) that he saw at Hamburg the copy of the Anthology which contained the MS., notes of Langermannus. The whole scheme, however, which seems to have been formed by Vossius in a spirit of rivalry to Salmius, was abandoned on the death of the latter in 1653.

3. Meanwhile several MS. Copies of the Vatican Codex were made, all of which were founded on the collations of Salmius, Sylburg, and Langermann, and all of which were superseded by the transcript made by the Abbate Joseph Spalletti, in 1776. This precious MS., the excellence of which is so great that it almost deserves to be called a facsimile rather than a copy, was purchased from the heirs of Spalletti by Ernst II. Duke of Gotha and Altenburg, for the library at Gotha, and formed the basis of Jacob's edition of the Palatine Anthology. Referring the reader to the Prolegomena of Jacobs for an account of the labours of D'Orville, Jensius, Leich, Reiske, Klotz, and Schneider, we proceed to mention those works which have superseded all former ones.

c. The Editions of Brunck and Jacobs.

1. In the years 1772—1776, appeared the Analecta Veterum Poetarum Graecorum. Editores Rer. Fr. Ph. Brunck. Argentorati, 3 vols. 8vo., which contains the whole of the Greek Anthology, besides some poems which are not properly included under that title. The epigrams of the Anthology were edited by Brunck, from a careful comparison of the Planudean Anthology with various copies of the Vatican Codex; and they now appeared for the first time revised by a scholar competent to the task. Brunk also adopted a new arrangement, which certainly has its defects, but yet is invaluable for the student of the history of Greek literature; discarding altogether the books and chapters of the old Planudean Anthology, he placed together all the epigrams of each poet, and arranged the poets themselves in chronological order, placing those epigrams, the authors of which were unknown, under the separate head of dηδοτορα. Important as Brunk's edition was when it was published, it is now unnecessary to give any further account of it, as it has been entirely superseded by the edition of Jacobs, who gives, in his Prolegomena, an elaborate criticism on the labours of his predecessor, and of the few contributions which were made by other scholars to the emendation or explanation of the Anthology between the publication of Brunk's edition and of his own. The Lectiones of Brunk are an indispen-sable supplement to the Analecta.

2. The original plan of Jacobs was only to form a complete commentary on Brunk's Analecta, but the carefulness of copies of that work induced him to reprint it, omitting those parts which do not properly belong to the Greek Anthology, and carefully re-editing the whole. The result of his labours was a work which ranks most deservedly as the standard edition of the Greek Anthology. It is in 13 vols. 8vo, namely, 4 vols. of the Text, one of Indices, and three of Commentaries, divided into eight parts. The titles and contents are as follows:—Vol. I.—4. Anthologia Graeca, sine Poetarum Graecorum Lusis. Ex Recensione Brunckii. Indices et Commentarium adjicit F. 3. In editing his Anthologia Graeca, Jacobs had the full benefit of the Palatine Anthology. Not content with the almost perfect copy of Spalletti (the Apographum Gothaeum,), he availed himself of the services of Uhden, then Prussian ambassador at Rome, who collated the copy once more with the original codex in the Vatican. The important results are to be found in Jacobs's emendations of Brunk's text, in his corrections of many of Brunk's errors in the assignment of epigrams to wrong authors, and in his Appendix of 213 epigrams from the Vatican MS, which are wanting in the Analecta. In the mean time he formed the design of rendering to scholarship the great service of printing an exact and complete edition of this celebrated Codex. In the preface to his Anthologia Palatina, he gives a most interesting account of his labours, and of the principles on which he proceeded. It is enough here to state that he followed the rule (always a good one, but absolutely essential where there is only one MS.), to represent exactly the reading of the MS, even if it gave no sense, unless the necessary correction are not clear beyond all doubt, placing all doubtful and conjectural emendations in the margin. After the printing of the text was completed, the unlooked-for restoration of the MS, to the University Library at Heidelberg afforded an opportunity for a new collation, which was made by A. J. Paulsen, who has given the results of it in an Appendix to the third volume of Jacobs's Anthologia Palatina. This work may therefore be considered an all but perfect copy of the Palatine Codex, and is therefore invaluable for the critical study of the Anthology. The following is its title:—Anthologia Graecae, ad Fiden Codicis Palatini, nunc Parisini, ex Apographio Gothaeo edita. Curavit, Epigrammata in Codice Palatino desiderata et Annotationem Criticali adjicit, F. Jacobs. Lips. 1813—1817, 8vo.; in 5 vols. of which the first two contain the text of the Palatine Anthology, with an Appendix of Epigrams which are not found in it, including the whole of the fourth and parts of the other books of the Planudean Anthology;

d. The Anthology since the Works of Jacobs.

Immense as were Jacobs's services for the Greek Anthology, much has still been left for his successors to accomplish, in the further correction of the text, the investigation of the sources and forms of the earlier Anthologies, the more accurate assignment of many epigrams to their right authors, and the collection of additional epigrams, especially from recently-discovered inscriptions. The great scholars of the day, such as Hermann, Welcker, Meineke, and others, have not neglected this duty. The most important contributions are the following:—Welcker, Sylloge Epigrammatum Graecorum, et Marmoribus el Libris collectorum, et illustratorum, studio F. T. Welckeri, Bonn, 1828, 8vo, with G. Hermann's review in the Ephem. Lit. Lips. 1829, Nos. 145—151, and Welcker's reply, Abweisung der verwirrenden Conjecturen des Herrn Prof. Hermann, Bonn, 1829, 8vo.; Cramer, Anecdota, vol. iv, pp. 366—388, Oxon. 1838, with Meineke's Epin. XIII. to his Analecta Alexandrina, Berol. 1843, de Anthologiae Graecae Supplemento nuper edito: Meineke, Delectus Poëtorum Anthologiae Graecae, cum Additioatis Critica. Accedit Conjectuæ Critica de Anthologiae Graecae Locis controversis, Berol. 1843, 8vo. (comp. Zeit. für Alterthumskunde, 1845, No. 51): A. Hecker, Comment. Crit. de Anth. Graec. Lugd. Bat. 1843: R. Unger, Beitriige zur Kritik der Griechischen Anthologie, Neubrandenburg, 1844, 4to; besides several other monographs; and an extremely important article by G. Weigand, de Pousilus atque Ordine Anthologiae Cephalanicae, in the Rheinisches Museum, vol. iii pp. 161, seq. 541, seq. 1846, with an appendix in vol. v. pp. 276, seq. 1847. There is also an article in the Recue de Philologie for 1847, vol. ii. No. 4. pp. 305—333, entitled Observations sur l'Anthologie Grecque, par M. le docteur N. Piccolos. Lastly, a passage in the preface to Meineke's Delectus intimates that he has contemplated an entirely new edition of the Anthology, a work for which he is perhaps better qualified than any other living scholar.

Of the innumerable christomathies and delectuses, the most useful for students is that of Jacobs, in the Bibliotheca Graecae, Delectus Epigrammatum Graec. quem novo ordine concinnatus et comment. in usu scholar. instruxit F. Jacobs, Gothae, 1826, 8vo.

PLATAEA (Παθρα), a daughter of Asopus, who had a sanctuary at Plataea (Paus. ix. 1, § 2, § 5), which according to some derived its name from her, but according to others from the Παθρα των καυσων. (Strab. ix. p. 406; comp. p. 400, &c.)

PLATO (Παθρα), one of the chief Athenian comic poets of the Old Comedy, was contemporary with Aristophanes, Phrynichus, Eupolis, and Pherecrates. (Suid. s. v.) He is erroneously placed by Eusebius (Chron.) and Syncellus (p. 247, d.) as contemporary with Cratinus, at Ol. 81, 3, n. c. 454; whereas, his first exhibition was in Ol. 88, n. c. 427, as we learn from Cyril (ad. v. Julian, i. p. 13, b.), whose testimony is confirmed by the above statement of Suidas, and by the fact that the comedies of Plato evidently partook somewhat of the character of the Middle Comedy, to which, in fact, some of the grammarians assign him. He is mentioned by Marcellinus (Vit. Thuc. p. xi. Bekker) as contemporary with Thucydides, who died in Ol. 97, 2, n. c. 391; but Plato must have lived a few years longer, as Platach quotes him from a passage which evidently refers to the appointment of the demagogue Agyrrius as general of the army of Lesbose in Ol. 97. 3. (Plut. de Repub. gerend. p. 301, b.) The period, therefore, during which Plato flourished was from n. c. 423 to at least n. c. 389.

Of the personal history of Plato nothing more is known, except that Suidas tells a story of his being so poor that he was obliged to write comedies for other persons (s. v. Αρκάδας μαμάγενος). Suidas founds this statement on a passage of the Paroicander of Plato, in which the poet alludes to his labouring for others: but the story of his poverty is plainly nothing more than an arbitrary conjecture, made to explain the passage, the true meaning of which, no doubt, is that Plato, like Aristophanes, exhibited some of his plays in the names of other persons, but was naturally anxious to claim the merit of them for himself when they had succeeded, and that he did so in the Parabasis of the Paroicander, as Aristophanes does in the Parabasis of the Clouds. (See the full discussion of this subject under PHILONIDES.) The form in which the article Αρκάδας μαμάγενος is given by Arsenius (Violet, ed. Walz. p. 76), completely confirms this interpretation.

Plato ranked among the very best poets of the Old Comedy. From the expressions of the grammarians, and from the large number of fragments which are preserved, it is evident that his plays were only second in popularity to those of Aristophanes. Suidas, and other grammarians rank him as Αρκάδας των χαρακτήρων. Purity of language, refined sharpness of wit, and a combination of the vigour of the Old Comedy with the greater elegance of the Middle and the New, were his chief characteristics. Though many of his plays had no political reference at all, yet it is evident that he kept up to the spirit of the Old Comedy in his attacks on the corruptions and
The spirit of Plato is expressed in his works in a manner the more lively and personal in proportion to the intimacy with which art and science are blended in them. And yet of the history of his life and education we have only very unsatisfactory accounts. He mentions his own name only twice (Phaedon, p. 59, b, Apology, p. 58, b), and then it is for the purpose of indicating the close relation in which he stood to Socrates; and, in passing, he speaks of his brothers, Ademantus and Glaucon, as sons of Ariston (de Rep. i. p. 327, comp. Xenoph. Mem. iii. 6; Diog. Laërt. iii. 4).*

The writer of the dialogues retires completely behind Socrates, who conducts the investigations in them. Moreover Plato’s friends and disciples, as Speusippus in his eulogium (Diog. Laërt. iii. 2, with the note of Menage; Plut. Quaest. Synop. viii. 2, &c.), appear to have communicated only some few biographical particulars respecting their great teacher; and Alexandrian scholars seem to have filled up these deficiencies, but it is certainly beyond the limits of reason, and is not very trustworthy. Even Aristozenes, the disciple of Aristotle, must have proceeded in a very careless manner in his notices respecting Plato, when he made him take part in the battles at Tanagra, b. c. 426, and Delium, b. c. 424. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 8; comp. Aelian, V. II. ii. 30.)

Plato is said to have been the son of Ariston and Perictione or Potone, and to have been born at Athens on the 7th day of the month Thargelion (21st May), Ol. 87. 2, b. c. 430; or, according to the statement of Apollodorus, which we find confirmed in various ways, in Ol. 68. 1, b. c. 428, that is, in the (Olympic) year in which Pericles died; according to others, he was born in the neighbouring island of Aegina. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 1, 3; comp. v. 9, iii. 2, 3; Corsini, Fast. Attici, iii. 230; Clinton, Pasti Hell. sub anno 429, &c.) His paternal family boasted of being descended from Codrus; his maternal ancestors of a relationship with Solon (Diog. Laërt. iii. 3.). Plato mentions the relationship of Critias, his maternal uncle, with Solon. (Charon, p. 155, 159. Comp. Tum. 29.) Originally, we are told, he was named after his grandfather Aristocles, but in consequence of the fluency of his speech, or, as others have it, the breadth of his chest, he acquired that name under which alone we know him. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4; Vita Platonis, p. 6, b; Tychsen, Bibliothek der alten Literatur und Kunst, v.) According to one story, of which Speusippus (see above) had already made mention, he was the son of Apollo; another related that bees settled upon the lips of the sleeping child. (Cic. de Divin. i. 36.) He is also said to have contended, when a youth, in the Isthmian and other games, as well as to have made attempts in epic, lyric, and dithyrambic poetry, and not to have devoted himself to philosophy till later, probably after Socrates had drawn him within the magic circle of his influence. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4, 5, Aelian, V. II. ii. 30; Plut. Epicur. vii.) His love for Polygymnias had brightened into love for the muse Urania (Plat. Symp. 187). Plato was instructed in grammar, music, and gymnastics by the most distinguished teachers of that time. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 4; comp. Hermann, Geschichten und System des Platonischen Systems, p. 98, note 48, p. 99, note 49.) At an early age (ἐκ νεότου) he had become acquainted, through Cratylius, with the doctrines of Heracleitus (Arist. Metaph. i. 6; comp. Appuleius, de Doct. Plat. p. 47, Elm.); through other instructors, or by means of writings, with the philosophical dogmas of the Eleatics and of Anaxagoras. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Vita Anon. ap. Tychsen, p. 13); and what is related in the Phaedo and Parmenides of the philosophical studies of the young Socrates, may in part be referable to Plato. In his 20th year he is said to have betaken himself to Socrates, and from that time onwards to have devoted himself to philosophy. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 6; Suidas s. v. makes this into an intercourse of twenty years' duration with Socrates.) The intimacy of this relation is attested, better than by hearsay accounts and insufficient testimonies (Diog. Laërt. iii. 5; Pans. i. 30 § 3, &c.; Xen. Mem. iii. 6 § 1), by the enthusiastic love with which Plato not only exhibits Socrates as he lived and died—in the Banquet and the Phaedo,—but also glorifies him by making him the leader of the investigations in the greater part of his dialogues; not as though he had thought himself secure of the assent of Socrates to all the conclusions and developments which he had himself drawn from the few though pregnant principles of his teacher, but in order to express his conviction that he had organically developed the results involved in them. Socrates, therefore, is usually regarded as therefore probable enough that, as Plutarch relates (Marius, 46; comp. Lactant. Div. Inst. iii. 19, § 17), at the close of his life he praised that dispensation which had made him a contemporary of Socrates. After the death of the latter he betook himself, with others of the Socratists, as Hermogenes had related, in order to avoid threatened persecutions (Diog. Laërt. ii. 106, iii. 6), to Eucleides at Megara, who of all his contemporaries had the nearest mental affinity with him. That Plato during his residence in Megara composed several of his dialogues, especially those of a dialectical character, is probable enough, though there is no direct evidence on the subject (Arist. von Leben und den Schriften des Plato, p. 51; Van Hesius, Init. Plat. doct. i. p. 72; Hermann, ibid. pp. 46, 490). The communication of the Socratic conversation recorded in the Theaetetus is referred to Eucleides, and the controversial examination, contained in the Sophistes (p. 246) and apparently directed against Eucleides and his school, of the tenets of the friends of certain incorporeal forms (ideas) cognisable by the intellect, testifies esteem for him. Friendship for the mathematician Theodorus (though this indeed does not manifest itself in the way in which the latter is introduced in the Theaetetus) is said to have led Plato next to Cyrene (Diog. Laërt. iii. 6; Appul. l. c.). Through his eagerness for knowledge he is said to have been induced to visit Egypt, Sicily, and the Greek cities in Lower Italy (Cic. de Rep. l. 10, de Fis. p. 29; Val. Max. viii. 7, § 3; Vita Anon. l. c.). Others, in inverted order, make him travel first to Sicily and then to Egypt (Quintil. i. 12, § 15; Diog. Laërt. iii. 6), or from Sicily to Cyrene and Egypt, and then again to Sicily (Appuleius, l. c. p. 47; comp. Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 366). As his companion we find mentioned Eudoxus (Strab. xvii. 29, in opposition to Diog. Laërt. viii. 87), or Simmias (Plut. de Deaen. Scorr. 7), or even Euphides, who died Ol. 83. 2 (Diog. Laërt. iii. 6). More distant journeys of Plato into the interior of Asia, to the Hebrews, Babylonians, and Assyrians, to the Magi and Persians, are mentioned only by writers, who, with no reliance can be placed (Clem. Alex. ad. Gent. p. 49; Vit. Max. l. i. 14; comp. Diog. Laërt. iii. 7; Lactant. Instit. ix. 21; comp. Cic. Tusq. Disp. iv. 19). Even the fruits of his better authenticated journeys cannot be traced in the works of Plato with any definiteness. He may have enlarged his mathematical and astronomical knowledge, have received some impulses and incitements through personal intercourse with Archytas and other celebrated Pythagoreans of his age (Clem. Alex. Cic. Val. Max. &c. l. cc.), have made himself acquainted with Egyptian modes of life and Egyptian wisdom (Plat. de Leg. ii. p. 656, vii. pp. 779, 819, Phaedo, p. 274, Philol. p. 18, Tim. 21; comp. Epipom. p. 886); but on the fundamental assumptions of his system, and its development and exposition, these journeys can hardly have exercised any important influence; of any effect produced upon it by the pretended Egyptian wisdom, as is assumed by Plessing (Meman. p. 383, &c. 584, &c.; Verfassung der Philosophie der alten Aegypten, ii. 2, p. 879, &c.) and others, no traces are to be found (comp. Hermann, l. c. i. 55, &c.). That Plato during his residence in Sicily, through the intervention of Dion, became acquainted with the elder Dionysius, but very soon fell out with the tyrant, is asserted by credible witnesses (especially by Hegesander ap. Athen. xi. 116, p. 507, b; Diod. xv. 7; Plut. Dion. 4, 5; Diog. Laërt. iii. 18, 19. The Platonic epistles vii. pp. 324, 326, 327, mentions only the acquaintance with Dion, not that with the elder Dionysius). More doubt attaches to the story, according to which he was given up by the tyrant to the Spartan ambassador Pollius, by him sold into Aegina, and set at liberty by the Cyrenian Amniciris. This story is told in very different forms. On the other hand, we find the statement that Plato came to Sicily when about forty years old, so that he would have returned to Athens at the close of the 97th Olympiad (n. c. 389 or 383), about twelve years after the death of Socrates; and perhaps for that reason Ol. 97, 4, was set down by the chroniclers whom Eusebius follows as the period when he flourished. After his return he began to teach, partly in the gymnasium of the Academy and its shady avenues, near the city, between the exterior Ceramicus and the hill Colonus Hippius, partly in his garden, which was situated at Colonus (Timon ap. Diog. Laërt. iii. 7, comp. 5; Plut. de Exilio, c. 10, &c.). Respecting the acquisition of this garden again, and the circumstances of Plato as regards property generally, we can only conjecture (Plat. Diog. Laërt. Alc. ii. ll. c. 17, comp. Hermann, l. c. p. 77, &c.). Plato taught gumentiously (Diog. Laërt. iv. 2; Olympiod. et Anon.), and agreeably to his maxims (Plat. p.

mined first piod. (Protag. 69, x. 14, comp. Aelian. V. H. ii. 18, iii. 35; Diog. Laërt. ii. 6), and it was probably to them alone that the inscription said to have been set up over the vestibule of the house, "let no one enter who is unacquainted with geometry." had reference (Tzetzes, Chol. viii. 972). For another was connected with Syracusan, Xenocrates of Chaledon, Aristotle, Heracleides Ponticus, Hes- tias of Perusinum, Philipps the Opuntian, and others, men from the most different parts of Greece. To the wider circle of those who, without attaching themselves to the more narrow community of the school, sought instruction and incitement from him, distinguished men of the age, such as Chabrias, Iphicrates (Aristid. p. 325), Timotheus (Athen. x. 14, comp. Aelian. V. H. ii. 18. § 10; Plut. de Sanit. tuenda, p. 127, 6), Phocion, Hyperides, Lycurgus, Isocrates (Diog. Laërt. iii. 46), are said to have belonged. Whether Demostenes was of the number is doubtful (Dem. Epist. v.; Cic. de Orat. i. 26, Brut. 32, Orat. 5, de Offic. i. 1, &c.; on the other hand see Niebuhr, Klein historische Schriften, p. 492; Bake, Bibl. Crit. Nova, v. 194, &c.). Even women are said to have attached themselves to him as his disciples (Diog. Laërt. t. c, comp. Olympiads). Plato's occupants, as it were, by journeys undertaken to Sicily; first when Dion, probably soon after the death of the elder Dionysius (Ol. 103. i, n. c. 368), determined him to make the attempt to win the younger Dionysius to philosophy (Plat. Epist. vii. p. 337, iii. p. 316, c; Plut. Dion. c. 11, &c., &c., Philosoph. esse cum Principio, c. 4; Corn. Nep. x. 3; Diog. Laërt. iii. 21); the second time, a few years later (about n. c. 361), when the wish of his Pythagorean friends, and the invitation of Dionysius to reconcile the disputes which had broken out shortly after Plato's departure between him and his step-uncle Dion, brought him back to Syracuse. He endowed his efforts were both times unsuccessful, and he owed his own safety to nothing but the earnest intercession of Archytus (Plat. Epist. vii. pp. 339, 345, iii. p. 318; Plut. Dion. c. 20; Diog. Laërt. iii. 25). Immediately after his return, Dion, whom he found at the Olympic games (Ol. 105. i, n. c. 360), prepared for the most violent attack, Syracuse, and, supported by Spengipus and other friends of Plato, though not by Plato himself, drove out the tyrant, but was then himself assassinated; upon which Dionysius again made himself master of the government (Plat. Ep.; Plut. ll. cc.; Diog. Laërt. iii. 25). That Plato cherished the hope of realising through the conversion of Dionysius his idea of a state in the rising city of Syracuse, was a belief pretty generally spread in antiquity (Plut. Philos. e. prince. c. 4; Themist. Orat. xvii. p. 215, b; Diog. Laërt. iii. 21), and which finds some confirmation in expression of the philosopher himself, and of the seventh letter, which though spurious is written with the most evident acquaintance with the matters treated of (p. 327, c; comp. Hermann, l. c. p. 66, &c.). If however Plato had suffered himself to be deceived by such a hope, and if, as we are told, he withdrew himself from all participation in the public affairs of Athens, from despair with regard to the destinies of his native city, noble even in her decline, he would indeed have exhibited a blind partiality for a theory which was too far removed from existing institutions, and have at the same time displayed a want of statesmanlike feeling and perception. He did not comply with the invitations of Cyrene and Megalopolis, which had been newly founded by the Arcadians and Thebans, to arrange their constitution and laws (Plut. of prince. inverd. c. 1; Diog. Laërt. iii. 23; Aelian. V. H. ii. 42). And in truth the vocation assigned him (Diog. Laërt. iii. 48), and many others, of founding the science of politics by means of moral science, and of practising it in the struggle with existing relations. From the time when he opened the school in the Academy (it was only during his second and third journeys to Sicily that one of his more intimate companions—Heracleides Ponticus is named—had to supply his place, Suid. s. v. Heracleid.) we find him occupied solely in giving instruction and in the composition of his works. He is said to have died while writing in the 81st, or according to others the 84th year of his age, in Ol. 108. i. n. c. 347 (Cic. de Senect. 5; Senec. Epist. iviii.; Neanthes in Diog. Laërt. iii. 3; Diog. Laërt. v. 9; Athen. v. p. 57, &c.). According to Hermippus he died at a marriage feast (Diog. Laërt. iii. 3; August. de Civ. Del. vii. 2). Thence probably arose the title of the enege of Spengipus—Platoes neposSneonov. According to his last will his garden remained the property of the school (Diog. Laërt. iii. 18) and passed, considerably increased by later additions, into the hands of the Neo-Platonists, who kept as a festival his birth-day as well as that of Socrates (Demasc. ap. Phot. Cod. ccxlii.; Por- phyr. ap. Euseb. Proep. Evang. x. 3, p. 468). Athenians and strangers honoured his memory by monuments (Diog. Laërt. iii. 43; Phavorin. lb. 25). Yet he had no lack of enemies and enviers, and the attacks which were made upon him with scoffs and ridicule, partly by contemporary comic poets, as Theopompus, Alexia, Cnatinus the younger, and others (Diog. Laërt. iii. 26, &c.; Athen. xii. p. 509, ii. p. 59, partly by one-sided Socrates, as Antis- theenes, Diogenes, and the later Megaraics (Diog. Laërt. iii. 35, vi. 7, 26, ii. 119; comp. Schillerma- cker's Platon, ii. 1, pp. 19, 183, 404, 406; ii. 2, pp. 17, 20), found a loud echo among Epicureans, Stoics, certain Peripatetics, and later writers eager for detraction. Thus even Antisthenes and Aris- toxenus (Diog. Laërt. iii. 35; Athen. v. p. 434, xi. p. 507; Mahne, de Aristoxen. Platonic. 73, 91) charged him with sensuality, avarice, and sycophancy (Diog. Laërt. iii. 29; Athen. xii. p. 509, c. xiii. p. 589, e.; and others with vanity, ambition, and envy towards other Socrates (Athen. xii. p. 507, d; Diog. Laërt. vi. 3, 7, 24, 26, 34; comp. A. Böckh, Comment. Aed. de Similulata quae Platonii cum Xenophonte intercessit fortun, Berol. 1811). Others again accused him of having borrowed the form and substance of his doctrine from earlier philosophers, as Aristippus, Antisthenes (Theopomp. ap. Athen. xi. p. 508, c), Protagoras (Diog. Laërt. iii. 87), Epicharmus (Alcimus ap. Diog. Laërt. iii. 9, &c.), Philonus (Diog. Laërt. iii. 9). But as the latter accusation is refuted both by the contradiction which it carries in itself, and by comparison of the Pythagorean doctrine with that of Plato, so is the former, not only by the weakness of the evidence brought forward in its favour, but still more by the depth and purity of moral sentiment, which, with all the marks of internal truth, is re-lected in the writings of Plato.

II. THE WRITINGS OF PLATO.

These writings, by a happy destiny, have come down to us complete, so far as appears, in texts comparatively well preserved, and have always been admitted as a model of the union of artistic perfection with philosophical acuteness and depth. Plato was by no means the first to attempt the form of dialogue. Zeno the Eleatic had already written in the form of question and answer (Diog. Laërt. iii. 48; comp. Arist. Elech. Sect. 10). Alexamenus the Teian and Sophron in the mimes had treated ethical subjects in the form of dialogue (Diog. Laërt. l. c; Athen. xi. p. 505, b.; Olympiod. p. 78; comp. Hermann on Arist. Poet. p. 93, &c.); Xenophon, Aeschines, Antisthenes, Eucleides, and other Sophists also had made use of the dialogical form (Diog. Laërt. passim); but Plato has handed this form not only with greater mastery than any one who preceded him, and, one may say, than any one who has come after him, but, in all probability, with the distinct intention of keeping by this very means true to the admonition of Socrates, not to communicate instruction, but to lead to the spontaneous discovery of it. The dialogue with him is not merely a favourite method of clothing ideas, handed down from others, as has recently been maintained (Hermann, l. c. i. p. 354), but the mimetic-dramatic form of it is intended, while it excites and enchains the attention of the reader, at the same time to give him the opportunity and enable him to place himself in the peculiar situations of the different interlocutors, and, not without success, with them to seek and find. But with all the admiration which from the first has been felt for the distinct-ness and liveliness of the representation, and the richness and depth of the thoughts, it is impossible not to feel the difficulty of rendering to oneself a distinct account of what is designed and accomplished in any particular dialogue, and of its connection with others. And yet again it can hardly be denied that each of the dialogues forms an artistically self-contained whole, and at the same time a link in a chain. That the dialogues of Plato were from first to last not intended to set before any one distinct assertions, but to place the objects in their opposite points of view (Cic. Acad. i. 12), could appear credible only to partisans of the more modern sceptical Academy. Men who took a deeper view endeavoured, by separating the different kinds and classes of the dialogues, or by arranging together those which had a more immediate relation to each other, to arrive at a more correct understanding of them. With reference to the first, some distinguished dramatic, narrative, and mixed dialogues (Diog. Laërt. iii. 80), others investigating and instructing dialogues, and again such as investigated gymnastically (maneuettically or peirastically), and agonistically (endetically or antareptically); as also dialogues which communicicated instruction theoretically (physically or logically), and practically (ethically or politically), (Diog. Laërt. iii. 49; Albin. Isag. 128.) With regard to the second point, attention was especially directed to the dramatic character of the dialogues, and, according to it, the Alexandrian grammarian Aristophanes of Byzantium arranged a part of them together in trilogies (Sophistes, Politicus, Cynulus — Thaeetetus, Euthyphron, Apology — Politeia, Timaeus, Critias — the Laws, Minos, Epinomis — Crilon, Phasedon, Letters), the rest being left unarranged on the ground that he was led to do so it is not easy to discover. Thrasylus, in the age of Tiberius, with reference to the above-named division into investigating and instructing dialogues, divided the whole number into tetralogies, probably because Plato had given intimation of his intention to add as a conclusion to the dialogues Thaeetetus, Sophistes, and Politicus, one called Philosophus, and to the trilogy of the Politieia, Timaeus, and Critias, the Hermocrates (Plat. Polit. p. 257, a. Critias, p. 108, a. c.). In place of the unwritten, if intended, Philosophus, Thrasylus adds to the first of the two trilogies, and as the first member of it, the Cratylus; to the second, in place of the Hermocrates, and again as the first member, the Clipton. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 80; comp. Albin. Isag. &c. p. 120.) Although this division appears to have been already usual in Varro's time (de Ling. Lat. vi. 90, Dig.), and has been adopted in manuscripts, as well as in the older editions, it is not more satisfactory than the others which have been mentioned, partly because it combines genuine and spurious dialogues, partly because, neglecting internal references, it not infrequently unites according to merely external considerations. Nor have the more recent attempts of Samuel Pettius (Miscell. iil. 2), Sydenham (Synopsis, or General View of the Works of Plato, p. 9), and Serranus, which connect themselves more or less with these earlier attempts, led to any satisfactory arrange ment. Yet at the basis of all these different attempts there lies the correct assumption, that the insight into the purport and construction of the separate Platonic dialogues depends upon our ascertaining the internal references by which they are united with each other. As Schleiermacher, for the purpose of carrying out this supposition, endeavoured to point out in Plato himself the leading ideas which lay at the foundation, and by means of them to penetrate to the understanding of each of the dialogues and of its connection with the rest, he has become the originator of a new era in this branch of investigation, and might with good reason be termed by I. Bekker, who has done so much for the critical restoration of the text, Platonis restitutor. Schleiermacher starts with Plato's declaration of the insufficiency of written communication. If he regarded this as the lifeless image of living colloquy, because, not being able to unfold its meaning, presenting itself to those who do understand as to those who do not, it produces the futile belief of being possessed of knowledge in those who do not know, being only adapted to remind the reader of convictions that have been produced and seized in a lively manner (Plat. Phaedr. p. 275), and nevertheless spent a considerable part of his long life in the composition of written works, he must doubtless have com-PLATO.

vinced himself that he was able to meet that deficiency up to a certain point, to communicate to the souls of the readers with science discourses which, being capable of representing their own meaning and of standing in the place of the person who thus implanted them, should show themselves fruitful (ib.
understanding of many of the dialogues of Plato,
however, is rendered difficult by this circumstance, that a single dialogue often contains different investigations, side by side, which appear to be only loosely connected, and are even obscured by one another; and these investigations, moreover, often seem to lead to no conclusion, or even to issue in contradictions. We cannot possibly look upon this peculiarity as destitute of purpose, or the result of want of skill. If, however, it was intended, the only purpose which can have been at the bottom of it must have been to compel the reader, through his spontaneous participation in the investigations proposed, to discover their central point, to supply intermediate members that are wanting, and in that way himself to discover the intended solution of the apparent contradictions. If the reader did not succeed in quite understanding the individual dialogue by itself, it was intended that he should seek the further carrying out of the investigations in other dialogues, and notice how what appeared the end of one is at the same time to be regarded as the beginning and foundation of another. Nevertheless, according to the differences in the investigation and in the susceptibility and maturity for it to be presupposed in the reader, the mode of conducting it and the composition of the dialogue devoted to it would require to be different. Schleiermacher distinguishes three series and classes of dialogues. In the first he considers that the germs of dialectic and of the doctrine of ideas begin to unfold them-seves in all the freshness of the first youthful inspiration, with the fulness of an imaginative, dramatically mimetic representation; in the second those germs develop themselves further by means of dialectic investigations respecting the difference between common and philosophical acquaintance with things, respecting notion and knowledge (δόξα and ἐπιστήμη); in the third they receive their completion by means of an objectively scientific working out, with the separation of ethics and physics (Schleiermacher's Plato,
i. 1, Einleitung, p. 45, &c.; comp. ii. 2, p. 142).
To suppose that Plato, when he composed the first of his dialogues, already had clearly before his eyes distinct outlines the whole series of the rest, with all their internal references and connecting links; and farther, that from the beginning to the end he never varied, but needed only to keep on spinning the thread he had once begun, without any where taking it up afresh,—such a supposition would indeed be preposterous, as Hermann remarks against Schleiermacher (l. c. p. 354. 56).
But the assumption above referred to respecting the composition and succession of the dialogues of Plato
by no means depends upon any such supposition.
It is enough to believe that the fundamental germs of his system early made their appearance in the mind of Plato in a definite form, and attained to their development in a natural manner through the power that resided in them. We need suppose in the case of Plato only what may be demonstrated in the case of other great thinkers of more modern times, as Des Cartes, Spinoza, Fichte, Schelling. Nay, we are not even compelled to assume (what indeed is very improbable) that the succession of the dialogues according to their internal references must coincide with the chronological order in which they were composed. Why should not Plato, while he had already commenced works of the third class, have found occasion now and then to return to the completion of the dialogues of the second, or even of the first class?
As regards, however, the arrangements in detail, we will not deny that Schleiermacher, in the endeavour to assign its place to every dialogue according to the presupposed connection with all the rest running through the series, has now and then suffered himself to be misled by insecure traces,
and has been induced partly to regard some leading dialogues from an incorrect or doubtful point of view, partly to supply deficiencies by means of artificial combinations. On the other hand, we believe, after a careful examination of the objections against it that have been made good, that we may adopt the principle of the arrangement and the most important points of it.

The first series embraces, according to Schleiermacher, the larger dialogues, Phaedrus, Protagoras, and Parmenides, to which the smaller ones, Lysis, Laches, Charmides, and Euthyphron are to be added
as supplements. When others, on the contrary, declare themselves for a much later composition of the Phaedrus, and Hermann in particular (l. c.
pp. 356, 373, &c.) regards it as the entrance-programme (p. 544) written by Plato for the opening of his school, we will indeed admit that the account which makes that dialogue Plato's first youthful composition (Diag. L. ii. 38 ; Olympiad. Plata.
p. 70) can pass for nothing more than a conclusion' come to by learned philosophers or grammarians (thus, the judgments of Euphronius, Pannæus, and Diænearchus brought forward in favour of the opinion deserve regard); but that the compass of knowledge said to be found in the dialogue, and the fulness and maturity of the thoughts, its similarly to the Symposium and Menexenus, the acquaintance with Egyptian mythology and Pythagorean philosophy, bear indubitable testimony to a later composition, we cannot admit; but we must rather appeal to the fact that the youthful Plato, even before he had visited Egypt and Magna Graecia, might easily have acquired such an amount of knowledge in Athens, the centre of all the philosophical life of that age; and further, that what is brought forward as evidence of the comp-pass and maturity of the thoughts is rather the youthful, lively expression of the first conception of great ideas (comp. Van Heusde, Initia Doctr.
Plat. i. p. 137). With the Phaedrus the Lysis stands connected as a dialectic essay upon love.
But as the Phaedrus contains the outlines of the peculiar leading doctrines of Plato partly still as forebodings expressed in a mythical form, so the Protagoras is distinctly to be regarded as the Socratic method in opposition to the sophistic, in discussions which we might term the Propylaen of the doctrine of morals. The early composition of dialogue is assumed even by the antagonists of Schleiermacher, they only dispute on insufficient grounds either the genuineness of the smaller dialogues Charmides, Laches and Euthypont (see on this point Hermann, p. 443, &c.), or their connection with the Protagoras, which manifests itself in this, that the former had demonstrated the insufficiency of the usual moral definitions in reference to the ideas of virtue as connected with temperance (σωφροσύνη), bravery, and holiness, to which the latter had called attention generally. The profound dialogue Parmenides, on the other hand, we cannot with Schleiermacher regard either as a mere dialectic exercise, or as one of the earlier works of Plato (comp. Ed. Zeller's Platonische Studien, p. 194, &c.), but rather see ourselves compelled to assign it a place in the second series of the dialogues of Plato. The foundation of this series is formed by the dialogues Theaetetus, Sophists, and Politicus, which have clearly a mutual connection. Before the Theaetetus Schleiermacher places the Gorgias, and the connection of the two is indubitable, in so far as they both exhibit the constant and essential in opposition to the changeable and contingent, the former in the domain of cognizance, the latter in that of moral action; and as the Theaetetus is to be placed before the Sophists, Cratylus and other dialogues, so is the Gorgias to be placed at the head of the Politicus, Philebus and the Politic. Less certain is the position assigned by Schleiermacher to the Menon, Euthydemus and Cratylus, between the Theaetetus and Sophists. The Menon seems rather expressly designed to form a connecting link between the investigations of the Gorgias and those of the Theaetetus, and on the one hand to bring into view the distinction discussed in the latter between correct notion and true apprehension, in its application to the idea of virtue; on the other hand, by means of this distinction to bring nearer to its final decision the question respecting the essence of the good, as of virtue and the possibility of teaching it. It might be more difficult to assign to the Euthydemus its definite place. Although with the ridicule of the empty polemical artifices of sophists which is contained in it, there are connected intimations respecting wisdom as the art of those who are in a condition at the same time to produce and to use what they produce, the dialogue nevertheless should probably be regarded as an occasional piece. The Cratylus opposes to the scoffing art of the sophist, dealing in grammatical niceties, the image of dialectic art which recognises and fashions language as a necessary production of the human mind. It should, however, find its appropriate place not before the Sophists (where Schleiermacher places it), but after it, as the application of dialectic to language could hardly become a matter of inquiry until the nature of dialectic had been discussed, as is done in the Sophists. The Elatic stranger, when questioned by Socrates respecting the nature and difference of the sophist, the statesman and the philosopher (Soph. p. 217), answers only the first two of these questions, in the dialogues that bear these names, and if Plato had intended a third and similar investigation respecting the nature of the philosopher, he has not undertaken the immediate fulfilment of his design. Schleiermacher therefore assumes that in the Euthydem and Phaedrus, taken together the model of the philosopher is exhibited in the person of Socrates, in the former as he lived, glorified by the panegyric of Alcibiades, and marked by the function, so especially peculiar to him, of love generating in the beautiful (p. 206); in the latter as he appears in death, longing to become pure spirit. (Schleiermacher's Platon, ii. 2, p. 356, &c.) The contents of the two dialogues, however, and their organization as regarded from the point of view of this assumption, is not altogether intelligible. (Comp. Hermann, p. 525, 27.) But as little should we, with Ed. Zeller (l. c. p. 194, &c.), look for the missing member of the trilogy, of which we have part in the Sophists and Politicus, in the exclusively dialectical Parmenides. (Comp. Hermann, p. 671, note 533.) But Plato might the sooner have given up the separate exhibition of the philosopher, partly inasmuch as the description of him is already mixed up with the representation of the sophist and the politician, partly as the picture is rendered complete by means of the Symposium and the Phaedon, as well as by the books on the state. Meantime the place which Schleiermacher assigns to those two dialogues between the Sophists and Philebus may be regarded as amply justifed, as even Hermann admits in opposition to Ast and Socher (pp. 398, 469, 526). Only we must reserve room at this same place for the Parmenides. In this most difficult of the Platonic dialogues, which has been treated of at length by Ed. Zeller (l. c.), Stallbaum (Platonis Parmenides, cum IV. Libris Prologom. Lipp. 1839), Brandis (Geschichte der Griech. Röm. Philosophie, ii. 1, p. 294, &c., comp. p. 169, note), and others, we find on the one hand the outlines of the doctrine of ideas, and on the other the difficulties which oppose themselves to it brightly discussed. On the other hand a considerably more extended attempt made to point out in connection with the conceptions considered in themselves, and in particular with the most universal of them, the One and Existence, the contradictions in which the isolated, abstract contemplation of those conceptions involves us; manifestly in order to pave the way for the solution of those difficulties. In this the Parmenides is closely connected with the Sophists, and might be placed immediately after the Cratylus, before the Symposium and Phaedon. But that the Philebus is to be regarded as the immediate transition from the second, dialectical, series of dialogues to the third, Schleiermacher has incontrovertibly shown; and the smaller dialogues, which as regards their contents and form are related to those of the second series, in so far as they are not banished as spurious into the appendix, should be ranked with them as occasional tracts.

In the third series the order for the books on the state (Politeia), the Timaeus and the Critias, has been expressly marked by Plato himself, and with the books on the state those on the laws connect themselves as a supplement.

Ast, though throughout polemically opposed to Schleiermacher, sees himself compelled in the main to recognise the threefold division made by the latter, as he distinguishes Socratic dialogues, in which the poetic and dramatic prevail (Protagors, Phaedrus, Gorgias and Phaedon), dialectic dialogues (Theaetetus, Sophists, Politicus and Cratylus), and purely scientific, or Socrates-Platonic dialogues (Philebus, Symposium, Politia, Timaeus and Critias). (Schleiermacher und Schrijlen, Leipzig, 1816.) But through this new conception and designation of the first series, and by adding, in the separation of the second and third series, an external ground of division to the internal one, he has been brought to unsteady and arbitrary assumptions which leave out of consideration the internal references. Socher's attempt to establish in place of such arrangements depending upon internal con-connection a purely chronological arrangement, depending on the time of their composition (Über Platon's Schriften, Müncheen, 1820), has been followed by no results that can in any degree be depended on, as the date of the composition can be approximately determined by means of the anachronisms (offences against the time in which they are supposed to take place) contained in them in but a few dialogues as compared with the greatly preponderating number of those in which he has assigned it from mere opinion. K. F. Hermann's undertaking, in the absence of definite external statements, to restore a chronological arrangement of the dialogues according to traces and marks founded in facts, with historical circumcision and criticism, and in doing so at the same time to sketch a faithful picture of the progress of the mental life and development of the writer of them, is considerably more worth notice. (Geschichte und System der Platonischen Philosophie, 1. Theil, Heidelberg, 1839, p. 368, &c.) In the first period, according to him, Plato's Socrates betrays no other view of life, or scientific conception, than such as we become acquainted with in the historical Socrates out of Xenophon and other unsuspicous witnesses (Hippias, Ion, Alcibiades I., Charmides, Lysis, Laches, Protagoras, and Euthydemus). Then, immediately after the death of Socrates, the Apology, Crito, Gorgias, Euthyphron, Menon, and Hippias Major belong to a transition step. In the second, or Megaric period of development dialectic makes its appearance as the true techne of philosophy, and the ideas as its proper objects (Crito, Theaetetus, Sophists, Politicus, Parmenides). Lastly in the third period the system itself is exhibited (Phaedrus, Menexenus, Symposium, Philebus, Phaedon, Politia, Timaeus, Critias, and the Laws). But although Hermann has laboured to establish his assumptions with a great expenditure of acuteness and learning, he has not attained to results that can in any degree stand the test of examination. For the assumptions that Plato in the first period confined himself to an analytic treatment of ideas, in a strictly Socratic manner, and did not attain to a scientific independence till he did so through his removal to Megara, nor to an acquaintance with the Pythagorean philosophy, and so to the complete development of his dialectic and doctrine of ideas, till he did so through his travels,—for these assumptions all that can be made out is, that in a number of the dialogues the peculiar features of the Platonic dialectic and doctrine of ideas do not as yet make their appearance in a decided form. But on the one hand Hermann ranks in that class dialogues such as the Euthydemus, Menon, and Gorgias, in which references to dialectic and the doctrine of ideas can scarcely fail to be recognised; on the other it is not easy to treat by Platon the even after he had laid down in his own mind the outlines of his dialectic and doctrine of ideas, should not now and then, according to the separate requirements of the subject in hand, as in the Protagoras and the smaller dialogues which connect themselves with it, have looked away from them, and transported himself back again completely to the Socratic point of view. Then again, in Hermann's mode of treating the subject, dialogues which stand in the closest relation to each other, as the Gorgias and Theaetetus, the Euthydemus and Theaetetus, are severed from each other, and assigned to different periods; while the Phaedon, any evidence (comp. Hermann, i. pp. 544, 744, note 755), the verbal lectures of Plato certainly did contain an extension and partial alteration of the doctrines discussed in the dialogues, with an approach to the number-theory of the Pythagoreans; for to this we should probably refer the "unwritten assumption" (δύτερα βουγίων), and perhaps also the divisions (βασιλείας), which Aristotle mentions (Phys. iv. 2, ib. Simpl. f. 127, de Generat. et Corrup., ii. 3; ib. Joh. Philop. f. 50; Diog. Laërt. iii. 80). His lectures on the doctrine of the good, Aristotle, Hermacleides Ponticus, and Hestineus, had noted down, and from the notes of Aristotle some valuable fragments have come down to us (Arist. de Anima, i. 2; ib. Simpl. et Joh. Philop.; Aristox. Harmonica, ii. p. 39; comp. Brandis, de Perditis Aristotelis Libris, p. 3, &c.; and Trendelenburg, Platonis de Ideis et Numeris Doctrina). The Aristotelian monography on ideas was also in least part drawn from lectures of Plato, or conversations with him. (Aristot. Metaph. i. 9. p. 980, b. 11, &c.; ib. Alex. Aphrod. in Schol. in Arist. p. 564, b. 14, &c.; Brandis, i. c. p. 14, &c.)

III. THE PHILOSOPHY OF PLATO.

The attempt to combine poetry and philosophy (the two fundamental tendencies of the Greek mind), gives to the Platonic dialogues a charm, which irresistibly attracts us, though we may have but a deficient comprehension of their subject-matter. Even the greatest of the Grecian poets are censured by Plato, not without some degree of passion and partiality, for their want of clear ideas, and of true insight (de Rep. iii. p. 387, a., ii. p. 377, x. pp. 597, c., 603, a., 603, a. v. p. 476, b. 479, 472, d., vi. p. 507, a., de Rep. iv. p. 719, c., Gorg. p. 501, b.). Art is to be regarded as the capacity of creating a whole that is inspired by an invisible order (Phileb. pp. 64, 67, Phaedr. p. 264, d.); its aim, to guide the human soul (Phaedr. pp. 261, a. 277, c. 278, a. de Rep. x. p. 605, c.). The living, unconsciously-creative impulse of the poet, which is purified by science, should, on its part, bring this to a full development. Carrying the Socratic dialogue to greater perfection, Plato endeavours to draw his hearers, by means of a dramatic intuition, into the circle of the investigation; to bring them, by the spur of irony, to a consciousness either of knowledge or of ignorance; by means of myths, partly to awaken up the spirit of scientific inquiry, partly to express hopes and anticipations which science is not yet able to confirm. (See Alb. Jahn, Disser- tatio Platonica qua tum de Causa et Naturae Mytho- rum Platonicorum disputatur, tum Mythas de Amoris Orta Sorte et Indole explicatur. Bernæe, 1839.)

Plato, like Socrates, was penetrated with the idea that wisdom is the attribute of the Godhead, that philosophy, springing from the impulse to wisdom, is the necessity of the intellectual man, and the greatest of the goods in which he participates (Phaedr. p. 278, d., Lysis, p. 218, a., Apolag. p. 23, Theæt. p. 155, b., Sympos. p. 204, a., Tim. p. 47, a.). When once we arrive after Wisdom with the intensity of a lover, she becomes the true consecra- tion and purification of the soul (Phaedr. p. 60, c., Symposium. p. 218, b.), adapted to lead us from the night-like to the true day (de Rep. vii. p. 521, d. vi. p. 485, b.). An approach to wisdom, however, presupposes an original communion with Being, truly so called; and this communion again presupposes the divine nature or immortality of the soul, and the impulse to become like the Eternal. This impulse is the love which generates in Truth, and the development of it is termed Dialectics. The hints respecting the constitution of the soul, as independent of the body; respecting its higher and lower na- ture; respecting the mode of comprehension of the former, and its objects, the eternal and the self- existent; respecting its corporisation, and its prolonging by purification to raise itself again to its higher existence: these hints, clothed in the form of myths (Phaedr. p. 245, c.), are followed up in the Phaedrus by panegyrics on the love of beauty, and discussions on dialectics (pp. 251—

Out of the philosophical impulse which is developed by Dialectics not only correct knowledge, but also correct action springs forth. Socrates' doctrine respecting the unity of virtue, and that it consists in true, vigorous, and practical knowledge; that this knowledge, however, lying beyond sensuous per- ception and experience, is rooted in self-consciousness and has perfect happiness (as the inward harmony of its inevitable consequences), this doctrine is intended to be set forth in a pre- liminary manner in the Protagoras and the smaller dialogues attached to it. They are designed, there- fore, to introduce a foundation for ethics, by the refutation of the common views that were entertain- ed of morals and of virtue. For although not even the words ethics and physics occur in Plato (to say nothing of any independent delineation of the one or the other of these sciences), and even dialectics are not treated of as a distinct and separate province, yet he must rightly be regarded as the originator of the threefold division of philosophy (Aristocles, ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xi. 33; comp. Aristot. Top. i. 14, Anal. Post. i. 33), inasmuch as he had before him the decided object to develop the Socratic method into a scientific system of di- dialectics, that should supply the grounds of our knowledge as well as of our moral action (philosophical and ethics), and therefore separates the general investigations on knowledge and understanding, at least relatively, from those which refer to physics and ethics. Accordingly, the Theaetetus, Sophistes, Parmenides, and Cratylus, are principally dialectical; the Protagoras, Gorgias, Politics, Philo- lebus, and the Politics, principally ethical; while the Timaeus is exclusively physical. Plato's dia- dialectics and ethics, however, have been more successful than his physics.

The question, "What is knowledge," had been brought forward more and more definitely, in pro- portion as the development of philosophy generally advanced. Each of the three main branches of the ancient philosophy, when at their culminating point, had made a trial at the solution of that enigma of human reason. We considered themselves bound to penetrate beneath the phenomenal surface of the affections and per- ceptions. Hermeletus, for example, in order to gain a sufficient ground for the common (ἐνώπιον), or, as we should say, for the universally admitted, though in contradiction to his fundamental prin- ciple of an eternal generation, postulates a world- consciousness; Parmenides believed that he had discovered knowledge in the identity of simple, unchangeable Being, and thought; Philoitus, and with him the flower of the Pythagoreans generally, in the consciousness we have of the unchangeable relations of number and measure. When, however,
PLATO.

The conflict of these principles, each of them untenable in its own one-sidedness, had called forth the sophists, and these had either denied knowledge altogether, or resolved it into the mere opinion of momentary affection. Socrates was obliged above all things to show, that there was a knowledge independent of the changes of our sensuous affections, and that this knowledge is actually found in our inalienable consciousness respecting moral requirements, and respecting the divinity, in conscientious self-intellection. To develop this by induction from particular manifestations of the moral and religious sense, and to establish it, by means of definition, in a comprehensive form,—that is, in its generality,—such was the point to which his attention had mainly to be directed. Plato, on the contrary, was constrained to view the question relating to the essence and the material of our knowledge, as well of that which develops itself for its own sake, as of that which breaks out into action,—of the theoretical as well as of the practical, more generally, and to direct his efforts, therefore, to the investigation of its various conceptions. In so doing he became the originator of the science of knowledge,—of dialectics. No one before him had gained an equally clear perception of the subjective and objective elements of our knowledge; no one of the theoretical and the practical side of it; and no one before him had attempted to discover its forms and its laws.

The doctrine of Heracleitus, if we set aside the postulate of a universal world-consciousness, had been weakened down to the idea that knowledge is confined to the consciousness of the momentary affection which proceeds from the meeting of the motion of the subject with that of the object; that each of these affections is equally true, but that each, on account of the incessant change of the motions, must be a different one. With this idea that of the atomistic theory coincided, inasmuch as it was only by means of arbitrary hypotheses that the latter could get over the consciousness of ever-changing sensuous affection. In order to refute this view from its very foundation, once for all, Plato's Theaetetus sets forth with great acuteness the doctrine of eternal generation, and the results which Protagoras had drawn from it (p. 153, &c.); he renounces the apparent, but by no means decisive grounds, which lie against it (p. 157, e. &c.); but then demonstrates that Protagoras must regard his own assertion as at once true and false; that he must renounce and give up all determinations respecting futurity, and consequently respecting utility; that continuity of motion being presupposed, no perception whatever could be attained; and that the comparison and combination of the emotions or perceptions presupposes a thinking faculty peculiar to the soul (reflection), distinct from mere feeling (pp. 171, &c. 179, 182b184). The man who acknowledges this, if he still will not renounce sensualism, yet will be inclined from his sense-perceptions to deduce recollection; from it, conception; from conception, when it acquires firmness, knowledge (Phaedo, p. 96, c.); and to designate the latter as correct conception; although he will not be in a condition to render any account of the rise of incorrect conceptions, or of the difference between those and correct ones, unless he presupposes a knowledge that lies, not merely beyond conception generally, but even beyond correct conception, and that carries with it its own evidence (Theaet. p. 187). He will also be obliged to give up the assertion, that knowledge consists in right conception, united with discourse or explanation; for then thus an absolute knowledge will be presupposed as the rule or criterion of the explanation, whatever may be its more accurate definition (p. 200, c. &c.). Although, therefore, Plato concludes the dialogue with the declaration that he has not succeeded in bringing the idea of knowledge into perfect clearness (p. 210, a.), but that it must be something which excludes all changeableness, something which is its own guarantee, simple, uniform, indivisible (p. 205, c., comp. 202, d.), and not to be reached in the science of numbers (p. 195, d.): of this the reader, as he spontaneously reproduces the investigation, was intended to convince himself (comp. Charmid. p. 166, c. 169, c., Sophist. p. 220, c.). That knowledge, however, grounded on and sustained by logical inference (αἰδιάς ἀκούσματα, Meno, p. 98, a., de Rep. iv. p. 431, c.), should verify itself through the medium of true ideas (Tsm. p. 81, c., de Rep. vi. p. 54, d.), can only be the result of the very perfect determination of the conclusion to which he had come in the Theaetetus.

But before Plato could pass on to his investigations respecting the modes of development and the forms of knowledge, he was obliged to undertake to determine the objects of knowledge, and to grasp that knowledge in its objective phase. To accomplish this was the purpose of the Sophists, which immediately attaches itself to the Theaetetus, and obviously presupposes its conclusions. In the latter dialogue it had already been intimated that knowledge can only take place in reference to real existence (Theaed. p. 206, e. and 201, a.). This was also the doctrine of the Eleatics, who nevertheless had deduced the unconditional unity and unchangeableness of the existent, from the inconceivableness of the non-existent. If, however, non-existence is absolutely inconceivable, then also must error, false conception, be so likewise. First of all, therefore, the non-existent was to be discussed, and shown to have, in some sort, an existence, while to this end existence itself had to be defined.

In the primal substance, perpetually undergoing a process of transformation, which was assumed by the Ionian physiologists, the existent, whether understood as duality, trinity, or plurality, cannot find place (p. 242, d.) but as little can it (with the Eleatics) be even so much as conceived in thought as something absolutely single and one, without any multiplicity (p. 244, b. &c.). Such a thing would rather again coincide with Non-existence. For a multiplicity even in appearance only to be admitted, a multififormity of the existent must be acknowledged (p. 245, c. d.). Manifest existence, however, cannot be a bare multiformity of the tangible and corporeal (p. 246, a. f.), nor yet a plurality of intelligible incorporeal Essences (Ideas), which have no share either in Action or in Passion, as Euclid and his school probably taught; since so conceived they would be destitute of any influence on the world of the changeable, and would indeed themselves entirely elude our cognizance (p. 248, a. f.).

But as in the Theaetetus, the inconceivableness of an eternal generation, without anything stable, had been the result arrived at (comp. Sophist. p. 249, b.), so in the Sophists the opposite idea is disposed of, namely, that the absolutely unchangeable existence alone really is, and that all change is mere appearance. Plato was obliged, therefore, to undertake this task,—to find a Being instead of a Becoming, and vice versa, and then to show how the manifold existences stand in relation to each other, and to the changeable, i.e. to phenomena. Existence, Plato conceived, of itself consist neither in Rest nor in Motion, yet still can share in both, and stand in reciprocal community (p. 250, a. &c.).

But certain ideas absolutely exclude one another, as rest, for example, excludes motion, and sameness difference. What ideas, then, are capable of being united with each other, and what are not so, it is the part of science (dialectics) to decide (p. 253, c.). By the discussion of the relation which the ideas of rest and motion, of sameness and difference, hold to each other, it is explained how motion can be the same, and not the same, how it can be thought of as being and yet not being; consequently, how the non-existent denotes only the variations of existence, not the bare negation of it (p. 253, d. &c.). That existence is not at variance with becoming, and that the latter is not conceivable apart from the former, Plato shows in the case of the two principal parts of speech, and their reciprocal relation (p. 256, c., &c. 262). From this it becomes evident in what sense dialectics can be characterised at once as the science of understanding, and as the science of the self-existent, as the science of sciences. In the Phaedrus (p. 261; comp. pp. 266, b. 270, d.), it is presented to us in the first instance as the art of discoursing, and therewith of the true education of the soul and of instruction. In the Sophistes (p. 261, e. &c.) it appears as the science of the true connection of ideas; in the Philebus (p. 16, c.) as the highest gift of the gods, as the true Promethean fire; while in the Books on the Republic (vi. p. 511, b.) pure ideas, freed from all form and presupposition, are shown to be grasped and developed by it.

In the Theaetetus simple ideas, reached only by the spontaneous activity of thought, had presented themselves as the necessary conditions of knowledge; in the Sophistes, the objects of knowledge come before us as a manifold existence, containing in itself the principles of all changes. The existence of things, cognisable only by means of conception, is their true essence, their ideas. Hence the assertion (Parmen. p. 135, b.) that to deny the reality of ideas is to destroy all scientific research. Plato, it is true, departed from the original meaning of the word idea (namely, that of form or figure) in which it had been employed by Anaxagoras, Diogenes of Apollonia, and probably also by Democritus; inasmuch as he understood by it the unities (ειδής, ποιητές) which lie at the basis of the visible, the changeable, and which can only be reached by pure thought. Plato considers (Sidonia) (Phaedr. p. 247, de Rep. ii. p. 380, ix. p. 563, b. vi. p. 507, b., Phileb. p. 15, Tim. p. 51, b.); but he retained the characteristic of the intuitive and real, in opposition to the mere abstractness of ideas which belong simply to the thinking which interposes itself. He included under the expression idea every thing stable amidst the changes of mere phenomena, all really existing and unchangeable definitudes, by which the changes of things and our knowledge of them are conditioned, such as the ideas of genus and species, the laws and ends of nature, as also the principles of cognition, and of moral action, and the essences of individual, concrete, thinking souls (Phileb. p. 15, a., de Rep. vii. p. 532, a., Tim. p. 51, Phaedo, p. 100, b. p. 102, c. &c.). To that only which can be conceived as an entirely formless and undetermined mass, or as a part of a whole, or as an arbitrary relation, do no ideas whatever correspond (Parm. p. 196, c.).

But how are we to understand the existence of ideas in things? Neither the whole conception, nor merely a part of it, can reside in the things; neither is it enough to understand the ideas to be conceptions, which the soul beholds together with the things (that is, as we should call them, subjectively valid conceptions or categories), or as bare thoughts without reality. Even when viewed as the archetypes of the changeable, they need some more distinct definition, and some security against obvious objections. This question and the difficulties which lie against its solution, are developed in the Parmenides, at the beginning of the dialogue, with great acuteness. To introduce the solution to that question, and the refutation of these difficulties, is the evident intention of the succeeding dialectical antinomical* of the idea of unity, as a thing being and not being, as long as it is viewed in relation to itself and to which is different. How far Plato succeeded in separating ideas from mere abstract conceptions, and making their reality distinct from the natural causality of motion, we cannot, here inquire. Neither can we enter into any discussions respecting the Platonic methods of division, and of the antinomical definitions of ideas, respecting the leading principles of these methods, and his attempt in the Cratylus to represent words as the immediate copy of ideas, that is, of the essential in things, by means of the fundamental parts of speech, and to point out the part which dialectics must take in the development of language. While the foundation which Plato lays for the doctrine of ideas or dialectics must be regarded as something finished and complete in itself, yet the mode in which he carries it out is not by any means better than the reach of objections; and we can hardly assume that it had attained any remarkably higher development either in the mind of Plato himself, or in his lectures, although he appears to have been continually endeavouring to grasp and to represent the fundamental outlines of his doctrine from different points of view, as is manifest especially from the arguments which are preserved to us in Aristotle's work on Plato's ideas. (Brandis, de perdité Aristotelic Libris de Ideis et de Bono, p. 14, &c.; also Handbuch der Geschichte der Griechisch-Römischen Philo-sophie, vol. ii. p. 227, &c.)

That Plato, however, while he distinctly separated the region of pure thinking or of ideas from that of sensuous perception and the world of phenomena, did not overlook the necessity of the communion between the intelligible and the sensible world, is abundantly manifest from the gradations which he assumes for the development of our cognition. In the region of sense—perception, or conception, again, he distinguishes the comprehension of images, and that of objects (εικάσια καὶ πρατησι), while in the region of thinking he separates the knowledge of those relations which belong indeed to thinking, but which require intuition in the case of sensuous objects, from the immediate grasp by thought of intelligible objects or ideas themselves, that is, of ultimate principles, devoid of all presupposition (φανον, νοεῖ), To the first gradation of science, that is, of the higher department of thinking, belong principally, though not exclusively, mathematically; and that Plato regarded them (though he did not fully realise this notion) as a necessary means for elevating experience into scientific knowledge, is evident from hints that occur elsewhere. (Comp. Brandis, Handbuch, &c. vol. ii. pp. 269, &c.—274, &c.) The fourfold division which he brings forward, and which is discussed in the De Republica (vi. p. 509, &c.) he appears to have taken up more definitely in his oral lectures, and in the first department to have distinguished perception from experience (αισθημα from νοεῖ), in the second to have distinguished mediate knowledge from the immediate thinking consciousness of first principles (εις την την τινα διανοησιν); in the third, to have distinguished experience of objects from the ideas, &c.—see Arist. De Anima, i. 2, with the note of Trendelenburg).

Although, therefore, the carrying out of Plato's dialectic may be imperfect, and by no means proportional to this excellent foundation, yet he had certainly taken a steady view of their end, namely, to lay hold of ideas more and more distinctly in their organic connection at once with one another and with the phenomenal world, by the discovery of their inward relations; and then having done this, to refer them to their ultimate basis. This ought at the same time to verify itself as the unconditional ground of the reality of objects and of the power we have to take cognisance of them, of Being and of Thought; being comparable to the intellectual sun. Now this absolutely unconditional ground Plato describes as the idea of the good (De Rep. vi. p. 505, &c.), convinced that we cannot imagine any higher definiteness than the good; but that we must, on the contrary, measure all other definitions by it, and regard it as the aim and purpose of all our endeavours, nay of all developments. Not being in a condition to grasp the idea of the good with full distinctness, we are able to approximate to it only so far as we elevate the power of thinking to its original purity (Brandis, ibid. pp. 291, &c. 824, &c.). Although the idea of the good, as the ultimate basis both of the mind and of the realities laid hold of by it, of thought and of existence, is, according to him, more elevated than that of spirit or actual existence itself, yet we can only imagine its activity as the activity of the mind. Through its activity the determinate natures of the ideas, which in themselves only exist, acquire their power of causation, a power which must be set down as spiritual, that is, free. Plato, therefore, describes the idea of the good, or the Godhead, sometimes teleologically, as the ultimate purpose of all conditioned existence; sometimes cosmologically, as the ultimate operative cause; and has begun to develop the cosmological, as also the physico-theological proof for the being of God; but has referred both back to the idea of the good, as the necessary presupposition to all other ideas, and our cognition of them. Moreover, we find him earnestly endeavouring to purify and free from its restrictions the idea of the Godhead, to establish and defend the belief in a wise and divine government of the world; as also to set aside the doubt that arises from the existence of evil and suffering in the world. (Brandis, Ibid. p. 331, &c.)

But then, how does the sensuous world, the world of phenomena, come into existence? To suppose that in his view it was nothing else than the mere subjective appearance which springs from the commingling of the ideas, or the confused conception of the ideas (Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. ii. pp. 295, &c. 339, &c.), not only contradicts the declarations of Plato in the Phaedrus (p. 23, b. 54, a.), Timaeus (pp. 27, c. 48, e. 51), &c., but contradicts also the dualistic tendency of the whole of the ancient philosophy. He designates as the, we may perhaps say, material ground of the phenomenal world, that which is in itself unlimited, ever in a process of becoming, never really existing, the mass out of which every thing is formed, and connects with it the idea of extension, as also of unregulated motion; attributes to it only the joint causality of necessity, in opposition to the free causality of ideas, which works towards ends and produces that which is necessary—the former, the soul of the universe, seeks to fill up the chasm between these opposed primary essences. This, standing midway between the intelligible (that to which the attribute of sameness belongs) and the sensible (the diverse), as the principle of order and motion in the world, according to him, comprehends in itself all the relations of number and measure. Plato had made another attempt to fill up the gap in the development of ideas by a symbolical representation, in the lectures he delivered upon the Good, mentioned by Aristotle and others. In these he partly referred ideas to intelligible numbers, in order, probably, that he might be able to denote more definitely their relation of dependence on the Godhead, as the absolute one, as also the relation of their succession and mutual connection; and partly described the Godhead as the ultimate ground both of ideas and also of the material of phenomena, inasmuch as he referred them both to the divine causality—the former immediately as original numbers, the latter through the medium of the activity of the ideas. But on this Pythagorean mode of exhibiting the highest principles of Plato's doctrine we have but very imperfect information. (Brandis, Ibid. vol. ii. 1, p. 336, &c.)

Both these departments which form the connecting link between Dialectics and Physics, and the principles of Physics themselves, contain only preliminary assumptions and hypothetical declarations, which Plato describes as a kind of recreation from more earnest search after the really existent, as an innocent enjoyment, a rational sport (Tim. pp. 27, c. 29, b. 59, c.). Inasmuch as physics treat only of the changeable and imitative, they must be contented with attaining probability; but they should aim, especially, at investigating teleologically and causally, that is, free causality, and showing how they converge in the realisation of the idea of the good. All the determinations of the original undetermined matter are realised by corporeal forms; in these forms Plato attempts to find the natural or necessary basis of the different kinds of feeling and of sensuous perception. Throughout the whole development, however, of his Physiology, as also in the outlines of his doctrine on Health and Sickness, pregnant ideas and clear views are to be meet with. (See especially
PLATO.

Th. H. Martin, Études sur le Timée de Platon, Paris, 1841.)

With the physiology of Plato his doctrine of the Soul is closely connected. Endowed with the same nature as the soul of the world, the human soul is that which is spontaneously active and unapproachable by death, although in its connection with the body bound up with the appetitive, the sensuous; and the \( \psi \omega \varphi \varsigma \), that which is of the nature of affection or eager impulse, the ground of courage and fear, love and hope, designed, while subordinating itself to the reason, to restrain sensuality, must be regarded as the link between the rational and the sensuous. (Tim. p. 69, d. 71, b., de Rep. iv. p. 435, &c. ix. p. 571.) Another link of connection between the intellectual and sensuous nature of the soul is referred to Love, which, separated from conceptive desire, is conceived of as an inspiration that transcends mere mediate intellect, whose purpose is to realise a perpetual striving after the immortal, the eternal;—to realise, in a word, by a close connection with others, the Good in the form of the Beautiful. In the Phaedrus Plato speaks of love under the veil of a myth; in the Lysis he commences the logical definition of it; and in the Symposium, one of the most artistic and attractive of his dialogues, he analyses the different moments which are necessary to the complete determination of the idea. In these and some of the other dialogues, however, beauty is described as the image of the ideas, penetrating the veil of phenomena and apprehended by the purest and brightest exercise of sense, in relation to colours, forms, actions, and morals, as also with relation to the harmonious combination of the Manifold into perfect Unity, and distinctly separated from the Agreeable and the Useful. Art is celebrated as the power of producing a whole, inspired by an invisible arrangement; of grouping together into one form the images of the ideas, which are everywhere scattered around.

That the soul, when separated from the body,—or the pure spirit,—is immortal, and that a continuance, in which power and consciousness or insight of the soul, preserved, is secured to it, Socrates, in the Phaedo of Plato, when approaching death, endeavours to convince his friends, partly by means of analogies drawn from the nature of things, partly by the refutation of the opposed hypothesis, that the soul is an harmonious union and tuning of the constituents of the body, partly by the attempt to prove the simplicity of the essential nature of the soul, its consequent indestructibility, and its relation to the Eternal, or its pre-existence; partly by the argumentation that the idea of the soul is inseparable from that of life, and that it can never be destroyed by moral evil,—the only evil to which, properly speaking, it is subjected (comp. de Rep. x. p. 605, b. &c., Phaedr. p. 245, c.).

Respecting the condition of the soul after death Plato expresses himself only in myths, and his utterances respecting the Transmigration of Souls also are expressed in a mythical form.

As a true disciple of Socrates, Plato devoted all the energy of his soul to ethics, which again are closely connected with politics. He paves the way for a scientific treatment of ethics by the refutation of the sophistical sensational and hedonistic (selfish) theories, first of all in the Protagoras and the three smaller dialogues attached to it (see above), then in the Gorgias, by pointing out the contradictions in which the assertions, on the one hand that wrong actions are uglier than right ones but more useful, on the other that the only right recognised by nature is that of the stronger, are involved. In this discussion the result is deduced, that neither happiness nor virtue can consist in the attempt to satisfy our unbridled and ever-increasing desires (de Rep. i.). In the Menon the Good is defined as that kind of utility which can never become injurious, and whose realisation is referred to a knowledge which is absolutely fixed and certain,—a knowledge, however, which must be viewed as something not externally communicable, but only to be developed from the spontaneous activity of the soul. Lastly, in the Philebus, the investigation respecting pleasure and pain, which was commenced in the Gorgias, as also that on the idea of the Good, is completed; and this twofold investigation grounded upon the principles of dialectics, and brought into relation with physics. Pain is referred to the disturbance of the inward harmony, pleasure to the maintenance, or restoration of it; and it is shown how, on the one hand, true and false, on the other, pure and mixed pleasure, are to be distinguished, while, inasmuch as it (pleasure) is always dependent on the activity out of which it springs, it becomes so much the truer and purer in proportion as the activity itself becomes more elevated. In this way the first sketch of a table of Goods is attained, in which the eternal nature of Measure, that is, the sum and substance of the ideas, as the highest canon, and then the different steps of the actual realisation of them in life, in a regular descending scale, are given, while it is acknowledged that the accompanying pure (unsensuous) pleasure is also to be regarded as a good, but inferior to that on which it depends, the reason and the understanding, science and art. Now, if we consider that, according to Plato, all morality must be directed to the realisation of the ideas in the phenomenal world; and, moreover, that these ideas in their reality and their activity, as also the knowledge respecting them, is to be referred to the Godhead, we can understand how he could designate the highest good as being a simulation to God. (Theaet. p. 176, a., de Rep. x. 613; comp. Wyttenbach, ad Plat. de Ser. Num. Vind. p. 27.)

In the Ethics of Plato the doctrine respecting virtue is attached to that of the highest good, and its development. That virtue is essentially one, and the science of the good, had been already deduced in the critical and dialectical introductory dialogues; but it had been also presupposed and even hinted that, without detriment to its unity, different phases of it could be distinguished, and that to knowledge there must be added practice, and an earnest combating of the sensuous functions. In order to discover these different phases, Plato goes back upon his triple division of the faculties of the soul. Virtue, in other words, is fitted for the soul for the operations that are peculiar to it (de Rep. i. p. 533, d. x. p. 601, d.), and it manifests itself by means of its (the soul's) inward harmony, beauty, and health (Gorg. pp. 504, b. 506, b., Phaedo, p. 93, e., de Rep. iv. pp. 444, d. viii. 554, e.). Different phases of virtue are distinguishable so far as the soul is not pure spirit; but just as the spirit should rule both the other elements of the soul, so also should wisdom, as the inner development of the spirit, rule the chiefly by Johannes Oporinus, who was afterward a professor of Greek in that university. It does not appear that he made use of any manuscripts, but he succeeded in correcting many of the mistakes to be found in the edition of Aldus, though some of his alterations were corruptions of sound passages. The edition was, however, enriched by having incorporated with it the commentaries of Proclus on the Timaeus and the State, which had shortly before been discovered by Simon Grynaeus in the library of the university at Oxford, and a triple Greek index,—one of words and phrases, another of proper names, and a third of proverbs to be found in Plato. The next edition, published at Basle in 1556, was superintended by Marcus Hopperus, who availed himself of a collation of some manuscripts of Plato made in Italy by Arnoldus Arle nius, and so corrected several of the errors of the previous Basle edition, and gave a large number of various readings; the edition of H. Stephanus (1578, in three volumes) is equally remarkable for the copiousness of its corrections of the mistakes of copyists and typographers, and introducing in several instances very felicitous improvements, and for the dishonesty with which the editor appropriated to himself the labours of others without any acknowledgment, and with various tricks strove to conceal the source from which they were derived. His various readings are taken chiefly, if not entirely, from the second Basle edition, from the Latin version of Ficinus, and from the notes of Cornarius. It is questionable whether he himself collated a single manuscript. The Latin version of Serranus, which is printed in this edition, is very bad. The occasional translations of Stephanus himself are far better. The Bipont edition (11 vols. 8vo. A. D. 1781—1786) contains a reprint of the text of that of Stephanus, with the Latin version of Marsilius Ficinus. Some fresh various readings, collected by Mitscherlich, are added. It was, however, by Immanuel Bekker that the text of Plato was first brought into a satisfactory condition in his edition, published in 1816—18, accompanied by the Latin version of Ficinus (here restored, generally speaking, to its original form, the reprints of it in other previous editions of Plato containing numerous alterations and corruptions), a critical commentary, an extensive comparison of various readings, and the Greek scholia, previously edited by Ruhnken, with some additions, together with copious indexes. The dialogues are arranged according to the scheme of Schleiermacher. The Latin version in this edition has sometimes been erroneously described as that of Wolf. A joint edition by Bekker and Wolf was projected and commenced, but not completed. The reprint of Bekker's edition, accompanied by the notes of Stephens, Heindorf, Wyttenbach, &c., published by Priestley (Lond. 1826), is a useful edition. A. S.'s edition (Lips. 1819—1827, 9 vols. 8vo., to which two volumes of notes on the four dialogues, Protagoras, Phaedrus, Georgias, and Phaedo, have since been added) contains many ingenious and excellent emendations of the text, which the editor's profound acquaintance with the phraseology of Plato enabled him to effect. G. Stallmann, who edited a critical edition of the text of Plato (Lips. 1821—1825, 8 vols. 8vo.*, and 1826, 8 vols. 12mo.), commenced in 1827 an elaborate edition of Plato, which is not yet quite completed. This is perhaps the best and most useful edition which has appeared. The edition of J. G. Baiter, J. C. Orelli, and A. G. Winckelmann (one vol. 4to. Zürich, 1839) deserves special mention for the accuracy of the text and the beauty of the typography.

Of separate dialogues, or collections of dialogues, the editions are almost endless. Those of the Cratylus and Theaetetus, of the Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phaedo, of the Sophist, Politics and Parmenides, and of the Philebus and Symposium by Fischer; of the Lysis, Charmides, Hippias Major, and Phaedrus, of the Gorgias and Theaetetus, of the Cratylus, Euthydemus and Parmenides, of the Phaedo, and of the Protagoras and Sophistes by Heindorf (whose notes exhibit both acuteness and sound judgment); of the Phaedo by Wytenbach; of the Philebus, and of the Parmenides by Stallbaum (in the edition of the latter of which the commentary of Proclus is incorporated), are most worthy of note. Of the translations of Plato the most celebrated is the Latin version of Marsilius Ficinus (Flor. 1463—1464, and frequently reprinted). It was in this version, which was made from manuscripts, that the writings of Plato first appeared in a printed form. The translation is so extremely close that it has almost the authority of a Greek manuscript, and is of great service in ascertaining varieties of reading. This remark, however, does not apply to the later, altered editions of it, which were published subsequently to the appearance of the Greek text of Plato. There is no good English translation of the whole of Plato, that by Taylor being by no means accurate. The efforts of Feyer Sydenham were much more successful, but he translated only a few of the pieces. There is a French translation by V. Cousin. Schleiermacher's German translation is incomparably the best, but is unfortunately incomplete. There is an Italian translation by Dardi Benso. The versions of separate dialogues in different languages are too numerous to be noticed.

We have space to notice only the following out of the very numerous works written in illustration of Plato: — Platonis Dialogorum Argumenta Exposita et Illustrata, by Tiedemann (Bip. 1786); System der Platonischen Philosophie, by Tennemann (4 vols. 8vo. Leipz. 1792—5); Initia Philosophiae Platonicae, by P. G. Van Heusde (ed. ii. Lugd. Bat. 1842); Platonis Leben und Schriften, by G. A. F. Ast (Leipz. 1816); Geschichte und System der Platonischen Philosophie, by C. F. Hermann (Heidel. 1838); Platonis De Ideis et Numeris Doctrina ex Aristotelis Illustrata, by F. A. Trendelenburg (Lips. 1826); Platonicus Studien, by E. Zeller (Tübing. 1839). There are also numerous smaller treatises by Büch, C. F. Hermann, Stallbaum, &c., which may be consulted with profit. Schleiermacher's introductions to some of the dialogues have been translated and published in a separate form in English.

PLATONIUS (Πλατώνιος), a grammairian, of whom all that we know is that a treatise bearing his name is generally prefixed to the editions of Aristophanes. It is entitled Περὶ διαφόρων κωμωδίων. The subject is the difference between volumes containing the various readings, and portions of the commentary of Proclus on the Cratylus, edited by Boissonade.

PLATORI'NUS, a cognomen of the Sulpicia gens, which occurs only upon coins, one of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Augustus with the legend ΚΑΕΣΑΡ ΑΥΓΙΣΤΟΣ, the reverse the head of M. Agrippa, with the legend PLATORIINVS HIEIV. M. AGRIPPA (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 317.)

PLAUTIANUS.

PLAUTIA GENS, plebeian. The name is also written Plotius, just as we have both Claudius and Claudius. The first person of this gens who obtained the consulship was C. Plautius Proculus in b.c. 338; and from that time down to the imperial period many of the Plautii held at different intervals the highest offices in the state. Under the republic we find the cognomina of DECIANUS, HYPSAIUS, PROCULUS, SILVANUS, VENNO, VENOX: and to these there were still further additions in the time of the empire, a list of which is given below. A few of the Plautii occur without any surname; and of them an account is also given below. Those persons whose names are usually written Plotius are spoken of under this form. The only cognomina occurring on coins are Hypsaeus and Plancus; and the latter surname does not properly belong to the Plautii, but was retained by Munatius Plancus after he had been adopted by L. Plautius. [Plancus, No. 5.]

PLAUTIA URGULANILLA, the first wife of the emperor Claudius, who divorced her on account of her low conduct, and of her being suspected of murder. She bore two children during her marriage, Drusus, who died at Pompeii in a. d. 20 [Drusus, No. 23], and Claudius, whom she had by a freedman of Claudius, and who was therefore exposed by command of the emperor. (Suet. Claud. 26, 27.)

PLAUTIA'NUS, L. (or C.) FULVIUS, an African by birth, the fellow-townsmen and probably a connection of Septimius Severus. He served as prefect of the praetorium under this emperor, who loaded him with honours and wealth, deferred to his opinion upon all important points of state policy, granted all his requests, and virtually made over much of the imperial authority into his hands. Intoxicated by these distinctions Plautianus indulged in the most despotism tyranny, and perpetrated acts of cruelty almost beyond belief. His capriciousness was boundless: no state, no province, no city escaped his exactions; in Rome he plundered all whose wealth excited his avarice, contrived the banishment or death of every one who impeded or thwarted his schemes, and ventured to treat with contumely even the empress Domna and her sons. He reached the pinnacle of his ambition when Severus in the year A.D. 202 selected his daughter Plautilla as the wife of Caracalla, and on that occasion the presentator declared would have sufficed for fifty queens. But even gratified ambition brought him no happiness. His external appearance gave evidence of a mind ill at ease: when seen in public he was ever deadly pale, and shone with nervous agitation, partly, says Dion Cassius who was himself an eye-witness of these things, from the irremediabilities of his life and diet, and partly from the hopes by which he was excited, and the torments by which he was tormented. But the high fortunes of this second Sejanus were short-lived. Having soon discovered the dislike cherished by Caracalla towards both his daughter and himself, and looking forward with apprehension to the downfall which awaited him upon the death of the sovereign, he resolved to anticipate these threatened disasters by effecting the destruction of his benefactor and of his son-in-law. His treachery was discovered, he was suddenly summoned to the palace, and there put to death in A.D. 203. His property was confiscated, his daughter banished, and his name erased from the public monuments on which it had been inscribed side by side with those of the emperor and the royal family. We ought to remark that the treason of Plautianus received the warmest approbation of Herodotus for Dion Cassius rather leans to the belief that this charge was fabricated by Caracalla for the ruin of an oxblood favourite. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 14—16, lxxvi. 2—9, lxxvii. 1; Herodian, iii. 13. § 7, iv. 6. § 7; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 224.) [W. R.]

PLAUTIUS, QUINTILLUS, a senator of high rank, blameless life and retired habits, who when far advanced in years was rashly put to death by Septimius Severus upon some vague suspicion. His last words have been preserved by Dion Cassius (lxxvi. 7). [W. R.]

PLAUTII/LA, FULVIA, daughter of Plautianus [PLAUTIANUS] praefect of the praetorium under Septimius Severus, by whom she was selected as the bride of his eldest son. This union, which took place in A.D. 202, proved most unhappy, for Caracalla was from the first averse to the match, and even after the marriage was concluded virtually refused to acknowledge her as his wife. Upon the disgrace and death of her father she was banished, first, it would appear, to Sicily, and subsequently to Lipara, where she was treated with the greatest harshness, and supplied with scarcely the necessaries of life. After the murder of Geta in A.D. 212, Plautilla was put to death by order of her husband. According to the narrative of Dion Cassius, who represents her a woman of most profligate life, a very short period, not more, probably, than a few months, intervened between her marriage and exile, a statement which it is extremely difficult to reconcile with the fact that a vast number of coins were struck in honour of this princess, not only in the city but in the more distant provinces. She had a brother, Plautius, who shared her banishment and her fate. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 6, lxxvii. 1.; Herodian, iii. 13. § 7, iv. 6. § 7; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 225.) [W. R.]

COIN OF PLAUTILLA.

PLAUTIUS. 1. A comic poet, some of whose comedies were erroneously ascribed to Plautus, as we learn from Varro (Geil, ii. 12). 2. A Plautius was sent by the emperor Claudius in A.D. 43 to subdue Britain. As he is called both by Tacitus and Suetonius a man of consular rank, he is perhaps the same as the A. Plautius, who was one of the consules suffecti in A.D. 29. Plautius remained in Britain four years, and subdued after a severe struggle, the southern part of the island. Vespasian, who was afterwards emperor, served under him and distinguished himself greatly in the war. In the first campaign Claudius himself passed over to Britain, and on his return to Rome celebrated a triumph for the victories which he pretended to have gained. Plautius came back to the city in A.D. 47, and was allowed by Claudius the unusual honour of an ovation; and to show the favour in which he was held by the emperor, the latter walked by his side both on his way to and his return from the Capitol. When subsequently his wife Pomponia Graecina was accused of religious worship unauthorised by the state, her husband was granted the privilege of deciding upon the case himself, according to the custom of the old Roman law. (Dion Cass. lxx. 19—21, 30; Suet. Claud. 24, Vesp. 4; Tac. Agr. 14, Ann. xii. 32.)

3. Q. PLAUTIUS, consul A.D. 36 with Sex. Papirius Alienus. (Dion Cass. ivii. 26; Tac. Ann. vi. 40; Plin. H. N. x. 2.)

4. A. PLAUTIUS, a youth slain by Nero. (Suet. Ner. 35.)

5. Son of Fulvius Plautianus [PLAUTIANUS], upon the downfall of his father was banished along with his sister Plautilla [PLAUTILLA] to Lipara, where he was subsequently put to death by Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 7, lxxvii. 1.; Herodian iii. 13. § 7, iv. 6. § 7.)

PLAUTIUS, a Roman jurist, who is not mentioned by Pomponia, though he lived before Pomponia. That he was a jurist of some note may be inferred from the fact that Paulus wrote eighteen Libri ad Plautum [PAULUS, JULIUS]. Javelones also wrote five books ad Plautum or ex Plautio, and Pomponia seven books. Plautius cited Cassius (Dig. 34. tit. 2. s. 8) and Proculus (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 43), and was cited by Nepotius Priscus, who wrote Libri ex Plautio [NERATIUS PRISCUS]. Plautius therefore lived about the time of Vespasian. (Grotilus, Vitae Jurisconsult.; Zimmern, Geschichte des Rom. Privatrechts., p. 322; Vatican.)

PLAUTUS LATERANUS. [LATERA- NUS.]

PLAUTUS, NOVIUS, a Roman artist, in the department of ornamental metal-work (coelatatura). He was the maker of one of the most admired of those cylindrical bronze caskets (cistae mystice), which are found in tombs in Italy, containing pat- tene, mirrors, and utensils of the bath, such as strigils. The greatest number of such caskets have been found at Prineste, where some of them seem to have been laid up in the temple of Fortune, as votive offerings from women. The one which bears the name of Plautius is beautifully engraved with subjects from the Argonautic expedition; a hunt is engraved round the lid, which is surmounted by three figures in bronze; and on the lid is the fol- lowing inscription: on the one side, DINDIA. MA- COLINA. PILÉA. DEBIAT,—on the other, NOVIOS. PLAUTIUS. MED. (me) ROMAL. FEIT. From the style of the workmanship and of the inscription, the date of the artist is supposed to be about A. u. 500, b. c. 254. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, b. viii. c. 4. § 7; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 173, n. 4.) [P.S.]

PLAUTUS QUINTILLUS. [QUINTIL- LUS.]

PLAUTUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

PLAUTUS, the most celebrated comic poet of Rome, was a native of Sarsina, a small village in Umbria. Almost the only particulars, which we possess respecting his life, are contained in a pas- sage of A. Gallus (iii. 3), which is quoted from Varro. According to this account it would appear that Plautus was of humble origin (compara Plau- tine prosapia homo, Minuc. Felix, Oct. 14), and that he came to Rome at an early age. Varro re- lated that the poet was first employed as a work- man or a menial for the actors on the stage (in operis artificem sceniciorum), and that he gained a livelihood, was employed in some business, but that having lost all his money in trade, he returned to Rome, and, in order to gain a living, was obliged to work at a hand-mill, grinding corn for a baker. Varro further adds that while employed in this work (in pistorio), he wrote three comedies, the Satturio, Addictus, and a third, of which the name is not mentioned. Hiero- nymus, in the Chronicle of Eusebius, gives almost the same account, which he probably also derived from Varro. It would seem that it was only for the sake of varying the narrative that he wrote "that as often as Plautus had leisure, he was ac- customed to write plays and sell them."

This is all that we know for certain respecting the life of Plautus; but even this little has not been correctly stated by most authors of his life. Thus Lessing, in his life of the poet, relates that Plautus early commenced writing plays for the aediles, and acquired thereby a sufficient sum of money to enable him to embark in business. It is the more necessary to call attention to this error, since, from the great authority of Lessing, it has been repeated in most subsequent biographies of the poet. The words of Gallus, in operis artificem sceniciorum, have no reference to the composition of plays. The artificial scenici are the actors, who employed servants to attend to various things which they needed for the stage, and a servant of such a kind was called an operarius, as we see from funerary inscriptions. Moreover, if Plautus had previously written passages for the stage, which must have already gained him some reputation, it is not likely that he should have been compelled on his return to Rome to engage in the menial office of a grinder at a mill for the sake of obtaining a livelihood. On the contrary, it is much more probable that the comedies which he composed in the mill, were the first that he ever wrote, and that the reputation and money which he acquired by them enabled him to abandon his menial mode of life.

The age of Plautus has been a subject of no small controversy. Cicero says (Brut. 15) that he died in the consulship of P. Claudius and L. Por- cius, when Cato was censor, that is, in b. c. 184; and there is no reason to doubt this express state- ment. It is true that Hieronymus, in the Chron- icom of Eusebius, places his death in the 145th Olympiad, fourteen years earlier (n. c. 200); but the dates of Hieronymus are frequently erroneous, and this one in particular deserves all the less credit, since we know that the Pseudolus was not repre- sented till n. c. 191, and the Bacchides somewhat later, according to the probable supposition of Ritschl. But though the date of Plautus's death seems certain, the time of his birth is a more doubtful point. Ritschl, who has examined the subject with great diligence and acumen in his essay De Actata Plauti, supposes that he was born about the beginning of the sixth century of the city (about b. c. 254), and that he commenced his career as a comic poet about b. c. 224, when he was thirty years of age. This supposition is con- firmed by the fact that Cicero speaks (Cat. 14) of the Pseudolus, which was acted in b. c. 191, as written by Plautus when he was an old man, an epi- thet which Cicero would certainly have given to no one under thirty years of age; and also by the circumstance that in another passage of Cicero (quoted by Augustine, De Civ. Dei, ii. 9), Plautus and Naevius are spoken of as the contemporaries of P. and Cn. Scipio, of whom the former was consul in b. c. 222, and the latter in b. c. 218. The principal objection to the above-mentioned date for the birth of Plautus, arises from a passage of Cicero, in his Tusculan Disputationes (i. 1), according to which it would appear that Plautus and Naevius were younger than Ennius, who was born in b. c. 239. But we know that this cannot be true of Naevius; and Ritschl has shown that the passage, when rightly interpreted, refers to Livius, and not to Ennius, being older than Naevius and Plautus. Indeed, Cicero, in another of his works (H. R. 18. 258), says that a certain Naevius sparsus (aliquanto) older than Ennius, and states that Naevius and Plautus had exhibited many plays before the consulship of C. Cornelius and Q. Minucius, that is, before b. c. 197. Moreover, from the way in which Naevius and Plautus are mentioned together, we may con- clude that the latter was older than Ennius. Te- rence, therefore, in his Prologue to the Andria (v. 18), has preserved the chronological order, when he speaks of "Naevium, Plautum, Ennium." We may safely assign the second Punic war and a few years subsequently, as the flourishing period of the literary life of Plautus.

poet has been erroneously given in all editions of Plautus from the revival of learning down to the present day. Ritschl first pointed out, in an essay published in 1842, that the real name of the poet was T. Maccius Plautus, and not M. Accius Plautus, as we find in all printed editions. It would take too much space to copy the proofs of this fact, which are perfectly satisfactory. We need only state here that in not a single manuscript is the poet called M. Accius Plautus, but almost always Plautus simply, Plautus Comicus, or Plautus Comicus Poeta. Ritschl was first led to the discovery of the real name of the poet by finding, in the Palimpsest manuscript in the Ambrosian library at Milan, the plays entitled T. MacCI PlavVI, and not M. Acci Plauti. He has shown that the two names of M. Accius have been manufactured out of the one of Maccius, just as the converse has happened to the author of the Noctes Atticae, whose two names of A. Gellius have been frequently contracted into Agellius. Ritschl has restored the true name of the poet in the prologues to two of his plays, where the present reading bears evident marks of corruption. Thus in the prologue to the Mercator (v. 10), we ought to read “Eadem Latine Mercator MacCI Titi,” instead of “Eadem Latine Mercator Marci Acci;” and in the prologue to the Asinoria (v. 11), “Demphilus scripsit, Macciae votit barbarae” is the true reading, and not “Demophilus scripsit, Marcus votit barbarae.”

T. Maccius was the original name of the poet. The surname of Plautus was given him from the flatness of his feet, according to the testimony of Festus (p. 236, ed. Müller), who further states that people with flat feet were called Ploti by the Umbrians. But besides Plautus we find another surname given to the poet in many manuscripts and several editions, namely, that of Asinicus. In all these instances, however, he is always called Plautus Asinius, never Asinii Plautus, so that it would appear that Asinius was not regarded as his gentile name, but as a cognomen. Hence some modern writers have supposed that he had two cognomina, and that the surname of Asinus was given to him in contempt, from the fact of his working at a mill, which was usually the work of an ass (Asinus), and that this surname was changed by the copyists into Asinii. But this explanation of the origin of the surname is in itself exceedingly improbable; and if Asinii was a regular cognomen of the poet, it is inconceivable that we should find no mention of it in any of the ancient writers. Ritschl, however, has pointed out the true origin of the name, and has proved quite satisfactorily, however improbable the state-

Having thus discussed the chief points connected with the life of our poet, we may sum up the results in a few words. T. Maccius Plautus was born at Rome in needful circumstances, and was first employed in the service of the actors. With the money he had saved in this inferior station he left Rome and set up in business; but his speculations failed; he returned to Rome, and his necessities obliged him to enter the service of a baker, who employed him in turning a hand-mill. While in this degrading occupation he wrote three plays, the sale of which to the managers of the public games enabled him to quit his drudgery, and begin his literary career. He was then probably about 30 years of age (n. c. 224), and accordingly commenced writing comedies a few years before the breaking out of the Second Punic War. He continued his literary occupation for about forty years, and died n. c. 184, when he was seventy years of age. His contemporaries at first were Livius Andronicus and Naevius, afterwards Ennius and Caecilius; Te-evidence of having been composed by him. 3. Those which were not assigned to Plautus by the authorities, or were even attributed to other writers, but which appeared to Varro to have such internal evidence in their favour (adulescens fili type fragilis sermenis Plauto congruentis), that he did not hesitate to regard them as the genuine works of the poet. To this third class, which naturally contained but few, the Boeotia belonged. There is a statement of Servius in the introduction to his commentary on the Aeneid, that according to some, Plautus wrote twenty-one, according to others forty, and, according to others again, a hundred comedies. Ritschl supposes, with great ingenuity, that the forty comedies, to which Servius alludes, were those which Varro regarded as genuine, the twenty-one, which were called pre-eminently Varroianae, belonging to the first class, spoken of above, and the other nineteen being comprised in the second and third classes.

In order to understand clearly the difficulties which Roman critics experienced in determining which were the genuine plays of Plautus, we should bear in mind the circumstances under which they were composed. Like the dramas of Shakspeare and Lope de Vega they were written for the stage, and not for the reading public. Such a public, in fact, did not exist at the time of Plautus. His plays were produced for representation at the great public games, and, content with the applause of his contemporaries and the pay which he received, he did not care for the subsequent fate of his works. A few patrons of literature, such as the Scipios, may have preserved copies of the works; but the chief inducement to their preservation was the interest of the managers of the different troops of actors, the domini gregis, who had originally engaged the poet to write the comedies, and had paid him for them, and to whom the manuscripts accordingly belonged. It was the interest of these persons to preserve the manuscripts, since they were not always obliged to bring forth new pieces, but were frequently paid by the magistrates for the representation of plays that had been previously acted. That the plays of Plautus were performed after his death is stated in several authorities, and may be seen even from some of the prologues (e. g. the Prologue to the Casina). But when, towards the middle of the sixth century of the city, one dramatic poet arose after another, and the taste for stricter imitations from the Greek began to prevail, the comedies of Plautus gradually fell into neglect, and consequently the contractors for the public games ceased to care about their preservation. Towards the latter end of the century, however, no new comic poets appeared; and since new comedies ceased to be brought before the public, attention was naturally recalled to the older dramas. In this manner Plautus began to be popular again, and his comedies were again frequently brought upon the stage. Owing, however, to the neglect which his works had sustained, it would appear that doubts had arisen respecting the genuineness of many of his plays, and that several were produced under his name, of which the authorship was at least uncertain. Thus the grammarians, who began to draw up lists of his plays in the seventh century of the city, had no small difficulties to encounter; and the question respecting the genuineness of certain plays was a fertile subject of controversy. Besides the treatise of Varro already mentioned, which was the standard work on the subject, A. Gellius (i. e.) also refers to lists of his comedies drawn up by Aelius, Sedigitius, Claudius, Aurelius, Accius, and Mani-lius.

After the publication of Varro's work, the twenty-one comedies, which he regarded as unquestionably genuine, were the ones most fre-cently used, and of which copies were chiefly preserved. These Varroian comedies are the same as those which have come down to our own time, with the loss of one. At present we possess only twenty comedies of Plautus; but there were originally twenty-one in the manuscripts, and the Vidularia, which was the twenty-first, and which came last in the collection, was torn off from the manuscript in the middle ages. The last-mentioned play was extant in the time of Priscian, who was only acquainted with the twenty-one Varroian plays. The ancient Codex of Camerarius has at the conclusion of the Truculentus the words which follow: the Vidularia, and the Philochorus. Ritschel's most important list also contains several lines from the Vidularia.

The titles of the twenty-one Varroian plays, of which, as we have already remarked, twenty are still extant, are: 1. Amphitruo. 2. Asinaria. 3. Aulularia. 4. Captivi. 5. Curculio. 6. Casina. 7. Cistellaria. 8. Epidicus. 9. Bacchides. 10. Most-ably not the one in which they were originally arranged by Varro. The present order is evidently alphabetical; the initial letter of the title of each play is alone regarded, and no attention is paid to those which follow: hence we find Captivi, Cur-culio, Casina, Cistellaria: Mostellaria, Menaechmi, Miles, Mercator: Pseudolus, Poenulus, Persa. The play of the Bacchides forms the only exception to the alphabetical order. It was probably placed after the Epidicus by some copyist, because he had oberved that Plautus, in the Bacchides (ii. 2. 36), referred to the Epidicus as an earlier work. The alphabetical arrangement is attributed by many to Priscian, to whom is also assigned the short acrostic argument prefixed to each play; but there is no certainty on this point, and the Latinity of the acrostic arguments is too pure to have been composed so late as the time of Priscian. The names of the comedies are either taken from some leading character in the play, or from some circumstance which occurs in it: those titles ending in .aria are adjectives, giving a general description of the play; thus Asinaria is the "Ass-Comedy." Besides those twenty-one plays we have already remarked, that Varro, according to Ritschl's conjecture, regarded nineteen others as the genuine productions of Plautus, though not supported by an equal amount of testimony as the twenty-one. Ritschel has collected from various authorities the titles of these nineteen plays. They are as follows: 22. Saturio. 23. Ad-em. 27. Trigemini. 28. Astrara. 29. Parasitus niger. 30. Parasitus medicus. 31. Comomrientes. 32. Condalunm. 33. Gemini leones. 34. Foenenatix. 35. Frivialonia. 36. Sidellitergia. 37. Fugitivi. 38. Caciatio. 39. Hortulo. 40. Artemo. Of the still larger number of comedies commonly ascribed to Plautus, but not recognised by Varro, the titles of only a few have been preserved. They are:—
1. Colax. 2. Carbonaria. 3. Acharistio. 4. Bis compressa. 5. Anni. 6. Agroecus. 7. Dyscolus.
Caecus or Prudones. Thus we have the titles of 21 Varronian comedies of the first class, 19 of the second and third classes, and 13 comedies not acknowledged by Varro, in all 53. Accordingly, if there were 130 comedies bearing the name of Plautus, we have lost all notice of 77. There is a play entitled Querulatus or Aulularia, which bears the name of Plautus in the manuscripts, and is quoted under his name by Servius (ad Virg. Aen.
il. 226). It is evidently, however, not the production of our poet, and was probably written in the third or fourth century of the Christian era.
The best edition of it is by Klinkhammer, entitled,
"Querolus sive Aulularia, incerti auctoris comicedia togata," Amsterdam, 1829.

The comedies of Plautus enjoyed unrivalled popularity among the Romans. Of this we have a proof in their repeated representations after the poet's death, to which we have already alluded.
In a house at Pompeii a ticket was found for admission to the representation of the Casina of Plautus (see Orelli, Inscrip. No. 2539), which must consequently have been performed at that time, shortly before its destruction in A.D. 79; and we learn from Arnobius that the Amphitruo was acted in the reign of Diocletian. The continued popularity of Plautus, through so many centuries, was owing, in a great measure, to his being a national poet. For though his comedies belong to the Comedia paliata, and were taken, for the most part, from the poets of the new Attic comedy, we should do great injustice to Plautus
if we regarded him as a slavish imitator of the Greeks. Though he founds his plays upon Greek models, the characters in them act, speak, and joke like genuine Romans, and he thereby secured the sympathy of his audience more completely than Terence could ever have done. Whether Plautus borrowed the plan of all his plays from Greek models, it is impossible to say. The Cistellaria, Bacchides, Poenulus, and Stichus were taken from Me-nander, the Casina and Rudens from Diphilus, and the Mercator and the Trinummus from Philemon, and many others were undoubtedly founded upon Greek originals. But in all cases Plautus allowed himself much greater liberty than Terence; and in some instances he appears to have simply taken the leading idea of the play from the Greek, and to have filled it up in his own fashion. It has been inferred from a well-known line of Horace (Epist. ii. 1. 58), "Plautus ad exemplar Sicilii properear Epicharmi," that Plautus took great pains to imitate Epicharmus. But there is no correspondence between any of the existing plays of Plautus, and the known titles of the comedies of Epicharmus; and the verb properare probably has reference only to the livelihood and energy of Plautus's style, in which he bore a resemblance to the Sicilian poet. Another mistake has arisen from the statement of Jerome (Ep. 57, 101) that Plautus imitated the poets of the old Attic comedy, but the only resemblance he bears to them is in the coarseness and boldness of his jokes. He borrowed to a slight extent from the middle Attic comedy; from which the Amphitruo was taken; but, as we have already remarked, it was the poets of the new Attic comedy whom Plautus took as his models.

It was, however, not only with the common people that Plautus was a favourite; educated Romans read and admired his works down to the latest times. The purity of his language and the refinement and good-humour of his wit are celebrated in particular by the ancient critics. The grammarians L. Aelius Stilo used to say, and Varro adopted his words, "that the Muses would use the language of Plautus, if they were to speak Latin." (Apud Quintil. x. 1. § 99.) In the same manner A. Gallius constantly praises the language of Plautus in the highest terms, and in one passage
(vii. 17) speaks of him as "homo linguae attque elegentiae in verbis Latinae princeps." Cicero (de Off. i. 29) places his wit on a par with that of the old Attic comedy, and St. Jerome used to console himself with the perusal of the poet after spending many nights in tears, on account of his past sins.
The freewill and jests; but it must be remembered that the taste of Horace had been formed by a different school of literature, and that he disliked the ancient poets of his country. Lessing, however, has shown that the censure of Horace probable does not refer to the general character of Plautus's poetry, but merely to his inharmonious verses and to some of his jests. And it must be admitted that only a blind admiration of the poet can fail to recognise some truth in the censure of Horace. Prosperity and metre are not always strictly attended to, and there is frequently a want of harmony in his verses. His jests, also, are often coarse, and sometimes puerile; but it must be recollected that they were intended to please the lower classes of Rome, and were accordingly adapted to the tastes of the day. The objections brought against the jokes of Plautus are equally applicable to those of Shakspere.

The text of Plautus has come down to us in a very corrupt state. It contains many lacunae and interpolations. Thus the Aulularia has lost its commencement, the Bacchides its commencement, &c.;
and we find in the grammarians several quotations from the existing plays of Plautus which are not found in our present copies. The interpo-lations are still more numerous than the lacunae, and were for the most part made for the purpose of supplying gaps in the original manuscript. Some of these were introduced in ancient times, as is proved by their existence in the Palmipess manuscript at

Milan, which is as old as the fifth century, but most of them were executed at the revival of learning, and evidently betray their modern origin. See the essay of Niebuhr on this subject, entitled "Ueber die als untergriechisch bezeichneten Scenen im Plautus," in his "Kleine Schriften," vol. i. p. 159, &c. The corruptions of the text are owing to the fact that all the existing manuscripts of Plautus, with the exception of the Milan Palimpsest, are derived from one common source. The editors of Plautus, however, have not founded the text upon the best existing manuscripts. These are the Codex vetus and decurtatus, which must, in connection with the Palimpsest manuscript of Milan, form the basis with any future editor for a restoration of the genuine text. (See Ritschl, "Ueber die Kritik des Plautus," in the Rheinisches Museum, vol. iv. p. 153, &c.) It appears that the comedies of Plautus were, at an early time, divided into two parts, the first containing eight plays (Amphitruo — Epidicus), the second the remaining twelve (Bacchides — Truculentus.) The last twelve plays were not at first known in Italy at the revival of learning; they were discovered in Germany about 1430, and from thence conveyed to Italy. It may be mentioned in passing, that this division of the plays into two parts accounts for the loss of the beginning of the Bacchides, which was the first play of the volume, and the commencement of which might therefore have been easily torn away. The edicto princeps of the complete works of Plautus was published at Venice, by Georgius Mela- rula, in 1472. There was a still earlier edition of the first eight plays of Plautus (Amphitruo—Epi- dicus), printed at Venice, without date, of which probably only one copy is now in existence, preserved in the public library at Venice. Niebuhr called attention to this edition (Kleine Schriften, vol. i. p. 176, &c.), but it had been previously noticed by Harles (Suppl. ad Brev. Notit. Lit. Rom. part ii. p. 488). Of the other earlier editions the best are those by Camerarius, Basel, 1558; and by Lambinus, Paris, 1576; by Taubmann, Wittenberg, 1605; by Pareus, Frankfort, 1610; by Gruter, with Taubmann's commentary, Wittenberg, 1621; by J. Fr. Gronovius, Leyden, 1664, reprinted at the same place in 1669, at Amsterdam in 1684, and again at Leipzig, under the care of J. A. Ernesti, in 1760. The best modern editions of the complete works of Plautus are by Bothe, Berlin, 1809—1811, 4 vols. 8vo, again at Stuttgart, 1829, 4 vols. 8vo, and lastly at Leipzig, 1834, 2 vols. 8vo; and by Weise, Quedlinburg, 1837—1838, 2 vols. 8vo. There are some editions of the separate plays of Plautus which deserve particular recommendation. These are the Captivi, Miles, and Trinummus, by Linde mann, Leipzig, 1844, 24 editions; the Miles by Ritschl Halle, 1863; and the Trinummus by Hermann, Leipzig, 1890. Plautus has been translated into almost all the European languages. In English some of the plays were translated by Echard in 1716, by Cooke in 1754, and by Cotter in 1827; and there is a translation in English of all the works of Plautus by Thornton and Warner, 1767—1774, 5 vols. 8vo. In French we have the translations of the Amphitruo, Epidicus, and Rudens, by Madame Dacier, 1683, and of the complete works by Li- miers, Amsterdam, 1719, 10 vols. 8vo, and by Guenoleve, Leyden, 1719, 10 vols. 8vo. In German there are several translations of single plays, of which Lessing's excellent translation of the Captivi deserves to be particularly mentioned. There is likewise a translation in German of the complete works by Kuffner, Vienna, 1806—1807, 5 vols. 8vo, of nine of the plays by Köpke, Berlin, 1809-20, 2 vols. 8vo, and of eight by Rapp, Stuttgart, 1833-46.

Plautus, C. RubelliUS, was the son of Rubellius Blandus [Blanous] and of Julia, the daughter of Drusus, the son of the emperor Tibe- rius. Plautus was thus the great-grandson of Tiberius, and the great-great-grandson of Augustus, in consequence of Tiberius having been adopted by Augustus. Descended thus from the founder of the Roman empire, Plautus incurred the jealousy of Nero. He was involved in the accusations which Junia Silana brought against Agrippina in A. D. 55, whom she accused of a design of marrying Plautus, and raising him to the imperial throne. Five years afterwards, A. D. 60, a comet appeared, which, according to the popular opinion, was thought to forebode a change in the empire. The people thereupon were set thinking who would be Nero's successor; and no one appeared to them so fit as Rubellius Plautus. Although the latter lived in the most quiet manner, avoiding the popular notice, and harboring no traitorous de- signs, Nero wrote to him, recommending him to withdraw from the city to his estates in Asia. Such advice was, of course, equivalent to a com- mand; Plautus accordingly retired to Asia with his wife Antistia, the daughter of L. Antistius Vetus, and employed himself in his exile in the study of the Stoic philosophy. But even in this retreat he was not safe; for Tigellinus having again excited the fears of Nero in A. D. 62 against Plautus, he was murdered in Asia by command of the emperor. Many of his friends advised him to take up arms to resist his executioner; and his father-in-law, Antistius Vetus wrote to him to the same effect; but Plautus preferred death to an uncertain struggle for the empire. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19, xiv. 22, 57, 59; Dion Cass. lix. 14; Juv. viii. 39.)

Pleiades. (Πελιάδες or Πελείαδες), the Pleiads, are called daughters of Atlas by Pleione (or by the Oceanid Aethra, Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1155), of Erechtheus (Serv. ad Aen. i. 744), of Cadmus (Theoc, ad Arat. p. 22), or of the queen of the Amazons. (Schol. ad Theocrit. xiii. 23.) They were the sisters of the Hyades, and seven in number, six of whom are described as visible, and the seventh as invisible. Some call the seventh Sterope, and relate that she became invisible from shame, because she alone among her sisters had had intercourse with a mortal man; others call her Electra, and make her disappear from the choir of her sisters on account of her grief at the destruction of the house of Dardanus (Hygin. Fab. 192, Poet. Astr. ii. 21). The Pleiades are said to have made away with themselves from grief at the death of their sisters, the Hyades, or at the fate of their father, Atlas, and were afterwards placed as stars at the back of Taurus, where they form a cluster resembling a bunch of grapes, whence they were sometimes called Bótrus (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1155). According to another story, the Pleiades were virgin companions of Artemis, and, together with their mother Pleione, were pursued by the hunter Orion in Bocotia; their prayer to be rescued from him was heard by the gods, and they were metamorphosed into doves (πελεάδες), and placed among the stars (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 21; Schol. C, Apoll. Rhod. iii. 229; Pind. Nem. ii. 17). The rising of the Pleiades in Italy was about the beginning of May, and their setting about the beginning of November. Their names are Electra, Maia, Taygete, Alcyone, Celaeno, Sterope, and Merope (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 219, comp. 149; Apollod. iii. 10 § 1). The scholar of Theocritus (xiii. 25) gives the following different set of names: Coccymo, Plancia, Protis, Parthenia, Maia, Stonychia, Lampatho. (Comp. Hom. ii. xviii. 486, Od. v. 272; Ov. Fast. iv. 169, &c.; Hyades; and Ideler, Untersuch. über die Sternennamen, p. 144.)

PLEISTONE (Πληιστόνη), a daughter of Oceanus, and mother of the Pleiades by Atlas. (Apollod. iii. 10 § 1; Pind. Fragm. 53; comp. Atlas; Pleades.)

PLEISTAE'NETUS (Πλείσταινετός), an Athenian painter, the brother of Phidias, is mentioned by Plutarch (De Glor. Athen. ii. p. 346) among the Aeginetan painters of the time of the Alexander. He married the daughter of Nicias, and is supposed to have painted victories, battles, and heroes but there is no other mention of him.

PLEISTARCHUS (Πλείσταρχος), 1. King of Sparta, of the line of the Agids, was the son and successor of the heroic Leonidas, who was killed at Thermopylae, b. c. 489. He was a mere child at the time of his father's death, on which account the regency was assumed by his cousin Pausanias, who commanded the Greeks at Plataea. (Herod. ix. 10; Paus. iii. 4 § 9.) It appears that the latter continued to administer affairs in the name of the young king till his own death, about b. c. 467 (Thuc. i. 132). Whether Pleistarchus was then of age to take the reins of government into his own hands we know not, but Pausanias tells us that he died shortly after assuming the sovereignty, while it appears, from the date assigned by Diodorus to the reign of his successor Pleistophonax, that his death could not have taken place till the year b. c. 458. (Paus. iii. 5 § 1; Diod. xiii. 75; Clinton, E. II. vol. ii. p. 210.) No particulars of his reign are recorded to us.

2. Son of Antipater and brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He is first mentioned in the year b. c. 313, when he was left by his brother in the command of Chaleis, to make head against Ptolemy, the general of Antigonus, when Cassander himself was recalled to the defence of Macedonia. (Diod. xix. 77.) Again, in b. c. 302, when the general coalition was formed against Antigonus, Pleistarchus was sent forward by his brother, with an army of 12,000 foot and 500 horses, to join Lysimachus in Asia. As the Hellespont and entrance of the Euxine was occupied by Demetrius, he endeavoured to transport his troops from Odessus direct to Heraclea, but lost by far the greater part on the passage, some having been captured by the enemy's ships, while others perished in a storm, in which Pleistarchus himself narrowly escaped shipwreck. (Id. xx. 112.) Notwithstanding this misfortune, he seems to have rendered efficient service to the confederates, for which he was rewarded after the battle of Ipsus (b. c. 301) by obtaining the province of Cilicia, as an independent government. This, however, he did not long retain, being expelled from it in the following year, by Demetrius, almost without opposition. (Plut. Demetri. 31.) Hereupon he returned to his brother Cassander, and from this time he heard no more of him. Pleistarchus was thus as having been defeated by the Athenians in an action in which he commanded the cavalry and auxiliaries of Cassander; but the period at which this event took place is uncertain. (Paus. i. 15 § 1.) It is perhaps to him that the medical writer, Diocles of Carystus, addressed his work, which is cited more than once by Athenaeus, as τὰ πρὸς Πλείσταρχου Τρειμά (Athen. vii. p. 329, d, 324, f.)

PLEISTO' LicATES, a son of Attalus, and husband of Erope or Eriphyle, the daughter of Catreus, by whom he became the father of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibia (Apollod. ii. 2 § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Aeschyl. Agam. 1569; comp. Agamemnon; Attreus). A son of Thyestes, who was killed by Attalus, was likewise called Pleisthenes. (Hygin. Fab. 80.)

PLEISTOANAX (Πλείστοαναξ), the nineteenth king of Sparta in the line of the Agides, and father of the mortal Pausanias who perished at Plataea in b. c. 479. On the death of Pleistarchus, in b. c. 458, without issue, Pleistoonax succeeded to the throne, being yet a minor, so that in the expedition of the Lacedaemonians in behalf of the Doriens against Phocis, in b. c. 457, his uncle Nicomedes, son of Cleombrotus, commanded for him. (Thuc. i. 107; Diod. xi. 79; Paus. i. 13, iii. 5.) In b. c. 445 he led in person an invasion into Attica, being however, in consequence of his youth, accompanied by Cleandridas as a counsellor. The premature withdrawal of his army from the enemy's territory exposed both Cleandridas and himself to the suspicion of having been bribed by Pericles, and, according to Plutarch, while Cleandridas fled from Sparta and was condemned to death in his absence, the young king was punished by a heavy fine, which he was unable to pay, and was therefore obliged to leave his country. Pleistoonax remained nineteen years in exile, taking refuge at first in the temple of Zeus on Mount Lycaeus in Arcadia, and having half his house within the sacred precincts that he might enjoy the benefit of the sanctuary. During this period his son Pausanias, a minor, reigned in his stead. The Spartans at length recalled him in b. c. 426, in obedience to the repeated injunctions of the Delphic oracle,—

"to bring back the seed of the demi-god, the son of Zeus; else they should plough with a silver plough;"—and his restoration was accompanied.

with solemn dances and sacrifices, such as those with which the first kings of his race had been inaugurated. But he was accused of having tampered with the Pythian priestess to induce her to interpose for him, and his alleged impurity in this matter was continually assigned by his enemies as the cause of all Spartain's misfortunes in the war; and therefore it was that he used all his influence to bring about peace with Athens in B.C. 421. (Thuc. i. 114, ii. 21, iii. 26, v. 16, 19, 24; Arist. Nub. 849; Ephor. ap. Schol. ad loc.; Plut. Per. 22, N. 28; Diod. xiii. 106.) [C]L[

PLEURATUS (Πλευράτος). 1. Father of Agron, king of Ilyria (Polyb. ii. 2), as well as in all probability of Scerdilidas also, though this is no where distinctly stated. (See Schweighäuser, ad Polyb. ii. 5, § 6.)

2. King of Ilyria, son of Scerdilidas, and therefore probably a grandson of the preceding. He appears to have been associated with his father in the sovereignty for some years before the death of the latter, whether as joint ruler, or as holding the separate command of some of the Illyrian tribes, is uncertain, but the last supposition seems the most probable. Livy, in one passage (xxvi. 24), calls him a Thracian prince, but this seems to be certainly a mistake. His name was included, together with that of Scerdilidas in the treaty of alliance concluded by M. Valerius Laevinus with the Aetolians, B.C. 211, and the two were associated together on several occasions during the war with Philip, as well as in the peace concluded by P. Sempronius with that monarch in B.C. 204. (Livy. xxiv. 24, xxv. 75, xxxi. 5, xxix. 19; Polyb. xiv. 41.) But after this period that of Pleuratus appears alone, and he seems to have become sole ruler. On the renewal of the war with Macedonia by the Romans (B.C. 201) he hastened to offer his assistance to the consul Sulpicius, but his services were declined for the moment, and were not subsequently called for. But though he rendered no active assistance, his fidelity to the Roman cause was rewarded by Plemminus at the peace of 196, by the addition to his territories of Lychnidus and the Parnith, which had been previously subject to Macedonia. (Livy. xxxi. 28, xxxii. 34; Polyb. xviii. 30, xxxi. 3, xxii. 4.) During the war of M. Fulvius in Aetolia, B.C. 189, he again came to the assistance of the Romans with a fleet of 60 ships, with which he laid waste the coasts of Aetolia, but did not effect any thing of moment. (Livy. xxxviii. 7.) The date of his death is unknown, but it must have occurred previous to B.C. 180, at which time we find his son Gentius already on the throne. (Id. x1. 42.)

3. A brother of Gentius, and son of the preceding, who is called Plator by Livy, but Pleuratus by Polybius. He was put to death by Gentius, in order that the king might himself marry a daughter of Monunius who had been betrothed to his brother. (Polyb. xxxix. 5; Liv. xlii. 30.)

4. A son of Gentius, king of Ilyria, who was taken prisoner, together with his father, and carried captive to Rome. (Livy. xliiv. 32.)

5. An Illyrian exile, of whose services Perseus, king of Macedonia, availed himself on his embassies to Gentius, king of Ilyria, in B.C. 162. (Livy. xiii. 19, 20; Polyb. xviii. 8, 9.) We afterwards heard of him as being a force of Illyrian auxiliaries for the service of Perseus. (Livy. xlv. 11.)

[E. H. B.]

PLEURON (Πλευρών), a son of Aetolus and Prone, and brother of Calydon, was married to Xanthippe, by whom he became the father of Agenor, Sterope, Stratonice, and Laophonte. He is said to have founded the town of Pleuron in Aetolia, but he had a heroa at Sparta. (Apol. d. 1. 7 § 7; Paus. iii. 13. § 5.)

PLEXATUR (Πλέκατορ), a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 353); or, according to others, of Nereus and Doris. (Apol. i. 2. § 7.)

PLEXIPPUS (Πλέξιππος). 1. A son of The page contains a segment of a text discussing historical figures and events. A portion of the text reads:

"Theusius, and brother of Alitha, was killed by Meleager. (Apollod. i. 7. § 10; Mel. 7.)
2. A son of Phineus by Cleopatra (Apollod. i. 15. § 3; Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 980.)
3. One of the sons of Aegyptius (Hygin. Fab. 170.) [L.S.]

C. PLINIUS SECUNDUS, the celebrated author of the Historia Naturalis, was born A.D. 23, having reached the age of 56 at the time of his death, which took place in A.D. 79. (Plin. Jun. Epist. iii. 5.) The question as to the place of his birth has been the subject of a voluminous and rather angry discussion between the champions of Verona and those of Novum Comum (the modern Como). That he was born at one or other of these two towns seems pretty certain; Hadriuyn's notion, that he was born at Rome, has nothing to support it. The claim of Comum seems to be, on the whole, the better founded of the two. In the life of Pliny ascribed to Suetonius, and by Eusebius, or his translator Jerome, he is styled Novum-comensis. Another anonymous Life (ap. v. 3.1. of a legal or kind of no authority) calls him a native of Verona; and it has been thought that the claim of Verona to be considered as his birth-place is confirmed by the fact that Pliny himself (Praef. init.) calls Catullus, who was a native of Verona, his consteraneus. On the other hand, it has been urged with more discerning criticism, that as the two towns were both situated beyond the Padus in Gallia Cisalpina, and at no very great distance from each other, this somewhat barbarous word is much better adapted to intimate that Catullus was a fellow-countryman of Pliny, than that he was a fellow-townsmen. In a similar manner the younger Pliny, who was undoubtedly born at Novum Comum, speaks of Veroneses nostris (Epist. vi. ult.). Of two Veronese inscriptions which have been adduced, one appears to be spurious. The other, which is admitted to be genuine, is too mutilated for its tenour to be ascertained. It appears to have been erected by Plinius Secundus, but whether the author of the Natural History or not, there is nothing to show. Nor would it in any case be decisive as to the birth-place of Pliny. That the family of the Plinii belonged to Novum Comum is clear from the facts that the estates of the elder Pliny were situated there, and that the younger Pliny was born there, and from several inscriptions found in the neighbourhood relating to various members of the family.

Of the particular events in the life of Pliny we know but little; but for the absence of such materials for biography we are in some degree compensated by the valuable account which his nephew has left us of his habits of life. He came to Rome while still young, and being descended from a family of wealth and distinction, he had the means at his disposal for availing himself of the instruction of the best teachers to be found in the imperial city. In one passage of his work (ix. 58) he speaks of the enormous quantity of jewellery which he had seen worn by Lolliia Paulina. That must have been before A.D. 40, in which year Caligula married Cesonia. It does not appear necessary to suppose that at that early age Pliny had already been introduced at the court of Caligula. The strange animals exhibited by the emperors and wealthy Romans in spectacles and combats, seem early to have attracted his attention (comp. II. N. ix. 5). He was for some time on the coast of Africa, though in what capacity, or at what period, we are not informed (H. N. vii. 3). At the age of about 25 he went to Germany, where he served under L. Pompeius Secundus, of whom he afterwards wrote a memoir (Plin. Jun. Ep. iii. 5), and was appointed to the command of a troop of cavalry (praefectus alae) (Plin. Jun. l. c.). It appears from notices of his own that he travelled over most of the frontier of Germany, having visited the Caucii, the sources of the Danube, &c. It was probably in Belgium that he became acquainted with Cornelius Tacitus (not the historian of that name, H. N. vii. 16). It was in the intervals snatched from his military duties that he composed his treatise de Jactuatione equestri. (Plin. Jun. l. c.) At the same time he commenced a history of the Germanic wars, being led to do so by a dream in which he fancied himself commissioned to undertake the task by Drusus Nero. This work he afterwards completed in twenty books.

Pliny returned to Rome with Pompeius (A.D. 52), and applied himself to the study of jurisprudence. He engaged for a time to write a law digest, but does not seem to have distinguished himself very greatly in that capacity. The greater part of the reign of Nero he spent in retirement, chiefly, no doubt, at his native place. It may have been with a view to the education of his nephew that he composed the work entitled Studiosius, an extensive treatise in three books, occupying six volumes, in which he marked out the course that should be pursued in the training of a young orator, from the cradle to the completion of his education and his entrance into public life. (Plin. Jun. l. c. ; Quintil. iii. 1. § 21.) Towards the end of the reign of Nero he wrote a grammatical work in eight books, entitled Dubius Sermo, confutations of which were promised by various professed grammarians, Stoics, dialecticians, &c. ; though ten years afterwards, when the Historia Naturalis was published, they had not appeared. (Plin. H. N. vii. 3.) Pliny was himself, however, no great admirer of the reign of Nero that Pliny was appointed procurator in Spain. He was here in A.D. 71, when his brother-in-law died, leaving his son, the younger Pliny, to the guardianship of his uncle, who, on account of his absence, was obliged to entrust the care of him to Virginiius Rufus. Pliny returned to Rome in the reign of Vespasian, shortly before A.D. 73, when he adopted his nephew. He had known Vespasian in the Germanic wars, and the emperor received him into the number of his most intimate friends. For the assertion that Pliny served with Titus in Judaea there is no authority. He was, however, on intimate terms with Titus, to whom he dedicated his great work. Nor is there any evidence that he was ever created senator by Vespasian. It was doubless at this period of his life that he wrote a continuation of the history of Cæsars Bassus, in 31 books, carrying the narrative down to his own times (H. N. praef. § 19). Of his manner of life at this period an interesting account has been preserved by his nephew (Epist. iii. 5). It was his practice to begin to spend a portion of the night in studying by candle-light, at the festival of the Vulpalalia (towards the end of August), at first at a late hour of the night, in winter at one or two o'clock in the morning. Before it was light he betook himself to the emperor Vespasian, and after executing such commissions as he might be charged with, returned home and devoted the time which he still had remaining to study. After a slender meal he would, in the summer time, lie in the sunshine while some one read to him, he himself making notes and extracts. He never read anything without making extracts in this way, for he used to say that there was no book so bad but that some good might be got out of it. He would then take a cold bath, and, after a slight repast, sleep a very little, and then pursue his studies till the time of the coena. During this meal some book was read to, and commented on by him. At table, as might be supposed, he spent but a short time. Such was his mode of life when in the midst of the bustle and confusion of the city. When in retirement in the country, the time spent in the bath was nearly the only interval not allotted to study, and that he reduced to the narrowest limits; for during all the process of scraping and rubbing he had some book read to him, or himself dictated. When on a journey he had a secretary by his side with a book and tablets, and in the winter season made him wear gloves that his writing might not be impeded by the cold. He once found fault with his nephew for walking, as by so doing he lost great time that might have been employed in study. By this incessant application, persevered in throughout his lifetime, he amassed an enormous amount of materials, and at his death left to his nephew 160 volumina of notes (electorum commentarii), written extremely small on both sides. While procurator in Spain, when the number of them was considerably less, he had been offered 400,000 sesterciae for them, by one Largius Licinius. With some reason might his nephew say that, when compared with Pliny, those who had spent their whole lives in literary pursuits seemed as if they had spent them in nothing else than sleep and idleness. When we consider the multiplicity of his engagements, both public and private, the time occupied in military services, in the discharge of the duties of the offices which he held, in his forensic studies and practice, in visits to the emperor, and the performance of the miscellaneous commissions entrusted to him by the latter, the extent of his acquisitions is indeed astonishing. From the materials which he had in this way collected he compiled his celebrated Historia Naturalis, which he dedicated to Titus, and published, as appears from the titles given to Titus in the preface, about A. D. 77.

The circumstances of the death of Pliny were remarkable. The details are given in a letter of the younger Pliny to Tacitus (Ep. vi. 16). Pliny had been appointed admiral by Vespasian, and in A. D. 79 was stationed with the fleet at Misenum, when the celebrated eruption of Vesuvius took place, which overwhelmed Herculanenum and Pompeii. On the 24th of August, while he was, as he thought, at a safe distance, he saw smoke. He immediately went to a spot from which he could get a better view of the phænomenon; but, desiring to examine it still more closely, he ordered a light vessel to be got ready, in which he embarked, taking his tablets with him. The sailors of the ships at Retina, who had just escaped from the imminent danger, urged him to turn back. He resolved, however, to proceed, and in the hope of rendering assistance to those who were in peril, ordered the ships to be launched, and proceeded to the point of danger, retaining calmness and self-possession enough to observe and have noted down the various forms which the cloud assumed. Hot cinders and pumice stones now fell thickly upon the vessels, and they were in danger of being left aground by a sudden retreat of the sea. He hesitated for an instant whether to proceed or not; but quoting the maxim of Terence, fortis fortuna adjovat, directed the steersman to conduct him to Pompeianus, who was at Stabiae, and whom he found preparing to set sail. Pliny did his best to restore his courage, and ordered a bath to be prepared for himself. He then, with a cheerful countenance, presented himself at the dinner-table, endeavouring to induce his friend to believe that the flames which burst out with increased violence were only those of some villages which the peasants had abandoned, and afterwards retired to, and slept soundly. But, as the court of the house was becoming fast filled with cinders, so that egress would in a short time have become impossible, he was roused, and joined Pompeianus. As the house, from the frequent and violent shocks, was in momentary danger of falling, it appeared the safer plan to betake themselves into the open fields, which they did, tying pillows upon their heads to protect them from the falling stones and ashes. Though it was already day, the darkness was profound. They went to the shore to see if it were possible to embark, but found the sea too tempestuous to allow them to do so. Pliny then lay down on a sail which was spread for him. Alarmed by the approach of flames, preceded by a smell of sulphur, his companions took to flight. His slaves assisted him to rise, but he almost immediately dropped down again, suffocated, as his nephew conjectures, by the fumes, for he had naturally weak lungs. His body was afterwards found unburnt, even his clothes not being disordered, and his attitude that of one asleep rather than that of a corpse.

It may easily be supposed that Pliny, with his inordinate appetite for accumulating knowledge out of books, was not the man to produce a scientific work of any value. He had no genius, as indeed might have been inferred from the bent of his mind. He was not even an original observer. The materials which he worked up into his huge encyclopaedic compilation were almost all derived at second-hand, though doubtless he has incorporated the results of his own observation in a larger number of instances than those in which he indicates such to be the case. Nor did he, as a compiler, show either judgment or discrimination in the selection of his materials, so that in his accounts the true and the false are found intermixed in nearly equal proportion,—the latter, if any thing, predominating, even with regard to subjects on which more accurate information might have been obtained; for, as he wrote on a multiplicity of subjects with which he had no scientific acquaintance, he was entirely at the mercy of those from whose writings he borrowed his information, being incapable of correcting their errors, or, as may be seen even from what he has borrowed from Aristotle, of determining the rela-
The importance of the facts which he selects and those which he passes over. His love of the marvellous, and his contempt for human nature, lead him constantly to introduce what is strange or wonderful, or adapted to illustrate the wickedness of man, and the unsatisfactory arrangements of Providence. He was, as Cuvier remarks, (Biograph. Univ. art. Pline, vol. xxxv.), "an author without critical judgment, who, after having spent a great deal of time in making extracts, has ranged them under certain chapters, to which he has added reflections which have no relation to science properly so called, but display alternately either the most superstitious or the most dangerous notions of a discontented philosophy, which finds fault continually with mankind, with nature, and with the gods themselves." His work is of course valuable to us from the vast number of subjects treated of, with regard to many of which we have no other sources of information. But what he tells us is often unintelligible, from his retailing accounts of things with which he was himself personally unacquainted, and of which he in consequence gives no satisfactory idea to the reader. Though a writer on zoology, botany, and mineralogy, he has no pretensions to be called a naturalist. His compilations exhibit scarcely a trace of scientific arrangement; and frequently it can be shown that he does not give the true sense of the authors whom he quotes and translates, giving not uncommonly wrong Latin names to the objects spoken of by his Greek authorities. That repeated contradictions should occur is such a work is not to be wondered at. It would not, of course, be fair to try him by the standard of modern times; yet we need but place him for an instant by the side of a man like Aristotle, whose learning was even more varied, while it was incomparably more profound, to see how great was his inferiority as a man of science and reflection. Still it is but just to him to add, that he occasionally displays a vigour of thought and expression which shows that he might have attained a much higher rank as an author, if his mental energies had not been weighed down beneath the mass of unorganized materials with which his memory and his note-tablets were overloaded. In private life his character seems to have been estimable in a high degree, and his work abounds with grave and noble sentiments, exhibiting a love of virtue and honour, and the most unmitigated contempt for the luxury, prodigality, and meanness which by his time had so deeply stained the Roman people. To philosophical speculation on religious, moral, or metaphysical subjects he does not seem to have been much addicted. All that is very distinctive of his views on such matters is that he was a decided pantheist.

With the exception of some minute quotations from his grammatical treatise (Lersch, Sprach-philosophie der Alten, vol. i. p. 179, &c.), the only work of Pliny which has been preserved to us, for it does not appear that any reliance can be placed on the statement that the twenty books on the Germanic wars were seen by Conrad Gesner in Augsburg,) is his Historia Naturalis. By Natural History the ancients understood more than modern writers would usually include in the subject. It embraced astronomy, meteorology, geography, mineralogy, botany,—in short, every thing that does not relate to the results of human skill or the products of human faculties. Pliny, however, has not kept within even these extensive limits. He has broken in upon the plan implied by the title of the work, by considerable digressions on human inventions and institutions (book vii.), and on the history of the fine arts (xxv.—xxxvii.). Minor digressions on similar topics are also interspersed in various parts of the work, the arrangement of which in other respects exhibits but little scientific discrimination. The younger Pliny fairly enough describes it as opus difficilissimum, eruditum, nec minus varium quam ipsa Natura (Epist. iii. 5). It comprises, as Pliny says in the preface (§ 16), within a compass of thirty-six books, 20,000 matters of importance, drawn from about 2000 volumes, the works of one hundred authors of authority, the greater part of which were not read even by those of professorly literary habits, together with a large number of additional matters not known by the authorities from which he drew. Hardein has drawn up a catalogue of the authors quoted by Pliny in the first book, or in the body of the work itself, amounting to between 400 and 500. When it is remembered that this work was not the result of the undistracted labour of a life, but written in the hours of leisure secured from active pursuits, interrupted occasionally by ill health (Proof. § 18), and that too by the author of other extensive works, it is, to say the least, a wonderful monument of human industry. Some idea of its nature may be formed from a brief outline of its contents.

The Historia Naturalis is divided into 37 books, the first of which consists of a dedicatory epistle to Titus, followed by a table of contents of the other books. It is curious that ancient writers should not more generally have adopted this usage. No Roman writer before Pliny had drawn out such a table, except Valerius Soranus, whose priority in the idea Pliny frankly confesses. (Proof. § 26.) Pliny has also adopted a plan in every way worthy of imitation. After the table of the subject-matter of each book he has appended a list of the authors from whom his materials were derived; an act of honesty rare enough in ancient as well as modern times, and for which in his prefatory epistle (§§ 16, 17) he deservedly takes credit. It may be noticed too, as indicating the pleasure which he took in the quantity of the materials which he accumulated, that he very commonly adds the exact number of facts, accounts, and observations which the book contains.

The second book treats of the mundane system, the sun, moon, planets, fixed stars, comets, meteoric prodigies, the rainbow, clouds, rain, &c., eclipses, the seasons, winds, thunder and lightning, the shape of the earth, changes in its surface, earthquakes, the seas, rivers, fountains, &c. He makes no attempt to distinguish between astronomy and meteorology, but jumbles both together in utter confusion. The book opens with a profession of the pantheistic creed of the author, who assails the popular mythology with considerable force on the ground of the degrading views of the divine nature which it gives (ii. 5, or 7). The consideration of the deabing, idle and conflicting superstitions of man-kind draws from him the reflection: Quae singula improvissimae mortali detestati, solus ut victori, tanta certum sit nihil esse certi, nec miserius quam quidquid homine, et superbus. Similar half gloomy, half contemptuous views of human nature, and complaints against the arrangements of Providence, are of frequent occurrence with Pliny. His own appetite for the marvellous however frequently leads him into an excess of credulity scarcely distinguishable from the superstition which he condemn; though we must at the same time remember that with Pliny Nature is an active and omnipotent deity; and that his love for the marvellous is not mere gossiping wonder, but admiration of the astonishing operations of that deity. It is a distinctly recognised maxim with him: Mithi continenti se persuasit rerum natura nihil incredibile existimare de ea, (II. N. xi. 3.) The mundus is in his view divine in its nature, eternal, infinite, though resembling the finite, globular in form, the sun being the animus or mens of the whole, and itself a deity (ii. 4). He of course supposed this mundus to revolve round an axis in 24 hours. The earth he looked upon as globular, being fashioned into that shape by the perpetual revolution of the mundus round it, and inhabited on all sides. The fact that such is its shape he demonstrates from a variety of pertinent arguments (ii. 64—71). His ideas with regard to the universe, the nature of the sun, and their important relation to us as the origin of human souls (ii. 29), are in the main very much the same as those which through the influence of the Stoic school became generally prevalent among the Roman philosophers, though on various subordinate points Pliny had some singular notions, whether his own, or copied from authors with whom we are unacquainted, many of them ingenious, still more puerile. The notion which he adopted from the earlier propagandists of it, that the gerns of the innumerable forms of animals, &c., with which the stars and the universe abound, find their way to the earth, and there frequently become intermingled, producing all kinds of monstrous forms (c. 2), accounts for the readiness with which he admits the most fabulous and impossible monsters into his accounts.

The historical and chronological notices with respect to the progress of astronomy which he intersperses are very valuable. Of the beneficial effects of the spread of such knowledge he speaks with generous enthusiasm (ii. 12). With respect to the changes in the surface of the earth, produced by the deposits of rivers, and the appearance of volcanic islands, he has some valuable and interesting statements (ii. 83, &c.). These changes, and the other startling natural phaenomena which present themselves in considerable number and variety in the volcanic region of Italy and Sicily, are to Pliny so many proofs of the manifold dieine activity of nature (c. 93). Some of the wonders he adduces are however more than apocryphal. On the tides (of the influence of the sun and moon upon which he was well aware), current and marine springs, he has some remarks which show that his official duties in Spain did not keep him from a careful observation of natural phaenomena (c. 97). The wonderful qualities and phaenomena of various waters and fountains (nam neo aquarum natura a miraculis cesset, c. 103), supply him with details, many of them curious and probably true, others requiring the credulity of Pliny for their belief. From the wonders of water he passes to those of fire (c. 104, &c.), and then, by a rather curious arrangement, closes the book with some statements regarding the size of the earth and the distance between various points of it.

The four following books (iii.——vi.) are devoted to geography, and this somewhat small space Pliny has still further narrowed by digressions and declamations, so that his notices are confined chiefly to the divisions of the countries and the mere names of the places in them. Of these he has preserved a very large number which would otherwise have been utterly lost, though the lists are considerably swelled by the unconscious repetition of the same names, sometimes several times over, in slightly varied forms. Pliny was himself but a poor geographer, and his erroneous conception of the forms of different countries often materially affected the way in which he made use of the information which he obtained. This part of his work contains a curious medley of the geographical knowledge of different ages, not distinguished and corrected, but pieced together into one whole in the best way that the discordant statements allowed. This discrepancy Pliny sometimes points out, but frequently he omits to do this, and strives to blend the ancient and modern accounts together, so that he often makes the earlier writers speak as if they had used and been familiar with names not in vogue till some time later. (Comp. iv. 27, xxxvii. 11.) He does not altogether discredit the stories of early times, and speaks of the Rhiphean mountains and the Hyperboreans with at least as much confidence as of some other better authenticated races. His geography of Italy, Greece, and Asia Minor is that of the times of Strabo. For the N. E. portion of Asia we have that of the time of Eratosthenes. For the southern Asiatic coast up to India we have ancient and recent accounts intermingled; for the North of Europe we have the knowledge of his own times, at least as it appears through the somewhat distorted medium of his imperfect notions. With regard to India and Ceylon he has some very recent and trustworthy accounts.

Pliny, like Ptolemy, makes the habitable earth to extend much farther from east to west than from north to south. By the western coast of Europe he understands simply Spain and Gaul; after them begins the northern ocean, the greater part of which he thought had been sailed over, a Roman fleet having reached the Cimbrian peninsula, and ascertained that a vast sea stretches thence to Scythia. He seems to have imagined that the northern coast of Europe ran pretty evenly east and west, with the exception of the break occasioned by the Cimbrian Chersonesus (iv. 13, &c.). Beyond Germany, he says, immense islands had been discovered, Scandinavia, Euxinia, &c. He also believed the northern coast of the earth to have been explored from the east as far as the Caspian sea (which he regarded as an inlet of the northern ocean) in the time of Seleucus and Antiochus. More than one voyage had also been made between Spain and Ambia (ii. 67, 68). He evidently considered India the most eastern country of the world (vi. 17). The third and fourth books are devoted to Europe, the countries of which he takes up in a somewhat curious order. He begins with Spain, specifying its provinces and conventus, and giving lists of the towns, the position of some of which he defines, while the greater number are merely enumerated in alphabetical order; mentioning the principal rivers, and noting the towns upon them. He gives a few notices of the inhabitants of the different provinces, but no clear or comprehensive account of the population of the country generally, or any intelligible views even of its physical characteristics. After a similar account of Gallia Narbonensis, Pliny proceeds to Italy. His account of this country is, on the whole, the best of the kind that he has given. Following the division of Augustus, he enumerates the different provinces, going round the coast. The extent of coast line was of course favourable for defining the positions of places situated on or near it. Where the coast or river does not give him a convenient method of defining the position of places, he simply enumerates them, usually in an alphabetical order. He has been at considerable pains to specify a number of distances between mouths of rivers, headlands, and other salient or important points, but his numbers can scarcely ever be relied on. Many are egregiously wrong. This may be partly the fault of copyists, but there can be little doubt that it is mainly the fault of Pliny himself, from his misunderstanding the data of the authors from whom he copied. In connection with the more important sections of Italy he enumerates in order, races that inhabited them, and which the occasion presents itself mentions not only the towns which existed in his own time, but those which had been destroyed. The Tiberis and Padus, especially the latter, he describes with considerable care. After the provinces on the western coast of Italy, he takes the islands between Spain and Italy, and then returns to the mainland.

Leaving Italy he proceeds to the provinces on the north and east of the Adriatic sea, and those south of the Danube—Liburnia, Dalmatia, Noricum, Pannonia, Moesia; and in the fourth book takes up the Grecian peninsula. His account of this is a good example of his carelessness, indistinctness, and confusion as a geographer. After the provinces on the western side of northern Greece (Epeirus, Acrania, &c.), he takes the Peloponnesus, and then comes back to Attica, Boeotia, and Thessaly. His account excludes the Peloponnesus from Hellas or Graecia, which begins from the isthmus, the first country in it being Attica, in which he includes the Megarides (iv. 7). His notices are of the most meagre description possible, consisting of hardly anything but lists of names. All that he says of Attica does not occupy twenty lines. After Thessaly come Macedonia, Thrace, the islands round Greece, the Pontus, Scythia, and the northern parts of Europe. Of the existence of the Hyperboreans he thinks it impossible to doubt, as so many authors affirmed that they used to send offerings to Apollo at Delos (iv. 12). Nor does he express any distrust when recounting the stories of races who fed upon horses' hoofs, or of tribes whose ears were large enough to serve as a covering for their bodies. His account of Britain, which he makes lie over against Germany, Gaul, and Spain, is very meagre. From Britain he proceeds to Gallia, in his account of which he mixes up Caesar's division according to races with the division according to provinces (Ukrit, Geographie der Griechen und Römer, ii. 2, p. 238), and so, not unnaturally, is indistinct and contradictory. After Gallia he comes back to the northern and western parts of Spain and Lusitania.

This sketch will give the reader an idea of the clumsy manner in which Pliny treats geography.

It is unnecessary to follow him in detail through the rest of this part of his work. It is carried on in much the same style. When treating of Africa he mentions (apparently without disbelief) the monstrous races in the south, some without articulate language, others with no heads, having mouths and eyes in their breasts. He accedes to the opinion of king Juba, that the Nile rises in a mountain of Mauritania, and that its inundations are due to the Etesian winds, which either force the current back upon the land, or carry vast quantities of clouds to Aethiopia, the rain from which swells the river. Of the races to the north and east of the Pontus and on the Tanais he has preserved a very large number of names. With regard to India he has some accounts which show that amid the conflicting, and what even Pliny calls incredible statements of different writers, a good deal of accurate information had reached the Romans. It is to be regretted that Pliny was deterred by the nature of these accounts from giving us more of them. It would have been interesting to know what Greeks who had resided at the courts of Indian kings (vi. 17) told their countrymen. We could have spared for that purpose most of the unimportant and inaccurate statements of distance which he had been troubled to put in. Some intercourse which had taken place with the king of Taprobane in the reign of the emperor Claudius enables Pliny to give a somewhat circumstantial account of the island and people. Though of very small value as a systematic work, the books on geography are still valuable on account of the extensive collection of ancient names which they contain, as well as a variety of incidental facts which have been preserved out of the valuable sources to which Pliny had access.

The five following books (vii.—xi.) are devoted to zoology. The seventh book treats of man, and opens with a preface, in which Pliny indulges his querulous dissatisfaction with the lot of man, his helpless and unhappy condition when brought into the world, and the pains and vices to which he is subject. After bespeaking some measure of belief for the marvellous accounts that he will have to give, and suggesting that what appears incredible should not be set aside, he enumerates a great whole (natural vero rerum) in which he gives a number of the most astonishing and curious races reported to exist upon the earth:—cannibals, men with their feet turned backwards; the Pevli, whose bodies produce a secretion which is deadly to serpents; tribes of Androgyini; races of enchancers; the Scinopades, whose feet are so large, that when the sun's heat is very strong they lie on their backs and turn their feet upwards to shade themselves; the Astomi, who live entirely upon the scents of fruits and flowers; and various others almost equally singular. Haece, he remarks, atque talia ex hominim genere ludibria sibi, nobis mirabilia, ingeniosa ficit natura. He then proceeds to a variety of curious accounts respecting the generation and birth of children, or of monsters in their place. An instance of a change of sex he affirms to have come within his own knowledge (vii. 4). The dentition, size, and growth of children, examples of an extraordinary precocity, and remarkable bodily strength, swiftness, and keenness of sight and hearing, furnish him with some singular details. He then brings forward a variety of examples (chiefly of Romans) of persons distinguished for remarkable mental powers, moral greatness, courage, wisdom, &c., preserving some interesting anecdotes respecting the persons adduced. Then follow some notices of those most distinguished in the sciences and arts, and of persons remarkable for their honours or good fortune, in connection with which he does not forget to point out how the most prosperous condition is frequently marred by adverse circumstances. He then mentions a number of instances of great longevity. Men's liabilities to disease draws from him some pertinent remarks, and even some instances which he mentions of resuscitation from apparent death only lead to the observation: _Haece est conditio mortuam_; _ad has et ejusmodi occasiones fortunae gignimur, uti de homine ne morti quasi debeat credi_ (vii. 52). Sudden death he looks upon as an especially remarkable phenomenon, and at the same time the happiest thing that can happen to a man. The idea of a future existence of the soul he treats as ridiculous, and as spoiling the greatest blessing of nature—death (c. 55 or 56). It must have been in some peculiar sense, then, that he believed in apparitions after death (c. 52 or 53).

The remainder of the book is occupied with a digression on the most remarkable inventions of men, and the authors of them. He remarks that the first thing in which men agreed by tacit consent was the use of the alphabet of the Ionians; the second the employment of barbers the third marking the hours.

The eighth book is occupied with an account of terrestrial animals. They are not enumerated in any systematic manner. There is, indeed, some approximation to an arrangement according to size, the elephant being the first in the list and the dormouse the last, but mammalia and reptiles, quadrupeds, serpents, and snails, are jumbled up together. For trustworthy information regarding the habits and organisation of animals the reader will commonly look in vain: a good part of almost every article is erroneous, false, or fabulous. Pliny's account is, of course, filled with all the most extraordinary stories that he had met with, illustrating the habits or instinct of the different animals. The elephant he even believes to be a moral and religious animal, and to worship the sun and moon (viii. 1). His entertaining account of the elephant and the lion will give somewhat favourable samples of the style in which he discusses natural history (viii. 1—11, 16). The reader of the seventh book will be prepared to find in the eighth the most extraordinary and impossible creatures figuring by the side of the lion and the horse. Thus we have the achilis, without joints in its legs (c. 16); winged horses armed with horns (c. 30); the mantichora, with a triple row of teeth, the face and ears of a man, the body of a lion, and a tail which pierces like that of a scorpion (ib.); the moniceros, with the body of a horse, the head of a stag, the feet of an elephant, the tail of a boar, and a black horn on its forehead two cubits long (c. 91); the ctenolepis, whose eyes are instantly fatal to any man who meets their glance (c. 32); and the basilisk, possessed of powers equally remarkable (c. 33). Pliny certainly was not the man to throw out the taunt: _mirum est quo procedat Graeco credula_ (viii. 22 or 34). He cites Ctesias with as much confidence as Aristotle; and it is not unlikely that in some instances he has transformed the symabolical animals sculptured at Persepolis into real natural productions. With his usual proneness to ramble off into digressions, his account of the sheep furnishes him with an opportunity for giving a variety of details regarding different kinds of clothing, and the novelties or improvements introduced in it (viii. 46 or 73).

In the ninth book he proceeds to the different races inhabiting the water, in which element he believes that even more extraordinary animals are produced than on the earth, the seeds and gymus of living creatures being more intermingled by the agency of the winds and waves, so that he asents to the common opinion that there is nothing produced in any other part of nature which is not found in the sea, while the latter has many things peculiar to itself. Thus he finds no difficulty in believing that a live Triton, of the commonly received form, and a Nereid, had been seen and heard on the coast of Spain in the reign of Tiberius, and that a great number of dead Nereids had been found on the beach in the reign of Augustus, to say nothing of sea-elephants and sea-goats. The story of Arius and the dolphin he thinks amply confirmed by numerous undoubted instances of the attachment shown by dolphins for men, and especially boys. It seems that these creatures are remarkably apt at answering to the name Simon, which they prefer to any other (c. 8). Pliny, however, rightly terms whales and dolphins beluae, npt piscis, though the only classification of marine animals is one according to their integuments (ix. 12 or 14, 13 or 15). His account of the ordinary habits of the whale is tolerably accurate; and indeed, generally speaking, the ninth book exhibits much less of the marvellous and exaggerated than some of the others. He recognises seventy-four different kinds of fishes, with thirty of Crustacea (14 or 16). The eagerness with which pearls, purple dye, and shell-fish are sought for excites Pliny to vehement abjuration of the luxury and rapacity of the age (c. 34). On the supposed origin of pearls, and the mode of extracting the purple dye, he enters at considerable length (c. 34—41). Indeed, as he sarcastically remarks: _abunde trastata est ratio quae se virorum fucta festinavamurpyma forma credid ampliarum foris._

The tenth book is devoted to an account of birds, beginning with the largest—the ostrich. As to the phoenix even Pliny is sceptical; but he has some curious statements about eagles, and several other birds. The leading distinction which he recognises among birds is that depending on the form of the feet (x. 11 or 13). Those, also, which have not talons but toes, are subdivided into oscines and alites, the former being distinguished by their note, the latter by their different sizes (c. 19 or 22). He notices that those with crooked talons are usually carnivorous; that those which are heavy feed on grain or fruits; those that fly high, on flesh (c. 47). The validity of augury he does not attach to. He has great difficulty in winged horses (viii. 21), he regards as fabulous winged Pegasi with horses' heads. The substance of the bird when hatched he states to be derived from the white of the egg, the yolk serving as its food (c. 53). From his account of eggs he digresses into a general discussion of the phenomenon of generation in animals of all kinds (c. 62, &c.), in connection with which he has several most extraordinary statements, as, e. g., that the spinal marrow of a man may turn into a serpent (c. 66), and that mice can generate by licking each other. The generation and fecundity of these little creatures he regards as especially astonishing; and what becomes of them all he cannot think, as they are never picked up dead, or dug up in winter in the fields (c. 65). He then proceeds to some statements as to the relative acuteness of the senses in different animals, and other miscellaneous matters. The reciprocal enmities and attachments of different animals are frequently touched upon by him.

The first part of the eleventh book is occupied with an account of insects. The phaenomena of the insect kingdom Pliny regards as exhibiting the wonderful operations of nature in even a more surprising manner than the others. He, however, only notices a few of the most common insects. On bees he treats at considerable length. He finds space, however, to mention the pyrallis, an insect which is produced and lives in the fire of furnaces, but dies speedily if too long away from the flame (c. 36). The remainder of the book (c. 37 or 44, &c.) is devoted to the subject of comparative anatomy, or at least something of an approximation to that science. Considerable ingenuity has been shown by those from whom Pliny copies in bringing together a large number of coincidences and differences, though, as might have been expected, there are many errors both in the generalisations and in the particular facts.

Botany, the next division of natural history taken up by Pliny, occupies by far the largest portion of the work. Including the books on medical botany, it occupies sixteen books, eight on general botany (xii.—xix.), and eight more on medicines derived from plants. Pliny's botany is altogether devoid of scientific classification. The twelfth book treats of exotics, especially the spice and scent bearing trees of India, Arabia, and Syria. Of the trees themselves Pliny's account is extremely unsatisfactory: frequently he merely names them. The book is chiefly occupied with an account of their products, the modes of collecting and preparing them, &c. The first part of the thirteenth book is occupied with a general account of modes of cultivation of the trees and compounding them, and the plants from which they are chiefly derived. Palms and other exotics, chiefly those of Syria, Arabia, and Egypt, taken up without any principle of arrangement, are noticed or described in the remainder of the book. His account of the papyrus (c. 11 or 21—13 or 27) goes considerably into detail. The fourteenth book is occupied with an account of the vine, and different notices respecting the various sorts of wines, closing with a somewhat spirited review of the effects of drunkenness. The fifteenth book treats of the more common sorts of fruit, the olive, apple, fig, &c. The sixteenth passes first to the most common kinds of forest trees, and then contains a great variety of remarks on general botany, and other miscellaneous notices, especially on the uses of wood and timber, into the midst of which there is awkwardly thrust some account of reeds, willows, and other plants of that kind. The seventeenth book treats of the cultivation and arrangement of trees and plants, the modes of propagating and grafting them, the diseases to which they are subject, with the modes of curing them, &c. The eighteenth book opens with an apology, in Pliny's peculiar style, on behalf of the earth, the benign parent of all, whom men have unjustly blamed for the mischievous use which they themselves have made of some of her products. The rest of the book is occupied with an account of the different sorts of grain and pulse, and a general account of agriculture. This and the preceding are by far the most valuable of the botanical books of the Historia Naturalis, and exhibit a great amount of reading, as well as considerable observation.

The next eight books (xx.—xxvii.) are devoted, generally speaking, to medical botany, though the reader must not expect a writer like Pliny to adhere very strictly to his subject. Thus, a great part of the twenty-first book treats of flowers, scents, and the use of chaplets; and some of the observations about bees and bee-hives are a little foreign to the subject. Indeed, the 20th and part of the 21st book are rather a general account of the medicinal, floral and other productions of gardens (see c. 49, end). Then, after giving an account of various wild plants, and some general botanical remarks respecting them, Pliny returns to the subject of medicines. The classification of these is chiefly according to the sources from which they are derived, whether garden or other cultivated plants (xx.—xxii.), cultivated trees (xxiii.), wild trees (xxv.), or wild plants (xxv.); partly according to the diseases for which they are adapted (xxvi.). Cuvier (l. c.) remarks that almost all the ancients have told us of the virtues of their plants is lost to us, on account of our not knowing what plants they are speaking of. If we might believe Pliny, there is hardly a single human malady for which nature has not provided a score of remedies.

In the twenty-eighth book Pliny proceeds to notice the medicines derived from the human body, and from other land animals, commencing with what is tantamount to an apology for introducing the subject in that part of the work. Three books are devoted to this branch, diversified by some notices respecting the history of medicine (xxix. 1—8), and magic, in which he does not believe, and which he considers an offshoot from the art of medicine, combined with religion and superstition (xxx. 1, &c). The thirty-first book treats of the medical properties of various waters; the thirty-second of those of fishes and other aquatic creatures.

The remaining section of the Historia Naturalis would doubtless have been headed by Pliny "Mineralogy," though this title would give but a small idea of the nature of the contents. In the 33d book the subject of metals is taken up. It begins with various denunciations of the wickedness and cupidity of men, who could not be content with what nature had provided for them on the surface of the earth, but must needs degrade even the abode of the Manes to find materials for the gratification of their desires. Pliny's account of gold and silver consists chiefly of historical disquisitions about rings, money, crowns, plate, statues, and the other various objects in the making of which the precious metals have been used, in which he has presented us with a number of curious and interesting notices. He also specifies when and how metallic products are used as remedies. The mention of bronze (book xxxiv.) leads him to a digression about statues and statuaries, again chiefly of an
The historical kind, and preserving several interesting and valuable facts (c. 9—19). In the 19th chapter he enumerates the chief works of the most celebrated statuaries, but the barren inventory is enlivened by very few remarks which can satisfy the curiosity of the artist or the lover of art. The introduction of this digression, and the mention of some mineral pigments, leads Pliny to take up the subject of painting in the 35th book. His account, however, is chiefly that of the historian and anecdote collector, not that of a man who understood or appreciated the art. The early stages of it he discusses very summarily; but on its progress after it had reached some maturity, and the various steps by which it rose in estimation among the Romans, he has many valuable and interesting records. In his account of the pigments employed by the ancient painters, he mixes up the medical properties of some of them in a way peculiarly his own, though not very conducive to regularity of arrangement. His chronological notices of the eras of the art and of the most distinguished painters are extremely valuable, and he notices, usually with tolerable clearness, the great improvers of the art, and the advances which they respectively made. The reader will find in this part of the work many interesting anecdotes of the great painters of Greece; but will often wish that instead of a great variety of unimportant details, and accounts of trivial processes and mechanical excellences, Pliny had given a more full and satisfactory account of many of the masterpieces of antiquity, which he only barely mentions. The excellent materials which he had before him in the writings of several of the ancient artists, and others which he might have consulted, might have been worked up, in better hands, into a far more interesting account. After a short notice of the plastic art, a few chapters at the end of the book are devoted to the medical and other properties of various mineral products, the use of bricks, &c.

For the 36th book "lapidum natura restit," as Pliny says, "hoc est processus morum insanas," Marble and the other kinds of stone and kindred materials used in buildings, or rather the admirable and curious works in which they have been employed (including a notice of sculpture and sculptors), occupy the greater portion of the book, the remainder of which treats of other minerals, and the medicinal and other uses to which they were applied. The 37th book treats, in a similar manner, of gems and precious stones, and the fine arts as connected with the department of engraving, the whole concluding with an energetic commendation of Italy, as the land of all others the most distinguished by the natural endowments and the glory of its inhabitants, by the beauty of its situation, and its fertility in everything that can minister to the wants of man.

The style of Pliny is characterised by a good deal of masculine vigour and elevation of tone, though its force is frequently rather the studied vehemence of the rhetorical than the spontaneous outburst of impassioned feeling. In his fondness for point and antithesis, he is frequently betrayed into harshness, and his pregnant brevity not uncommonly degenerates into abruptness and obscurity, though much of this latter characteristic which is found in his writings is probably due to the corrupt state of the text.

The editions of Pliny's Natural History are very numerous. The first was published at Venice 1469, and was rapidly followed by many others; but the first edition of any great merit was that by Hardouin (Paris, 1685, in 5 vols. 4to.; 2nd edition 1723, 3 vols. fol.), which exhibits great industry and learning. The edition published by Panckoucke (Paris, 1829—1833, in 20 vols.) with a French translation by Ajasson de Grandsagne is enriched by many valuable notes by Cavier and other eminent scientific and literary men of France. These notes are also appended, in a Latin form, in another edition in six volumes (Paris, 1836—38, Panckoucke). The most valuable critical edition of the text of Pliny is that by Sillig (Leipzig, 1831—36, 5 vols. 12mo.). The last volume of this edition contains a collation of a MS. at Bamberg of great value (containing, however, only the last six books), which supplies words and clauses in many passages not suspected before of being corrupt, from which it may be inferred that the text of the earlier books is still in a mutilated state, and that much of the obscurity of Pliny may be traced to this cause. A considerable passage at the end of the last book has been supplied by Sillig from this manuscript. It appears from his preface that Sillig is engaged upon a more extensive edition of Pliny.

The Natural History of Pliny has been translated into almost all languages; into English by Holland (London, 1601); into German by Denson (1764—65), and Grosse (1781—88, 12 vols.); besides translations of parts by Fritsch and Kilb; into Italian by Landino (Ven. 1476), Bruccoli (Ven. 1548), and Domenichi (Ven. 1561); into Spanish by Huerta (Madrid, 1624—29); into French by Dupinet (1563), Poinsinet de Sivry (1771—82), and Ajasson de Grandsagne; into Dutch (Arnhem, 1617); into Arabic by Homan Ibn Ishak (Joannitius). A great deal of useful erudition will be found in the Exercitationes Plinianae on the Polyhistor of Solinus, by Salmiasi. Another valuable work in illustration of Pliny is the Disquisitiones Plinianae, by A. Jos. a Turre Rezzonio. Parma, 1763—67, 2 vols. fol. (Ajasson de Grandsagne, Notice sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de Plinie Cacicien; Bähr, Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, p. 471, &c.)

G. P. M.]

C. PLINIUS CAECILIUS SECUNDUS, was the son of C. Caecilius, and of Plinia, the sister of C. Plinius, the author of the Naturalis Historia. His native place was probably Comum, now Como, on the lake Larius, Lake of Como, on the banks of which he had several villæ (Ep. ix. 7). The year of his birth was a. d. 61 or 62, for, in a letter addressed to Cornelius Tacitus (Ep. vi. 20), in which he describes the great eruption of Vesuvius, which happened a. d. 79, he says that he was then in his eighteenth year. His father died young, and after his death Plinius and his son lived with his brother, who adopted his nephew, Caecilius. Under the republic his name after adoption would have been C. Plinius Caecilius Secundus.

The education of Plinius was conducted under the care of his uncle, his mother, and his tutor, Verginius Rufus (Ep. ii. 1). From his youth he was devoted to letters. In his fourteenth year he wrote a Greek tragedy (Ep. vii. 4); but he adds, "what kind of a thing it was, I know not: it was called a tragedy." He studied eloquence under Quintilianus and Nicetas Sacerdos (Ep. vi. 9). His acquisitions finally gained him the reputation
It is an improbable conjecture that Plinius may have written many of his letters with a view to publication, or that when he was writing some of them, the idea of future publication was in his mind. However they form a very agreeable collection, and make us acquainted with many interesting facts in the life of Plinius and that of his contemporaries.

The letters from Plinius to Trajanus and the emperor's replies are the most valuable part of the collection. The first letter in the tenth book is a letter of congratulation to Trajanus on his accession to the imperial dignity. Other letters contain requests for favours to himself or his friends; and many of them are on public affairs, on which he consulted the emperor during his government in Asia Minor. The replies of Trajanus are short, and always to the purpose in hand; and for instance, in the matter of the aqueduct of Nicomedia (x. 46, 47), and the aqueduct of Sinope (x. 91, 92); as to covering over a dirty drain in Amastris, which sent forth a pestilent stench (x. 99); on the plan for uniting the lake of Nicomedia to the sea by a canal (x. 50, 51, 69, 70); and on the proposal to compel the decurions to accept loans of the public money, in order that the interest might not be lost: the emperor's notions of justice would not allow him to accede to such a proposal.

The letter on the punishment of the Christians (x. 97), and the emperor's answer (x. 98), have furnished matter for much remark. The fact of a person admitting himself to be a Christian was sufficient for his condemnation; and the punishment appears to have been death (supplicium minatus: perseverantes duci jussi). The Christians, on their examination, admitted nothing further than their practice of meeting on a fixed day, before it was light; and they justified themselves to Christ, as God (quasi Deo); their oath (whatever Plinius may mean by sacramentum) was not to bind them to any crime, but to avoid theft, robbery, adultery, breach of faith, and denial of a deposit. Two female slaves, who were said to be deaconesses (ministræ), were put to the torture by Plinius, but nothing unfavourable to the Christians could be got out of them: the governor could detect nothing except a perverse and extravagant superstition (superstitionem pravam et immodicam). Hereupon he asked the emperor's advice, for the condemnation of the superstition was spreading; yet he thought that it might be stopped. The Romans had a horror of secret meetings, especially for religious celebrations, and they had experience of their mischief, as in the case of the Bacchanalia (Liv. xxxix. 8). They made no distinction between the Christians and others who congregated contrary to law: nor did they concern themselves about the particular character of any of these unions: the Roman policy was generally opposed to all meetings at irregular times or places (Ep. x. 43). "It is not true," says Dr. Taylor (Elements of Civil Law, p. 579), "that the primitive Christians held their assemblies in the night to avoid the interruptions of the civil power: but the converse of that proposition is true in the utmost latitude; viz. that they met with molestations from that quarter, because their assemblies were nocturnal." It remains a question if they would have been permitted to hold their assemblies in the day time; and it is not clear that they would. This being premised, the emperor's answer is mild and merciful; more mild than the practice of his governor had been, more merciful and just than the proceedings of the Inquisition, and of many religious persecutions among Christians themselves: he approves of the governor's conduct, as explained in his letter, and observes that no general rule can be laid down. Persons supposed to be Christians are not to be sought for: if they are accused and the charge is proved, they are to be punished, but if a man denied the charge, and could prove its falsity by offering his prayers to the heathen gods (dios nosris), however suspected he may have been, he shall be excused in respect of his repentance. Charges of accusation (libellis) without the name of the informer or accuser, were not to be received, as they had been: it was a thing of the worst example, and unseemly to the age.

The first edition of the Epistolae and Panegyrics of Plinius is that of Venice, 1483, 4to. One of the latest and best editions is that of J. M. Gesner, by G. H. Schaefer, Leipzig, 1805, 8vo. The best edition of the Epistolae alone is said to be by Corius and Longolius, Amsterdam, 1794, 4to. Schaefer's edition contains the life of Plinius by Cellarius, who has given references to the several passages in the letters, which are evidence of the facts. There is a much more elaborate life by Masson, Amsterdam, 1709, 8vo. There are German translations of the Epistolae, by E. Thierfeld, 1828-1829; by E. A. Schmid, 1782, &c.; and by J. B. Schaefer, 1801, &c. There is an English version of the Epistolae by Lord Orrery, and another by W. Meltow. [G. L.]

PLINIUS VALERIATUS. [Valerianus, Plinius.]

PLISTONICUS or PLEISTONICUS (ΠΛΙΣΤΩΝΙΚΟΣ), an ancient Greek physician, a pupil of Praxagoras (Cels. De Med. i. praef. p. 6), who therefore lived probably in the fourth and third centuries B.C. He appears to have written a work on Anatomy (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6, vol. x. p. 136), which is several times mentioned by Galen (De Atro Bile, c. 1, vol. v. p. 104; De Meth. Med. i. 3, ii. 5, iv. 4, vol. x. pp. 28, 110, 260; De Venae Sect. ad Cru. Ersist. cc. 5, 6, vol. xi. pp. 163, 169; De Simplici, Medicum, Temper. in Facult. vi. praeom. vol. xi. p. 795; Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. Vf." iii. 12, vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 29; Adv. Julianum. c. 5, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 270), who calls him one of the most eminent physicians of his time (De Hippocr. et Plat. Deirr. vii. 5, vol. v. p. 683). He is quoted also by Pliny (H. N. xx. 13, 48), Atheneus (Deipn. ii. 23, p. 45), Orisias (Coll. Med. vii. 27, p. 532), and Gaius Iustinus (De Furt. c. 7). None of his writings are now extant. [W. A. G.]

PLOCAMUS, a Greek sculptor, whose name is inscribed on the plinth of a group of two statues, Bacchus supported by Amphilochus. Besides the inscription ΠΛΟΚΑΜΟΣ ΠΟΙΗΣΕ, there is another on the front of the plinth, ΦΩΒΕΙΝ ΤΟΝ ΑΤΟΜΟΝ ΜΠ, which is evidently of later date. (Boissard, Antiq. Rom. iv. tab. 120; Montfaucon, Antiq. Épalcq. vol. ii. p. 11; R. Rochette, Letter à M. Schomb. p. 359, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

PLOTINA, POMPEIA, the wife of the emperor Trajan, was, according to the concurrent testimony of all the writers who mention her, a woman of extraordinary merits and virtue. As she ascended the steps of the palace after her husband's accession, she turned round to the people, and took them to witness that she always desired to be the same as she was then; and throughout her life her conduct was regulated by this principle. She also increased the popularity of Trajan by repressing the exactions of the procurators. As she had no children, she persuaded her husband to adopt Hadrian, to whom she was much attached; but the statement of Dion Cassius, that her intercourse with Hadrian was of a criminal character, is opposed to all that we know of her character. Plotina survived her husband and died in the reign of Hadrian, who honoured her memory by mourning for her nine days, by building a temple in her honour, and by composing hymns in her praise. Hadrian likewise erected in honour of her a magnificent temple at Nemausus in Gaul. (Dion Cass. lxi. 5, lxix. 1, 10; Plin. Paneg. 83, 94; Aur. Vict. Epit. 42. § 21; Spathian. Hadr. 4, 12.) In the coin annexed Plotina is called Augusta, but in what year she received that title is uncertain. When Pliny pronounced his Panegyric, that is, in A.D. 100, she had not yet obtained it (Paneg. 84); but an ancient inscription informs us that she was so called in A. D. 105. (Eckhel, vol. vi. p. 465.)

COIN OF PLOTINA, WIFE OF TRAJAN.

PLOTINUS (ΠΛΟΤΙΝΟΣ), the originator of the new Platonic system (though not of its fundamental principles), lived so exclusively in speculation, that he appeared to be ashamed of his own bodily organisation (Ετις μην αληθωμένη διὰ το εκσωτη ενι, Porphyry. Vita Plotin. c. 1; comp. Euseb. i. 4, §§ 14, 15), and would neither tell his parents, his forefathers, his native country, nor his birthday, in order to avoid the celebration of it. (Porphyry. ec. 1, 2.) When requested to sit for his portrait, he asked, whether it was not enough to bear the image in which nature had veiled us, and whether we ought to commit the folly of leaving to posterity an image of this image? so that his enthusiastic friend, Amelius, only succeeded in getting a faithful portrait of him by introducing an artist to his open lectures, in order that he might observe him accurately and then paint him from memory. (Porphyry. l.c.) According to Suidas and others, he was born at Lycopolis (Sivion) in Egypt. That he was of Roman descent, or at least born of a freed man of Rome, is conjectured with great probability from his name. Porphyry could give very little information respecting his earlier life, at least from any personal communication. He learned, however, that he had been fed from the nurse's breast up to his eighth year, although he was already sent to school; that in his twenty-eighth year the impulse to study philosophy was awakened in him, but that not obtaining satisfaction from the teacher he attended (who was named Alexandriens), he fell into a state of great anxiety, and was then brought by a friend to Ammonius Saccas; that from that day forward he remained continuously with Ammonius for eleven years, until in his thirty-ninth year the desire he experienced to learn the philosophy of the Persians and Indians, induced him to join the expedition of the emperor Gordian (A. D. 242). After the death of Gordian he retreated with great difficulty to Antioch, and from thence went, in his fortieth year, to Rome. There he held communication with some few individuals, but kept the doctrines of Ammonius secret, as he had concerted to do with two others of the same school, namely, Herennius and Origen. Even after Herennius and Origen had successively, in opposition to the agreement, begun to make known these doctrines in their books, Plotinus continued not only to make use of them in oral communications (εκ της Ἀμμονίου συνο- σίας παυόμενος τάς διατριβάς), in order to excite his friends to investigation, which communications, however, according to the testimony of Amelius, were characterised by great want of order and superficiality of words (η δια τισ διατριβή... ἀταξίας πλήρης καὶ πολλάς φλασίκας, Porphyry, c. 3), until, in the first year of the reign of Gallienus (254), he was induced by his friends to express himself in writing upon the subjects treated of in his oral communications (γράφειν τάς ἐκπίστωσις ὑπο- θέσεις, Porph. c. 4). In this manner when, ten years later, Porphyry came to Rome and joined himself to Plotinus, twenty-one books of very various contents had been already composed by him, which in the bly dispersed, however, with discretion and put into the hands of the initiated. (Ib. c. 4)

During the six years that Porphyry lived with Plotinus at Rome, the latter, at the instigation of Amelius and Porphyry, wrote twenty-three books on the subjects which had been earnestly discussed in their meetings, to which nine books were afterwards added. (Porphyry had returned to Sicily in the year 268.) Of the fifty-four books of Plotinus, Porphyry remarks, that the first twenty-one were of a lighter character, that only the twenty-three following were the production of the matured powers of the author, and that the other nine, especially the four last, were evidently written with diminished vigour. Although Porphyry's judgment, however, might only have approved of the edition which he had himself arranged, yet he has carefully given the titles to all three of the portions, as, with his title variation, they again appear, the twenty-three. (c. 5, 6.)

The correction of his writings Plotinus himself committed to the care of Porphyry, on account of the weakness of his sight he never read them through a second time, to say nothing of making corrections; intent simply upon the matter, he was alike careless of orthography, of the division of the syllables, and the clearness of his handwriting. He was accustomed, however, to think out his conceptions so completely, that what he had sketched out in his mind seemed copied as though from a book. He could always, with the utmost confidence, take up the thread of the investigation where he had broken off, without being obliged to read the preceding paragraph anew, even though foreign investigations might have filled up the intervening time. He lived at the same time with himself and with others, and the inward activity of his spirit only ceased during the hours of sleep, which, moreover, this very activity, as well as the scantiness of food to which he had accustomed himself, greatly abraded (ec. 7, 8); even bread itself he but seldom enjoyed (c. 8), and when suf-fering from pains of the stomach denied himself the bath as well as treacle (a kind that was made of viper's flesh and poppies), the latter because he generally abstained from flesh altogether. (c. 2, ib. Kreuzer.) His written style was close (συναγωγή), pregnant (πελάνων), and richer in thoughts than in words, yet enthusiastic, and always pointing entirely to the main object (ἐπικαθός φιλοσώς. c. 14). Probably he was more eloquent in his oral communications, and was said to be very clever in finding the appropriate word, even if he failed in accuracy on the whole. Beside this, the beauty of his person was increased when disclosing; his countenance was lighted up with genius, and covered with small drops of perspiration. Although he received questions in a gentle and friendly manner, yet he knew well how to answer them forcibly or to exhaust them. For three whole days, on one occasion, he discussed with Porphyry the relation of the soul to the body. (c. 13.) He ever expressed himself with the great warmth of acknowledgment respecting any successful attempts of his younger friends; as, for example, respecting a poem by Porphyry. Immoral principles he met by exciting opposition against them. (c. 15.)

At a time when, notwithstanding the reigning demonisation, a deep religious need was awakened, noble minds, which had not yet obtained satisfaction from the open teaching of Christianity, must have attached themselves with great confidence and affection to a personality so fraught with deep reflection as was that of Plotinus. It was not only men of science like the philosophers Amelius, Porphyry, the physicians Paulinus, Eustochias, and Zethus the Arab, who regarded him with deep respect, but even senators and other statesmen did so as well. One of them, named Rogatianus, respected him to such a degree, that he stripped himself of his dignity (he had attained the praetorian rank) and renounced all kind of luxury; this he did, however, to his own bodily comfort, for having been previously lame both in his hands and feet, he perfectly recovered by this simple habit of living the use of all his limbs. (c. 7.) Even women attached themselves to him, and his house was filled with youths and maidens, whom their dying parents had entrusted to his direction. He did not use his high position as a stimulus to the practical skill that was requisite to manage their affairs. His sharp penetrating judgment and good sense in such matters are highly extolled (c. 11), and the care with which he looked through all the accounts respecting their fortune is much praised (c. 9).

He enjoyed the favour of the emperor Gallienus and the empress Salonina to such a degree, that he obtained almost the rebuilding of two destroyed towns in Campania, with the view of their being governed according to the laws of Plato (c. 12). Even envy itself was constrained to acknowledge his worth. It is said that the attempt of a certain Alexandrian, named Olympius (who for a short time had been a pupil of Ammonius), to injure Plotinus by magical arts (ἀστρονομός ἀπὸν μαγείαν) recoiled upon himself, and reflected itself on him by causing the contraction of all his limbs. It is further related, that an Egyptian priest, in the temple of Isis, essayed in the presence of Plotinus to make his attending δαιμονικος appear, but that instead of this a god presented himself as the protecting spirit of the philosopher, whose high dignity the Egyptian could now no longer call in question. These relations, occurring as they did in a comparatively sober-minded Porphyry (c. 10; comp. Procl. in Alcibiad. i. 23, p. 190, Cons.), are well worthy of observation, as characteristic of the tendencies of that age, however little disposed we may be to attach any reality to them. Although Plotinus only attached any faith to the prophecies of the astrologers after a searching examination (c. 15, extr.), yet he believed, as that Egyptian did (comp. Ennead. iii. 4), in protecting spirits of higher and lower ranks, and not less, probably, in the power of calling them up through intense meditation, or of working upon those at a distance by magic. It was not indeed to his individual power, but to the divine power, gained by vision, that he ascribed this miraculous agency, but he would none the more acknowledge that the gods had any individual interest in him, and on one occasion he put off Amelius' request to share with him in a sacrifice, with the words, "Those gods of yours must come to me, not to I to them." (c. 10.)

After Plotinus's death, Amelius inquired of the Delphic Apollo whether his soul was gone, and received in fifty-one lame hexameters an ardent panegyric on the philosopher, in which he was celebrated as mild and good, with a soul aspiring to the divinity, loved of God, and a fortunate searcher after truth; now, it was said, he abides like Minos, Rhadamanthus, Aeacus, Pluto, and Pythagoras, where friendship, undisturbed joy (ἐὐποἰ ὡν), and love to Deity are enthroned, in fellowship with the ever-blessed spirits (πάσας ων, c. 52).

Porphyry, his biographer, adds, that he had raised his soul to the contemplation of the supreme and personal God not without success, and that the Deity appeared to him to be something elevated above all body and form, beyond thought and imagination; yes, that during his own intercourse with him, he (Plotinus) had, by a transcendent energy of soul, four times risen to a perfect union with God, and confesses that he himself, during a life of sixty-eight years, had only once attained that elevation. (c. 23; comp. Plotin. Ennead. v. 5. § 3.) The acknowledgments of Longinus, however, speak far more for the influence which Plotinus exercised on the mind of his age, than do the manifested Deity or the admiring love of Porphyry. That excellent critic had at first (having been himself a constant hearer of Ammonius and Origen) regarded Plotinus with contempt (c. 20), and even after his death could not profess any kind of agreement with most of his doctrines. The criticism which Plotinus's doctrine of ideas, and not given in to the answers of Porphyry and Amelius; yet still he was most anxious to get perfect copies of his books, and extolled at once the pregnancy of their style and the philosophical treatment of the investigations. In the same manner he expressed himself in his work on final causes, and also in a letter written before the death of Plotinus; in these writings he unconditionally prefers our Lycopolitans, not only to the other philosophers of his time, whether Platonics, Stoics, or Peripatetics, but also to Numenius, Cronius, Modernists, and Thrasyllus, more especially in reference to the fullness of the objects treated of (προδήληστα), the originality of the manner in which they were discussed (τρόπος ἑαυτὴς ὑποδηλώσεως; Amelius is in this respect placed by his side), and the closeness of the reasoning. (c. 21, 22.)

When suffering from pain in the bowels, Plotinus used no other means than daily rubbing, and left this off when the men who assisted him died of the pest (A. D. 262). Suidas (who, however, is not to be relied on) says, that Plotinus himself was attacked by the plague; Porphyry on the contrary (c. 15) states, that the omission of these rubbings produced only disease of the throat (κοινονίας), which gradually became disjointed, so that at last he became speechless, weak of vision, and contracted both in hands and feet. Plotinus, therefore, withdrew to the country seat of his deceased friend Zethus in Campania, and, according to Eustochius, passed by Puteoli. There was only one of his friends present in the neighbourhood when he died (Porphyry had been obliged to go on account of health to Lillybaean in Sicily, and Amelius was on a journey to Apanaea in Syria), and of him he took leave in the following words: "I have waited for, but now I seek to lead back the Divine principle within me to the God who is all in all." At his last breath, Porphyry relates that a dragon glided from under the bed, and escaped through an opening in the wall. (c. 2.) In reference to former systems of Grecian philosophy, we are fully able to point out, for the most part with decision, how far they had prepared the way for Plotinus by earlier developments, and how much the peculiarity, both of their matter and their form, gained by his additional and creative reflections. It is not so easy, however, to decide by what peculiar ideas Plotinus compressed the New Platonic doctrines into that systematic form in which they lie before us in the Enneads. This result, indeed, we may see was prepared for by the philosophical efforts of almost two centuries. On the one side, Philon and others had attempted to bring the Emanation-theory, peculiar to the East, into harmony with the flower of the Hellenistic philosophy, namely with Platonism; on the other side, various Greeks had attempted partly to perfect and complete this theory, as the mature fruit of the Greek philosophic spirit, by a selection from the Platonic, Aristotelian, and Stoic doctrines, partly (as a satisfaction for the religious wants of the age) to base upon it the elements of the symbolism and the faith both of the Oriental and Grecian religions. With reference to the latter, that which first of all had sprung out of the religions wants of the age, was afterwards continued in the hope of raising a barrier against the spread of the Christian doctrines, by ennobling the various polytheistic religions, and by pointing out the same rational basis. But as, on the one hand, the Oriental Emanation-theory, with its hidden and self-excluding deity, could not strike its roots in the soil of the Grecian philosophy, so neither, on the other hand, could the eclectic and syncretic attempts of Plutarch, Maximus Tyrius, and others, satisfy the requisitions of a regular philosophy of religion. Without altogether renouncing these syncretic and eclectic attempts, or rejecting the new intuitive method of the Oriental Emanation-theories, Numenius and his contemporary Cronius appeared to be striving to make these several systems accessible to the Grecian dialectics. In place of emanations from the divine self-revealing essence, which become more and more finite in proportion as they stand further from the godhead, Numenius, approaching nearer to Plato, substitutes the development of eternal ideas, by the intuition (§eolplas) of the separate and independent soul, as directed to that absolute and unchangeable Divine essence from which it first proceeded. The unconditional existence, or the good, is not supposed to enter into this development; but its fluctuating image, the soul, by virtue of its innate intuition, can explain the hidden fullness of the original being, and by virtue of its peculiar striving (§eolpas), can set it, as it were, out of itself, and so separate in itself the soul and the spirit. How far Ammonius Saccas entered into such a logical modification of the Emanation-theory we cannot decide, neither do we know how far he surpassed his teachers in the form of his logical definitions. We only learn that he pointed out the unanimity of Plato and Aristotle in their essential doctrines, and chose them for his leaders. (Hierocles, de Provident. ap. Phot. Cod. 214, 251.) According to the fore-mentioned authority of Porphyry, Plotinus had joined himself entirely to Ammonius in the first years of his residence in Rome, and even afterwards, when he had the commentaries of Severus, Cronius, Numenius, Galius, Atticus, as also those of the Peripatetics, Aspasius, Alexander, Adriustus, read in their meetings, without at the same time following them, the spirit of his former teacher was predominant in all their investigations. (Porphyry, c. 14.) Against the charge of having copied Numenius, Amelius had defended him in a letter to Porphyry (Porph. 17, where the letter referred to is given); and indeed from the worthless fragments that have been handed down to us from the books of Numenius, we could well judge of the matter, even if Plotinus had simply surpassed that Plotonic in a few important points, and not in his whole method of philosophising.

With the doctrines of Aristotle, of the Pythagoreans and Stoics, of Heraclitus, of the Eleatics, of Anaxagoras and Empedocles, our philosopher was clearly acquainted; he appropriates much from them, and opposes much often with great acuteness; as, for example, in the books on the different species of existence, the Categories. (Ennead, vii. 1—3; comp. Trendelenburg's Hist. Beiträge zur Philosophie, 1st vol., Geschichte der Kategorienlehre.) Plato, however, is his constant guide and master. In him he finds the very basis and point of his philosophy more or less distinctly hinted at; he quotes him often with a bare "ipse dixit," is fond of joining his own speculations upon his remarks, and of exhibiting his own agreement with that great Athenian. This connection with Plato is probably common to him with Numenius, as also the critical method of examining the other Grecian systems, which was borrowed from Aristotle. But to him Plato was not, as with Numenius, the Attic Moses; on the contrary, he appears almost designately to avoid any reference to the Oriental philosophy and religion; he attempts to find all this under the veil of the Greek mythology, and points out here the germ of his own philosophical and religious convictions. Of the Egyptian and other Oriental doctrines of religion he hardly makes any mention at all; and yet to one who was a born Egyptian, and had penetrated so far into Asia, such knowledge could not have been wanting. Plotinus, therefore, cannot be accused of that confusion and falsification of the Oriental mythology and mysticism, which is found in Iamblichus, Proclus, and others of the New Platonic school. Probably it was at his suggestion that Amelius and Porphyry had written against the misuse which already began to be made of the doctrines of Zoroaster. Porphyry (Plotin. c. 16) mentions these writings in connection with the book which Plotinus aimed against the Gnostics, and there can be no doubt but that in this discussion he had to deal also with the Christian Gnostics. It is only their arbitrary Emanation-phantasies, however, their doctrines of matter and evil, and their astrological fatalism, that he opposed; the Christian doctrine respecting salvation, which were rather veiled than revealed by them, he leaves entirely untouched; also in the different explanations he gives of his threefold principle, he makes no reference to the Christian Trinity. Porphyry was the first to enter decidedly into the lists against the Christian revelation, and we must attribute it to the manner in which he viewed the task committed to his care, that in the books of Plotinus, which were edited by him, he introduced no unfavourable reference whatever to a religion which he detested.

In order to estimate these writings correctly, we ought not to forget that they originated for the most part in some question or other of temporary interest. Only a few of them can be considered as the commencements of a complete development of their respective subjects; as, for example, their books on philosophical problems (iv. 3—5), on the different species of existence (vi. 1—3), and on unity and uniformity (vi. 4—5); yet it would be difficult to unite even them in one continuous series of investigations, and still more so the others, especially those that were completed in the first period, which, however, bear more than those of the other periods the character of separate treatises, being adapted only in some few respects to stand in connection with them. We need not, therefore, blame Porphyry, that despairing of all such attempts, he has divided and arranged the books according to the similarity of their subject-matter; perhaps it would have been still better if he had entirely separated the treatises of the first period from those of both the others, and arranged consecutively each of the other divisions separately for itself, on the very same principles by which he had already been guided. These chronological references would, at least, have necessitated a complete discussion of Plotinus's system, however little it might have been practicable to trace the gradual development of that system in the mind of the author. The fundamental and main doctrines of it appear to have been fixed when he first began to write (which was at a tolerably mature period of life), only in the earlier periods they seem to have been concealed behind the particular object he had in view, more than was the case in those elaborations of a later date, which were directed towards the elucidation of the essential features of his own peculiar system. In these latter writings, the endeavour which, as far as we can judge, characterised Plotinus more than any other philosopher of his age, was especially prominent, the endeavour, namely, to pave the way to the solution of any question by a careful discussion of the difficulties of the case. However unsatisfactory this process may generally have proved, yet the insight which it afforded into the peculiarity of the problems was only second to that of Aristotle himself, whom in this respect he appears to have chosen as his master.

The difficulty of comprehending and appreciating the system of Plotinus is greatly increased, not only by the want of any systematic and scientific exhibition of it, and the consequent tedious repetitions, but also by the impossibility of finding in such a mass of isolated treatises the connection of the parts and the foundation of the whole system. No treatises like the Theætetus and Sophistæ of Plato, which undertake to develop and fix the idea of knowledge, and of its objects, are to be found in the Ennead of Plotinus; and from this circumstance we can see how the desire for a strictly scientific foundation in the philosophy of the age had been lost. The middle point of the system, however, may be regarded as involved in the doctrines of a threefold principle, and of pure intuition. We find, if not a fully satisfactory, yet at any rate a vigorous attempt to establish these points in the argument, that true knowledge is not attained so long as the knowing and the known, subject and object, are separate from each other. We trust, says Plotinus, to our sense-perceptions, and yet we are ignorant what it is in them which belongs to the objects themselves, and to the affection of the subject. Moreover, sense can grasp only an image (ἐιδωλικός) of the object, not the object itself, which ever remains beyond it. In the same way the spirit cannot know the spiritual (τὰ νοητά) so long as it is separate from it; and if any one would affirm that the spirit and the spiritual may somewhere or other be united, yet still our thoughts would only be types ( cuckold τῶν ἐνυπαρταί), types it may be of a real external existence; an existence, however, which the mind can never be sure that it has grasped, and which (whether existence be a spiritual thing or not) must present itself to us as premises, judgments, or propositions (v. 3 § 1, comp. v. 3 §§ 1—3). To despair of truth altogether, he considered, notwithstanding this, to be equivalent to a denial of mind itself. Accordingly, we must of necessity presuppose knowledge, truth, and existence; we must admit that the real spirit carries every thing (spiritual) in itself, not merely their types or images; and that for this very reason there is no need of any demonstration or guarantee of truth; but rather, that truth carries its own evidence to the soul. (Ἡ ἐνυπαρτα ἄληθεια τῶν ἐμφανισθέντων ἀλήθεια δὲν ἐμφανίζεται, ἦδ. § 2.)

The true soul cannot therefore deceive; and its knowledge is nothing representational, uncertain, or borrowed from other sources (§ 1). This argumentation, directed as well against the Stoics as the atomistic Sensationalists (comp. vi. 1 § 28, ii. 6 § 1, iii. 6 § 6, iv. 4 § 23, § 3 § 3, § 18, i. 4 § 10, iv. 7 § 9), now breaks off, and leads immediately to consideration in which the mind is regarded as a conceptual principle, not a knowing principle. The conclusion of this train of reasoning is found in the third book of the Enneads, which starts from the question, whether the self-conscious (νοον) subject, in order to separate the thinking from the thought, presupposes an inherent multiplicity; or whether the simple me can comprehend itself. The former Plotinus cannot admit as valid, since on such a supposition, self and knowledge, the comprehending principle and the comprehended, would be separated from each other; he cannot renounce the idea of a pure self-comprehension, without at the same time renouncing the knoledge of every thing that can be thought of likewise (v. 3 § 1, comp. §§ 4, 5).

After an acute development of the difficulties which oppose themselves to the idea of an absolutely simple self-consciousness, Plotinus attempts to solve them by the supposition that the essence of the soul is a spontaneous activity, and that self-consciousness is to be regarded as including at once thinking itself—the thinking principle—and the object thought (v. 3 §§ 5, 6, 5 § 1). From this it follows still further, that the pure spirit (which does not strive to work out of itself) lives necessarily in a state of self-consciousness and self-knowledge; that the human spirit, however, develops its pure activity only so far as it masters the soul, with which it is connected by the bond of a mediating thought (διάνοια), and rests simply upon itself (v. 3 § 7). Lastly, it is concluded that the human spirit can only know the divine and the spiritual, so far as it knows itself (κ. c.). In self-knowledge, thought and existence fall absolutely together; for the former is implied in the process of knowing, the latter in self or the me (vi. 1 § 1). So likewise in all true knowledge, the objects must be comprehended immediately (§ 17), and not by reference to the ideas which are innate in the soul itself. Meditation, or meditating thought, can only be regarded as the way to truth (iv. 4 § 12), without being ever able to reach it (v. 5 §§ 1, 2, 6, 8, 4, comp. i. 3 §§ 4, 5, 8, § 2).

Nay, unconditioned Being, or the Godhead, cannot be grasped by thinking, or science, only by intuition (πανομοίωσις, vi. 9 § 4, 7, 35). In this pure intuition, the good, or the absolute being, grasps upon itself through the medium of our own spirits (vi. 7 §§ 16, 34, vi. 6 § 7, 3, 19, 9, § 4, iv. 4 § 2, v. 3 § 3). To close the eye against all things transient and variable (ὤσα ἀκαταστατά δήμος, 1. 6 § 8), to raise ourselves to this simple essence (πανομοίωσις), to take refuge in the absolute (vi. 9 § 11, vi. 6 § 11), this must be regarded as the highest aim of all our spiritual efforts. We are necessitated, however, to regard the unconditioned or the unconditioned on earth, as the primary ground of the spirit, and of its fundamental idea of being, or of the world of ideas, by virtue of the multiplicity of the acts of the soul's activity, and of their objects, all being included in the conception of being (vi. 3 § 10, 6, § 1, vi. 7 § 37, 9 § 2); for all multiplicity is conditioned and dependent. In this way the unconditioned shows itself as the absolutely simple,—the unconditioned one (v. 4 § 1, vi. 9 § 6), which for that very reason has no need of thinking nor of willing (vi. 9 § 6); and being raised entirely above all the determinations of existence (v. 3 § 12, vi. 2 § 3, &c. 8 § 18, 9 § 5) can be described neither as being or not being; neither as moved or resting; neither as free or necessary; neither as a principle or as no principle; nay, which can only be characterised as the unconditioned one, and as the good (v. 2 § 1, 4, § 1, vi. 8 § 3, 9 § 9). Accordingly, the absolute is something inexpressible (vi. 8 § 8), and can only be reached by the above-mentioned yielding up of the soul to it (comp. vi. 9 § 3, 4, 9 § 9, &c.). Consequently, it is a necessary presupposition to all beings, that we think of every kind of existence as dependent upon the absolute, and in a certain sense produced from it (vi. 9 § 3, comp. v. 1 § 6). It (the absolute) must ever stream forth as inexhaustible (v. 2 § 7); it must bring every thing else out of itself without becoming the weaker (vi. 8).
§ 19). Esences must flow from it, without its experiencing any change; it must dwell in all existences so far as they partake of the one essential existence (iv. 3. § 17, vi. 9. § 1); as absolutely perfect it must be the end (not the operating cause) of all being (vi. 9. §§ 8, 9). The immediate productive power of the unconditioned one absolutely exists; and next to it stands the spirit, which has a certain connection with duality and plurality, and is the source of all the determinations of being and knowing (v. 1. § 6, v. 6. § 1, v. 2. § 1, vi. 9. § 2). This partakes of both uniformity and diversity—of unity and plurality (v. 1. § 4, vi. 1). The spirit is the basis both of being and thinking, for every act of thought, directed to the unconditioned, produces a real existence, an idea; each one of which is different from the rest by virtue of its form, but identical in respect of the matter (ii. 4. § 4, ii. 5. § 6, iii. 9. §§ 9, 10, v. 1. § 7, vi. 7. § 16). Out of the spirit is developed the idea that would be contained in it (v. 1. §§ 3—6), that is, the soul. As being an immediate production of the spirit, the soul has a share in all existence or in ideas, being itself an idea (iii. 6. §§ 18). By it is produced the transition from eternity to time, from rest to motion (iv. 4. § 15, ii. 9. § 1; comp. v. 1. § 4); to it belongs, in contradistinction from the spirit, the power of looking out of itself; and as the result of this a practical activity (ii. 1. § 2, ii. 5. § 3, iii. 6. § 4, v. 1. §§ 6, 10, v. 2. § 1, vi. 2. § 22). In its power of imaging the world, it (the soul) stands midway between the intelligible and the sensuous (iv. 8. §§ 2, 3, iv. 9. § 7); the latter is an image of itself, as itself is an image of the spirit. The boundary of being, or the lowest principle of all, is matter; the necessary contrast of the first, or the good (i. 8. § 1, &c.); and in so far it must also be negative and evil (i. 8, i. 7. § 15, iii. 4. § 9); nevertheless in consequence of its susceptibility of form, it must have something positive about it (ii. 4. §§ 10—13, ii. 2. § 14). Nothing else also is a soul (iii. 8. § 3), and perception at once the ground and aim of all becoming. But in proportion as the perception becomes more clear and distinct, the corresponding essence belongs to a higher step in the scale of being (iii. 8. §§ 3, 7).

The further development of Plotinus's three principles, and of the dim idea of matter (see especially ii. 4, &c.), and the attempts he made to determine the idea of time in opposition to that of eternity (iii. 7), to explain the essential constitution of man, and his immortal blessedness (i. 4, &c.), to maintain the belief in a divine providence, and the freedom of the will, in opposition to the theory of an evil principle, and the inexcusable necessity of predetermination or causal sequence (iii. 1—3, comp. ii. 9), together with the first weak beginnings of a natural philosophy (ii. 5—8), and the foundations of an ethical science answering to the above principles, grounded on the separation of the lower or political from the higher or intelligible virtue,—these points, as also his researches on the Beautiful, can only just be mentioned in passing (i. 2, 3, comp. 4. 5, and ii. 6).

Beside Porphyry's recension of the books of Plotinus there was also another furnished by Eustochius, out of which a more extensive division of the books on the soul (iv. 4. § 20) has been quoted in a Greek Scholion, and the operation of which on the present text has been traced and pointed out by Fr. Kreuzer (see his remarks to i. 9. § 1, ii. 3. § 5, p. 248. 12, Kreuz. iv. 2. §§ 1, 2, iv. 7. § 8, p. 837, Kr.). Moreover, there is in connection with the last-mentioned passage a completion by Eusebius (Pr. Ec. xx. 22).

The Enneads of Plotinus appeared first in the Latin translation of Marsiliii Ficinus (Florence, 1492), a translation which was furnished with an elaborate introduction to each part, and a full table of contents, and to which the very faulty Greek text of Petrus Perna was appended (Basel, 1530). The Greek and Latin edition of Fr. Kreuzer is much more satisfactory, which is furnished, moreover, with critical and exegetical annotations: "Plotini opera omnia," &c. Oxoni, 1833, 3 vols. 4to. There is an English translation of Selections from the works of Plotinus by Thomas Taylor, London, 1834.

PLOTIUS, whose full name was Marius Plotius Sacerdos, a Latin grammarian, the author of De Metris Liber, dedicated to Maximus and Simplicius. All that we know with regard to the writer is comprised in the brief notice prefixed by himself to his work "Marius Plotius Sacerdos de Rhythmis," &c.

From the preface which follows we learn that this essay formed the third and concluding book of a treatise upon grammar, the subject of the first book having been De Institutiones Artistae Grammaticae, and of the second De Nomine Verborumque Ratione nec non de Structurarum Compositionibus. Although we have no direct means of determining the period when Plotius flourished we are led to infer from his style that he cannot be earlier than the fifth or sixth century. Endlich in his "Analecta Grammatica" from a MS. which once belonged to the celebrated monastery of Bobbio a tract, entitled M. Claudii Sacerdotis Artium Grammaticarum Libri duo, which he endeavoured to prove were in reality the two books by Marius Plotius Sacerdos described above, but there is not sufficient evidence to warrant this conclusion.

The "Liber de Metris" was first published by Putschius in his "Grammaticae Latinae Aquitanae antiqua," 4to. Hannover, 1605. p. 2623—2663, from a MS. or MSS. belonging to Andreas Schottus and Joannes a Wouwer. It will be found also in the "Scriptores Latini Regni Merid.," of Gaisford, 8vo. Oxon. 1837. p. 242—302.

PLUTARCHUS (Πλοῦταρχος), a tyrant of Eretria in Euboea. Whether he was the immediate successor ofThemistokles, and also whether he was in any way connected with him by blood, are points which we have no means of ascertaining.
PLUTARCHUS.

PLUTARCHUS. 429

Trustimg perhaps to the influence of his friend Medias, he applied to the Athenians in B.C. 354 for aid against his rival, Callias of Chalceis, who had allied himself with Philip of Macedon. The application was granted in spite of the resistance of Demostenes, and the command of the expedition was entrusted to Phocion, who defeated Callias at Tamynae. But the conduct of Plutarchus in the battle had placed the Athenians in great jeopardy, and though it may have been nothing more than rashness, Phocion would seem to have regarded it as treachery, for he thereupon treated Plutarchus as an enemy and expelled him from Eretria (Dem. de Pac. p. 58, Philipp. iii. p. 125, c. Meid. pp. 550, 567, 579; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 50, c. Ctes. p. 66; Plut. Phoc. 12, 13; Paus. i. 36.)

CALLIAS; PHOCION. [E. E.]

PLUTARCHUS (Πλούταρχος), was born at Chaeronea in Boeotia. The few facts of his life which are known, are chiefly collected from his own writings.

He was studying philosophy under Ammonius at the time when Nero was making his progress through Greece (Περὶ τῶν Εἰ ὅπερ δέλοι, c. 1), as we may collect from the passage referred to. Nero was in Greece and visited Delphi in A.D. 66; and Plutarch seems to say, that he was at Delphi at that time. We may assume then that he was then a young man in A.D. 66. In another passage (Antonius, 87) he speaks of Nero as his contemporary. His great-grandfather Nicarchus told him what the citizens of Chaeronea had suffered at the time of the battle of Actium (Plut. Antonius, 68). He also mentions his grandfather Lamprias, from whom he heard various anecdotes about M. Antonius, which Lamprias had heard from Philotas, who was studying medicine at Alexandria when M. Antonius was there with Cleopatra. (Antonius, 29.) His father’s name does not appear in his extant works. He had two brothers, Timon and Lamprias. As a young man, he was once employed on a mission to the Roman governor of the province. (Παλαιτικά παραγγελματα, 20.)

It appears incidentally from his own writings that he must have visited several parts of Italy: for instance, he speaks of seeing the statue or bust of M. Antonius at Ravenna (Marius, 2). But he says in express terms that he spent some time at Rome, and in other parts of Italy (Demostenes, 2). He observes, that he did not learn the Latin language in Italy, because he was occupied with public commissions, and in giving lectures on philosophy; and it was late in life before he busied himself with Roman literature. He was lecturing at Rome during the reign of Domitianus, for he gives an account of the stoic L. Junius Arulenus Rusticus receiving a letter from the emperor while he was present at one of Plutarch’s discourses (Περὶ πολυσοφισματος, c. 15). Rusticus was also a friend of the younger Plinius, and was afterwards put to death by Domitianus. Sossius Seneca, whom Plutarch addresses in the introduction to his life of Theocles (c. 1), is probably the same person who was a friend of the younger Plinius (Ep. I. 13), and consul several times in the reign of Trajanus.

The statement that Plutarchus was the preceptor of Trajanus, and that the emperor raised him to the consular rank, rests on the authority of Suidas (s. v. Πλούταρχος), and a Latin letter addressed to Trajanus. But this short notice in Suidas is a worthless authority; and the Latin letter to Trajanus, which only exists in the Polycarpicus of John of Salisbury (Lib. 5. c. 1, ed. Leiden, 1639), is a forgery, though John probably did not forge it. John’s expression is somewhat singular: " Extat Epistola Plutarchi Trajanum instituit, quae cujusdam politice constitutionis exprimit sensum. Ea dictat esse hujusmodi;" and then he gives the letter. In the second chapter of this book John says that this Politica Constitutio is a treatise inscribed "Instituto Trajani," and he gives the substance of part of the work. Plutarch, who dedicated the Αντοφθέγματα Βασιλέων καὶ Στρατηγῶν to Trajanus, says nothing of the emperor having been his pupil. But some critics have argued that Plutarch is not the author of the Apophthegmata, because he says in the dedication that he had written the lives of illustrious Greeks and Romans; for they assume that he did not return to Chaeronea until after the death of Trajanus, and did not write his Lives until after his return. If these assumptions could be proved, it follows that he did not write the Apophthegmata, or at least the dedication. If we assume that he retired to Chaeronea before the death of Trajanus, we may admit that he wrote his Lives at Chaeronea and the Apophthegmata afterwards. It appears from his Life of Demostenes (c. 2), that he certainly wrote that Life at Chaeronea, and this Life and that of Cicero were the fifth pair. (Demostenes, c. 3.) Plutarch probably spent the latter years of his life at Chaeronea, where he discharged various magisterial offices, and had a priesthood.

Plutarch’s wife, Timoxena, bore him four sons and a daughter, also named Timoxena. It was on the occasion of his daughter’s death that he wrote his sensible and affectionate letter of consolation to his wife (Παραμυθηκος εἰς τὴν ἰδιαν γυναίκα). The time of Plutarch’s death is unknown.

The work which has immortalised Plutarch’s name is his Parallel Lives (Βίοι Παράδελφοι) of forty-six Greeks and Romans. The forty-six Lives are arranged in pairs; each pair contains the life of a Greek and a Roman, and is followed by a comparison (αὐγκρατία) of the two men; in a few pairs the comparison is omitted or lost. He seems to have considered each pair of Lives and the Parallel as making one book (ἐξίδιον). When he says that he wrote the book of the Lives of Demostenes and Cicero was the fifth, it is the most natural interpretation to suppose that it was the fifth in the order in which he wrote them. It could not be the fifth in any other sense, if each pair composed a book.

There are also the Lives of Artaxerxes Meneon, Plutarchus.

Aratus, Galba, and Otho, which are placed in the editions after the forty-six Lives. A Life of Homer is also sometimes attributed to him, but it is not printed in all the editions.

The following Lives by Plutarch are lost:—Epaminondas, Scipio, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Vitellius, Hessid, Pindar, Crates the Cynic, Dauphants, Aristomenes, and the poet Aratus.

There is an imperfect list of the works of Plutarch, intitled ΠΛΟΥΤΑΡΧΟΥ ΒΙΒΛΙΑΝ ΠΙΣΣΑ, which is attributed to his son Lamprias. Whether Lampris made the list or not, may be doubtful; but it is probable that a list of Plutarch’s works was made in ancient times, for it was common to make such lists; and his son may have performed the pious duty. (Suidas, s. v. Λαμπρίας.)

The authorities for Plutarch’s Lives are incidentally indicated in the Lives themselves. He is said to quote two hundred and fifty writers, of whom about eighty are writers whose works are entirely or partially lost. The question of the sources of Plutarch’s Lives has been examined by A. H. L. Heeren. (De Fontibus et Auctoritate Vitarum Parallelarum Plutarchi Commentationes IV. Goettingae, 1820, 8vo.) Plutarch must have had access to a good library; and if he wrote all his Lives during his old age at Chaeronea, we must infer that he had a large stock of books at command. The passage in the Life of Demosthenes (c. 2), in which he speaks of his residence in a small town, is perhaps wrongly understood to allude to the difficulty of finding materials for his Roman Lives; for he could hardly have been deficient in materials for his Greek Biographies.

It is not improbable that he may have collected materials and extracts long before he began to compose his Lives. Plutarch being a Greek, and an educated man, could not fail to be well acquainted with all the sources for his Greek Lives; and he has indicated them pretty fully. His acquaintance with the sources for his Roman Lives was less complete, and his handling of them less critical, but yet he quotes and refers to a great number of Roman writers as his authorities, as we may observe particularly in the Lives of Cicero and Caesar. He also used the Greek writers on Roman affairs—Polybius, Theophrastes the historian of Cn. Pompeius, Strabo, Nicolauus Damonenus, and others.

In order to judge of his merits as a biographer we must see how he conceived his work. He explains his method in the introduction to his Life of Alexander: he says, that he does not write histories,—he writes lives: and the most conspicuous events in a man’s life do not show his character so well as slight circumstances. It appears then that his object was to delineate character, and he selected and used the facts of a man’s life for this purpose only. His Lives, as he says, are not histories; nor can history be written from them alone. They are useful to the writer of history, but they must be used with care, for they are not intended even as materials for history. Important historical events are often slightly noticed, and occupy a subordinate place to a jest or an anecdote. The order of time is often purposely neglected, and circumstances are mentioned just when it is most suitable to the biographer’s purpose. Facts and persons are sometimes confounded; and a sober painstaking writer, like Drumann (Ge- schichte Rome) has reason to complain of Plutarch and his carelessness.

But there must be some merit in a work which has entertained and instructed so many generations, which is read in so many languages, and by people of all conditions: a work which delighted Montaigne and Rousseau, for it was one of the few books which Rousseau had never read without profit (Les Reveries du Promeneur solitaire, Quatrième Promenade); a work which amuses both young and old, the soldier and the statesman, the philosopher and the man who is busied about all ordinary concerns of life. The reason is that Plutarch has rightly conceived the business of a biographer: his biography is true portraiture (Alexander, 1). Other biography is often a dull, tedious enumeration of facts in the order of time, with perhaps a summing up of character at the end. Such biography is portraiture also, but it is false portraiture: the dress and the accessories put the face out of countenance. The reflections of Plutarch are neither imperious, nor trifling: his sound good sense is always there: his honest purpose is transparent: his love of humanity warms the whole. His work is and will remain, in spite of all the fault that can be found with it by plodding collectors of facts, and small critics, the book of those who can nobly think, and dare and do. It is the book of all ages for the same reason that good portraiture is the painting of all time; for the human face and the human character are ever the same. It is a mirror in which all men may look at themselves.

If we would put the Lives of Plutarch to a severe test, we must carefully examine his Roman Lives. He says that he knew Latin imperfectly; and he lived under the empire when even many of the educated Romans had but a superficial acquaintance with the earlier history of their state. We must, therefore, expect to find him imperfectly informed on Roman institutions; and we can detect him in some errors. Yet, on the whole, his Roman Lives do not often convey erroneous notions: if the detail is incorrect, the general impression is true. They may be read with profit by those who seek to know something of Roman affairs, and have not knowledge enough to detect an error. They probably contain as few mistakes as most biographies which have been written by a man who is not the countryman of those whose lives he writes.

The first edition of the Lives was a collection of the Latin translation of the several Lives, which had been made by several hands. The collection appeared at Rome, 2 vols. fol. about 1470: this version was the foundation of the Spanish and Italian versions. The first edition of the Greek text was that printed by P. Giunta, Florence, 1517, folio. The edition of Bryan, London, 1729, 5 vols. 4to., with a Latin version, was completed by Moses du Soul after Bryan’s death. There is an edition by A. Coënes, Paris, 1809—1815, with notes, in 6 vols. 8vo.; and one by G. H. Schaef, Leipzig, 1826, 6 vols. 8vo., with notes original and selected. The latest and best edition of the Greek text is by C. Sintenis, Leipzig, 1839—1846, 4 vols. 8vo., with the Index of the Frankfort edition, considerably altered. (See the Praefatio of Sintenis, vol. i.)

The translations are numerous. The French translation of Amyot, which first appeared in 1559, and has often been reprinted, has great merit. The English translation of Sir Thomas North, London, 1612, professes to be from the French of Amyot, but it does not always follow the French version, and some passages are very incorrectly rendered by North which are correctly rendered by Amyot. North's version is, however, justly admired for the expression. The translation commonly called Dryden's, was made by many hands: Dryden did nothing further than write the dedication to the Duke of Ormond, and the Life of Plutarch, which is prefixed to the version.

The English version of John and William Langhorne has been often printed. The writer of this article has translated and written Notes on the following Lives: Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, Marius, Sulla, Sertorius, Lucullus, Crassus, Pompeius, Caesar, Cato the Younger, Cicero, M. Brutus and Antonius. The German translation of Kaltwasser, Magdeburg, 1799—1806, 10 vols. 8vo., the last of which is chiefly occupied with an Index, is on the whole a faithful version. The French translation of Dacier is often loose and inaccurate.

Plutarch's other writings, above sixty in number, are placed under the general title of Moralia or Ethical works, of which he was the author of several, which pass usually for his father's, as e.g. the Apophthegmata, and the treatises πέρι ποιήσεως and πέρι των ἀρχαίων τῶν φιλόσοφων. His explanation of the fabled Sirens as seductive courtesans (Tzetz. Chil. i. 14, comp. ad Lyco. 653) only shows that he belonged to that class of dull and tasteless critics, referred to by Niebuhr with just indignation, who thought that they were extracting historical truth from poetry by the very simple and ingenious process of turning it into prose. (See Voss. de Hist. Graec. pp. 231, 232, ed. Westermann; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 232.)

2. An Athenian, son of Nestorius, presided with distinction over the Neo-Platonic school at Athens in the early part of the fifth century, and was supposed the great. He was an Eclectic or Syncretist, and numbered among his disciples Syaurus of Alexandria, who succeeded him as head of the school, and Proclus of Lycia. He appears to have followed Iamblichus in his doctrine of the efficacy of theurgic rites for bringing man into communion with God, herein illustrating what has been often remarked, that the Neo-Platonic system was the parallel of the Catholic. Plutarch wrote commentaries, which are lost, on the "Timaeus" of Plato, and on Aristotle's treatise "On the Soul." He died at an advanced age, about A.D. 430 (Suid. s. v. Δομήνιος, Ηυλέας, Νεόκλαος, Ὀσιανός, Πρόκλους ὁ Ἀκίδος; Marin. Vit. Proc. 12; Phot. Bibl. 242; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 93, 183, 235, 632, v. p. 197; ix. p. 376).

PLUTARCHUS (Πλούταρχος). 1. The younger, was a son of the famous biographer of the same name, and is supposed by some to have been the author of several of the works which pass usually for his father's, as e.g. the Apophthegmata, and the treatises περί ποιήσεως and περί των ἀρχαίων τῶν φιλόσοφων. His explanation of the fabled Sirens as seductive courtesans (Tzetz. Chil. i. 14, comp. ad Lyco. 653) only shows that he belonged to that class of dull and tasteless critics, referred to by Niebuhr with just indignation, who thought that they were extracting historical truth from poetry by the very simple and ingenious process of turning it into prose. (See Voss. de Hist. Graec. pp. 231, 232, ed. Westermann; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 232.)

PLUTON. (Πλωτόν). A Greek rhetorician, twice quoted briefly by Seneca, as it seems safe to infer that Pluton in the second passage should be read Pluton. (Suid. s. v. 13, Controvers. i. 3. p. 104, ed. Genev. 1628.) The commentators on the former passage state, on the authority of Eusebius, that he was a celebrated teacher of rhetoric. Westermann places him in the period.
between Augustus and Hadrian. (Geschichte der Griech. Bericht p. 188.) [W. M. G.]

PLYTO (Πλυτός). 1. A Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and one of the playmates of Persephone. (Hes. Theog. 355; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 422.)

2. A daughter of Cronus or Himantes, became by Zeus or Tmolus, the mother of Tantalus. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Paus. ii. 22. § 4; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 41; Hygin. Feb. 155.) [L. S.]

PLYTON (Πλυτόν), the giver of wealth, at first a surname of Hades, the god of the lower world, and afterwards also used as the real name of the god. In the latter sense it first occurs in Euripides. (Herc. Fur. 1104; comp. Lucian, Tim. 21.) [L. S.]

PLYTUS (Πλυτύς), sometimes also called Pluton (Aristoph. Plat. 727), the personification of wealth, is described as a son of Iasion and Demeter (Hes. Theog. 969, &c.; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 491, Od. v. 125). Zeus is said to have blinded him in order that he might not bestow his favours on righteous men exclusively, but that he might distribute his gifts blindly and without any regard to merit (Aristoph. Plat. 90; Schol. ad Theoret. x. 19). At Thebes there was a statue of Tyche, at Athens one of Eirene, and at Thespiae one of Athena Ergane; and in each of these cases Plutus was represented as the child of those divinities, symbolically expressing the sources of wealth (Paus. ix. 16 § 1, 26 § 5). Hyginus (Poet. Astr. ii. 4) calls him the brother of Philomelus. He seems to have commonly been represented as a boy with a Cornucopia. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderd. ii. p. 105, &c.) [L. S.]

PLUVIUS, i. e. the sender of rain, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans, to whom sacrifices were offered during long protracted droughts. These sacrifices were called aquicium, "the calling forth of water," because certain magic ceremonies were performed by Etruscans to call down rain from heaven. (Tibull. i. 8 26; Tertull. Apolog. 40; Fest. p. 2, ed. Müller.) [L. S.]

Pnytagoras (Πνυταγόρας). 1. The eldest son of Evagoras, king of Salamis in Cyprus, who served under his father during the war carried on by the latter against the king of Persia [Evagoras], and contributed essentially to his successes. Isocrates speaks of him in terms of praise not inferior to those which he bestows upon the father. (Isocr. Evoc. p. 201; Diod. xv. 4.) The circumstances of the conspiracy which led to the assassination of Evagoras are not very clearly known to us: but it is certain that Pnytagoras also was involved in his fate, and perished together with his father by the machinations of the envious Thrasylaeus. (Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a. b. ed. Bekk, Fragm. 111, ed. Didot.)

* There is much confusion in regard to this name. Our MSS. of Diodorus and Isocrates give in some cases Pythagoras, in others Protagoras. But Theopompus, Arrian, Athenaeus, and Q. Curtius, concur in the true form Pnytagoras, which has been judiciously restored by the later editors both of Diodorus and Isocrates. Borrell (Sur les Médailles des Rois de Chypre, p. 48) endeavours to defend the reading Pytagoras on the authority of coins, but their evidence is inconclusive.

2. King of Salamis in Cyprus, in which position he probably succeeded Nicocles, though we have no account of his accession, or his relation to the previous monarchs. But we find him in possession of the city in B. C. 351, when he was besieged there by the younger Evagoras, at the head of an armament destined to reduce Cyprus for the Persian king. Pnytagoras, however, while he held out successfully against the invaders, sent an embassy with offers of submission to the king of Persia, and thus obtained the confirmation of his power. (Diod. xvi. 46.) From this time he appears to have retained the virtual sovereignty unmolested until the conquest of Phoenicia by Alexander (i. c. 332), when he submitted, together with the other petty princes of Cyprus, to the Macedonian monarch. He commanded, in person, the fleet with which he assisted the conquer in the siege of Tyre, and rendered important services. In one of the naval actions before that city his own quinquemere was sunk, but he himself escaped, and was rewarded by Alexander after the siege with rich presents, and an extension of territory. (Arr. Anab. ii. 20, 22; Curt. iv. 3, § 11; Duris, ap. Athen. iv. p. 167, e.) His son Nithadon accompanied Alexander throughout his campaigns, and was appointed to the command of a trireme in the descent of the Indus. (Arr. Ind. 18.) Borrell, in his Essai sur les Médaill es des Rois de Chypre (p. 46—50), has confirmed this Pnytagoras with the preceding: and the same error has inadvertently been committed in the article Evagoras, No. 2. Vol. ii. p. 55, a. (E. H. B.)

PODALEIRIUS (Ποδαλέιριος), a son of Asclepius and Epaque or Arinose, and a brother of Machon, along with whom he led the Thessalians of Tricca against Troy (Hom. ii. iii. 729, &c.; Apollod. iii. 10 § 8; Paus. iv. 31 § 9). He was, like his brother, skilled in the medical art (Hom. ii. i. 822, &c.). On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Syros in Caria, where he is said to have settled (Paus. ii. ii. 26 § 7, iii. 26 § 7). He was worshipped as a hero on mount Drim. (Strab. vi. p. 284.)

PODARGE. [HARPYLAE.] POARDCES (Ποιάρκες). 1. Is said to have been the original name of Priamus. (Apol. ii. 6 § 4; comp. PRIAMUS.) 2. A son of Iphiclus, and grandson of Phylacus, was a younger brother of Proteusiles, and led the Thessalians of Phylace against Troy. (Hom. ii. ii. 695; Apollod. i. 9, § 12; Hygin. Fab. 97; Strab. i. p. 432; Schol. ad Hom. Od. xi. 289.) [L. S.]

POEAS (Ποιας), a son of Phylacus or Thauma- cus, and husband of Methone, by whom he became the father of Philoctetes (Hom. Od. iii. 190; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 323). He is mentioned among the Argonauts (Apol. i. 9, § 16; comp. Pind. Pyth. i. 53), and is said to have killed with an arrow, Talaus, in Crete (Apollod. i. 9 § 26). At the request of Hercules, Poeas kindled the pile on which the hero burnt himself, and was rewarded with the arrows of Hercules. (Apol. ii. 7 § 7; comp. HERACLES and PHILOCTETES.) [L. S.] POLEMIUS. a daughter of Aecolis or Aesopas, by whom he became the father of Ephippius and Leucippus. He was the reputed founder of the town of Tanagra in Boeotia which was hence called Poemandria. When Poemander inadvertently had killed his own son, he was purified by Elephon. [Paus. ix. 20. § 2; Plut. Quaest. Graec. 70; comp. Strab. i. p. 404; Lycophr. 326.] [L. S.]

POENA (Penit.), a personification of retaliation, is sometimes mentioned as one being, and sometimes in the plural. They belonged to the train of Dice, and are akin to the Erinyses (Aeschyl. Choephe. 936, 947; Paus. i. 43. § 7.) [L. S.]

POENIUS POETUMUS, prefect of the camp of the second legion in Britain during the war against Boudicea (Tac. Ann. xiv. 37.)

POETE/LIA GENS, plebeian (Dionys. x. 53), first occurs at the time of the decemvirs. The name is frequently confounded with that of Petillius or Petilus [PETILLIA GENS.]

The only family-name in this gens is that of Libo, which is usually found with the agnomen Visolus. Livy (vii. 11), it is true, says that C. Petoelius Ballus was consul b. c. 360 with M. Fabius Ambustus; but as the Capitoline Fasti make C. Petoelius the Libo colleague of Fabius, and Ballus does not occur elsewhere as a cognomen of the Petoelii, the cognomen in Livy is probably either an error or a corruption. All the other Petoelii bear the surname Libo with the exception of P. Petoelius, who was sent as one of the three ambassadors to Syraph in b. c. 210. (Livy xxvii. 4.)

POGONATUS CONSTANTINUS. [Constantinus IV.]

POLA, SERVIVUS, one of Cicero's enemies, and described by him as " homo teter et frus" (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 13, comp. ad Fam. viii. 12.)

He is the same as the person called simply Servius in another passage (ad Q. Fr. ii. 6), and is supposed by Pighini to be the same as the Servius, who was condemned in b. c. 51, when he was tribune of the plebs elect (ad Fam. viii. 4.)

POLEMARCHUS (Πολεμαρχος). 1. The pupil of the celebrated astronomer Eudoxus, whose instructions he received in Cyzicus, his native place, and the teacher of the more celebrated Calippus, who accompanied him to Athens (Simplicius, de Caelo, ii. p. 120, a.). He lived about the middle of the fourth century b. c.

2. Of Tarentum, and a follower of Pythagoras (Iamblich. VII. Pyth.). Fabricius conjectures (Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 864) that he is the same with Polemarckus surnamed ἱσωδάβις, who is mentioned by Athenaeus (xii. p. 545), as having been sent by Dionysius the younger, on an embassy to Tarentum, where, being intimate with Archytas, he dictated to that philosopher on the excellency of pleasure; his discourse being given by Athenaeus, on the authority of Aristoxenus. But this seems an unhappy conjecture. The doctrines ascribed to Polemarckus are certainly not those of the school of Pythagoras; nor is it even hinted that he was a native of Tarentum.

3. A writer of this name is quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 111, c.), whom, from his being named along with Artemidorus and Heracleon, we should judge to be a grammarian. [W. M. G.]

POLEMIUS, or SALVIUS, or SYLVIIUS, the author of a sacred calendar, drawn up A. D. 448, which is entitled Lotoriades s. Iulius Dionys. Pastorum, and which includes Heathen as well as vol. III.

POLEMON. 433

Christian festivals, is generally believed to have been bishop of Martyrius, in the Vaia. A portion of this Lotoriades was published by Boland in the general preface to the Acta Sanctorum, vol. i. pp. 44, 45, and the whole will be found, but in a mutilated state, in the seventh volume of the same work, p. 178. (Mansi, ad Fabric. Bibl. Med. et Infin. Lat. vi.; Schönenmann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 50.) [W. R.]

POLEMOCLES (Πολεμώκλης), a Rhodian, who was despatched by his countrymen with three triremes, to Byzantium, at the same time that they sent thither Arides, with proposals of peace, which were accepted by the Byzantines, and a treaty concluded in consequence, b. c. 220. He was next sent to Crete to assist the Cossians, who were in alliance with Rhodes against the Lyttians. (Polyb. iv. 52, 53.) [E. H. B.]

POLEMO/CRATES (Πολέμοκράτης), a son of Maconna, and, like his father, a skilful physician; he had a heroum at Eua in Argolis. (Paus. ii. 38. § 6.]

POLEMON (Πολέμων), historical. 1. Son of Andromenes the Stymphaeum, a Macedonian officer, in the service of Alexander the Great. The great intimacy which subsisted between him and Philotas caused him to be suspected, together with his brothers Amyntas, Attalus, and Simmias, of participating in the treasonable designs imputed to Philotas: a charge to which Polemon had the imprudence to give countenance by taking to flight immediately on learning the arrest of the son of Parmenion. Amyntas, however, who remained, having successfully defended himself before the assembly of the army, obtained the pardon or acquittal of Polemon also. (Arr. Anab. iii. 27; Curt. vii. 1. § 10, 2. § 1—10.]

2. Son of Megacles, a Macedonian of Pella, who was one of the officers appointed by Alexander to command the garrison at Memphis, b. c. 331. (Arr. Anab. iii. 5. § 4.)

3. Son of Theramenes, a Macedonian officer, who was left by Alexander in the command of a fleet of thirty triremes which was destined to guard the mouths of the Nile, and the sea-coast of Egypt, b. c. 331. (Arr. Anab. iii. 5. § 6; Curt. iv. 8. § 4.)

4. A Macedonian officer of rank, who, in the disputes that followed the death of Alexander, distinguished himself as a warm partisan of Perdiccas. In order to conciliate the favour of the regent, he endeavoured, though ineffectually, to prevent Arrhidaeus from transporting the body of the deposed monarch to Egypt (Arrian, ap. Polyb. p. 70, b.) He afterward served under Ateleas, the brother of Perdiccas, and was taken prisoner by Antigonus in Pisidia, together with Attalus and Docimus, b. c. 320. From this time he shared the fortunes of Attalus; the history of their captivity, escape, and final defeat has been already given. [ATTALUS, No. 2.] (Diod. xviii. 45, xix. 16.) It is highly probable, as suggested by Droysen, that this Polemon is the same with the son of Andromenes (No. 1), and that he was consequently a brother of Attalus, with whom we find him so closely connected.

5. A dynast of Olba in Cilicia, whose name appears on the coins of that city, with the titles of Ἀρχοντας and Δυναστας. As it is associated with that of M. Antony, there is little doubt that he is the same person who is mentioned by Appian (B.C.)
POLEMON.

v. 75) as being appointed by Antony to the sovereignty of a part of Cilicia, and who subsequently became king of Pontus [POLEMON I.] The grounds on which this identity is denied by Eckhel (vol. iii. p. 63) are not satisfactory. (Visconti, Iconographie Greque, vol. iii. p. 5, &c.) [E. H. B.]

POLEMON (Πολέμων), the name of two kings of Pontus and the Bosporus.

1. POLEMON I., was the son of Zenon, the orator of Laodicea, and it was as a reward for the services rendered by his father as well as himself that he was appointed by Antony in b.c. 39 to the sovereignty of part of Cilicia (Appian, B. 5; Strab. xii. p. 578.) At a subsequent period he obtained from the triumvirs in favour for this principality the more important government of Pontus with the title of king. The precise date of this change is unknown, but Polemon is already called by Dion Cassius king of Pontus in b.c. 36, in which year he co-operated with Antony in his campaign against the Parthians. On this occasion he shared in the defeat of Appius Stattius, and was taken prisoner by the Parthian king, but allowed to ransom himself, and restored to liberty. (Dion Cass. xlix. 25; Plut. Ant. 38.) In b.c. 35 he was employed by Antony to negotiate with the Median king Artavasdes, whom he succeeded in detaching from the alliance of Parthia, and gaining over to that of Rome; a service for which he was subsequently rewarded by the triumvirs by the addition to his dominions of the Lesser Armenia. (Dion Cass. xlix. 34, 44.) But though he thus owed his elevation to Antony he was fortunate enough not to share in his fall, and although he had sent an auxiliary force to the assistance of his patron in b.c. 30, shortly before the battle of Actium, he was able to make his peace with Octavian, who confirmed him in his kingdom, and some years afterwards bestowed on him the honorary appellations of a friend and ally of the Roman people. (Plut. Ant. 61; Strab. xii. p. 578; Dion Cass. liii. 25.) At a subsequent period (about b.c. 16) he was intrusted by Agrippa with the charge of reducing the kingdom of Bosporus, which had been usurped by Sertobnius after the death of Assander. The usurper was put to death by the Bosporans before the arrival of Polemon, who, notwithstanding some opposition established himself in the sovereignty of the country, in which he was confirmed, first by Agrippa and then by Augustus himself. (Dion Cass. liv. 24.) His reign after this was long and prosperous: his dominions comprised, besides Pontus itself, Colchis and the other provinces, as far as the kingdom of the Bosporus, the confines of which last he extended to the river Tanais, and destroyed the city of that name, which had ventured to throw off his yoke. (Strab. xi. p. 493, 495, 499.) But having engaged in an expedition against the barbarian tribe of the Aspurgians (who inhabited the mountains above Phanagoria) he was not only defeated by them, but taken prisoner, and immediately put to death. (Id. xi. p. 493, xii. p. 556.) The date of this event is unknown; but it appears from an inscription that he must have been still on the throne as late as b.c. 2. (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. vol. ii. No. 3524; Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 639.)

Polemon had been twice married: first to Dynamis, a daughter of Pharmaces, and granddaughter of Mithridates the Great, by whom he appears to have had no children. (Dion Cass. liv. 24); and secondly to Pythodoris, who succeeded him on the throne. By her he left two sons, Polemon II., and Zenon king of Armenia, and one daughter who was married to Cotys' king of Thrace. (Strab. xii. p. 556; Tac. Ann. ii. 56.)

2. POLEMON II., was a son of the preceding and of Pythodoris. During the lifetime of his mother he was content to remain in a private station, while he assisted her in the administration of her dominions: but in a.d. 39, he was raised by Caligula to the sovereignty not only of Pontus, which had been held by Pythodoris, but of the Bosporus also. This last was, however, afterwards taken from him by Claudius, who assigned it to Mithridates, while he gave Polemon a portion of Cilicia in its stead, a.d. 41. (Dion Cass. lix. 12, lx. 8.) He appears to have been a man of a weak character, and in a.d. 48 allowed himself to be persuaded by Berenice, the widow of Herod, king of Chalais, to adopt the Jewish religion in order that he might marry that princess, who possessed vast wealth. But Berenice had sought this marriage only as a cloak for her illicit amours [Berenick, No. 21; it was in consequence soon dissolved, and Polemon ceased to profess Judaism (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7 § 8). At a subsequent period he was induced by Nero to abdicate the throne, and Pontus was reduced to the condition of a Roman province. This appears to have taken place about the year a.p. 62 (Suet. Nero, 13; Eutrop. vil. 14; Aur. Vict. de Caes. 6. § 2; Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 873.) As the city of Polemonium on the Euoxice (Sjynns. Ch. Fr. i. 177; Steph. Byz. s. v. Πολέμων) is not mentioned by Strabo, it appears certain that we must ascribe its foundation to Polemon II., and not to his father. Concerning the coins of the two Polemoni, see Cary, Hist. des Rois de Thrace et du Bosphore, 4to. Paris, 1752, and Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 368—373. [E. H. B.]

POLEMON.

POLEMON (Πολέμων), literary. 1. Of Athens, an eminent Platonic philosopher, and for some time the head of the Academy, was the son of Philostratus, a man of wealth and political distinction. In his youth, Polemon was extremely profligate; but one day, when he was about thirty, on his burning into the school of Xenocrates, at the head of a band of revellers, his attention was so arrested by the discourse, which the master continued calmly in spite of the interruption, and which chanced to be upon temperance, that he tore off his garland and remained an attentive listener, and from that day he adopted an abstemious course of life, and continued to frequent the school, of which, on the death of Xenocrates, he became the head, in Ol. 116, b.c. 315. According to Eusebius (Chron.) he died in Ol. 126. 4, b.c. 273. Diogenes also says that he died at a great age, and of natural decay. He esteemed the object of philosophy to be, to exercise men in things and deeds, not in dialectic speculations; his character was grave and severe; and he took pride in displaying the mastery which he had acquired over emotions of every sort. He was a close follower of Xenocrates in all things, and an intimate friend of Crates and Crantor, who were his disciples, as well as Zeno and Arcesilaus; Crates was particularly near in the Academy. In literature he most admired Homer and Sophocles, and he is said to have been the author of the remark, that Homer is an epic Sophocles, and Sophocles a tragic Homer. He left, according to Diogenes, several treatises, none of which were extant in the time of Suidas. There is, however, a quotation made by Clemens Alexandrinus, either from him or from another philosopher of the same name, in τοις περὶ τῶν κατὰ φόνον βίου (Strom. vii. p. 117), and another passage (Strom. ii. p. 410), upon happiness, which agrees precisely with the statement of Cicero (de Fin. iv. 6), that Polemon placed the sumnum bonum in living according to the laws of nature. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 16—20; Suid. s. v.; Plut. de Aul. et Amic. 32, p. 71, e.; Lucian. Di Accusat. 16, vol. 5, p. 611; Atticus, 21, c. 4; Cic. Acad. ii. 18, de Orat. iii. 18, de Fin. ii. 6, 11, iv. 2, 6, 16, 18, vi. 1, 5, 7; and alii.; Horat. Serm. ii. 3. 253, fol.; Val. Max. vi. 9; Menag. ad Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 183; comp. p. 323, n. 156.)

3. Of Athens by citizenship, but by birth either of Illyria, or Samos, or Sicily, a Stoic philosopher and an eminent geographer, surnamed ὁ ἐπιστήμων, was the son of Eunetges, and a contemporary of Aristophanes of Byzantium, in the time of Posemy Epiphanes, at the beginning of the second century n. c. (Suid. s. v.; Ath. vi. p. 294; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. sub ann. n. c. 198.) In philosophy he was disciple of Plato, and in his youth made extensive journeys through Greece, to collect materials for his geographical works, in the course of which he paid particular attention to the inscriptions on votive offerings and on columns, whence he obtained the surname of Στυλοκρατός. (Ath. l. c.; Cusaub. ad loc.) As the collector of these inscriptions, he was one of the earlier contributors to the Greek Anthology, and he wrote a work expressly, Περὶ τῶν κατὰ πόλεις ἐπιστήμων (Ath. x. pp. 436, d., 442, e.); beside which, other works of his are mentioned, upon the votive offerings and monuments in the Acropolis of Athens, at Lacedaemon, at Delphi, and elsewhere, which no doubt contained copies of numerous epigrams. Hence Jacobs infers that, in all probability, his works formed a chief source of the Garland of Melangetes (Animaude, in Anth. Graec. vol. i. Proem, pp. xxxiv. xxxv.). Athenaenus and other writers make very numerous quotations from his works, the titles of which it is unnecessary to give at length. They are chiefly descriptions of parts of Greece; some are on the paintings preserved in various places, and several are controversial, among which is one against Eratosthenes, (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 184; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 159, fol. ed. Westermann; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. p. 524, where a list of his works is given.)

4. ANTONINUS, a highly celebrated sophist and rhetorician, who flourished under Trajan, Hadrian, and the first Antoninus, and was in high favour with the two former emperors. (Suid. s. v.; Ptol. Vit. Soph. p. 532.) He is placed at the sixteenth year of Hadrian, A. D. 133, by Eusebius (Chron.). His life is related at considerable length by Philostonus (Vit. Sophistei. ii. 25, pp. 530—544). He was born of a consular family, at Laodiceia, but spent the greater part of his life at Smyrna, the people of which city conferred upon him at a very early age the highest honours, in return for which he did much to promote their prosperity, especially by his influence with the emperors. Nor, in performing these services, did he neglect his native city Laodiceia. An interesting account of his relations with the emperors Hadrian and Antoninus is given by Philostratus (pp. 533, 534).

Among the sophists and rhetoricians, whom he heard, were Timocrates, Sopelplanus, Dion Chrysostom and Apollonophanes. His most celebrated disciple was Aristideles. His chief contemporaries were Herodes Atticus, Marcus Byzantinus, Dionysius Milesius, and Favorinus, who was his chief rival. Among his imitators in subsequent times was S. of Ravenna. He was an orator, and his style of oratory was imposing rather than pleasing; and his character was haughty and reserved. During the latter part of his life he was so tortured by the gout, that he resolved to put an end to his existence; he had himself shut up in the tomb of his ancestors at Laodiceia, where he died of hunger, at the age of sixty-five. The exact time of his death is not known; but it must have been some time after A. D. 143, as he was heard in that year by Verus. The only extant work of Polemon is the funeral orations for Cnaeusgrus and Callimachus, the generals who fell at Marathon, which are supposed to be pronounced by their fathers, each extolling his own son above the other. Philostratus mentions several others of his rhetorical compositions, the subjects of which are chiefly taken from Athenian history, and an oration which he pronounced, by command of Hadrian, at the dedication of the temple of Zeus Olympia at Athens, in a. d. 135. His μέγας επιστήμον was first printed by H. Stephanus, in his collection of the declamations of Polemon, Himerius, and other rhetoricians, Paris, 1547, 4to, afterwards by themselves in Greek, Paris, 1566, 4to; and in Greek and Latin, Tolosa, 1637, 8vo. The latest and best edition is that of Caspar and Conrad Orelli, Lips. 1819, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 2—4; Clinton. Fasti Romani, s. a. 133, 135, 143.) There is a coin of Hadrian, bearing the inscription ΠΟΛΕΜΟΝ. ΑΝΕΘΟΚΗ. ΚΜΥΠΝΑΙΟΙΚ. (Raache. Lexicom Rei Num. s. v. Polemon; Eckhel. Doct. Num. Vet. vol. ii. p. 662). This coin belongs to a class which Eckhel has explained in a dissertation of oratory, and the question respecting the identity of the sophist with the writer, who forms the subject of the following article, is discussed by Fr. Passow (Über Polemon's Zeitalter, in the Archiv. für Philologie und Poesioglogik, 1825, vol. i. pp. 7—9, Vermischte Schriften, p. 137.) [P. S.]

POLEMON (ΠΟΛΕΜΟΝ), the author of a short Greek work on Physiognomy, which is still extant. Nothing is known of the events of his life, but from some expressions that he uses (e. g. the word εἶδοςκυριός, i. 6. p. 197) it has been supposed that he was a Christian. With respect to his date it can only be stated that he must have lived in or before the third century after CHRIS. as he is mentioned by Origen (Cont. Cels. i.33. p.331, ed. Bened.), and from his style he cannot be supposed to have lived much earlier than this. His work, which appears to have suffered much from the ignorance of transcribers, consists of two books: in the first, which contains twenty-three chapters, after proving the utility of physiology, he lays down the general principles of the science; he speaks of the shape of the head, the color of the hair, of the forehead, the eyes, the ears, the nose, the manner of breathing, the sound of the voice, &c.; in the second book, which consists of twenty-seven chapters, he goes on to apply the principles he had before laid down, and describes in a few words the characters of the courageous man, the timid, the impudent, the passionate, the talkative, &c. It was first published in Greek by Camillus Perucus, with Aelian's "Varia Historia," and other works, at Rome, 1545, 4to. It was translated into Latin by Nicolaus Petreius, and published with Meletius "De Naturae Hominis," and other works, at Venice, 1552, 4to. The last and best edition is that by J. G. F. Franz in his "Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres," Altenburg. 1789. 8vo. in Greek and Latin, with a Preface and Notes. It was translated into Arabic, and is still extant in that language. [PHILEMON.] (See Franz's Preface to his "Script. Physion. Vet." and Penny Cyclopaedia.) [W. A. G.]

POL'LEON, of Alexandria, a painter mentioned by Pliny among those who were non iuxtabiles guidem, in transversu tamen dicens (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42). [P. S.]

POL'LIAS (Pollias), i.e. "the goddess protecting the city," a surname of Athens at this time. It is first mentioned by Isidore as worshipped at the protective divinity of the acropolis. (Pas. i. 27. § 1; Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. 193.) [L. S.]

POL'ICHUS, artist. [POLICHUS]

POLIJUS (Pollius), "the protector of the city," a surname of Zeus, under which he had an altar on the acropolis at Athens. Upon this altar barley and wheat were strewn, which were consumed by the bull about to be sacrificed to the god. The priest who killed the victim, threw away the axe as soon as he had struck the fatal blow, and the axe was then brought before a court of justice. (Pas. i. 24. § 4, 28. § 11.) [L. S.]

POLIOCHUS (Pollioches), an Athenian comic poet, of uncertain age, of whom two fragments only occur in Athenaeus (vii. p. 313, c. ii. p. 60, c.), the one from his Kophistathis, and the other from a play, of which the title is not mentioned. (Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græc. vol. iv. p. 493, vol. iv. pp. 539, 590.) [P. S.]

POLIOCRETES, DEMETRIUS. [DEMETRIUS, p. 962.]

POLIS, a stationary, mentioned by Pliny among those who made atelides et armatos et venalos saecularitique (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34). [P. S.]

POLIT'IES (Politias). 1. A son of Priam and Hecabe, and father of Priam the younger, was a valiant warrior, but was slain by Pyrrhus. (Hom. ii. ii. 791, xiii. 533, xxiv. 250; Virg. Aen. ii. 526, v. 564.)

2. A companion of Odysseus, who is said to have been worshipped as a hero at Temesa in Italy. (Hom. Od. x. 224; Strab. vi. p. 255.)

3. One of the companions of Menelaus. (Pas. x. 25. § 8.) [L. S.]

POLIUCHOS (Polluchos), i.e. "protecting the city," occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Athena Chalicioecus at Sparta. (Paus. iis. 17. § 2), and of Athena at Athens. (Comp. Athene.) [L. S.]

POLLA, the name of several Roman females, was merely another form of Paulla, like Claudius of Claudius.

1. The wife of D. Brutus, one of the murderers of Caesar. Cicero calls her simply Polia (ad Fam. xi. 8), but we learn from a letter of Caecilius (ad Fam. vii. 7) that her full name was Paulla Valeria. She was a sister of the C. Valerius Triarius, who was tribune of the plebs B. C. 51, and who subsequently served in the civil war in Pompey's fleet. She divorced her husband, whose name is not mentioned, in B. C. 50, without being able to give any reason for so doing, and then married D. Brutus (ad Fam. viii. 7).

2. The mother of L. Gellius Publicola. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24, where the manuscripts have Pola.)

3. The sister of M. Agrippa. (Dion Cass. lv. 8.)

4. Accorionia Polia, the friend of Agrippina, is spoken of under ACCORNIA.

5. Vespassia Polia, the daughter of Vespassio Pollio, and the mother of the emperor Vespassian. (Suet. Vesp. 1.)

6. Argentaria Polia, the wife of the poet Lucan. (Stat. Silv. ii. 7. 62, &c.; Martial, vii. 21, 23, x. 64.)

POLLENIUS SEBENNUS, lived in the reign of Alexander Severus (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 9.)

POLLES (Pollas), Suidas mentions (i.e. Melampus), that Melampus and Polles had acquired such courage at Athens that there was a current proverb, "It needs a Melampus or a Pollas to divine it." He was a native of Aegae in Asia Minor, and wrote copiously on the subject of divination in all its forms; as on the prognostications to be derived from the objects that met a traveller on his way; as from objects that occurred at home; regarding the result of diseases; and similar subjects, for which see Suidas (s. ev. Οἰσομακτικής, Pollas). [W. M. G.]

POLLEX, one of Cicero's slaves. (Cic. ad Fam. xiv. 6, ad Att. viii. 5, xiii. 46, 47.)

POL'LLIAS, Nusus, an epigrammatic poet, five of whose pieces are preserved in the Greek Anthology. From the first of these epigrams it is probable that he was a grammarian; the third is addressed to a poet named Florus, who is possibly the Florus who lived under Hadrian; but there is no other indication of the writer's age. (Bruneck, AnaL vol. ii. p. 439; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 146, 147, vol. xiii. p. 940.) [P. S.]

PO'LLIO, the statuas. A gem-engraver (Bracei, Prof. ad Comm. ii. p. 6).

2. C. Postumius, an architect, whose name occurs in an inscription in the cathedral at Terracina; from which it may be inferred, with much probability, that he was the architect of the celebrated temple of Apollo at that place. From another inscription it appears that C. Cececius, the architect of the temple of Augustus at Pozzuoli, was the freedman and disciple of this Postumius Pollio. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 410—441, 2nd ed.) [P. S.]

PO'LLIO, Annius, was accused of treason (majestas) towards the end of the reign of Tiberius, but was not brought to trial. He was subsequently one of Nero's intimate friends, but was notwithstanding accused of taking part in Piso's conspiracy against that emperor in A.D. 63, and was in consequence banished. His wife's name was Servilla. (Tac. Ann. vi. 9, xv. 56, 71, xvi. 30.)

POLLIO, A'NTIUS, one of the consules sufecti in A.D. 155 (Fasti).

POLLIO, ASI'NIUS. 1. C. ASNIUS POLLIO, a distinguished orator, poet and historian of the Augustan age. He was descended from a family of the Marculli, and he may have been a grandson of the Hierius Asinius, who commanded this people in the Marsic war. We learn from the Fasti Capitolini, and from inscriptions, that his father's name was Cneius. Pollio was born at Rome in B.c. 76 according to Hieronymus (in Æuseb. Chron.), and he had consequently frequent opportunities of hearing in his youth Cicero, Caesar, Hortensius, and the other great orators of the age. He was early fired with the ambition of treading in the footsteps of these illustrious men, and accordingly in B.C. 56, when he was only twenty-two years of age, he came forward as the accuser of C. Cato, on account of the disturbances which the latter had caused in B.C. 56, when he was tribune of the plebs. Cato was defended by C. Licinius Calvus and M. Scaurus; but as the illegal acts of which he was accused, had been performed to favour the election of Pompey and Crassus to the consulship, he was now supported by the powerful influence of the former, and was accordingly acquitted. It can scarcely be inferred from this accusation that Pollio was in favour of the republican party; he probably only wished to attract attention, and obtain celebrity by his bold attack against one of the creatures of the triumvirs. At all events, he espoused Caesar's party, when a rupture at length took place between Caesar and Pompey, and repaired to Caesar in Cisalpine Gaul probably in the course of B.C. 50. He accompanied Caesar in his passage across the Rubicon at the beginning of B.C. 49, on which occasion he is mentioned in a manner that would indicate that he was one of Caesar's intimate friends (Pint. Coes. 32), and was a witness of his triumphal progress through the towns of Italy. After Caesar had obtained possession of Italy Pollio was sent, under the command of Curio, to drive M. Cato out of Sicily, and from thence crossed over with Curio into Africa. After the unfortunate battle, in which Curio was defeated by King Juba, and in which he lost his life, Pollio hastened back to the camp at Utica, collected the remains of the army, and with difficulty made his escape. He then joined Caesar, accompanied him in his campaign against Pompey in Greece, and was present at the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48, which he could therefore describe as an eye-witness. After the battle of Pharsalia he returned to Rome, and was probably tribune of the plebs in B.C. 47, since he is mentioned in that year as one of the opponents of the tribune Dohabella, who was endeavouring to carry a measure for the abolition of all debts (Pint. Anton. 9), and as a private person he could not have offered any open resistance to a tribune. In the following year, B.C. 46, Pollio fought under Caesar against the Pompeian party in Africa, and he related in his history how he and Caesar on one occasion had driven back the enemy when their troops were surprised (Pint. Coes. 52). He also accompanied Caesar next year, B.C. 45, in his campaign in Spain, and on his return to Rome must have been one of the fourteen praetors, whom Caesar appointed in the course of this year, since we find him called praetorius in the history of Tac. Ann. i. 44 (Veil. Pat. i. 75). He did not, however, remain long in Rome, for Caesar sent him again into Spain, with the command of the Further Province, in order to prosecute the war against Sextus, who had again collected a considerable force since the battle of Munda. He was in his province at the time of Caesar's death on the 15th of March, B.C. 44, and his campaign against Sextus is described by his panegyrist Velleius Paterculus (l.c.) as most glorious; but he was, in fact, defeated, and nearly lost his life in the battle (Dion Cass. xliv. 10). He would probably have been unable to maintain his position in his province, if a peace had not been concluded after Caesar's death between Rome and Sextus. This was brought about by the mediation of Antony and Lepidus; Sextus quitted Spain, but Pollio continued quietly in his province.

On the breaking out of the war between Antony and the senate in B.C. 43, Pollio was strongly pressed to assist the latter with troops. In his letters to Cicero, three of which have come down to us (ad Fam. x. 31—33), he expresses great devotion to the cause of the senate, but alleges various reasons why it is impossible for him to comply with their request. Like most of Caesar's other friends, he probably did not in heart wish success to the senatorial party, but at the same time would not commit himself to Antony. Even when the latter was joined by Lepidus, he still hesitated to declare in their favour; but when Octavian espoused their side, and compelled the senate in the month of August to repeal the sentence of outlawry which had been pronounced against them, Pollio at length joined them with three legions, and persuaded L. Plancus in Gaul to follow his example. Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus then formed the triumvirate, and determined who should be consuls for the next five years. Pollio was nominated for B.C. 40, but was in return obliged to consent to the proscription of his father-in-law, L. Quintius.

In the division of the provinces among the triumvirs, Antony received the Gauls with the exception of the Narbonese. The administration of the Transpadane Gaul was committed to Pollio by Antony, and he had accordingly the difficult task of settling the veterans in the lands which had been assigned to them in this province. It was upon this occasion that he exhibited the property of the poet Virgil at Mantua from condescension, whom he took under his protection from his love of literature. In the Perusinian war which was carried on by Fulvia and L. Antonius against Octavian in B.C. 41 and 40, Pollio, like the other legates of Antony, took little part, as he did not know the views and wishes of his commander. Octavian compelled him to resign the province to Alfenus Varus; and as Antony, the triumvir, was now expected from Greece, Pollio exerted himself to keep possession of the sea-coast in order to secure his landing, since an open rupture between Octavian and Antony seemed now almost inevitable. He was fortunate in securing the co-operation of Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was cruising in the Ionian sea with a squadron of ships which had formed part of the fleet of Brutus and Cassius. The threatened war, however, did not break out; and a reconciliation took place at Brundusium between Octavian and Antony in a. c. 40, at which Pollio acted the part of mediator. Pollio returned to Rome with the triumphs, and now became consul with Cn. Domitius Calvinus, according to the promise made him three years before. It was during his consulship that Virgil addressed to him his fourth Eclogue.

In the following year, a. c. 39, Antony went to Greece, and sent Pollio with a part of his army to fight against the Parthians, an Illyrian people, who had espoused the side of Brutus and Cassius. Pollio was successful in his expedition; he defeated the Parthians and took the Dalmatian town of Salona; and in consequence of his success obtained the honour of a triumph on the 25th of October in this year. He gave his son Asinius Gallus the agnomen of Salomirius after the town which he had taken. It was during his Illyrian campaign that Virgil addressed to him the eighth Eclogue (see especially ii. 6, 7, 12).

From this time Pollio withdrew altogether from political life, and devoted himself to the study of literature. He still continued however to exercise his oratorical powers, and maintained his reputation for eloquence by his speeches both in the senate and the courts of justice. When the war broke out between Octavian and Antony, the former asked Pollio to accompany him in the campaign; but he declined on account of his former friendship with Antony, and Octavian admitted the validity of his excuse. He lived to see the supremacy of Augustus fully established, and died at his Tuscan villa, a. d. 4, in the eightieth year of his age, preserving to the last the full enjoyment of his health and of all his faculties. (Val. Max. viii. 13, § 4).

Asinius Pollio deserves a distinguished place in the history of Roman literature, not so much on account of his works, as of the encouragement which he gave to literature. He was not only a patron of Virgil, Horace (see Carm. ii. 1), and other great poets and writers, but he had the honour of having been the first person to establish a public library at Rome, upon which he expended the money he had obtained in his Illyrian campaign. (Plin. H. N. vii. 3, xxxv. 2.) He also introduced the practice of which Martial and other later writers so frequently complain, of reading all his works before a large circle of friends and critics, in order to obtain their judgment and opinion before making them public. (Senee. Conru. iv. Praef. p. 441.) None of Pollio's own works have come down to us, but they possessed sufficient merit to lead his contemporaries and successors to class his name with those of Cicero, Virgil and Sallust, as an orator, a poet and an historian. It was however as an orator that he possessed the greatest reputation. We have already seen that he distinguished himself when he was only twenty-two by his speech against C. Cato: Catullus describes him in his youth (Carm. xii. 9) as

"leporum Disertus puer et facietarum," and Horace speaks of him in the full maturity of his powers (Carm. ii. 1. 13) as

"Insigne maestis praezidium reis Et consulenti, Pollio, curiae;"

and we have also the more impartial testimony of Quintilian, the two Senecas and the author of the Dialogue on Orators to the greatness of his oratorical powers. Belonging as he did both to the Ciceronian and the Augustan age, the orations of Pollio partook somewhat of the character of each period. They possessed the fertility of invention and the power of thought of the earlier period, but at the same time somewhat of the artificial and elaborate rhetoric which began to characterise the style of the empire. There was an excessive care bestowed upon the composition, and at the same time a fondness for ancient words and expressions, which often obscured the meaning of his speeches, and detracted much from the pleasure of his hearers and readers. Hence the author of the Dialogue on Orators (c. 21) speaks of him as "durus et sicus, and Quintilian says (x. 1. § 113) that so far is he from possessing the brilliant and pleasing style of Cicero ("nitor et juveulitias Cicerois"), that he might appear to belong to the age preceding that of the great orator. We may infer that there was a degree of pedantry and an affection of learning in his speeches; and it was probably the same desire of exhibiting his reading, which led him to make frequent quotations from Ennius, Accius, Pacuvius, and the other ancient poets. (Quintil. i. 8, 11, ix. 4, § 76.) The care however with which he composed his speeches—his diligentia—forms an especial subject of praise with Quintilian. (Comp. in general Quintil. x. 1. § 113, x. 2. § 25, xii. 11. § 28; Senee. Controv. iv. Praef. p. 441; Suet. August. vi. p. 50; Senee. Ep. 100; Auct. Dial. de Orat. 17, 21, 25.) Meyer has collected the titles of eleven of his orations. (Orator. Roman. Progn. p. 491, &c.)

As an historian Pollio was the first man for his use of the materials of his history of the civil wars in seventeen books. It commenced with the consulship of Metellus and Afranius, b. c. 60, in which year the first triumvirate was formed, and appears to have come down to the time when Augustus obtained the undisputed supremacy of the Roman world. It has been erroneously supposed by some modern writers from a passage in Plutarch (Caes. 46), that this work was written in Greek. Pollio was a contemporary of the whole period embraced in his history, and was an eye-witness of many of the important events which he describes. His work was thus one of great value, and is cited by subsequent writers in terms of the highest condemnation. It appears to have been rich in anecdotes about Caesar, but the judgment which he passed upon Cicero appeared to the elder Seneca unjustly severe. Pollio was assisted to some extent in the composition of his work by the grammarian Athenius Philologus, who drew up for him the rules of grammar, which might be useful to him in writing. (Suid. s. v. 'Asvinus'; Senee. Suet. div. vii. 7; Hor. Carm. ii. 1; Suet. Caes. 30, De Il. Gram. 10; Plut. Caes. 46; Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Appian. B. C. ii. 82; Val. Max. viii. 13, ext. 4.)

As a poet Pollio was best known for his tragedies, which are spoken of in high terms by Virgil and Horace, but which probably did not possess any great merit, as they are hardly mentioned by subsequent writers, and only one fragment of them is preserved by the grammarians. (Verg. Ecl. iii. 66, vii. 10; Hor. Carm. ii. 1. 9, Sat. i. 10. 42;
POLIO.

Charis. i. p. 56, ed. Lind.) The words of Virgil (Ed. iii. 86), "Pollio et ipse facit nova carmina," probably refer to tragedies of a new kind, namely, such as were not borrowed from the Greek, but contained subjects entirely new, taken from Roman story. (Welecker, Die Griechischen Tragödien, p. 1421, &c.)

Pollio also enjoyed great reputation as a critic, but he is chiefly known in this capacity for the severe judgment which he passed upon his great contemporaries. Thus he pointed out many mistakes in the speeches of Cicero (Quintil. xii. 1. § 22), censured the Commentaries of Caesar for their want of historical fidelity, and found fault with Sallust for affectation in the use of antiquated words and expressions (Suet. de Ill. Gram. 10), a fault with which Pollio himself is charged by other writers. He also complained of a certain Potuiinix in Livy (Quintil. i. § 56, viii. § 3), respecting which some remarks are made in the life of Livy. [Vol. ii. p. 735.]

Pollio had a son, C. Asinius Gallus Saloninus, who is spoken of elsewhere. [Gallus, No. 2.] Asinius Gallus married Vipsania, the daughter of Agrippa and Pomponia, the former wife of Tiberius, by whom he had several children: namely, 1. Asinius Saloninus. (Tac. Ann. iii. 75) 2. Asinius Gallus. [Gallus, No. 2.] 3. Asinius Pollio, spoken of below [No. 2]. Asinius Agrippa, consul a. d. 25 [Agrippa, p. 77, a], Asinius Celer. [Celer.] (Lipsius, ad Tac. Ann. iii. 75.)

(The following are the most important authorities for the life of Pollio, in addition to those which have been cited above: Cic. ad Fam. ix. 25, x. 31, xi. 9, ad Att. xii. 2, 39, 39, xiii. 20; Appian, B. C. ii. 40, 45, 82, iii. 46, 74, 97, iv. 12, 27, v. 20—23, 50, 64; Veil. Pat. ii. 63, 76, 86; Dion Cass. xiv. 10, xviii. 15, 41; and among modern writers, Eckhard, Commentatio de C. Asinius, quius optimorum Latinorum auctorum censure, Jan. 1793, and especially Thorbecke, Commentatio de C. Asini Pollionis Vita et Studiis, Lugd. Batav. 1820.)

2. C. Asinius Pollio, grandson of the preceding, and son of C. Asinius Gallus Saloninus and of Vipsania, the daughter of Agrippa, was consul a. d. 25 with C. Antistius Vetus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 1; Plin. H. N. xxxiiii. 1. 8.) We learn from coins, a specimen of which is annexed, that he was also proconsul of Asia. The obverse represents Drusus, the son of the emperor Tiberius and Germanicus seated on a curule chair, with the legend ΔΡΟΤΟΣ ΚΑΙ ΕΡΜΑΝΙΚΟΣ ΚΑΙΖΑΡΕΩΣ ΝΕΟΙ ΘΕΟΙ ΦΙΑΛΑΕΑΦΟΙ; the reverse a crown of oak leaves, with the legend ΑΛΙΝΟΞ ΠΟΛΙΩΝΙ ΑΝΟΤΗΤΑΙ, and within the crown ΚΟΙΝΟΤ ΑΞΙΑΣ. Drusus and Germanicus are here called Philadelphia, because they were brothers by adoption; and there was an obvious reason why Pollio had these coins struck, inasmuch as Drusus was the half-brother of Pollio by the same mother Vipsania. (Eckhel, vol. vi. pp. 210, 211.)

3. Asinius Pollio, the commander of a regiment of horse, serving under Lucius Albinus in Mauritania, was slain in a. d. 69, when the troops espoused the side of Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. ii. 59.)

4. Asinius Pollio Verrucosus, consul a. d. 81. (Dion Cass. lxvi. 26; Fasti.)

POLIO, ASI/NIUS, a native of Tralles in Asia Minor, is described by Suidas (s. v. Πωλίων) as a sophist and philosopher, who taught at Rome at the time of Pompey the Great, and succeeded Timagenes in his school. But as Timagenes flourished b. c. 55 [Timagenes], we must place the date of Asinius Pollio rather later. Judging from the name of the latter, we may infer that he was a freedman of the great Asinius Pollio. Suidas ascribes to the Trallian the following work of 1. An Epitome of the Aththis of Philochorus, respecting which see Philochorus, p. 299. 2. Memorabilia of the philosopher Musonius (Rufus). 3. An Epitome of the Geogries of Diophanes, in two books. 4. A commentary on Aristotle's work on Animals. 5. On the Civil War between Caesar and Pompey. The second of these works however could not have been written by this Pollio, since Musonius lived in the reign of Nero: some writers ascribe it to Valerius Pollio, who lived in the reign of Hadrian, but others to Claudius Pollio, a contemporary of the younger Pliny. The work on the civil war between Caesar and Pompey may perhaps have been a translation into Greek of the history of the great Pollio on the same subject. (Vossius, de Hist. Graeciae, p. 197, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 566, with the note of Haries; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. p. 550.)

POLIO, CAE/LIUS, was commander of the Roman army in Armenia, a. d. 51, and was bribed by Rhadamistus to betray the cause of Mithridates king of Armenia, whom the Romans had placed upon the throne. Notwithstanding his corrupt conduct, he was allowed to remain in Armenia till the first year of Nero's reign, a. d. 54, when he was succeeded by Lucelianus. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 44, 45; Dion Cass. lxi. 6.)

POLIO, CARVILIUS, a Roman eques, lived in the times of the dictator Sulla, and was celebrated for several new kinds of ornamental furniture, which he invented and brought into use. (Plin. H. N. ix. 11. 13, xxxiiii. 11. 51.)

POLIO, ClauDIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, who extols his merits in one of his letters (xii. 31). Pliny states that Pollio had written the life of one of his friends: the name is corrupt in the manuscripts; the best modern editions have Annius Bassus; but some read Musonius, and therefore suppose that the Memorabilia of Musonius, which Suidas ascribes to Asinius Pollio, is the very work alluded to by Pliny. The name however of the philosopher was Musonius Rufus, and not Bassus; and the way in which he is spoken of by Pliny would lead to the conclusion that he was not the celebrated philosopher.

POLIO, CLAUDIUS, a centurion, who put Diodumenianus to death. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 40.)
POLLIO. CLO'DIUS, a man of praetorian rank, against whom Nero wrote a poem, entitled Lusio. (Suet. Dom. 1.)

POLLIO, DOM'TIUS, offered his daughter for a Vestal Virgin in the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. ii. 97.)

POLLIO, L. FU'FI'DIUS, consul A.D. 166 with Q.Servilius Pudens. (Lamprid. Commod. 11; Fasti.)

POLLIO, HERENNIUS, a Roman orator, and a contemporary of the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. iv. 19.)

POLLIO, JU'LIUS, a tribune of the praetorian cohort, assisted Nero in poisoning Britannius. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 15.)

POLLIO, MEM'MIUS. [MEMMIUS, No. 13.]

POLLIO, NAF'VIUS. [NAEVIVIUS, No. 8.]

POLLIO, ROMUL'LIUS, a Roman who attained the age of upwards of a hundred years. When asked by the emperor Augustus how he had preserved such vigour of mind and body, he replied “Istus mulus, foris olea.” (Plin. H. N. xxii. 24. 45. 53.)

POLLIO, RU'BRIUS, the commander of the praetorian cohorts in the reign of Claudius, was allowed a seat in the senate as often as he accompanied the emperor thither. (Dion Cass. ix. 23.)

POLLIO, TREBE'LLIUS. [TREBELLIIUS.]

POLLIO, VAE'RU'SIUS, an Alexandrian philosopher, lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian, and was the father of the philosopher Diodorus. (Suidas, s. v. Πωλίων.) [Diodorus, literary, No. 2.]

POLLIO, VE'DIUS, a Roman eques and a friend of Augustus, was by birth a freedman, and has obtained a place in history on account of his riches and his cruelty. He was accustomed to feed his lampreys with human flesh, and whenever a slave displeased him, the unfortunate wretch was forthwith thrown into the pond as food for the fish. On one occasion Augustus was supping with him, when a slave had the misfortune to break a crystal goblet, and his master immediately ordered him to be thrown to the fishes. The slave fell at the feet of Augustus, praying for mercy; the emperor interceded with his master on his behalf, but when he could not prevail upon Pollio to pardon him, he dismissed the slave of his own accord, and commanded all Pollio's crystal goblets to be broken and the fish-pond to be filled up. Pollio died n. c. 15, leaving a large part of his property to Augustus. (Dion Cass. liv. 29; Sene. de Irra, iii. 40, de Clem. i. 19; Plin. H. N. ix. 23. s. 93, 53, s. 70; Tac. Ann. i. 10. xii. 60.) This Pollio appears to be the same as the one among Augustus whom Suetonius mentions in a similar context. (Suet. Aug. 43.)

POLLIO, VESPA'SIUS, a native of Nursia, was thrice tribune of the soldiers and likewise prefect of the camp. His son obtained the dignity of praetor, and his daughter Vespasia Polla became the mother of the emperor Vespasian. (Suet. Vesp. 1.)

POLLIO, VITRA'SIUS. 1. The praefectus or governor of Egypt in the reign of Tiberius, died A.D. 32. (Dion Cass. lii. 10.)

2. Probably the son of the preceding, was the procurator of Egypt in the reign of Claudius. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 7. s. 11.)

3. The legatus Lugdunensis, in the reign of the emperor Hadrian, may have been a son of No. 2 and a grandson of No. 1. (Dig. 27. tit. 1. s. 15. § 17.)

4. Lived in the reign of M. Aurelius, and was consul the second time in A.D. 176 with M. Flavius Aper. The year of his first consulship is not recorded. (Lamprid. Commod. 2; Fasti.) The Senatusconsultum Vitrassianum, of which mention is made in the Digest (40. tit. 5. s. 30. § 6), was probably passed during one of the consulships of Vitrassus Pollio. This Pollio was perhaps the great-grandson of No. 1. The Vitrasia Faustina slain by Commodus was probably his daughter. (Lamprid. Commod. 4.)

POLLIS (Πῶλης), is first mentioned in n. c. 390 as ἀρχηγὸς, or second in command of the Lacedaemonian fleet (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 11). In A.D. 376 he was appointed nautarch or commander-in-chief of a Lacedaemonian fleet of sixty ships in order to cut off from Athens her supplies of corn. His want of success and defeat by Chabrias are related in the life of the latter [Vol. I. p. 676, a.] (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 60, 61; Diod. xv. 34; Polyena. iii. 11. § 17.) In several MSS. of the above-mentioned authors, his name is written Πολύς, but Πωλής is the preferable form.

POLLIS, an architect, who wrote on the rules of the orders of architecture, pracepta symmetriaeum. (Vitruv. v. praecl. § 14.) [P.S.]

POL'LUX. [Diosculli.]

POL'LUX, JU'LIUS (Ἰωάννης Πολύδεικτος), of Naucratia in Egypt, was a Greek sophist and grammarian. He received instruction in criticism from his father, and afterwards went to Athens, where he studied rhetoric under the sophist Adrianus. He opened a private school at Athens, where he gave instruction in grammar and rhetoric, and was subsequently appointed by the emperor Commodus to the chair of rhetoric at Athens. He died during the reign of Commodus at the age of fifty-eight, leaving a young son behind him. We may therefore assign A. D. 183 as the year in which he flourished. (Suidas, s. v. Πολύδεικτος; Philostr. Vit. Soph. ii. 12.) Philostratus praises his critical skill, but speaks unfavourably of his rhetorical powers, and implies that he gained his professor's chair from Commodus simply by his mellifluous voice. He seems to have been attacked by many of his contemporaries on account of the inferior character of his oratory, and especially by Lucian in his Πηγάρων διδάσκαλος, as was supposed by the ancients and has been maintained by many modern writers (see especially C. F. Ranke, Comment. de Polluce et Luciano, Quedlinburg, 1831), though Hemsterhuis, from the natural partiality of an editor for his author, stoutly denies this supposition, and believes that Lucian intended to satirize a certain Dioscorides. It has also been conjectured that Lucian attacks Pollux in his LarciPhanes, and that he alludes to him with contempt in a passage of the De Saltatione (c. 33, p. 287, ed. Reitz). Athenodorus, who taught at Athens at the same time as Pollux, was likewise one of his detractors. (Philosor. Vit. Soph. ii. 14.) We know nothing more of the life of Pollux, except that he was the teacher of the sophist Antipater, who taught in the reign of Alexander Severus. (Philosor. Ibid. ii. 24.)

Pollux was the author of several works, of which PULJIX.

Suidas has preserved the titles of the following:
1. 'Ονομαστικόν εν βιβλίοις ι., an Onomasticon in ten books.
2. Διαλέξεις ἕτοι καλωλ. Dissertations.
3. Μελέται, Declamations.
4. Εἰρ Κώμων Καί-

4αρα ενθάλαμος, an oration on the marriage of the Caesar Commodus, and the work was therefore published before λ. d. 177, since Commodus became Augustus in that year. Each book forms a separate treatise by itself, containing the most important words relating to certain subjects, with short explanations of the meanings of the words, which are frequently illustrated by quotations from the ancient writers.
The alphabetical arrangement is not adopted, but the words are given according to the subjects treated of in each book. The object of the work was to present youths with a kind of store-house, from which they could borrow all the words of which they had need, and could at the same time learn their usage in the best writers. The contents of each book will give the best idea of the nature of the work. 1. The first treats of the gods and their worship, of kings, of speed and slowness, of dyeing, of commerce and manufactures, of fertility and the contrary, of time and the divisions of the year, of horses, of gods, of artes, of war, of horses, of agriculture, of the parts of the plough and the waggon, and of bees. 2. The second treats of man, his eye, the parts of his body and the like.
3. Of relations, of political life, of friends, of the love of country, of love, of the relation between masters and slaves, of money, of travelling, and numerous other subjects. 4. Of the various branches of knowledge and science. 5. Of hunting, animals, &c. 6. Of meals, the names of cries, &c. 7. Of the different trades, &c. 8. Of the courts, the administration of justice, &c. 9.
Of towns, buildings, coins, games, &c. 10. Of various vessels, &c. In consequence of the loss of the great number of lexicographical works from which Pollux compiled his Onomasticon, this book has become one of the greatest value for acquiring a knowledge of Greek antiquity, and explains many subjects which are not found in any other source. It has also preserved many fragments of lost writers, and the great number of authors quoted in the work may be seen by a glance at the long list given in Fabricius. (Bibl.
Gracc. vol. vi. p. 145, &c.)
The first three editions of the Onomasticon contain simply the Greek text, without a Latin translation and with numerous errors; they are by Aldus, Venice, 1502, fol., by B. Junta, Florence, 1520, fol., by S. Grynaeus, Basel, 1536, 4to.
The first Greek and Latin edition was by Wolgang Seber, Frankfort, 1698, 4to., with the text corrected from manuscripts; the Latin translation given in this edition had been previously written by Walther at Basel, 1541, 8vo. The next edition is the very valuable one in Greek and Latin by J. H. Lederlin and Tib. Hemstershuis, An-xterdam, 1706, fol.; it contains copious notes by Goth. Jungermann, Joach. Kühn, and the two editors. This was followed by the edition of W.
Dindorf, Leipzig, 1824, 5 vols. 8vo., containing the works of the previous commentators.
The last edition is by Imm. Bekker, Berlin, 1846, which gives only the Greek text.

losophie, vol. iii. p. 166, &c.; Bonn, 1849; Clinton,

POLYXUS, JULIUS, a Byzantine writer, is the author of a chronicon, which states that some length of the creation of the world, and is therefore titled 'ταυτόπα φασιν.' Like most other Byzantine histories, it is an universal history, beginning with the creation of the world and coming to the time of the writer. The two manuscripts from which this work is published end with the reign of Valens, but the Paris manuscript is said to come down as low as the death of Romanus,

λ. d. 963, and also to contain what is wanting at the conclusion of the anonymous continuation of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. The whole work is made up of extracts from Simeon Logotheta, Theophanes, and the continuation of Constantinus, and relates chiefly ecclesiastical events. It was first published from a manuscript at Milan by J. B.
Bianconi, under the title of Anonymi Scriptoris Historia Sacra, Domonie, 1775, 6o. Ign. Hart did not find the work in a more perfect state, and with the name of the author prefixed to it in a manuscript at Munich, and believing that it had not yet been printed, published it at Munich, 1792, 8vo., under the title of Iulii Polluci Historia Physica, nano primum Gr. et Lat. ed. &c. (Fabric.
Graecis, p. 278, ed. Westermann; Scholl, Geschicthete der Griechischen Literatur, vol. iii. p. 257.)

POLUS (Πολύας). 1. A sophist and rhetorican, a native of Agrigentum. He was a disciple of Gorgias (or, according to other authorities, of Lyciun-

nus, Schol. ad Plat. Phaedr. p. 812), and wrote a work on rhetoric, called by Suidas Τεχνην, as also a genealogy of the Greeks and barbarians who were engaged in the Trojan war, with an account of their several fates; a catalogue of the ships, and a work Πελάτειαν. He is introduced by Plato as an interlocutor In the Gorgias. (Suidias, s. v.;

2. A Pythagorean, a native of Lucania. A fragment from a work by him on Justice is preserved by Stobaeus. (Serv. 9.)

3. A celebrated tragic actor, the son of Charicles of Sunium, and a disciple of Archias of Thurii. It is related of him that at the age of 70, shortly before his death, he acted in eight tragedies on four

POLYAENUS (Πολύαινος), historical. 1. One of the leading men at Syracuse, b. c. 214. (Liv.
xxiv. 22.)

2. Of Cyprus, was in the company of Philopometon when the latter killed Macedonias in b. c.
207. (Polyb. xi. 18, § 2.)
POLYAENUS.

3. An Athenian, belonged to the party of Archon, Polybius, and the more moderate patriots, who thought that the Achaeans ought not to oppose the Romans in their war against Perseus, B.C. 171. (Polyb. xxviii. 6. § 9.)

4. CLAUDIUS POLYAENUS, probably a freedman of the emperor Claudius, bequeathed a house to this emperor at Prusa. (Plin. Ep. x. 23, s. 75.)

POLYAENUS (Πολυαίνος), literary. 1. Of ATHENS, an historical writer, mentioned by EricUSIUS. (Chron. i. p. 25.)

2. Of LAMPSACUS, the son of Athenodorus, a mathematician and a friend of Epicurus, adopted the philosophical system of his friend, and, although he had previously acquired great reputation as a mathematician, he now maintained with Epicurus the worthlessness of geometry. (Cie. de Fin. i. 6, Acad. ii. 33; Dign. Laërt. x. 24, ii. 105, with the note of Menagius.)

It has been supposed that it was against this Polyaeus that the treatise was written, a fragment of which has been discovered at Herculaneum under the title of Δυνατρέων πρὸς τῶν Πολυαινῶν ἄφορας. (Schöll, Geschichte d. Griech. Literatur, vol. ii. p. 209.)

3. JULIUS POLYAENUS, the author of four epigrams in the Greek Anthology (ix. 1, 7, 8, 9, Tauchnitz), in one of which he is called Polyaeus of Sardis, and in the other three Julius Polyaeus. He must be the same as Polyaeus of Sardis, the sophist, spoken of by Suidas, who says (s. v. Πολυαινός), that he lived in the time of the first Caesar, Caius, that is, in the time of Julius Caesar, and wrote Ἀγγείοι διακεκαλοι καὶ διάνει ηγευμαντορίων ὑπονομεσιν. Τοιούτως, and Ὑπακουον δικαίως θεωρηματος, and Ὑποκούον δικαίως θεωρηματος. The latter work probably referred to the victories over the Parthians gained by Ven- tidius.

4. The Macedonian, the author of the work on Strataegismes in war (Στρατηγήματα), which is still extant, lived about the middle of the second century of the Christian era. Suidas (s. v.) calls him a rhetorician, and we learn from Polyaeus himself that he was accustomed to plead causes before the emperor. (Praef. lib. ii. and lib. viii.) He dedicated his work to M. Aurelius and Verus, while they were engaged in the Parthian war, about A.D. 163, at which time, he says, he was too old to accompany them in their campaigns. (Praef. lib. i.) This work is divided into eight books, of which the first six contain an account of the stratagems of the most celebrated Greek generals, the seventh of those of barbarous or foreign people, and the eighth of the Romans, and illustrious women. Parts, however, of the sixth and seventh books are lost, so that of the 900 stratagems which Polyaeus described, only 833 have come down to us. The work is written in a clear and pleasing style, though somewhat tinged with the artificial rhetoric of the age. It contains a vast number of anecdotes respecting many of the most celebrated men in antiquity, and has preserved many historical facts of which we should otherwise have been ignorant; but its value as an historical authority is very much diminished by the little judgment which the author evidently possessed, and by our ignorance of the sources from which he took his statements. There is an abridgment of this work in a Greek manuscript in the king's library at Paris, containing only fifty-five chapters, but which serves to elucidate and explain many of the original passages.

Polyaeus also wrote several other works, all of which have perished. Suidas has preserved the titles of two, Πολυαίνους (Πολυαίνος) Τρής τοῦ κοινοῦ τῶν Μακεδών (Florioleg, xiii.). (or xii.) § 53;) and from another entitled Τρής τοῦ Σωεθίου (Ibid. § 41). Polyaeus likewise mentions his intention of writing a work on the memorable actions (Άξιομακρουνη) of M. Aurelius and L. Verus (Praef. lib. vi.)

Polyaeus was first printed in a Latin translation, executed by Justus Valtellus, at Basel, 1549, 8vo. The first edition of the Greek text was published by Casaubon, Lyon, 1589, 12mo; the next by Panarius Masiuicius, Leyden, 1690, 8vo; and the third in Berlin, 1756, 12mo; and the last by Coray, Paris, 1809, 8vo. The work has been translated into English by R. Shepherd, London, 1793, 4to; to German by Seybold, Frankfort, 2 vols. 8vo. 1793 and 1794, and by Blume, Stuttgart, 1834, 16mo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 321, &c.; Schöll, Geschichte der Griech. Literatur, vol. ii. p. 716; Kronbergiehl, De Dictionis Polyaenii Graeci, Lutetiae, 1770; Droysen, Geschichte des Hel- lenismus, vol. i. p. 685.)

5. Of Sardis. [See No. 3.]

POLYANTHES (Πολυανθής), a Corinthian, who commanded a Peloponnesian fleet, with which he fought an indecisive battle against the Athenian fleet under Diplius in the gulf of Corinth in n. c. 413. (Thuc. vii. 34.) He is again mentioned in n. c. 395, as one of the leading men in Corinth, who received money from Timocrates the Rhodian, whom the satrap Tithraustes sent into Greece in order to bribe the Thracian king Laisma in the war to make war upon Sparta, and thus necessitate the recall of Aegialus from his victorious career in Asia (Xen. Hell. iii. 5, § 1; Paus. iii. 9, § 8.).

POLYARATUS (Πολυάρατος), a Rhodian, one of the leaders of the party in that state favourable to Perseus, during the second Macedonian War. According to Polybius he was a man of an obstinate and extravagant character, and had, in consequence, become loaded with debts, which he hoped to pay off by the king's assistance. At the commencement of the war (n. c. 171) he united with Deinon in endeavouring, though unsuccessfully, to induce the Rhodians to refuse the assistance of their ships to the Roman praetor C. Lucretius; but shortly afterwards he supported with success the proposition made to allow Perseus to ransom the Macedonian captives who had fallen into the hands of the Rhodians (Polyb. xxvii. 6, 11). He continued throughout the war to maintain an active correspondence with Perseus; and in the third year of the contest (n. c. 169), matters having apparently taken a turn more favourable to the king, the Rhodians were induced, by his efforts and those of Deinon, to give a favourable audience to the ambassadors of Perseus and Gentius, and to interpose their influence at Rome to put an end to the war (Liv. xiv. 23, 29). But this step gave great offence to the Romans, and after the defeat of Perseus, Polygaratus hastened to provide for his safety by flight. He took refuge at the court of Poteloymy, king of Egypt, but his surrender being demanded by the Roman legate Popillius, the king, in order to evade compliance, sent him away secretly to Rhodes. Polyaratus, however, made his escape on the voyage, and took refuge, first at Phaselis, and afterwards at Cibyra, but the inhabitants of both these cities were unwilling to incur the enmity of the Roman senate, by affording him protection, and he was ultimately conveyed to Rhodes, from whence he was sent a prisoner to Rome. (Polyb. xxix, 11, xxx. 9) [E. H. B.]

POLYARCUS. [Poliearchus.]

POLYARCHUS (Πολυαρχος), a Greek physician, who is mentioned by Celusus (De Med. v. 18, § 6 of VIII. 9, § 1, pp. 36, 177), and must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He appears to have written a pharmaceutical work, as some of his prescriptions are several times quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. VIII. 5, vol. xii. pp. 184, 185, 186, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. VII. 7, vol. xiii. p. 981), Aëtius (ii. 57, iii. 1. 34, iv. 2. 14, pp. 415, 481, 530), Marcellus (De Medicinæ c. 20, p. 339), and Paulus Aegineta (De Re Medic. iii. 63, 70, 74, vii. 18, pp. 486, 487, 489, 834); but of his writings only these extracts remain. [W. A. G.]

POLYBIADES (Πολυβιάδης), a Lacedaemonian general, succeeded Agesipolis in the command of the army against Olynthus, and compelled the city to surrender in B.C. 379. (Xen. Hell. v. 3 §§ 20, 26; Dial. xv. 23.)

POLYBIUS (Πολύβιος), historical. 1. Of Megalopolis, fought under Philopoemen at the battle of Mantinea against Macedonians, tyrant of Lacedaemon, in B.C. 207. (Polyb. xi. 15. § 5.) It has been usually supposed that this Polybius was a relation of the historian, probably either his uncle or grandfather; but this is opposed to the statement of the historian himself in one of the Vatican fragments (p. 448, ed. Mai), "that no one, as far as he knew, had borne the same name as his, up to his time." Now though Polybius, when he wrote the passage quoted above, might possibly have forgotten his namesake who fought at the battle of Mantinea, still he certainly would not have escaped his memory if any one of his family had borne this name. It is, however, even improbable that he should have forgotten this namesake, especially since he was a native of Megalopolis, and we therefore think that the conjecture of Luecht in his edition of the Vatican Fragments is correct, that the true reading in xxv. 7 is Πολύβιος and not Πολύβιος. (Comp. Thrillwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 273, note 2.)

2. A freedman of the emperor Augustus, read in the senate the will of the emperor after his decease. (Dion Cass. iv. 32; Suet. Aug. 101.)

3. A freedman of the emperor Claudius, was so highly favoured by this emperor that he was allowed to walk between the two consuls. He was the companion of the studies of Claudius; and on the death of his brother Seneca addressed to him a Consolation, in which he bestows the highest praises upon his literary attainments. Polybius was put to death through the intrigues of Messalina, although it is not certain what was the reason of her paranoia. (Dion Cass. ix. 29, 31; Suet. Claud. 29.)

POLYBIUS (Πολύβιος), literary. 1. The historian, was the son of Lycocton, and a native of Megalopolis, a city in Arcadia. The year in which he was born is uncertain. Suidas (x. 27) places his birth in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, who died in B.C. 222. It is certain, however, that Polybius could not have been born so early as that year; for he tells us himself (xxxv. 7) that he was appointed ambassador to Egypt along with his father and the younger Aratus in B.C. 181, at which time he had not yet attained the legal age, which he himself tells us (xxix, 9), was thirty among the Achaenae. But if he was born, according to Suidas, before the death of Ptolemy Euergetes, he must then have been forty years of age. In addition to which, if any other proof were needed, it is impossible to believe that he could have taken the active part in public affairs which he did after the fall of Corinth in B.C. 146, if he was born so early as Suidas alleges. We may therefore, without much probability, suppose that he was born about B.C. 204, since he would in that case have been about twenty-five at the time of his appointment to the Egyptian embassy.

Lycortas, the father of Polybius, was one of the most distinguished men of the Achaean league; and his son therefore received the advantages of his training in political knowledge and the military art. He must also have reaped great benefit from his intercourse with Philopoemen, who was a friend of his father's, and on whose death, in B.C. 182, Lycortas was appointed general of the league. At the funeral of Philopoemen in this year Polybius carried the urn in which his ashes were deposited. (Plut. Philopoem. 21; An seci gerunda sit respuid. p. 790, &c.) In the following year, as we have already seen, Polybius was appointed one of the ambassadors to Egypt, but he did not leave Greece, as the intention of sending an embassy was abandoned. From this time he probably began to take part in public affairs, and he appears to have soon obtained great influence among his countrymen. When the war broke out between the Romans and Perseus king of Macedonia, it became a grave question with the Achaenae what line of policy they should adopt. The Roman party in the league was headed by Callicrates, an unprincipled time-serving syphonist, who recognised no law but the will of Rome. He was opposed by Lycortas and his friends; and the Roman ambassadors, Popillius and Octavius, who came into Peloponnesus at the beginning of B.C. 169, had complained that some of the most influential men in the league were unfavourable to the Roman cause and had denounced by name Lycortas, Archon, and Polybius. The more moderate party, who did not wish to sacrifice their national independence, and who yet dreaded a contest with the Romans from the consciousness of their inability to resist the power of the latter, were divided in opinion as to the course of action. Lycortas strongly recommended them to preserve a strict neutrality, since they could hope to gain nothing from either party; but Archon and Polybius thought it more advisable not to adopt such a resolution, but to be guided by circumstances, and if necessary to offer assistance to the Romans. These views met with the approval of the majority of the party; and accordingly, in B.C. 169, Archon was appointed strategus of the league, and Polybius, adjutant of the cavalry, to carry these views into execution. The Achaenae shortly after passed a decree, placing all their forces at the disposal of the Roman consul, Q. Marcus Philippus; and Polybius was sent into Macedonia to learn the pleasure of the consul. Marcius, however, declined their assistance for the present. (Polyb. xxviii. 3, 6.) In the following year, B.C. 168, the two Ptolemies, Philometor and his brother Euergetes II., sent to the Achaean, to request succour against Antiochus Epiphanes, and, if this were refused, to beg that Lycortas and Polybius might come to them, in order to aid them with their advice in the conduct of the war. But as Antiochus was shortly after compelled by the Romans to relinquish his attempts against the Ptolemies, neither of these measures was necessary, and Polybius accordingly remained at home (xix. 8).

After the fall of Perseus and the conquest of Macedonia, two Roman commissioners, C. Claudius and Cn. Dolabella, visited Peloponnesus, for the purpose of advancing the Roman interests in the south of Greece. At the instigation of Callianetes, they commanded that 1000 Achaean should be carried to Rome, to answer the charge of not having assisted the Romans against Perseus. This number included all the best and noblest part of the nation, and among them was Polybius. They arrived in Italy in c. 167, but, instead of being put upon their trial, they were distributed among the Etruscan towns. Polybius was more fortunate than his other companions in misfortune. He had probably become acquainted in Macedonia with Aeælius Paulus, or his sons Fabius and Scipio, and the two young men now obtained permission from the pretor for Polybius to reside at Rome in the house of their father Paulus. Scipio was then eighteen years of age, and soon became warmly attached to the illustrious exile, and availed himself of his advice and assistance, both in his private studies and his public life. The friendship thus formed between the young Roman noble and the Greek exile was of great advantage to both parties: Scipio was accompanied by his friend in all his military expeditions, and received much advantage from the experience and knowledge of the latter; while Polybius, besides finding a liberal patron and protector in his exile, was able by his means to obtain access to public documents, and accumulate materials for his great historical work (Polyb. xxxii. 9, &c.; Paus. vii. 10).

The Achaean exiles remained in Italy seventeen years. The Achaean had frequently sent embassies to the senate supplicating the trial or release of their countrymen, but always without success. Even their earnest entreaty, that Polybius and Stratius alone might be set at liberty, had been refused. At length, in c. 151, Scipio exerted his influence with Cato the Censor to get him to support the restoration of the exiles, and the authority of the latter carried the point, though not without a hard struggle and a protracted debate in the senate. After their restoration had been decreed, Polybius was anxious to obtain from the senate on behalf of himself and his countrymen the additional favour of being reinstated in the honours which they had formerly enjoyed; but upon consulting Cato, the old man bade him, with a smile, beware of returning, like Ulysses, to the Cyclop's den, to fetch away any trifles he had left behind him. (Polyb. xxxv. 6; Plut. Cat. Maj. 9; Paus. vii. 10.) Polybius returned to Peloponnesus in this year with the other Achaean exiles, who had been reduced during their banishment from 1000 to 300. During his stay in Greece, which was, however, not long, he exhorted his countrymen to peace and unanimity, and endeavored to counteract the mad projects of the party who were using every effort to hurry the Achaean into a hopeless struggle with the Roman power. When it was too late, the Achaean saw and recognised the wisdom of his advice; and a statue erected to his honour bore on its pedestal the inscription, "that Hellas would have been saved, if the advice of Polybius had been followed" (Paus. viii. 37. § 2). In the first year of the third Punic war, c. 149, the consul M. Manlius sent for Polybius to attend him at Lilybaenum, but upon reaching Corea, he heard from the consuls that the Carthaginians had given hostages, and thinking, therefore, that the war was at an end, and that his presence was no longer needed, he returned to Peloponnesus (Polyb. Exc. Viat. p. 447). But he soon left it again in order to join Scipio. His Roman connections probably made him an object of suspicion with what was called the independent party; and his residence in his native country may therefore have been not very pleasant to him. In addition to which he was no doubt anxious to be a spectator of the final struggle which was now going on between Rome and Carthage, and the history of which he intended to write.

Polybius was present with Scipio at the destruction of Carthage, c. 146 (Appian, Pan. 132); and immediately after that event he hurried to Greece, where the Achaean were waging a mad and hopeless war against the Romans. Whether he was present at the capture of Corinth may well be questioned, and it is probable, as Thirlwall (Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 453, note 3) has remarked, that he would not have hastened to Peloponnesus till the struggle was over. He must, however, have arrived there soon afterwards; and he exerted all his influence to alleviate the misfortunes of his countrymen, and to procure favourable terms for them. As a friend of Scipio, the conqueror of Carthage, he was received with marked distinction; and the want of patriotism with which his enemies had charged him, enabled him now to render his country far more effectual service than he could otherwise have done. The statues of Philopoemen and Aratus, which the Roman commissioners had ordered to be conveyed to Italy, were allowed, at his intercession, to remain in Peloponnesus. So much respect did the commissioners pay him, that when they quitted the country in the spring of c. 145, after arranging its affairs, and reducing it to the form of a Roman province, they ordered him to visit the various cities, and explain the new laws and constitution. In the execution of this duty, Polybius spared no pains or trouble. He traveled the whole country, and with indefatigable zeal he drew up laws and political institutions for the different cities, and decided disputes that had arisen between them. He further obtained from the Romans a relaxation of some of the most severe enactments which had been made against the conquered Achaean. His grateful fellow-countrymen acknowledged the great services he had rendered them, and statues were erected to his honour at Megalopolis, Mantinea, Pallantium, Tegen, and other places. (Polyb. xl. 8—10; Paus. viii. 9, 30, 37, 44, 48.)

Polybius seems now to have devoted himself to the composition of the great historical work, for which he had long been collecting materials. At what period of his life he made the journeys into foreign countries for the purpose of visiting the places which he had to describe in his history, it is impossible to determine. He tells us (iii. 59) that he undertook long and dangerous journeys into Africa, Spain, Gaul, and even as far as the Atlantic, on account of the ignorance which prevailed respecting those parts. Some of these countries he visited while serving under Scipio, who afforded him every facility for the prosecution of his design. Thus we learn from Pliny (H. N. v. 1), that Scipio, during the third Punic war, placed a fleet at the disposal of his friend, in order that he might explore the African coast. At a later period of his life he visited Egypt likewise; and this journey must have been taken after the fall of Corinth, since he was in that country in the reign of Ptolemy Physein, who did not ascend the throne till n. c. 146 (Strab. xvii. p. 797). It has been conjectured that Polybius accompanied Scipio to Spain in n. c. 134, and was present at the fall of Numantia in the following year, since Cicero states (ad Fam. v. 12) that Polybius wrote a history of the Numantine war. The year of his death is uncertain. We have only the testimony of Lucian (Macrobr. 23), that he died at the age of 83, in consequence of a fall from his horse, as he was returning from the country. If we are correct in placing his birth in n. c. 204, his death would fall in n. c. 122.

The history of Polybius consisted of forty books. It began n. c. 220, where the history of Aratus left off, and ended at n. c. 146, in which year Corinth was destroyed, and the independence of Greece perished. It consisted of two distinct parts, which were probably published at different times and afterwards united into one work. The first part comprised a period of fifty-three years, beginning with the second Punic war, the Social war in Greece, and the war between Antiochus and Ptolemy Philopator in Asia, and ending with the conquest of Perseus and the downfall of the Macedonian kingdom, in n. c. 168. This was in fact the main portion of his work, and its great object was to show how the Romans had in this brief period of fifty-three years conquered the greater part of the world; but since the Greeks were ignorant for the most part of the early history of Rome, he gives a survey of Roman history from the taking of the city by the Gauls to the commencement of the second Punic war, in the first two books, which thus form an introduction to the body of the work. With the fall of the Macedonian kingdom the supremacy of the Roman dominion was decided, and nothing more remained for the other nations of the world than to receive laws from the republic, and to yield submission to its sway. But, after the fall of the Juba and most of their fellow kings, and most of their pages by which this people were enabled, not only to acquire the sovereignty of Italy and Sicily, and to reduce the Gauls and Spaniards to their yoke, but to subdue the Carthaginians also, and when they had completed this great conquest, to form the project of obtaining universal empire. We shall add, likewise, a short digression concerning the fate of Hiero’s kingdom in Sicily; and afterwards go on to speak of those commotions that were raised in Egypt, after the death of Ptolemy, by Philip and Antiochus: the wicked arts by which those princes attempted to share between themselves the dominions of the infant king; and the manner in which the former of them invaded Egypt, Samos, and Caria; and the last of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. We shall then make a general recapitulation of all that was transacted.
by the Carthaginians and the Romans, in Spain, Sicily, and Africa; and from thence shall again remove the history to Greece, which now became the scene of new disorders. And having first run through the naval battles of Attalus and the Rhodians against king Philip, we shall next describe the war that followed between the Romans and this prince; together with the causes, circumstances, and conclusion of it. After these events, we shall relate in what manner the Aetolians, urged by their resentment, called Antiochus from Asia, and gave occasion to the war between the Achaeneans and the Romans. And having explained the causes of that war, and seen the entrance of Antiochus into Europe, we shall then show the manner in which he fled back again from Greece; and afterwards, when he had suffered an entire defeat, was forced to abandon all the country on this side of mount Taurus. Next will follow the victories by which the Romans gave an effectual check to the insolence of the Gauls; secured to themselves the sovereignty of nearer Asia; and delivered the people of that country from the dread of being again exposed to the violence and savage fury of those barbarians. We shall then give some account of the misfortunes in which the Aetolians and Cephallenians were involved, and of the war which Eumenes sustained against Prusias and the Gauls of Greece; together with that of Ariarathes against Pharnaces. And after some discourse concerning the union and form of government of the confederate cities of Peloponnesus, which will be attended also with some remarks upon the growth and flourishing conditions of the republic of the Rhodians, we shall, in the last place, take a short review of all that has been before related; and conclude the whole with the expedition of Antiochus Epiphanes into Egypt, and the war with Perseus, which was followed by the entire subversion of the Macedonian empire."

He then proceeds to relate the subjects contained in the second part of his history. "The chief of these transactions were, the expeditions of the Romans against the Celtiberians and Vaceaeans; the war which the Carthaginians made against Massinissa, a sovereign prince of Africa; and that between Attalus and Prusias in Asia. We shall also see the manner in which Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, was driven from his dominions by Orofernes, assisted by Demetrius, and again by his own address recovered his paternal right. We shall see Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, after he had reigned twelve years in Syria, deprived of his kingdom and his life, by the conspiracy of the other kings. About the same time, the Romans absolved those Greeks that were accused of having secretly excited the wars of Perseus, and permitted them to return to their own country. And not long afterwards the same Romans made war again upon the Carthaginians: at first intending to force them to remove the seat of their republic; but afterwards with design to exterminate both their name and government, for reasons which I shall there endeavour to explain. And lastly, when the Macedonians had, about this time, broken their alliance with the Romans, and the Lacedaemonians were also separated from the Peloponnesian league, the ill fate of Greece received at once both its beginning and full accomplishment, in the loss of the common liberty."

dary importance; they formed only the text of the political and moral discourses which it was the province of the historian to deliver. The reflections of Polybius are, it is true, characterised by deep wisdom; and no one can read them without admiring the solidity of the historian's judgment, and deriving from them at the same time both instruction and improvement. Still, it must be admitted, that, excellent as they are, they materially detract from the merits of the history as a work of art; their frequent occurrence interrupts the continuity of the narrative, and destroys, to a great extent, the interest of the reader in the scenes which are described. Instead of narrating the events in such a manner that they should convey their own moral, and throwing in, as it were by the way, the reflections to which the narrative should give rise, he pauses in the midst of the most interesting scenes to impress upon the reader the lessons which these events ought to teach, and he thus imparts to his work a kind of moralising tone, which frequently mars the enjoyment of the reader, and, in some cases, becomes absolutely repulsive. There can be no doubt that some of the most striking faults in the history of Polybius arise from his pushing too far the principle, which is doubtless a sound one to a certain extent, that history is written for instruction and not for amusement. Hence he omits, or relates in a very brief manner, certain important events, because they did not convey, in his opinion, lessons of practical wisdom; and, on the other hand, he frequently inserts long episodes, which have little connection with the main subject of his work, because they have a didactic tendency. Thus we find that one whole book (the sixth) was devoted to a history of the Roman constitution; and in the same manner episodes were introduced even on subjects which did not teach any political or moral truths, but simply because his countrymen entertained erroneous opinions on those subjects. The thirty-fourth book, for example, seems to have been exclusively a treatise on geography. Although Polybius was thus enabled to impart much important information, of which we, in modern times, especially reap the benefits, still it cannot be denied that such episodes are no improvements to the history considered as a work of art.

Still, after making these deductions, the great merits of Polybius remain unimpaired. His strict impartiality, to which he frequently lays claim, has been generally admitted both by ancient and modern writers. And it is surprising that he displays such great impartiality in his judgment of the Romans, especially when we consider his intimate friendship with Scipio, and the strong admiration which he evidently entertained of that extraordinary people. Thus we find him, for example, characterising the occupation of Sardinia by the Romans in the interval between the first and second Punic wars, as a violation of all justice (ii. 28. § 2), and denouncing the general corruption of the Roman generals from the time of their foreign conquests, with a few sentiments which are not unpleasant (xiv. 18). But, at the same time, he displays an equal impartiality in the history of the Achaean league; and perhaps we could hardly expect from him that he should forget that he was an Achaean. He no doubt thought that the extension of the Achaean league was essential to the liberties of Greece; and he is thus unconsciously led to exaggerate equally the merits of its friends and the faults of its enemies. He describes in far too glowing colours the character of Aratus, the great hero of the Achaean league, and ascribes (ii. 40) to the historical work of this statesman a degree of impartiality, to which it certainly was not entitled. On the same principle, he gives quite a false impression of the political life of Cleomenes, one of the greatest men of the latter days of Greece, simply because this king was the great opponent of Aratus and the league. He was likewise guilty of injustice in the views which he gives of the Aetolians, of which Brandstätter has quoted some striking instances in the work referred to below, although it must be confessed that the modern writer is in some cases equally unjust to the ancient historian, from the partiality which he displays for the Aetolians. Not only does Polybius exhibit a partiality for the Achaeans, but he cannot forget that he was an Arcadian, and is equally zealous for the honour of his native land. Thus he considers it strange that the Achaean league derived its name from the Achaean people, and not rather from the Arcadians, whom he classes with the Lacedaemonians (ii. 38); and many other instances might be quoted in which he displays an equal partiality towards his own people.

The style of Polybius will not bear comparison with the great masters of Greek literature; nor is it to be expected that it should. He lived at a time when the Greek language had lost much of its purity by an intermixture of foreign elements, and he did not attempt to imitate the language of the great Attic writers. He wrote as he spoke, and had too great a centum for rhetorical embellishments to avail himself of them in the composition of his work. The style of such a man naturally bore the impress of his mind; and, as instruction and not amusement was the great object for which he wrote, he did not seek to please his readers by the choice of his phrases or the composition of his sentences. Hence the later Greek critics were severe in their condemnations of his style, and Dionysius classes his work with those of Phylarchus and Duris, which it was impossible to read through to the end. (Dionys. De Compos. Verb. c. 4.) But the most striking fault in the style of Polybius arises from his want of imagination. No historian can present to his readers a striking picture of events, unless he has at first vividly conceived them in his own mind; and Polybius, with his cool, calm, calculating judgment, was not only destitute of all imaginative powers, but evidently despised it when he saw it exercised by others. It is no doubt certain that an historian must keep his imagination under a strong control; but it is equally certain that he will always fail in producing any striking impression upon the mind of his readers, unless he has, to some extent, called his imagination into exercise. It is for this reason that the geographical descriptions of Polybius are so vague and indistinct; and the following remarks of Dr. Arnold, upon the character of Polybius as a geographer, are quite in accordance with the general views we have expressed:—"Nothing shows more clearly the great rarity of geographical talent, than the praise which has been commonly bestowed upon Polybius as a good geographer. He seems indeed to have been aware of the importance of geography to history, and to have taken considerable pains to gain information on the subject: but this very circurnstance proves the more the difficulty of the task; for his descriptions are so vague and imperfect, and so totally devoid of painting, that it is scarcely possible to understand them. For instance, in his account of the march of the Greeks into Italy, and of the subsequent movements of their army and of the Romans, there is an obscurity, which never could have existed had he conceived in his own mind a lively image of the seat of war as a whole, of the connection of the rivers and chains of mountains with each other, and of the consequent direction of the roads and most frequented passes.” (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 473, 474.) To this same cause, the want of imagination on the part of Polybius, we are disposed to attribute the apparent indiscernibility with which he describes the fall of his native country, and the extinction of the liberties of Greece. He only sought to relate facts, and to draw the proper reflections from them; to relate them with vividness and to paint them in striking colours was not its calling.

The greater part of the history of Polybius has perished. We possess the first five books entire, but the rest we have only fragments and extracts, of which some, however, are of considerable length, such as the account of the Roman army, which belonged to the sixth book. The first five books were first printed in a Latin translation executed by Nic. Perotti, and issued from the celebrated press of Sweynheym and Pannartz, Rome, 1475, fol. The first part of the work of Polybius, which was printed in Greek, was the treatise on the Roman army, which was published by Ant. de Sabio, Venice, 1529, 4to., with a Latin translation by Lascaris; and in the following year, 1530, the Greek text of the first five books, with the translation of Perotti, appeared at Hagenau, edited by Obsopeus (Koch), but without the treatise on the Roman army, which had probably not yet found its way across the Alps. A few years afterwards a discovery was made of some extracts from the other books of Polybius; but the discovery of the compilation, and the time at which it was drawn up, are unknown, and can hardly believe with Casaubon that it was the Epitome which was made by M. Brutus, and of which both Plutarch (Brut. c. 4) and Suidas (s. v. Βροτός) speak. These extracts, which must be distinguished from those of the emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus mentioned below, contain the greater part of the sixth book, and portions of the following eleven (vii.-xvi.). The manuscript containing them was brought from Corfu, and they were published, together with the first five books which had already appeared at Basel, 1549, fol. from the press of Herragius. The Latin translation of these extracts was executed by Wolfgang Musculus, who also corrected Perotti’s version of the other books, and the editing of the Greek text was superintended by Arnold Paraxylus Arlenius. A portion of these extracts, namely a description of the naval battle fought between Philippus and Atticus and the Rhomae, belonging to the sixteenth book, had been previously published by Dayf in his De Re Navali Veterum, Paris, 1536, reprinted at Basel, 1537. In 1562 Ursinus published at Antwerp, in 4to., a second collection of Extracts from Polybius, entitled Excerpta de Legionibus (Ἐκλογαὶ περὶ Προσεχεῖν), which were made in the tenth century of the Christian era by order of the Emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. These Excerpta are taken from various authors, but the most important of them came from Polybius. In 1609 Is. Casaubon published at Paris, in folio, his excellent edition of Polybius, in which he incorporated all the Excerpta and fragments that had hitherto been discovered, and added a new Latin version. He intended likewise to write a commentary upon the author, but he did not proceed further than the 20th chapter of the first book; this portion of his commentary was published after his death at Paris, 1617, 8vo. A further addition was made to the fragments of Polybius by Valesius, who published, in 1634, another portion of the Excerpta of Constantinus, entitled Excerpta de Virtutibus at Vittis (περὶ ἀρετῶν καὶ καυχών), containing extracts from Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, and other writers; and to this collection Valesius added several other fragments of Polybius, gathered together from various writers. Jacobus Gronovius undertook a new edition of Polybius, which appeared at Amsterdam in 1670, in 3 vols. 8vo.; the text of this edition is taken almost verbatim from Casaubon’s, but the editor added, to the first four, the fragments and the commentary of Casaubon on the first twenty chapters of the first book, many additional notes by Casaubon, which had been collected from his papers by his son Mercius Casaubon, and likewise notes by Gronovius himself. The edition of Gronovius was reprinted under the care of J. A. Ernesti at Leipzig, 1763—1764, 3 vols. 8vo. The next edition is that of Schweighaeuser, which surpasses all the preceding ones. It was published at Leipzig, 1789—1795 in 8 vols. 8vo., of which the first four contained the Greek text with a Latin translation, and the other volumes a commentary, an historical and geographical index, and a copious “Lexicon Polybianum,” which is almost indispensable to the student. Schweighaeuser’s edition was reprinted at Oxford in 1823, in 5 vols. 8vo., without the commentary, but with the Lexicon. From the time of Valesius no new additions were made to the fragments of Polybius, with the exception of a fragment describing the voyage of Ambraxas, originally published in the second volume of Gronovius’s Livy, until Angelo Mai discovered in the Vatican library at Rome the third section of the Excerpta of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, entitled Excerpta de Sententis (περὶ ἱστοριῶν), which, among other extracts, contained a considerable number from the history of Polybius. These excerpts were published by Mai in the second volume of his Scriptorum veterum Novae Collectio, Rome, 1827, but in consequence of the mutilated state of the manuscript from which they were taken, many of them are unintelligible. Some of the errors in Mai’s edition are corrected in the reprints of the Excerpta, published by Geel at Leyden in 1829, and by Lucht at Altona in 1830; but these Excerpta appear in a far more correct form in the edition of Heyse, Berlin, 1846, since Heyse collated the manuscript afresh with great care. The edition of Polybius is by Immanuel Bekker (Berlin, 1844, 2 vols. 8vo.), who has added the Vatican fragments.

Of the translations of Polybius into modern languages, those most worthy of notice are the French, by Thuillier, chiefly remarkable on account of the military commentary appended to it by Foulard, Amsterdam, 1759, 7 vols. 4to.; the German, by Seybold, Lemgo, 1779—1783, 4 vols. 8vo.; and the English by Hampton, 1772, 2 vols. 4to.; the latter is upon the whole a faithful version, and we have availed ourselves of it in the quotations which we have made above.

They did not use Polybius till he came to the second Punic war, but from that time he followed him very closely, and his history of the events after the termination of that war appears to be little more than a translation of his Greek predecessor. Cicero likewise seems to have chiefly followed Polybius in the account which he gives of the Roman constitution in his De Republica. The history of Polybius was continued by Poseidonius and Strabo. [PROSKEDIONIUS; STRABO.]

Besides the great historical work of which we have been speaking, Polybius wrote, 2. The Life of Philopoemen in three books, to which he himself refers (x. 24). 3. A treatise on Tactica (πολεμικός ἔμφρονος), which he also quotes (ix. 30), and to which Arrian (Tactic. init.) and Aelian (Tactic. cc. 1, 3) allude; 4. A History of the Catilinarian War, according to the statement of Cicero (ad Fam. v. 12); and 5, a small treatise De Habituatione sub Aequatore (πολεμικός ἰδιαίτερα τιμωρήσεως), quoted by Geminus (c. 13, in Petavius, Uranologium, vol. iii. p. 31, &c.), but it is not improbable that this formed part of the 34th book of the History, which was entirely devoted to geography.

The reader will find some valuable information respecting the character of Polybius as an historian in the following works:—Lucas, Ueber Polybius Durstellung des Aetolischen Bundes, Königsberg, 1827; Merleker, Die Geschichte des Aetol-Achaischen Bundesgenossen-Krieges, Königsberg, 1831; K. W. Nitsch, Polybius: zur Geschichte antiker Politik und Historiographie, Kiel, 1842; Brandstetter, Die Geschichte des Aetolischen Landes, Felix und Bundes, nebst einer historiographischen Abhandlung über Polybius, Berlin, 1844. 2. Of Sardis, a Greek grammarian of unknown date, some of whose works have been printed by Iriarte (Catal. Cod. MSS, Biblioth. Matrit. vol. i. pp. 117, &c., 379, &c.) and Walz (Rhetores Graeci, vol. viii.).

POLYBOEA (Πολυβοέα), the name of two mythical personages, one a sister of Hianthus (Paus. iii. 19, § 4), and the other the wife of Actor. [Eustath. ad Hom. p. 321.] [L. S.]

POLYBOTES (Πολυβότης), a giant, who in the contest between the gods and giants was pursued by Poseidon across the sea as far as the island of Cos. There Poseidon tore away a part of the island, which was afterwards called Nisyren, and throwing it upon the giant buried him under it. (Apollod. i. 6, § 2; Paus. i. 1. § 4; Strab. x. p. 489.) [L. S.]

POLYBUS (Πολύβους). 1. A Trojan, a son of Antenor, mentioned in the Iliad. (xxi. 59.)

2. An Ithacan, father of the suitor Eurymachus, was slain by the swine-herd Eumaeus. (Hom. Od. i. 399, xxii. 284.)

3. The son of Alcandra, at Thebes in Egypt; he was connected with Menelaus by ties of hospitality. (Hom. Od. iv. 126.)

4. One of the Phaeacians. (Hom. Od. viii. 375.)

5. The king of Corinth, by whom Oedipus was brought up. He was the husband of Periboea or Moreo. (Soph. Oed. Rex, 770; Apollod. iii. 5. Vol. iii.)

men Sanitatis Salernitanae (in numerous editions), and to three or four other works. [W. A. G.]

POLYCAON (Πολύκαιων). 1. A son of Lelex, brother of Myles, and husband of Messene, the daughter of Tripas of Argolis. He emigrated from Lacania to Messenia, which country he thus called after his wife. He was the first king of Messenia. (Pana. iii. 1. § 1. iv. 1. § 1.)

2. A son of Bates, was married to Eusechme, the daughter of Hyllus. (Pana. iv. 2. § 1.)

POLYCARPUS (Πολυκάρπος). 1. ASCETA. There is extant in Greek a life of the female saint Syncretica, which has been ascribed to various persons. Some MSS. and the Greek ecclesiastical historian, Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. viii. 40), ascribe it to Athanasius, but Montfaucon, though he gives the piece with a Latin version in his edition of the works of Athanasius (vol. ii. p. 681, &c.), classes it among the spurious works, and declares that the difference of style, and the absence of any external testimony for five or six centuries after Athanasius, leave no room to doubt its spuriousness. A copy, which was among the papers of Combes, contains a clause, stating that the dis- continued lines of the work had been completed by "the blessed Arsenius of Pegada;" but this does not seem to describe him as the compiler of the narrative, but only as the author from whom part of the materials were derived. It is then most reasonable to follow the very ancient MS. in the Vatican library, which ascribes the biography to Polycarp the Ascetic or Monk, but where or when this Polycarp lived cannot be determined. The biography was first published in the Latin version of David Colvillus in the Acta Sanctorum Januarii, vol. i. p. 242, &c. The original Greek text is said to have been published with some other pieces, 4to. Ingoldstadi, 1603; it is given with a new Latin version and notes in the Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta of Cotelerius, vol. i. p. 201, &c., 4to. Paris, 1677. The MS. used by Cotelerius contained neither the author's name nor the final clause about Arsenius of Pegadae. The title of the piece is Βίος καὶ ἡμετερία τοῦ Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἀρσινοῦ (in Montfaucon's edition, B. κ. π. τῆς ὁσίου καὶ μαρτύρου Ἰωάννου [in Montfaucon's edition], Vita et Gestæ sanctæ celebritae matriæ nostræ (or according to Montfaucon, sanctæ beatissimæ magistriæ) Syncreticae. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 329.)

2. MARTYR. [No. 8]

3. Of Smyrna, a Christian writer of the age immediately succeeding that of the Apostles. Of the early history of this eminent father we have no trustworthy account. The time of his birth is not known, and we can only determine it by approximation. At the time of his martyrdom, to which various dates are assigned, he had been a Christian eighty-six years. Now if we adopt for the present Tillemont's date of his martyrdom, A. D. 166, and suppose Polycarp to have been of Christian parents, or at least educated from childhood in the Christian faith, and so in- terpret the eighty-six years, as several eminent critics do, of the term of his natural life, his birth will fall in A. D. 80; but if with other critics we suppose him to have been converted at a riper age, and compute the eighty-six years from the time of his conversion, his birth must be placed at a consid- erably earlier period. A vague passage in the Latin text of Polycarp's epistle to the Philippians (c. xi.), which we think merely indicates that the church at Smyrna was not in existence when the Apostle Paul wrote his epistle to the Philippians, has been adduced to prove that Polycarp was born before that time; but the words are too indefinite to bear out any such inference.

An ancient life, or rather a fragment of a life of Polycarp, ascribed by Bollandus to a certain Pionius of unknown date, and given by him in a Latin version in the Acta Sanctorum Januarii (a. d. 26), vol. ii. p. 695, &c., dwells much on the early history of Polycarp, but the record (if indeed it be the work of Pionius) is some centuries later than its subject, and is evidently false in several particulars. We are inclined to think, however, that it embodies some genuine traditions of Polycarp's history. According to this account, the Apostle Paul visited Smyrna in his way from Galatia, through the pro- consular Asia to Jerusalem (the writer apparently confounding two journeys recorded in Acts, xvii. 18—22, and 23, &c.), and having collected the believers, instructed them in the proper time of keeping Easter. After Paul's departure, his host, Strataeus, the brother of Timotheus, became bishop of the infant church; or, for the passage is not clear, Strataeus became a disciple of Polycarp and was bishop. It was during the episcopate of Buculos (whether he was the contemporary or the successor of Strataeus) that Callisto, a female member of the church, eminent for riches and works of charity, was warned of God in a dream to go to the gate of the city, called the Epheian gate, where she would find a little boy (puerulum) named Polycarp, of Eastern origin, who had been reduced to slavery, and was in the hands of two men, from whom she was to redeem him. Callisto, obedient to the vision, went to the gate, found the two men with the child, as it had been revealed to her; and having redeemed the boy, brought him home, educated him with maternal affection in the Christian faith, and, when he attained to manhood, first made him ruler over her house, then adopted him as her son, and finally left him heir to all her wealth. Polycarp had been from childhood distinguished by his benevolence, piety, and the gravity and deportment of his life, and his diligence in the study of the Holy Scriptures. These qualities early attracted the notice and regard of the bishop, Buculos, who loved him with fatherly affection, and was in return regarded by him with filial love. By Buculos he was or- dained first to the office of deacon, in which he laboured diligently, confuting heathens, Jews, and heretics; delivering catechetical homilies in the church, and writing epistles of which that to the Philippians is the only extant specimen. He was subsequently when of mature age (his hair was already turning grey) and still maturer conduct, ordained presbyter by Buculos, on whose death he was elected and consecrated bishop. We omit to notice the various miracles said to be wrought by Polycarp, or to have occurred on different occasions in his life. Such are the leading facts recorded in this ancient narrative, which has, we think, been too lightly estimated by Tillemont. That it has been interpolated with many fabulous admixtures of a later date, is clear; but we think there are some things in it which indicate that it embodies earlier and truer elements. The difficulty is to discover and separate these from later corruptions. The chief ground for rejecting the narrative altogether is the supposed difficulty of reconciling them with the more trustworthy statements of Irenaeus, who, in his boyhood, had known, perhaps lived with Polycarp (Iren. Epistola ad Floriram, apud Euseb. H. E. v. 20), and of other writers. According to Irenaeus (Epist. ad Victorem Papam, apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24), Polycarp had intercourse with "John and others of the Apostles:" or still more expressly (Adv. Haeres. iii. 3, et apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 14), he was instructed (perhaps converted, μαθητευθησας) by the Apostles, and conversed familiarly with many who had seen Christ; was by the Apostles appointed (κατασταθησας) bishop of the church at Smyrna; and always taught what he had learned from the Apostles. Tertullian (De Praescriptionibus Haereticis, c. 32), and Jerome (De Viris Illustratis, c. 17), distinctly mention John as the Apostle by whom Polycarp was ordained. But we question if the expressions of Irenaeus, when critically examined and stripped of the rhetorical exaggeration with which his natural reverence for Polycarp has invested them, will prove more than that Polycarp had enjoyed opportunities of hearing some of the Apostles; and was, with their sanction, appointed bishop of the church at Smyrna. That John was one of the Apostles referred to by Irenaeus, there is not the slightest reason to doubt; and we are disposed, with Tillemont, to regard Philip, whom Polycrates of Ephesus (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24) states to have ended his days in the Phrygian Hierapolis, as another of those with whom Polycarp had intercourse. We believe that intercourse with these apostles, and perhaps with some other old disciples who had seen Jesus Christ, is sufficient to bear out the statements of Irenaeus, and is not inconsistent with the general truth of the ancient narrative given by Bollandus. His statement of the ordination of Polycarp by the Apostles, may perhaps be reduced to the fact that John, of whom alone Tertullian (L. e.) makes mention, was among "the bishops of the neighbouring churches," who, came, according to the narrative, to the consecration of Polycarp. This circumstance enables us to fix that consecration in or before a. d. 104, the latest date assigned to the death of the venerable Apostle, and which is not inconsistent with the narrative. It must be borne in mind, too, that the whole subject of the ordination of these early bishops is perplexed by ecclesiastical writers utterly neglecting the circumstance, that in some of the larger churches there was in the Apostolic age a plurality of bishops (comp. Philippians, i. 1), not to speak of the grave and much disputed question of the identity of bishops and presbyters. The Apostolic ordination mentioned by Irenaeus and Tertullian may, therefore, have taken place during the lifetime of Bucolas, and have been antecedent to the precedence which, on his death, Polycarp obtained. We are the more disposed to admit the early origin and the truth of the leading statements bodied in the narration, as the natural tendency of the mind of a later age would have been to exaggerate the opportunities of Apostolic intercourse, and the sanctions of Apostolic authority, which Polycarp certainly possessed.

Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna at the time when Ignatius of Antioch passed through that city on his way to suffer death at Rome, some time between A. D. 107 and 116. [Ignatius, No. 1.] Ignatius seems to have enjoyed much this intercourse with Polycarp, whom he had known, apparently, in former days, when they were both heirs of the apostle John. (Martirg. Ignatii, c. 3.) The sentiment of esteem was reciprocated by Polycarp, who collected several of the epistles of Ignatius, and sent them to the church at Philippi, accompanied by an epistle of his own. (Polyc. Epistol. ad Philippum, c. 13.) Polycarp himself visited Rome while Anicetus was bishop of that city, whose episcopate extended, according to Tillemont's calculation, from a. d. 157 to 168. Irenaeus has recorded (Epistol. ad Victor, apud Euseb. H. E. v. 14) the difference of opinion of these two holy men on the time of observing Easter, and the steadfastness of Polycarp in adhering to the custom of the Asiatic churches, derived, as they affirmed, from the Apostles; as well as their mutual kindness and forbearance, notwithstanding this difference. Indeed, the character of Polycarp appears to have attracted general regard: Irenaeus retained for him a feeling of deepest reverence (Epistol. ad Florinn. apud Euseb. H. E. v. 21); Jerome speaks of him (De Viris Illustr. c. 17) as "totius Asiae princeps," the most eminent man in all prosanctural Asia. An anecdote given elsewhere [Marcion] seems to show that even renowned heretics, notwithstanding his decided opposition to them, desired to possess his esteem; and it is not improbable that the reverence excited by his character conducted to his success in restoring them to the communion of the church. It has been conjectured that he was the angel of the church of Smyrna to whom Jesus Christ directed the letter in the Apocalypse (ii. 8—11); and also that he was the bishop to whom the apostle John, according to a beautiful anecdote recorded by Clement of Alexandria (Liber "Quis Divae salvatur?" c. 42), committed the care of a young man, who, forsaking his patron, became chief of a band of robbers, and was re-converted by the apostle: but these are mere conjectures, and of little probability.

The martyrdom of Polycarp occurred, according to Eusebius (H. E. iv. 15), in the persecution under the emperor Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus; and is recorded in a letter of the Church at Smyrna to the Churches of Philomelium and other places, which is still extant, and of which Eusebius (ibid.) has given the chief part. The persecution began: one Germanicus, an ancient man, was thrown to the wild beasts, and several others, including some who were brought from Philadelphial, were put to death at Smyrna. Polycarp had at first intended to remain in the city and brave the danger of martyrdom; but the intreaties of his flock led him to withdraw to a retreat in the adjacent country, where he passed his time in prayer. Here, three days before his apprehension, he had a remarkable dream, which his anticipation of his fate led him to interpret as an intimation that he should be burnt alive, a foreboding but too exactly verified by the event. Messengers having been sent to apprehend him, he withdrew to another hiding place; but his place of retreat was discovered by the confession of a child, who had been forced by torture to make known where he was. Polycarp might still have escaped by leaving the place on the approach of those sent to apprehend him; but he refused, saying, "The will of God be done." His venerable figure and calm and courteous deportment commanded the respect of his captors; and a prayer offered by him affected some of them with remorse for their share in his apprehension. The officer into whose custody he was delivered, with the usual laxity of paganism, would have persuaded him, apparently through pity, to offer divine honours and sacrifice to the emperor; but his steady refusal changed their pity into anger, and they violently threw him down from the carriage in which they were conveying him. On entering the amphitheatre where the proconsul, Stratus Quadratus, was, a voice which the excited feelings of the old man and his companions led them to regard as from heaven, exclaimed, "Be strong, O Polycarp! and quit you like a man." The proconsul was, as others, moved by his appearance, and exhorted him to consider his advanced age, and comply with the requirements of government: "Swear by the fortune of Caesar, recent, and cry "Away with the godless (τοὺς δυσχωρούς)."" Looking first round upon the heathen multitude, and then up to heaven, the old man sighed and said, "Away with the populace." Their rage now averted, he "Swear by Caesar's fortune, and I will release thee. Revile Christ." "Eighty and six years have I served him," was the reply, "and he never did me wrong: how then can I revile my King and my Saviour?" Threats of being thrown to wild beasts, and of being committed to the flames, failed to move him; and his bold avowal that he was a Christian provoked the wrath of the assembled multitude. "This man," they shouted, "is the teacher of impiety, the father of the Christians, the man that does away with our gods (δὲ τῶν μυστηρίων θεών καθαρέτας); who teaches many not to sacrifice to nor to worship the gods." They demanded that he should be thrown to wild beasts, and when the Asiarch, Philip of Tralles, who presided over the games which were going on, evaded the demand, on the plea that the combats with wild beasts were ended, they demanded that he should be burned alive. The demand was complied with; and the populace, their rage still unaverted, collected from the baths and workshops logs and faggots for the pile. The old man ungirded himself, laid aside his garments, and took his place in the midst of the fuel; and when they would have secured him with nails to the stake, said, "Let me remain as I am; for he that has enabled me to brave the fire will so strengthen me that, without your fastening me with nails, I shall, unmoved, endure its fierceness." After he had offered a short but beautiful prayer, the fire was kindled, but a high wind drove the flames on one side, so that he was roasted rather than burned; and the executioner was ordered to despatch him with a sword. On his striking him with it so great a quantity of blood flowed from the wound as to quench the flames, which were, however, resuscitated, in order to consume his lifeless body. His ashes were collected by the pious care of the Christians of his flock, and deposited in a suitable place of interment. The day and year of Polycarp's martyrdom are involved in considerate doubt. Samuel Petit places it in A.D. 175; Usher, Pagi, and Bollandus, in A.D. 169; Eusebius (Chronicon) places it earlier, in the seventh year of Marcus Aurelius, who acceded to the throne, 7th March, A.D. 161; Scaliger, Le Moyne, and Cave, place it in A.D. 167; Tillemont in 166; and the Chronicon Paschale in the consulsip of Aelianus and Pastor, A.D. 163; and Pearson, who differs widely from all other critics, in A.D. 147, in the reign of Titus Antoninus Pius. Pearson brings various reasons in support of his opinion, which reasons are examined by Tillemont in one of his careful and elaborate notes. Polycarp is referred as a saint both by the Greek and Romish Churches; by the former on the 23rd of February, by the latter on the 26th of January, or (at Paris) on the 27th of April. The Greeks of Smyrna, on his festival, used formerly to visit devoutly what is shown as his tomb, near the ruins of an ancient church or chapel, on a hill side to the S.E. of the city. Mr. Arundel (Discoveries in Asia Minor, vol. ii. p. 379) is disposed to think that the tradition as to his place of interment is correct.

The chief authorities for the history of Polycarp have been cited. The account of Eusebius (H. E. iv. 14, 15, and v. 20) is chiefly taken from Irenaeus (Hist. c.), and from the letter of the Church at Smyrna, giving an account of his martyrdom, which will be noticed below. Halloix (Hi.lustr. Ecles. Orientalis Scriptorum Vitae) (Apostolici, or the Lives, &c., of the Primitive Fathers), and Mémorial, (Mémoires, vol. ii.), have collected the chief notices of the ancients, and embodied them in their narrative. See also Ceillier, Auteurs Suiv., vol. i. p. 672, &c. The English reader may consult (beside Cave's work just mentioned) Lardner (Credibility, &c. part ii. ch. 6, 7), Neander (Church Hist. trans, by Rose, vol. i. p. 106, &c.), Milman (Hist. of Christianity, bk. ii. ch. 7), and other ecclesiastical historians.

We have remaining only one short piece of this short writer: his Πρὸς Φιλιππηνα ἐπιστολή, Ad Philippienses Epistola. That he wrote such an epistle, and that it was extant in their time, is attested by Irenaeus (Adv. Haeres. iii. 3, and Epistol. ad Florinum, apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 14, and v. 20) and Eusebius (H. E. iii. 36, iv. 14), Jerome (De Viris Illust. c. 17), and later writers whom it is needless to enumerate; and, notwithstanding the objections of the Magdeburg Centurion (Cent. ii. c. 10); of Uehli (De Script. Ignatianis, c. 32), who however only denied the divisions of the New Testament; of Matthieu de la Roche; and, at a later period, of Semler, our present copies have been received by the great majority of critics as substantially genuine. Some have suspected the text to be interpolated; and the suspicion is perhaps somewhat strengthened by the evidence afforded by the Syriac version of the Epistles of Ignatius, lately published by Mr. Cureton [Ignatii, No. 1], of the extensive interpolation of those contemporary and kindred productions.

The Epistola ad Philippienses is extant in the Greek original, and in an ancient Latin version; the latter of which contains, toward the conclusion, several chapters, of which only some fragments preserved by Eusebius are found in the Greek. The letter partakes of the simplicity which characterizes the writings of the apostolic fathers, being HORTATORY rather than argumentative; and is valuable for the light which it throws upon the New Testament, especially from the first Epistle of Peter and the Epistles of Paul, which are incorporated in it, and for the testimony which it consequently affords to the early existence and wide circulation of the Sacred Writings. It was first published in black letter in the Latin version, by Jace Faber Stapulensis, with the works of the pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita and of Ignatius [Dionysi; Ignatius, No. 1], fol. Paris, 1498, under the title of Theologia Vivificans; and was reprinted at Strasbourg, A.D. 1502; at Paris, 1515; at Basel, 1520; at Cologne, 1536; at Ingolstadt, with the Clementina [Clemens, Romanus], 4to. 1546; at Cologne, with the Latin version of the writings of the pseudo-Dionysius, 1547; and with the Clementina and the Latin version of the Epistolae of Ignatius, fol. A.D. 1569. It appeared also in the following collections: the Microprosopikon, Basel, 1550; the Orthodiographa of Heroldus, Basel, 1555; in the Orthodiographa of Grynaeus, Basel, 1569; in the Milla Patrum of Francis Rous, 8vo. London, 1650; and in the various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, from its first publication by De la Bigne, a.d. 1575. The Greek text was first published by Halloix, subjoined to the life of Polycarp, in his Illustrum Ecclesiae Orientalis Scriptorvm Vitae et Documenta, vol. i. fol. Douai, 1633; and was again published by Usher, with the Epistolae of Ignatius, 4to. Oxford, 1644, not in the Appendix Ignatiana (which came out in 1647) as incorrectly stated by Fabricius; by Maderus, 4to. Helmstadt, 1653; and in the Patres Apostolici of Cotelerius, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1672; and Amsterdam, 1724; of Ittigius, 8vo. Leipzig, 1659; of Frey, Basel, 1742, and of Russel, 2 vols. 8vo. 1746. It is contained also in the editions of Ignatius, by Aldrich, 8vo. Oxon. 1708, and Smith, 4to. Oxon. 1709. It is contained also in the Varia Sacra of Le Moyne, vol. i. 4to. Leyden, 1685; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. i. fol. Venice, 1765.

Of more recent editions may be mentioned those of Hornemann, Scripta Genuina Graeco Patrum Apostoliconum, 4to. Copenhagen, 1828; Routh, Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Opuscula Praeipua quaedam, vol. i. 8vo. Oxford, 1832; Jacobson, Patrum Apostoliconum quae supernum, vol. ii. 8vo. Oxford, 1838; and Hafeli, Patrum Apostoliconum Opera, 8vo. Tubingen, 1839. There are English versions of this Epistle by Wake and Clementson [Ignatius, No. 1], and one in Cave's Apostolici, or Lives of the Primitive Fathers.

That Polycarp wrote another Epistle is attested by Irenaeus (Epistol. ad Florin.) one Prps Athénaios, Ad Athenienses, is quoted by St. Maximus in his Prologus ad Libros Dionysii Areopagitici [Maximus Confessor], and by Joannes Maxentius [Maxentius, Joannes], but is supposed to be spurious; at any rate it is now lost: another, Prps Diouqouos tov Aposatigwv, Ad Dionysium Areopagiti, mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Polyaekros), is supposed to be spurious also. The life of Polycarp, ascribed to Pionius, states that he wrote various Tractatus, Homiliae, and Epistolae, and especially a book De Obitu S. Joannis; of which, according to Halloix (i. c.), some extracts from a MS. said to be extant in an abbey in Northern Italy, had been given in a Concio de S. Joanne Evangelista by Francisctus Humblot; but even Halloix evidently doubted their genuineness. Some fragments ascribed to Polycarp, cited, in a Latin version, in a Catena in Quattor Evangelistas by Victor of Capua, were published by Francisctus Feurantdus subjoined to Lib. iii. c. 3, of his Annotationes ad Irenaeum, and were subsequently reprinted by Halloix (i. c.), Usher (Appendix Ignatiana, p. 31, &c.), Maderus (i. c.), Cotelerius (i. c.), Ittigius (i. c.), and Galland (i. c.), under the title of Fragmenta Quisque e Responsionum Capitula S. Polycarpo adscripta, but their genuineness is very doubtful. (Caves Irae, 2fo. p. 44, &c. fol. Oxon. 1740; Ittigius, De Biblioth. Patrum, passim; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 47, &c.; Ceillier, Aureaev Sacris, i. c.; Lardner, Credibility, pt. ii. b. i. c. 6, &c.; Gallandius, Biblioth. Patrum, prol.; and vol. i. c. ix.; Jacobson, l. c. proleg. pp. 1, &c. lxxx.)

The Τῆς Συμφωνίας εκκλησίας περὶ μαρτυρίων τοῦ ἀγίου Πολυκάρπου ἐπίστολα ἐγκώμιος is almost entirely incorporated in the Historia Ecclesiastica of Eusebius (iv. 15); it is also extant in its original form, in which it was first published by Archbishop Usher, in his Appendix Ignatiana, 4to. London, 1647; and was reprinted in the Acta Martyrum Sincerae et Selectae of Ruinart, 4to. Paris, 1689, and in the Patres Apostolici of Cotelerius, vol. ii. fol. Paris, 1672, Antwerp (or rather Amsterdam), 1698, and Amsterdam, 1724; it was also reprinted by Maderus, in his edition of the Epistolae Polycarpi, already mentioned; by Ittigius, in his Bibliotheca Patrum Apostoliconum, 8vo. Leipzig, 1809; and by Smith, in his edition of the Epistolae of Ignatius (reprinted at Basel, by Frey, 8vo. 1742); by Russel, in his Patres Apostolici, vol. ii. 8vo. London, 1746; and by Gallandius, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. i. fol. Venice, 1765; and by Jacobson, in his Patrum Apostoliconum quae supernum, vol. ii. 8vo. Oxford, 1838. There is an ancient Latin version, which is given with the Greek text by Usher; and there are modern Latin versions given by other editors of the Greek text, or in the Acta Sanctorum Januarii (ad d. xxvi.) vol. ii. p. 702, &c. There are English versions by Archbishop Wake, 8vo. London, 1693 (often reprinted); and lately revised by Chevalier, 8vo. Cambridge, 1833; and by Dalrymple, in his Remains of Christian Antiquity, 8vo. Edinburgh, 1776. (Cave, l. c. p. 65; Fabric, l. c. p. 51; Lardner, l. c. c. 7; Ceillier, l. c. p. 695; Ittigius, Galland, and Jacobson, l. c. c.)

POLYCASTE (Πολυκάστη). 1. A daughter of Nestor and Anaxibia (Hom. Od. iii. 464; Apollod. i. 9. § 9), became by Telemaeus the mother of Persepolis. (Eustath. ad Hom. l. c.)

2. A daughter of Lygaeus, was married to Icarius, by whom she became the mother of Penelope. (Strab. x. p. 461.)

POLYCHARMUS (Πολύχαρμος), a Messenian, and the conqueror in the 4th Olympiad (B.C. 764), is celebrated as the immediate cause of the first Messenian war, B.C. 743. Having been wronged by the Lacedaemonian Euephues, he took revenge by aggressions upon other Lacedemonians; and as the Messenians would not deliver him up to the Spartans, war was eventually declared by the latter against Messenia. (Paus. iv. 4. § 5, &c.)

POLYCHARMUS (Πολύχαρμος), wrote a work upon Lycaia (Λυκαία), which is referred to by Athenaeus (viii. 333, &c.), and Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Λάρις, Ζωφα, Φιλάδ). It is doubtful whether he is the same as the Polycharmus of Naucratis, who wrote a work on Aphrodite (Περὶ Αφροδίτης), from which Athenaeus makes an extract (pp. 675, &c.).

POLYCHARMUS (Πολύχαρμος), a sculptor, two of whose works stood in Pliny's time in the portico of Octavia at Rome (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. § 10). One of these works was Venus washing herself; but what the other was is doubtful, on account of the corrupt state of the passage in Pliny. As it stands in the common editions, it is, Βενευρομενα καταστημα ρηκιανον Πολυχαρμους, which is the reading of the inferior MSS., and seems to be only a conjectural emendation of the

POLYCLEITUS.

There are several beautiful statues of Venus, stooping on one knee, in the attitude of washing herself, which are supposed to be copies of the work of Polycharmus. The finest is in the Vatican, and the next best in the Museum at Paris. (Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. i. pl. 10; Clarac, pl. 345, No. 628; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 377, n. 5; Denkmäler d. Alten Kunst, vol. ii. pl. xxvi. fig. 279.)

P. S. POLYCLEITUS (ΠΟΛΥΚΛΕΙΤΟΣ), historical. 1.

An officer appointed by Ptolemy to command the fleet sent under Menelaus to Cyprus in B.C. 315. From thence Polycleitus was detached with a fleet of fifty ships to support the partisans of Ptolemy and Cassander in the Peloponnesus, but, finding on his arrival there that there was no longer occasion for his services, he returned with his fleet to Cilicia. Here he received intelligence that a fleet under Theodotus, and a land force under Periillas, were advancing to the support of Antigonus, and hastened to intercept them. Both one and the other were surprised and totally defeated; the two commanders and the whole fleet fell into the hands of Polycleitus, who returned with them to Egypt, where he was received with the utmost distincion by Ptolemy II., 2. 509-522.

2. Of the officers left by Epicydes in the command of the garrison of Syracuse when he himself quitted the city. [ΕΠΙΚΥΔΕΣ.] They were all put to death in a sedition of the citizens shortly afterwards. (Liv. xxxv. 28.)

P. H. B. POLYCLEITUS (ΠΟΛΥΚΛΕΙΤΟΣ), literary. 1.

Of Larissa, a Greek historian, and one of the numerous writers of the history of Alexander the Great. Athenaeus quotes from the eighth book of his histories (xii. p. 539, a.); and there are several other quotations from him in Strabo (xi. p. 509, d., xv. pp. 723, a. d., 735, a., xvi. 742, a.), and other writers (Plut. Alex. 46; Aelian. N. A. xvi. 41). There are some other passages in which the name of Polyceitus is erroneously put for that of Polyceitus of Mende (Diod. xiii. 53; Ath. v. p. 206, e.; Plin. H. N. xxxi. 2. s. 4.) He may, perhaps, have been the same person as Polyceitus of Larissa, the father of Olympias, mother of Antigonus Doson. Most of the extracts from his histories refer to the geography of the countries which Alexander invaded. They are collected, with a notice of the author, by C. Müller, in his Scriptores Rerum Alexandr. Magni, (pp. 129—133), in Didot's Scriptorium Graecorum Bibliothecae, Paris, 1846. (See also Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 499, ed. Westermann; Fabrik. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 49.)

2. An epigrammatic poet, who is mentioned by Meleager (Proem. 40), as one of those included in his Garland. None of his epigrams are extant. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 941.)

P. S. POLYCLEITUS (ΠΟΛΥΚΛΕΙΤΟΣ), a physician of Messina in Sicily, to whom some of the episodes of Phalaris are addressed, and who, therefore (if he be a real personage), may be supposed to have lived in the sixth century n. c. Having cured the tyrant of a dangerous disease, he received from him some valuable presents, and also succeeded in persuading him to pardon a conspirator against his life (Phalar. Epist. 106, 109). [W. A. G.]

POLYCLEITUS (ΠΟΛΥΚΛΕΙΤΟΣ), in Latin writers, Polyceitus and Polyceitus, artists. Some difficulty has arisen from the mention of two statues of this name, whom Pausanias expressly distinguishes from one another, who seem both to have lived about the same period, and who are both said to have been of Argos. (Paus. vi. 6. § 1.) Moreover, Pliny speaks of the great Polyceitus as a Sicyonian, though several other writers, as well as Pausanias, call him an Argive. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 10. § 2.) The question which arises, as to the number of artists of this name, is very fully discussed by Thiersch, but with more ingenuity than sound judgment. (Epochen, pp. 150, 203, &c.) He distinguishes three statues of the name (besides a fourth, of Thasos); namely, first, Polyceitus of Sicydon, the pupil of Ageladas, an artist of the beginning of the period of the perfection of art, and whose works partook much of the old conventional style; secondly, Polyceitus the elder, of Argos, maker of the celebrated statue in the Heraeum at Argos; and, thirdly, Polyceitus, the younger, of Argos, the pupil of Naucydes. But the common opinion of other writers is both simpler and sounder, namely that, on account of the close connection between the schools of Argos and Sicydon, the elder Polyceitus might easily have been assigned to both, and, if a more precise explanation be required, that he was a native of Sicydon, and was a citizen of Argos with which Sicydon was then subject, probably as an honour well earned by his statue in the Heraeum. We know the same thing to have happened with other artists; and we think that Thiersch himself could hardly have failed to accept this explanation, but for his perverse theory respecting the early date of Pheidias [ΠΗΕΙΔΙΑΣ], which imposed upon him the necessity of placing that artist's chief contemporaries also higher than their true dates. The questions which arise, respecting the assignment of particular works to either of the two Polyceiti of Argos, will be considered in their proper places.

I. Polyceitus, the elder, of Argos, probably by citizenship, and of Sicydon, probably by birth, was one of the most celebrated statues of the ancient world; and was also a sculptor, an architect, and an artist in toretic. He was the pupil of the great Argive statuary Ageladas, under whom he had Pheidias and Myron for his fellow-disciples. He was also somewhat younger than the Pheidias, and died about the same age as Myron. He is placed by Pliny at the 87th Olympiad, b. c. 431, with Ageladas, Callon, Phradmon, Gorgias, Lacon, Myron, Pythagoras, Scopas, and Parellus (H. N. xxxiv. 8. § 19). An important indication of his date is derived from his great statue in the Heraeum near Argos; for the old temple of Hera was burnt in Ol. 89. 2, b. c. 423 (Thuc. iv. 133; Clinton, F. H. s. a.); and, including the time required to rebuild the temple of the goddess, the statue by Polyceitus in the new temple could scarcely have been finished in less than ten years; which brings his life down to about b. c. 413. Comparing this conclusion with the date given by Pliny, and with the fact that he was a pupil of Ageladas, Polyceitus may be safely said to have flourished from about Ol. 82 to 92, or B.C. 452—412. A further confirmation of this date is furnished by Plato's mention of the sons of Polycleitus as being of about the same age as the sons of Periclea. (Protag. p. 328, c.)

Of his personal history we know nothing further. As an artist, he stood at the head of the schools of Argos and Sicyon, and approached more nearly than any other to an equality with the great head of the Athenian school, whom he was even judged to have surpassed on one occasion, in the celebrated competition of the Amazons. (See below, and Phidias.) The essential difference between these artists was that Phidias was unsurpassed, nay perfect, in making the images of the gods, Polycleitus in those of men. The one embodied in his Athena and Olympian Zeus, for all subsequent ages, the ideal standard of divine majesty; the other expressed, in his Doryphorus, the ideal perfection of human beauty. It is not, however, surprising that, in the estimation of many, the beauty of Polycleitus should even have been preferred to the more unapproachable majesty of Phidias, in an age when art, having reached its climax, was on the point of beginning to degenerate. Nay, even Polycleitus himself was, by some, placed below Myron in some respects (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. 19. § 3); and his forms were thought by the artists of the age of Alexander susceptible of greater grace. If, therefore, we find, in writers of a still later period, expressions which appear to refer to the works of Polycleitus as retaining something of the stiffness of an early period of art, we must not at once conclude that such passages, even if they are rightly interpreted, refer to some earlier artist of the same name.

Among the statements of Polycleitus is the following (H. N. xxxiv. 8. 19. § 2):—"Proprium ejus est, ut suo curae insisterent signa, exoglossae; quadra ta tamen ca esse tradit Varro et pae ne ad unum exemplum." (The word quadra ta, which Sillig formerly suspected, is confirmed by the authority of the Bamberg MS.) This passage has exercised the critical skill of most of the writers on art. Thiersch regards it as obviously characterising the style of one of the early improvers of the art; and he therefore supposes that the artist of whom Varro made this statement was the oldest artist of the name, Polycleitus of Sicyon, whom, according to him, Pliny has confounded with the more celebrated Polycleitus of Argos. But the language of Varro, properly understood, neither requires nor sustains any such hypothesis. For, besides the mechanical difficulty in statuary, of making a man without the support of a pedestal, his weight on one leg, may have been, and probably had been, overcome before the time of Polycleitus; but it was, as we understand Varro, a distinguishing feature of his works, that he did this without in any way interfering with those proportions and that repose, which constituted the perfection of his art. It was not, of course, for an artist like Phidias to poise his divinities upon one leg; but Polycleitus, the inventor of the perfect canon of the human form, would naturally devote careful study to an attitude, which adds so much to the life-like expression of a figure, while, on the other hand, he refrained from any tampering with his own established proportions, and avoided the dangers into which the free use of this attitude might lead an artist too eager for variety. Some writers think that Varro intended to censure Polycleitus on the ground that he adhered so strictly to his own canons as to introduce too much uniformity into his works; but the passage (to say nothing of its only referring to those statues of Polycleitus which rested on one leg) does not appear to be in the tone of censure *, and if it were, we should rather suspect the soundness of Varro's judgment, than of Polycleitus's practice on such a point. In fact, this appears to be the very point in which Myron was inferior to Polycleitus; that the former, in his eagerness for variety, transgressed, in his choice of subjects, in his proportions, and in his attitudes, those high principles of art to which Polycleitus always adhered.

The word quadra ta, in the above passage, demands further explanation. It is clearly meant to describe a certain proportion of the human figure, and may be roughly explained as expressing a robust middle stature, in opposition to a tall and slender stature. The meaning is clearly shown by Pliny's description (L. e. § 6) of the style of proportion practised by Lysippus, who, he says, made the heads smaller than the ancients made them, the bodies more slender and less fleshly, and thus the whole statue apparently taller "quadra ta veterum staturas permutando." Vitruvius gives a canons of proportion, according to which the length of the outstretched arms is equal to the height of the statue, so that the whole figure may be enclosed in a square; but it does not seem that there is any precise reference to this canons in the term quadra ta, as used by Pliny. (Böttiger, Andeut. p. 120; Schorn, Studien, p. 308.)

The praises which the ancients heap upon Polycleitus are numerous and of the highest order. According to Pliny (L. e.), he was considered to have brought the art of statuary to perfection; and the same judgment is passed upon his works by Cicero, who expressly gives him the preference over Myron (Brd. 19; comp. de Orat. iii. 7, Acad. ii. 47, De Fis. ii. 34, Tus. i. 2, Parados, v. 2). Dionysius of Halicarnassus praises him, in conjunction with Phidias, for those qualities which he expresses by the phrase kath to sevnov kai megalitevekyn kai dixmatiakyn. (De Isor. p. 95, Sylburg.) Quintilian (xii. 10) tells us that his works were distinguished by accurate execution (diligentia) and beauty (decor) above those of all others; but that he was thought to be deficient in grandeur (pudore). But even this fault is mentioned with the qualification "ne nihil detractatur;" and the critic proceeds to explain that it applies to his predecessors for human subjects over divine, and rests on the weight of his figures, and that the deficiency is ascribed to him chiefly in comparison with Phidias and Alcamenes:—"Nam ut humane formae decorem addiderit supra verum, ita non expelisse deorum auctoritatem videtur. Quin acutem quoque gra viorem dictur refugisse, nihil ausus ultra leves genas. At qua Polyeleto defuerunt, Phidiae atque Alcameni dantur." The breasts of his statues were especially admired. (Rhet. ad Herenn. iv. 6.) Several other passages might be added

* Perhaps, however, this censure may be implied in another passage of Varro, in which he says "Neque enim Lysippus artificem priores potius est vitiosa securis quam artem," de L. L. ix. 18, ed. Müller.
from Lucian, the poets of the Anthology, and other writers. Even while he lived Polycleitus was ranked among the very first artists: Xenophon makes Socrates place him on a level, as a statueur, with Homer, Sophocles, and Zeuxis in their respective arts. (Mem. i. 4. § 3.) The Socrates of Plato also speaks of him in terms which imply an equality with Pheidias. (Protag. p. 311, c.)

Of the artists who succeeded him, Lysippus especially admired him, and declared that his Doryphorus was his own teacher (Cic. Brut. 86). In fact Lysippus stood in much the same relation to the Argive school of Polycleitus as Praxiteles to the Attic school of Pheidias and Alcamenes.

An interesting anecdote is told by Aelian (V. H. xiv. 6), respecting the manner in which Polycleitus proved the superiority of the rules of art to popular opinion. He made two statues, one of which he finished to his own mind, and the other he exposed to public view, and altered it according to the opinions expressed by the spectators. He then exhibited the statues together. One of them was universally admired; the other was derided. "You yourselves," exclaimed the artist, "made the statue you abuse; I made the one you admire." Plutarch relates a saying of Polycleitus, that the work was the most difficult when the clay model had been brought to apparent perfection. (Quaest. Conv. ii. 3. p. 636, c.)

The disciples of Polycleitus were Argius, Aso- podorus, Alexis, Aristides, Phrynny, Dinon, Athenodorus, Demas Citorios, Cannucus II., and Pericleitus. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19; Paus. vi. 13. § 4; see the articles.)

Plato refers to the two sons of Polycleitus, as being also statueurs, but of no reputation in comparison with their father; he does not, however, mention their names. (Protag. p. 328, c.)

Polycehtus was not only celebrated as a statueur in bronze, but also as a sculptor in marble, as an architect, and as an artist in toretic. His works in these departments will be mentioned presently. His fame as a toretic artist was so great that he was considered, according to Pliny, to have perfected the art, which Pheidias had commenced, but had left incomplete: — "to reucton sic erudisse [judicetur], ut Phedias aperissesse." (H. N. l. c. 2.) There are a few passages in which Polycleitus seems to be spoken of as a painter; but they are insufficient to establish the fact. (See Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.)

Polycehtus wrote a treatise on the proportions of the human body, which bore the same name as the statue in which he exemplified his own laws, namely, Kanwv (Galen, p. 36. v. 793 τον έκθεσιν Πολυκλείτου κατ' ἐκθέσιν). The following were the chief works of Polycleitus in bronze. The kind of bronze which he chiefly used was the Aeginetan; whereas his contemporary Myron preferred the Delian. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 2. s. 5; Diet. of Ant. s. v. Aes.)

1. The Spear Bearer (Doryphorus), a youthful figure, but with the full proportions of a man (viriliter poerum, Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 2). There can be no doubt that this was the statue which became known by the name of Canum, because in it the artist had embodied a perfect representation of the ideal of the human figure, and had thus, as Pliny says, exhibited art itself in a work of art. Pliny, indeed, appears to speak of this statue as something different from the Doryphorus; but that it really was this statue isplain from the statement already quoted from Cicero respecting Lysippus, and from other passages in the ancient writers (Cic. Orat. 2; Quintil. v. 12. § 21; Galen, vol. i. p. 566, vol. iv. p. 606). Lucian describes the proportions of the human figure, as exhibited in the Canon of Polycleitus, in terms which completely confirm the explanation given above of the term quadrata, as applied to his works, and which amount to this; that the figure should be moderate both in height and stoutness. (Lucian. de Sult. 75, vol. ii. p. 309.) Quintilian describes the figure as alike fit for war or for athletic games (l. c.).

2. A youth of tender age, binding his head with a fillet, the sign of victory in an athletic contest (diadumemum molliter juvenem, Plin. l. c.; Luc. Phil. 13. 33). This work was valued at a hundred talents (Plin. l. c.). The beautiful statue in the Villa Farnese is no doubt a copy of it (Gerhard, Ant. Denkmüller, Cent. i. pl. 59; Müller, Denkmüller d. alt. Kunst, vol. i. pl. 31, fig. 136).

3. An athlete, scouring himself with a strigil (destringentem se, Plin. l. c.).

4. A naked figure, described by Pliny as talo incoscentem; an obscure phrase, which is explained by some to mean challenging to the game of tali (Harduin, ad loc.), by others, trampling down, or sparing away, an opponent in the pankration. (Jacobs, ad Philost. p. 435; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 120, n. 3.)

5. A group of two naked boys playing at tali, known by the name of Astrogalizontes. In Pliny’s time this group stood in the Atrium of Titus, and was esteemed by many as one of the most perfect works of statueur. The British Museum contains a portion of a similar group in marble, which was found in the baths of Titus in the pontifice of Urban VIII., and which was probably copied, but with some alterations, from the work of Polycleitus. (Townley Marbles, vol. i. p. 304.)

6. A Mercury, at Lysimachin. (Plin. l. c.)

7. A Hercules Ageter, arming himself, which was at Rome in Pliny’s time (Plin. l. c.); but the reading is somewhat doubtful. Cicero also mentions a Hercules by Polycleitus; but this seems to have been a different work, in which the hero was represented as killing the hydra (de Orat. ii. 16).

8. A portrait statue of Artemon, surnamed Peripheros, the military engineer employed by Pericles in the war against Samos (Plin. l. c.; Plut. Per. 27).

9. An Amazon, which gained the first prize, above Pheidias, Ctesilas, Cydon, and Pharradon, in the celebrated contest at Ephesus (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 6). The following are mentioned by Pliny in the list of new works, which are not mentioned by Pliny.

10. A pair of small but very beautiful Cane- phoroi (Cic. in Ferr. iv. 3; Symmach. Ep. 1. 23; Amathoia, vol. iii. p. 164).

11. A statue of Zeus Phlius at Megalopolis, the dress and ornaments of which were similar to those appropriate to Dionysus (Paus. viii. 31. § 2. s. 4).

12. Several statues of Olympic victors (Paus. vi. § 4. 4. § 6. 7. § 3. 9. § 1. 13. § 4). But it cannot be determined whether these should be ascribed to the elder or the younger Polycleitus. (See below, No. 2.)

POLYCLEITUS.
Of his works in marble, the only ones which are mentioned are his statue of Zeus Miltiades at Argos (Paus. ii. 20. § 1), and those of Apollo, Leto, and Artemis, in the temple of Artemis Orthia, on the summit of Mt. Lycon in Argolis. (Paus. ii. 24. § 5.)

But that which he probably designed to be the greatest of all his works was his ivory and gold statue of Hera in her temple between Argos and Mycenae. This work was executed by the artist in his old age (see above), and was doubtless intended by him to rival Pheidias's chryselephantine statues of Athena and of Zeus, which, in the judgment of Strabo (viii. p. 372), it equalled in beauty, though it was surpassed by them in costliness and size. According to the description of Pausanias (i. 17. § 4), the goddess was seated on a throne, her head crowned with a garland, on which were worked the Graces and the Hours, the one hand holding the symbolical pomegranate, and the other a sceptre, surmounted by a cuckoo, a bird sacred to Hera, on account of her having been once changed into that form by Zeus. From an epitaph by Parmenion (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 202, No. 5) it would seem that the figure of the goddess was robed from the waist downwards. Maximus Tyrius, who compares the statue with the Athena of Pheidias, describes the Hera of Polycleitus as the white-armed goddess of Homer, having ivory arms, beautiful eyes, a splendid robe, a queenlike figure, seated on a golden throne. (Diisert. xiv. 6, vol. i. p. 260, Reiske.) In this description we clearly see the Homeric ideal of Hera, the white-armed, large-eyed (αυθωδάλενος, Βοώπας), which Polycleitus took for the model of his Hera, just as Pheidias followed the Homeric ideal of Zeus in his statue at Olympia. The character expressed by the epithet Βοώπας must have been that of the whole countenance, an expression of open and imposing majesty; and accordingly, in a most laudatory epitaph on the statue, Martial says (x. 89):

"Ore nitet tanto, quanto superasset in Ida Judice convicis non dubitante dea."

This statue remained always the ideal model of Hera, as Pheidias's of the Olympian Zeus. Thus Hercules of Attica, when he set up at Caesarea the statues of Augustus and Rome, had them made on the model of these two statues respectively. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xv. 13.) Praxiteles, however, ventured to make some minor alterations in Polycleitus's type of Hera. [Praxiteles.] There is an excellent essay on this statue, with an explanation of the allegorical signification of its parts, by Böttiger. (Anecd. pag. 122-128; comp. Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 352.)

It is impossible to determine which of all the existing figures and busts of Hera or Juno, and of Roman empresses in the character of Juno, may be considered as copies of the Hera of Polycleitus; but in all probability we have the type on a coin of Argos, which is engraved in Müller's Denkmäler (vol. i. pl. 30. fig. 132; comp. Böttiger, L.c. p. 127).

In the department of toretic, the fame of Polycleitus in this respect rested chiefly on the golden ornaments of his statue of Hera; but he also made small bronze statuettes (sigilla), and drinking-vessels (phialae) (Martial. viii. 51; Juvenal. viii. 102). Muchion mentions a celebrated lamp, which he made for the king of Persia (ap. Ath. v. p. 206. e).

As an architect Polycleitus obtained great celebrity by the theatre, and the circular building (tholus), which he built in the sacred enclosure of Aesculapius at Epidaurus: the former Pausanias thought the best worth seeing of all the theatres, whether of the Greeks or the Romans. (Paus. ii. 27. §§ 2, 5.)

2. Of the younger Polycleitus of Argos very little is known, doubtless because his fame was eclipsed by that of his more celebrated namesake, and, in part, contemporary. The chief testimony respecting him is a passage of Pausanias, who says that the statue of Agenor of Thebes, an Olympic victor in the boys' wrestling, was made by "Polycleitus of Argos, not the one who made the statue of Hera, but the pupil of Naucydes." (Paus. vi. 6. § 1. a. 2.) Now Naucydes flourished between B.c. 420 and 400; so that Polycleitus must be placed about B.C. 400. With this agrees the statement of Pausanias, that Polycleitus made the bronze tripod and statue of Aphrodite, at Amyclae, which the Lacedaemonians dedicated out of the spoils of the victory of Aegospotami (Paus. iii. 18. § 5. 8); for the age of the elder Polycleitus cannot be brought down so low as this. Mention has been made above of the statue of Zeus Phlius, at Megalopolis, among the works of the elder Polycleitus. Some, however, refer it to the younger, and take it as a proof that he was still alive after the building of Megalopolis, in B.C. 379; but this argument is in no way decisive, for it is natural to suppose that many of the statues which adorned Megalopolis were carried thither by the first settlers. To this artist also we should probably refer the passage of Pausanias (ii. 22. § 8), in which mention is made of a bronze statue of Hecate by him at Argos, and from which we learn too that Polycleitus was the brother of his instructor Naucydes. [Naucydes.] He also was probably the maker of the mutilated statue of Alcibiades, mentioned by Dio Chrysostom (Orat. 37, vol. ii. p. 122, Reiske). It would seem from the passage of Pausanias first quoted (vi. 6. § 1), that the younger Polycleitus was famous for his statues of Olympic victors; and, therefore, it is exceedingly probable that some, if not all, of the statues of this class, mentioned above under the name of the elder Polycleitus, ought to be referred to him. Whatever else was once known of him is now hopelessly merged in the statements respecting the elder artist.

Thiersch makes still a third (according to him, a fourth) statuary or sculptor of this name, Polycleitus of Thasos, on the authority of an epitaph of Geminius (Anth. Plan. iii. 30; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 279):

Χείρ με Πολυκλέτους Θασιαίον θάνατον, εύθειας Ζωλιστενος, βροντας τε Διὸς ἀπόπιτης, ν.τ.α.

where Grotius proposed to read Πολυγνώτου for Πολυκλέτους, an emendation which is almost certainly correct, notwithstanding Heiney's objection, that the phrase χείρ μακρον is more appropriate to a sculpture than a painting. There is no other mention of a Thasian Polycleitus; but it is well known that Polygnotus was a Thasian. The error is just one of a fourth, often made with, and of which we have a precisely parallel example in another epitaph, which ascribes to Polycleitus a painting of Polyeuxena (Anth. Plan. iv. 156; Brunck, Anal.
POLYCELES.

vol. ii. p. 440). It is not, however, certain that Polydoros is the right reading in this second case; the blunder is very probably that of the author of the epigram. (Jacobs, Animad. in Anth. Graec. ad loc.)

Lastly, there are gems bearing the name of Polyceles, respecting which it is doubtful whether the engraver was the same person as the great Argive statute; but it is more probable that he was a different person. (Bracci, tab. 96; Stosch, de Gemm. 76; Lewezow, über den Rubu des Palladium, pp. 31, &c.; Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.) [P. S.]

POLYCELES (Πολύκλης), a favourite freedom of Nero, was sent by that emperor into Britain to inspect the state of the island. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 39, Hist. i. 57, ii. 95; Dion Cass. xliii. 12.)

POLYCELES (Πολύκλης). 1. A Macedonian general who was left in the command of Thessaly by Antipater, when the latter crossed over into Asia to the support of Craterus, b. c. 321. The Aeolians took advantage of the absence of Antipater to invade Locris, and laid siege to Ambuchsia; whereupon Polyceles hastened to its relief, but was totally defeated, his army utterly destroyed, and he himself slain. (Diod. xviii. 38.)

2. One of the partisans and counsellors of Eurydice, who shared in her defeat by Olympias (b. c. 317), and accompanied her on her flight to Amphipolis, where she was soon after taken prisoner. (Id. xix. 11.) [E. H. B.]

POLYCELES (Πολύκλης), artists. 1. 2. Two statues of this name are mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19); one, as flourishing in the 102d Olympiad (b. c. 370), contemporaneous with Cephisodotus, Leochares, and Hypatodorus; the other, as one of a number of statues, who flourished at the revival of the art in the 158th Olympiad (b. c. 153), and who, though far inferior to those who lived from the time of Pheidias down to the 120th Olympiad (b. c. 300), were nevertheless artists of reputation. In this list the name of Polyceles of the school which produced the Ganymede, which is usually taken for the name of another artist, but which may perhaps, as Sillig has observed, indicate the city to which Polyceles belonged; for it is at all improbable that Pliny would copy the words Polykleitōs 'Athnaimos, which he found in his Greek authority, either through carelessness, or because he mistook the second for the name of a person. It is also extremely probable that the elder Polyceles was an Athenian, and that he was, in fact, one of the artists of the later Athenian school, who obtained great celebrity by the sensual charms exhibited in their works. For not only does Pliny mention Polyles I. in connection with Cephisodotus I. and Leochares, whom we know to have been two of the most distinguished artists of that school; but he also ascribes to Polyceles (without, however, specifying which of the two) a celebrated statue of an Hermaphrodite, a work precisely in keeping with the characteristics of the Ganymede of Leochares. (Plin. l. c. § 20.) From this comparison, then, of these two statements, the inference is highly probable that the Hermaphrodite was the work of the elder Polyceles, who was an artist of the later Athenian school of statuary. Müller strongly confirms this view by the ingenious observation, that, in Pliny's alphabetical lists of artists, the names under each letter come pretty much in the order of time; and in the present instance, the name of Polyceles comes before those of Pyrrhus and of Phoenician the Apostle of Lyons. (Archäol. d. Kunst, § 128, n. 2.)

Respecting the Hermaphrodite of Polyceles, it cannot be determined with certainty which of the extant works of this class represents its type, or whether it was a standing or a recumbent figure. The prevailing opinion among archaeologists is that the celebrated recumbent Hermaphrodite, of which we have two slightly different examples, in marble, the one in the Florentine Gallery, the other in the Louvre (formerly in the Villa Borghese), is copied from the bronze statue of Polyceles. (Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 98, 99, and plate 9; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 332, n. 2; Osann, Ueber eine in Pompeji Ausgegrabene Hermaphroditenstatue; and Böttiger, Ueber die Hermaphroditens-Fibel und Bildung, in the Amathia, vol. i. pp. 342—366.)

The younger Polyceles, from the date assigned to him by Pliny, and from the mention of a statue of Juno by Polyceles in the Temple of Olympian Zeus at Rome (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4. s. 5. § 10), would seem to have been one of the Greek artists who flourished at Rome about the time of the original erection of that portico by Metellus Macedonicus. But it is evident, on a careful examination of the latter passage of Pliny, and it is probable, from the nature of the case, that many, if not most of the works of art, with which Metellus decorated his portico, were not the original productions of living artists, but either the works of former masters, transported from Greece, or marble copies taken from such works. It contained, for example, works by Praxiteles, one of which stood in the very part of the edifice in which the statue by Polyceles was placed. Hence arises the suspicion that this Polyceles may be no other than the great Athenian artist already mentioned; that, like other statues of that era (Praxiteles, for instance), he wrought in marble as well as in bronze, or else that this Polyceles was a very distinguished pupil of the elder Metellus. Polyceles was not only a copy from one of his works, and that Pliny places him erroneously at the 158th Olympiad, because, finding him mentioned among the artists whose works stood in the portico of Metellus, he mistook him for an artist living at the period of its erection. It is true that this is uncertain conjecture; but Pliny is very apt to make mistakes, and still more the copyists, especially in lists of names, and a sound critic is very reluctant to consent to the unnecessary multiplication of persons bearing distinguished names.
to say more in a subsequent part of his work (vi. 12. § 3. s. 9). Accordingly, at the end of the chapter in which he describes Elateia in Phocis, after mentioning the temple of Asclepius, with the bearded statue of the god in it, made by Timocles and Timarchides, who were of Athenian birth, he proceeds to give an account of the temple of Athena Cranaea, in which was a statue of the goddess, equipped as if for battle, and with works of art upon the shield in imitation of the shield of the Athena of the Parthenon; “and this statue also,” he says, “was made by the sons of Polycles.” (Paus. x. 34. § 3. s. 6—9.) From this passage, taken in its connection, it is evident that the sons of Polycles were no other than Timoecles and Timarchides, and that these were Athenian artists of considerable reputation. Now, reverting to Pliny, we find in the same list of statuaries at the revival of the art in Ol. 156, in which the name of Polycles occurs, the name of Timoecles; and in the passage respecting the works in the portico of Octavia, immediately after the mention of the statue of Juno by Polycles, he mentions that of Jupiter by the sons of Timarchides, in the adjacent temple. It follows that, if there be no mistake in Pliny, the Polycles of the two latter passages of Pausanias (and perhaps, therefore, of the first) was the younger Polycles. At all events, we establish the existence of a family of Athenian statuaries, Polycles, his sons Timoecles and Timarchides, and the sons of Timarchides, who either belonged (supposing Pliny to have made the mistake above suggested) to the later Attic school of the times ofScopas and Praxiteles, or (if Pliny bePliny) it was the tradition of the revival of the art about c. 155, which was connected with the employment of Greek artists at Rome. (Comp. Timarchides and Timocles.) There is still one more passage in which the name of Polycles occurs, as the maker of some statues of the Muses, in bronze. (Varro, ap. Nonius, s. v. Divine.)

3. Of Adranymittus, a painter, mentioned by Vitruvius among those artists who deserved fame, but who failed through adverse fortune to attain to it. (iii. Pref. § 2.)

POLYCRATES (Πολυκράτης), historical.

1. Of Samos, one of the most fortunate, ambitious, and treacherous of the Greek tyrants. With the assistance of his brothers Pantagnotus and Sylos son, he made himself master of the island towards the latter end of the reign of Cyrus. At first he shared the supreme power with his brothers; but he shortly afterwards put Pantagnotus to death and banished Sylos son. Having thus become sole despot, he raised a fleet of a hundred ships, and took a thousand bowmen into his pay. With this force he conquered several of the islands, and even some towns on the main land; he made war upon Miletus, and defeated in a sea-fight the Lesbians, who had come to the assistance of the latter city. His navy became the most formidable in the Persian world; and he formed the design of conquering all the Ionian cities as well as the islands in the Aegean. He had formed an alliance with Amasis, king of Egypt, who, however, finally renounced it through alarm at the amazing good fortune of Polycrates, which never met with any check or disaster, and which therefore was sure, sooner or later, to excite the envy of the gods. Such, at least, is the account of Herodotus, who has narrated the story of the rupture between Amasis and Polycrates in his most dramatic manner. In a letter which Amasis wrote to Polycrates, the Egyptian monarch advised him to throw away one of his most valuable possessions, in order that he might thus inflict some injury upon himself. In accordance with this advice Polycrates threw into the sea a seal-ring of extraordinary beauty; but in a few days it was found in the belly of a fish, which had been presented to him by a fisherman. Thereupon Amasis immediately broke off his alliance with him. Of course the story is a fiction; and Mr. Grote remarks (Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 323) with justice, that the facts related by Herodotus rather lead us to believe that it was Polycrates, who, with characteristic faithlessness, broke off his alliance with Amasis, in order to make it more for his interest to cultivate friendship with Cambyses, when the latter was preparing to invade Egypt, n. c. 525. He sent to the assistance of the Persian monarch forty ships, on which he placed all the persons opposed to his government, and at the same time privately requested Cambyses that they might never be allowed to return. But these malcontents either never went to Egypt, or found means to escape; they sailed back to Samos, and made war upon the tyrant, but were defeated by the latter. Thereupon they repaired to Sparta for assistance, which was readily granted. The Corinthians likewise, who had a special cause of quarrel against the Samians, joined the Spartans, and their united forces accompanied by the exiles sailed against Samos. They laid siege to the city for forty days, but at length despairing of taking it, they abandoned the island, and Polycrates, in the meantime, became master of it.

The power of Polycrates now became greater than ever. The great works which Herodotus saw and admired at Samos were probably executed by him. He lived in great pomp and luxury, and like some of the other Greek tyrants was a patron of literature and the arts. The most eminent artists and poets found a ready welcome at his court; and his friendship for Anacreon is particularly celebrated. But in the midst of all his prosperity he fell by the most ignominious fate. Oroetes, the satrap of Sardis, had for some reason, which is quite unknown, formed a deadly hatred against Polycrates. By false pretences, the satrap contrived to allure him to the mainland, where he was arrested soon after his arrival, and crucified, n. c. 522. (Herod. iii. 39—47, 54—56, 120—125; Thuc. i. 13; Athen. xii. p. 540.)

2. An Athenian, a lochagos in the army of the Cyrenian Greeks, is mentioned several times by Xenophon, whom he defended on one occasion. (Xen. Anab. iv. 5. § 24, v. 1. § 16, vii. 2. §§ 17, 29, vii. 6. § 41.)

3. An Argive, the son of Mnasiades, descended from an illustrious family at Argos, came over to the court of the Egyptian monarch Ptolemy Philopator, just before his campaign against Antiochus III., in n. c. 217. Polycrates was of great service in drilling and encouraging the Egyptian troops, and he commanded the cavalry on the left wing at the battle of Raphia, in n. c. 217, in which Antiochus was defeated, and which secured to Ptolemy the provinces of Coele-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine. Although Polycrates was still young he was appointed, to off one, says Polybius, in the king's court, and was accordingly appointed by Ptolemy governor of Cyprus. The duties of this office he discharged with the utmost fidelity and integrity; he secured the island for Poltemy Epiphanes, the infant son and successor of Philopator, and on his return to Alexandria about b.c. 196, he brought with him a considerable sum of money for the use of the monarch. He was received at Alexandria with great applause, and forthwith obtained great power in the kingdom; but as he advanced in years, his character changed for the worse, and he indulged in every kind of vice and wickedness.

We are ignorant of his subsequent career, in consequence of the loss of the later books of Polybius; but we learn from a fragment of the historian that it was through his evil advice that Poltemy took no part in military affairs, although he had reached the age of twenty-five. (Polyb. v. 64, 65, 62, 64, xvi. 38, xxii. 16.)

POLYCRATES (Πολυκράτης), an Athenian rhetorician and sophist of some repute, a contemporary of Socrates and Isocrates, taught first at Athens and afterwards in Cyprus. He is mentioned as the teacher of Zolus. He is named along with some of the most distinguished orators of his time by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (de Isaeo, c. 8, de Dem. Eloc. c. 20), who, however, finds great fault with his style. He wrote, 1. An accusation of Socrates (κατηγορία Σωκράτους), which is said by some writers to have been the speech delivered by Melitus at the trial of Socrates; but as it contained an allusion to an event which occurred six years after the death of the philosopher, it would seem to have been simply a declamation on the subject composed at a subsequent period. (Diog. Laert. ii. 38, 39, with the note of Menagius; Aelian, V. H. xi. 10, with the note of Perizonius; Isocr. Busiris, § 4, &c.; Quintil. ii. 17, § 1, iii. 1. § 11; Suidas, s. v. Πολυκράτης.) 2. Βουγιόδως Α΄Τολογολογία. The oration of Isocrates, entitled Βουγιόδως, is addressed to Polybius, and points out the faults which the latter had committed in his oration on this subject. 3. Έγκυμων Θσραοτούλος (Schol. ad Arist. Hilo. p. 48). 4. Περί Α’φοροδίσιαν, an obscure poem on love, which he published under the name of the poetess Philanис, for the purpose of injuring her reputation (Athen. viii. p. 335, c. d.). It is doubtful whether the above-mentioned Polybius is the same as the Polybius who wrote a work on Lacoitia (Λακωνικός) referred to by Athenaeus (iv. p. 139, d.). Spengel supposes that the rhetorician Polybius is the author of τον Παναγρί ριον Ἡλεν, which has come down to us as the work of Gorgias. (Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Berufschaft, § 50, n. 22.)

POLYCRATES (Πολυκράτης). 1. A statuary, whom Pliny mentions among those who made αθληται και αρματος και νεκταρος σφαριορικες (II. N. xxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34). There is a fragment of a Hermes in the Villa Mattei, bearing the mutilated inscription, on which slight basis Visconti rests the hypothesis that Polybius was an Athenian artist, contemporary with Timotheus, and that the Hermes in question was a copy of a bronze statue of Timotheus by Polybius. A simpler hypothesis would be to complete the inscription thus, ΤΙΜΟΘΕΩΣ ΑΘΝΑΙΟΣ ΑΝΘΡΟΠΟΣ, ΠΟΛΥΚΡΑΤΗΣ ΕΥΑΙΣ. (Monum. Mat- tei, vol. iii. n. 118; Visconti, Icon. Graecae, vol. i. p. 150, n.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 389—390.)

TIMΟΘΕΩΣ ΑΘΝ... ΠΟΛΥΚΡ... .

2. An engraver of precious stones, known by an inscription on a gem representing Eros and Psyche. (Mariette, Traité, 3c. vol. i. p. 421; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 149.)

POLYCRITUS (Πολυκρίτους), of Mendae in Sicily, wrote a work on Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, which is referred to by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 63). Aristotle likewise quotes a work by Polycritus on Sicilian affairs, in poetry (Miraβ. Ars- cul. 115), which is probably the same work as the one referred to by Diogenes. It is doubtful whether this Polycritus is the same person as the Polycritus who wrote on the East, and whose work is referred to by Strabo (xv. p. 735), Plutarch (Alex. 46), Antigonus of Carystus (c. 150, or 135, ed. Westermann), and as one of the writers from whom Pliny compiled the 11th and 12th books of his Natural History.

POLYCRITUS (Πολυκρίτους), a physician at the court of Artaxerxes Mnaemon, king of Persia, in the fourth century B.C. (Plut. Artax. 21). He was a native of Mende in Macedonia, and not a "son of Mendeaus," as Fabricius states (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 376, ed. vet.). [W. A. G.]

POLYCRITUS (Πολυκρίτους), a mythical architect, mentioned by the Pseudo-Plutarch, in connection with the story of Poemander. (Quaest. Graec. 37, p. 298, c.) [P. S.]

POLYCTOR (Πολυκτόρ). 1. A son of Aegyptus and Caliande, (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

2. A son of Pterelus, prince of Ithaca. A place in Ithaca, Polycitorium, was believed to have derived its name from him. (Hom. Od. xvii. 207; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1815.)

There is one more mythical personage of this name. (Hom. Od. xviii. 298.) [L. S.]

POLYDAMAS (Πολυδάμας), a son of Panthous and Phrontis, was a Trojan hero, a friend of Hector, and brother of Euphorbus. (Hom. II. xi. 57, xvi. 353, xvii. 40.) [L. S.]

POLYDAMAS (Πολυδάμας). 1. Of Scytussa in Thessaly, son of Nicias, conquered in the Panathenaion at the Olympic games, in Ol. 93, n. c. 406. His size was immense, and the most marvelous stories are related of his strength, how he killed without arms a huge and fierce lion on mount Olympus, how he stopped a chariot at full gallop, &c. His reputation led the Persian king, Dareius Ochus, to invite him to his court, where he performed similar feats. (Euseb. 'Ελλ. αλ. p. 41; Paus. vi. 5, vii. 27, § 6, who calls him Πολυδάμας; Diod. Fragm. vol. ii. p. 640, ed. Wesseling; Lucian, Quomodo Hist. conscrib. 35, et aliib; Suidas, s. v. Πολυδάμας; Krause, Olympia, p. 360.)

2. Of Pharsalus in Thessaly, was entrusted by his fellow-citizens about n. c. 375, with the supreme government of their native town. Polydams formed an alliance with Sparta, with which state his family had long been connected by the bonds of public hospitality; but he soon after entered into a treaty with Jason of Phere. The history of this treaty is related elsewhere [Vol. II. p. 554, b.]. On the murder of Jason in B.c. 370, his brother Polyphon, who succeeded to his power, put to death Polydams and eight other most distinguished citizens of Pharsalus. (Xen. Hell. vi. 1. § 2, &c. vi. 4. § 34.)

POLYDAMNA (Πολυδάμνα), the wife of king Thon in Egypt; she gave Helen a remedy by which she could sooth any grief or anger. (Hom. Od. iv. 226.)

POLYDECTES (Πολύδεκτης), a son of Mag-nes and king of the island of Seriphus, is called a brother of Dictys. (Pind. Pyth. xii. 14; Apollod.
i. 9, § 6; Strab. x. p. 487; Zenob. i. 41; Paus.
i. 22, § 6.)

POLYDECTES (Πολύδεκτης), the sixth or seventh king of Sparta in the Procid line, was the eldest son of Eunomus, the brother of Lycurgus
the lawgiver, and the father of Charilaus, who succeeded him. Herodotus, contrary to the other authorities, makes Polydectes the father of Eunomus.
(Plut. Lyc. 2; Paus. iii. 7, § 2; Herod. viii. 151.)

[Elgin Marbles.]

POLYDECTES, a sculptor who lived at Rome under the earlier emperors, and wrought in conjunction with Hermaeus. These two were among the artists who "filled the palace of the Caesars on the Palatine with most approved works." (Plin.
H. N. xxxvi. 5, a. 4, § 11.)

POLYDEGMON or POLYDECTES (Πολυ-δέγμων or Πολύδεκτης), that is, "the one who receives many," occurs as a surname of Hades (Hom. Ηημ. in C. 431; Aeschyl. Prom. 153.)

POLYDEUCES (Πολυδευκής), one of the Dioscuri, is commonly called Pol lux and the twin-brother of Castor. (Hom. Il. iii. 237; Apollod.
i. 11, § 1; comp. Dioscuri.)

POLYDECUCE, literary. [POL Lux.]

POLYDOR' (Πολυδόρα). 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Theysis. (Hes. Theog. 534.)

2. The mother of Idas and Lycurcus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 151.)

3. A daughter of Danaus and the wife of Peneus, by whom she became the mother of Dryops.
(Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1212; Anton. Lib.
32.)

4. The daughter of Melenger and Cleopatra, was married to Protadius, after whose death she was so much affected by grief that she made away with herself. (Paus. iv. 2, § 5.)

5. A daughter of Pelcus and Polymela, was a sister of Achilles, and married to Spercheus or Borus, by whom she became the mother of Menes-thus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 176; Apollod. iii. 13, § 4; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 321.)

POLYDO' RUS (Πολυδόρος). 1. A son of Cadmus and Harmonia, was king of Thebes, and husband of Nycteis, by whom he became the father of Labdacus. (Hes. Theog. 376; Apollod.
i. 2, § 5, § 5; Paus. ii. 6, § 2, ix. 5, § 1,
&c.; Herod. v. 59.)

2. The youngest among the sons of Priam and Laoteq, was slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xx. 406, &c., xxii. 46, &c.) The tragic poets (see Eurip.
Hec. 3) call him a son of Priam and Hecabe.
When Ilium was on the point of falling into the hands of the Greeks, Priam entrusted his son Polydorus and a large sum of money to Polyphemus or Polyphemus, king of the Thracian Chersonesus;
but after the destruction of Troy, Polyphemus killed Polydorus for the purpose of getting possession of his treasures, and cast his body into the sea. His body was afterwards washed upon the coast, where it was found and recognised by his mother Hecabe, who together with other Trojan captives, took vengeance upon Polyphemus by killing his two children, and putting out his eyes.
(Eurip. Hec. i. c. 1050; Virg. Aen. iii. 49, &c.; Ov. Met. xiii. 432, &c.; 536; Plut. Parall. min.
24.) Another tradition states that Polydorus was entrusted to his sister Iliona, who was married to Polyphemus, and who was to educate him.
She accordingly brought him up as her own son,
while she made every one else believe that her own son Deiphilus or Deipnus was Polydorus. The Greeks determined to destroy the race of Priam with Polyphemus, promising him Electra for his wife, and a large amount of gold, if he would kill Polydorus. Polyphemus was prevailed upon, and he accordingly slew his own son instead of Polydorus. The true Polydorus having afterwards learnt the real Intention of Polyphemus persuaded his wife, by the help of his son, to kill Polyphemus. (Hyg. Fab. 109, 240; Horn. Silv. iv. 3, 61; [Cic. de Nat. l. 44, Acad. ii. 27.) According to a third tradition, Lastly, Polyphemus, who was attacked by the Greeks, delivered up Polydorus to them in order to secure their leaving him in peace. The Greeks wanted to get possession of Helen in his stead, but as the Trojans refused to make the exchange, the Greeks stoned Polydorus to death under the very walls of Troy, and his body was delivered up to Helen.
(Dic. Cret. i. 18, 22, 27.)

3. One of the Epigoni, a son of Hippomedon.
(Paus. ii. 20, § 4; comp. ADRASTUS.) [L. S.]

POLYDO' RUS (Πολυδόρος). 1. The tenth or eleventh king of Sparta in the Eurysthenid line, was the son of Alcmenes and the father of Euryalces, who succeeded him. This king lived in the time of the first Messenian war, and assisted in bringing it to a conclusion, n. c. 724. He was murdered by Polymestor, a Spartan of high family; but his murderers did not keep their promise to him of account of his justice and kindness. They purchased his house of his widow; and the magistrates in future sealed all public documents with his image. Several constitutional changes were introduced by him and his colleague Theopompos; and Plutarch says that Polydorus increased the number of the Spartan losts. It is further stated that Crotona and the Epizephyrian Locri were founded in his reign.
(Herod. vii. 204 ; Paus. iii. 3, §§ 1—3, iii. 11.
10, iii. 12, § 3, iv. 7, § 7, viii. 52, § 1; Plut.
Lyc. 6, 6.)

2. The brother of Jason of Phæae, Tagus of Thessaly, obtained the supreme power along with his brother Polyphæon, on the death of Jason in B.C. 370. But shortly afterwards as the two brothers were on a journey to Larissa, Polydorus died suddenly in the night, assassinated, as it was supposed, by Polyphæon (Xen. Hell. vi. 4. § 33).
Diodorus makes a mistake in stating (xv. 61) that Polydorus was killed by another brother Alexander, who afterwards became tyrant of Phæra; for this Alexander was the nephew, and not the brother of Polydorus and Polyphæon. (Plut. Pelo. c. 29.)

[See Vol. i. p. 124—]

POLYDO' RUS, a distinguished sculptor of Rhodes, was one of the associates of Agesander, in the execution of the celebrated group of the Laocoön; and was not improbably the son of Ages-ander, since there is a tradition that Agesander made the figure of Laocoön in the group, and his sons those of the sons of Laocoön. The age of Polydorus depends of course on the date assigned to the Laocoön: if Thiersch be right he lived at Rome under Titus (Plin. H. N. xxvii. § 4, L. 81); Oppert (Sect.
199). He is also mentioned by Pliny, unless an earlier artist of the same name be intended, among Polyeides (Πολυείδης), a Greek physician who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Celsus* (De Med.

v. Aglaphon, Aristophon, Polygnotus.)

With respect to the time at which Polygnotus lived, Pliny only states indefinitely, that he flourished before the 90th Olympiad, n. c. 420, which is with Pliny an era in the history of the art (Plin.
H. N. xxxv. 9, s. 35: from the context of this passage it would follow that Polygnotus lived after Pausenius, which is certainly incorrect). A much more daring is the opinion of the
Iv. 448, 9.

* The objection against this view, derived from a story told about Euphron, would scarcely deserve attention, were it not for the importance which has been attached to it by such critics as Lessing, Bötttiger, and others of less note. Polygnotus, as we are told, fell in love with Cimon’s sister, Euphron, and placed her portrait among the Trojan women, in his picture in the Pocile (Plin. iv. 35). Now, not only does it appear that Euphron must at this time have been nearly forty years old (not, certainly, a very formidable objection in itself), but it is also related that, only two years later (b. c.
461), Pericles answered an appeal which Euphron made to him on behalf of her brother Cimon, by calling her an old woman! (Plut. Cim. 14, Per.
10.) The whole story is suspicious, for Plutarch tells it again as having happened twenty-two years later, when, certainly, the appellation would be far more appropriate (Per. 23). But, even if the story were true, it is absurd to take the suavem of Pe-ricles as an actual fact, and to rest upon it the argument that Polygnotus must have been in love with Euphron when she was younger, and therefore must have flourished at an earlier period than that at which all other indications, direct and indirect, lead us to place him. Besides, Plutarch only mentions the story of his love for Euphron as a rumour, and he even hints that it was a malicious rumour. The known connection of Polygnotus with Cimon is quite enough to account for his honouring his patron’s sister with a place in one of his great paintings.
ing to this view, Polyclitus came to Athens in Ol. 79. 2, p. c. 463, at which time he must have been already an artist of some reputation, since Cimon thought him worthy of his patronage. He may, therefore, have been between twenty-five and thirty-five years old, or even older; and this agrees perfectly with the slight indications we have of the length of time during which he flourished at Athens. For we learn from Pausanias (i. 22. § 6) that there was a series of paintings by Polyclitus in a chamber attached to the Propylaea of the Acropolis; and although it is possible, as these were probably panel pictures, that they might have been painted before the erection of the building in which they were placed, yet, from the description of Pausanias, and from all that we know of the usual practice in the decoration of public buildings at this period, it is far more probable that they were painted expressly for the building. Now the Propylaea were commenced in B.C. 437, and completed in B.C. 432, so that the age of Polyclitus is brought down almost to the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Again, in the Gorgias of Plato, "Aristophon, the son of Aglaophon, and his brother," are referred to in a way which implies that they were two of the most distinguished painters then living (Gorg. p. 448, b., comp. Schol.*). Now the probable date of the Gorgias is about Ol. 88. 2, p. c. 427—426, which is within six years of the date assigned by Pliny as that before which Polyclitus flourished. Hence we may conclude that the period during which Polyclitus lived at Athens, was from B.C. 463 to about 426; and assuming his age, at his death, to have been about 65, the date of his birth would just about coincide with that of the battle of Marathon; or he may have been somewhat older, as we can hardly suppose him to have been much less than thirty at the time of his migration to Athens. At all events, his birth may be safely placed very near the beginning of the fifth century B.C. The period of his greatest artistic activity at Athens seems to have been that which elapsed from his removal to Athens (B.C. 463) to the death of Cimon (B.C. 449), who employed him in the pictorial decoration of the public buildings with which he began to adorn the city, such as the temple of Theseus, the Anacoeum, and the Pocell. The reason why we have no mention of him in connection with the still more magnificent works which were erected in the subsequent period, under the administration of Pericles and the superintendence of Pheidias, is probably because he had left Athens during this period, with the other artists who had undertaken the decoration of the buildings connected with the great temple at Delphi; for there we know that some of his greatest works were executed. It appears, however, from the passage of Pausanias already cited, that he returned to Athens about B.C. 435, to execute his paintings in the Propylaea. He also worked at Plataeae and at Thespiae (see below).

The above considerations respecting the date of Polyclitus lead to the very interesting result, that he was exactly contemporaneous with Pheidias, having been born about the same time, having survived him only a few years, and having commenced his artistic career about the same period; for, not to insist on the probability that Pheidias had some share in the works at the temple of Theseus, we know that both artists worked at about the same time for the temple of Athena Areia at Plataeae, where Polyclitus (in conjunction with Omatas) painted the walls of the portico, and Pheidias made the acrolith statue of the goddess: the date of these works may be assumed to have been about B.C. 460, or a little later. Again, about the end of their career, we find, at the Propylaea, the paintings of Polyclitus decorating the latest edifices which were erected under the superintendence of Pheidias. Thus, it appears that the causes which produced that sudden advance in the formative art of statuary, of which Pheidias was the leader, produced also a similar advance in the representative art of painting, as practised by Polyclitus. The periods of the essential development of each art were identical, under the effect of the same influences. What those influences were, has been very fully explained under Pheidias. But, it may be said, from all that we know of the style of Polyclitus, the advance of the one art does not seem to have corresponded precisely to that of the other, for Pheidias brought his art to perfection; but no one supposes that the works of Polyclitus exhibited the art of painting in any thing like perfection. This has, in fact, been aduced by eminent archaeologists, such as Böttiger, as a reason for placing Polyclitus about ten years earlier. The reply is, that the objection rests on a confusion between too very different things, the art of painting, as developed by all the accessory refinements and illusions of perspective and foreshortening, elaborate and dramatic composition, varied effects of light and shade, and great diversities of tone and colouring, and, on the other hand, the mere representation on a flat surface, with the addition of colours, of figures similar to those which the statuary produces in their actual form in a solid substance: in one word, it is a confusion between the art of Apelles and the art of Polyclitus, which differed even more from one another than the latter did from such sculptures as the bas-reliefs of Phigaleia or the Parthenon. The painting of Polyclitus was essentially stuccoque; and this sort of painting it is probable that he brought nearly, if not quite, to perfection, by the ideal expression, the accurate drawing, and the improved colouring which characterised his works, though he made no attempt to avail himself of the higher accessories of the art, the discovery of which was reserved for a later period. The difference is clearly indicated by Cicero, when he says that Polyclitus, and Timanteus, and other artists who used but few colours, were admired for their forms and outlines, but that in Echion, Nicomachus, Protagenes, and Apelles, every thing had reached perfection. (Brut. 10.)

* It is, of course, almost useless to speculate on the reason why the same of Polyclitus is not specified. It may have been on account of his celebrity; or it may have been that he was growing old, and that his brother Aristophon was, just at the time, more before the public eye.

So fully did the ancients recognise the position of Polyclitus as the head of this perfected style of stuccoque painting, that Theophrastus ascribed to him the invention of the whole art. (Plin. H. N. vii. 56. s. 57.) In how far this statement is incorrect, and what steps had been taken in the art before the time of Polyclitus, may be seen in the article Painting in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities.

The improvements which Polygnotus effected in painting are described by Pliny very briefly and unsatisfactorily. (H.N. xxxv. 5. p. 35.) Among these improvements were, opening the mouth, showing the teeth, and varying the expression of the countenance from its ancient stiffness. He was the first who painted women with brilliant (or transparent) drapery (lucida veste), and with variegated head-dresses (mavis versicoloribus); and, generally, he was the first who contributed much to the advancement of painting (plurimumque picturae primus contulit). Lucian also selects his figures as models of excellence for the beauty of the eye-brows, the blush upon the cheeks (as in his Cassandra in the Lesche at Delphi), and the gracefulness of the draperies. (De Imag. 7, vol. ii. p. 465.) These statements of Pliny amount to saying that Polygnotus gave great expression to both face and figure, and great elegance and variety to the drapery. How these matters were treated before his time we may judge from many of the ancient vases. "Could the animals, which denote his expression of power, not possess and emotion only, but also ideal character. (Polit. viii. 5. p. 267, ed. Göttling, Poét. vi. 5, ed. Herm., 11, ed. Ritter.) In the second of these passages he contrasts him with Zeus, whose painting, he says, has no ςόν at all; and his meaning is further shown by what he says on the subject, of which these allusions to painting are in illustration, namely ςόν in poetry. "Tragedy," he says, "could not without action, but it could without ideal characters (ςόνοι); for the tragedies of most of the recent poets are without character (ςόνοι), and, in general, there are many poets of this kind;" words thoroughly exemplified in some of the tragedies of Euripides, and in the account we have of others of the later tragedians and dithyrambic poets, where the expression of ideal character is sacrificed to the exhibition of mere emotion, to the energy and complication of dramatic action, or even to lower sources of interest. In another well-known passage, which forms a sort of landmark in the history of art (Polit. 2), he says: "But since those who imitate, imitate men in action, and it is necessary that these be either good or bad (for characters, ςόνη, almost always follow these distinctions alone: for all men differ in their characters by vice and virtue), they imitate persons either better than the divine (ςόνη μεγαλώτατην) or worse, or such as men really are, just as the painters do: for Polygnotus represented men as better than they; Pauson worse than they are; and Dionysius like ordinary men." And so, in the passage respecting ςόνη, first quoted from the Politic (where the whole context deserves careful reading), he says, "that the young ought not to study the works of Pauson, but those of Polygnotus, and whoever else of the painters or statuaries is ethical." In the Poetic, Aristotle goes on to explain his distinction by reference to various imitative arts, and especially poetry, in which, he says, "Homer represented characters better than ordinary men, but Cleophaes like ordinary men, but Hegemon, who first composed parodies, and Niochares, the author of the Delias, worse;:" he then quotes Timothues and Philoxenus as examples of the same thing in the dithyramb, and adds the very important remark that "this is the very difference which makes the distinction between tragedy and comedy; for the one purposes to imitate men worse, but the other better, than men as they now actually are." (Comp. Hermann's Notes, and Lessing's Hambrungsche Dramaturgie.) The parallel which Aristotle thus draws between Polygnotus and Homer (and the poets of Homer's spirit) seems, from all we know of Polygnotus, to be an exact illustration, both of his subjects and of his mode of treating them. It should never be forgotten that Grecian art was founded upon Grecian poetry, and took from it both its subjects and its spirit. Phelidas and Polygnotus were the Homers of their respective arts; in their hands the personages and the subjects of the old mythology, and they treated them in an epic spirit, while Lysippus and Apelles were essentially dramatico; the former artists strove to express character and repose, the latter action and emotion; the former exhibited ideal personages, the latter real ones; the men of the former are godlike, the gods of the latter are ordinary men; Phelidas derived the image of his Zeus from the sublimest verses of Homer, Apelles painted his Venus from a courtezan, and Zeus could find no higher model for the queen of Olympus than a selection from real and living beauties. The limits of this article do not permit any further exposition of this essential and fundamental point of aesthetic science. We must not, however, omit to state a fact, in illustration of the parallel between Homer and Polygnotus, namely, that the painter's works in the Lesche of Delphi were called Ηηδις and Οδύσσεια of Polygnotus; though it must be admitted that most of those who used that phrase were thinking of the subjects of the paintings, and little or nothing of their character, and that very few had any notion of the sense in which Polygnotus is placed beside Homer by the great philosopher, who is rightly regarded as the father of aesthetic science. The subjects of the pictures of Polygnotus were almost invariably taken from Homer and the other poets of the epic cycle.

With respect to the more technical and mechanical improvements which Polygnotus introduced into painting, the statement of Pliny concerning his female draperies is admirably illustrated by Büttiger, to whose section on Polygnotus, in his Ideen zur Geschichte der Architektur der Mzchen, we here refer once for all, as one of the chief authorities for the present subject, and one of the most valuable contributions to the history of ancient art. Büttiger (pp. 263—265) remarks that the descriptions of Polygnotus's paintings prove that female figures were introduced by him far more freely than we have any reason to suppose them to have appeared in earlier works of art; and that he thus gained the opportunity of enlivening his pictures with the varied and brilliant
There is one passage of Pliny, from which it would appear that Polygnotus excelled in statuary as well as painting, though none of his works in that department were preserved. (Plin. H.N. xxxiv. 8, s. 19, § 25, adopting the reading of the Bamberg MS., Polygnotus, idem pictor e nobilissimis.) Perhaps this fact may contribute to the explanation of two obscure epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. pp. 279, 440; see Jacobs's Notes: Onwarde, Polyclitus.)

His chief contemporaries, besides the members of his own family, already mentioned, were Micon, Panarkus, the brother or nephew of Pheidias, Onatas of Aegina, Dionysius of Colophon, Timagoras of Chalcis, and Agatharchus the scenepainter. No disciples of his are mentioned, although we may almost assume that he instructed his brother Aristophon and his nephew Aglaiophon; but we are told by Aelian (V.H. iv. 3), that Dionysius closely imitated his style. (But see Aristot. t. c. and Plut. Themis. 2.)

The Works of Polygnotus, as mentioned by Pliny (H.N. xxxv. 5. s. 35), include paintings in the temple at Delphi, in the portico called Poecile at Athens, those at Thespiae already mentioned, and a panel picture, which was placed in the portico in front of Pompey's Curia, at Rome. Pliny and Harpocration both state that he executed his works at Athens gratuitously, and the former says that, on this account, he was more highly esteemed than Myron, who painted for pay; the latter, that it was for this service that he obtained the citizenship of Athens. We may infer that he displayed the same liberality at Delphi, especially as Pliny tells us that the Amphictyons decreed him "hospitalis gratiae," that is, the ποίευτης, in all the states of Greece. (Böttiger, pp. 271, 272.) To the above works must be added, on other authorities, his paintings in the temple of Theseus, in the Anaeicum, and the chamber of the Propylaeum, at Athens, and those in the temple of Athena Areia at Plateae. The detailed description of these works, and the full discussion of the questions which arise respecting their composition, would far exceed our limits. We have, therefore, preferred to occupy the space with the more important subjects of the time and artistic character of Polygnotus; and we shall now describe his works briefly, referring to the authorities in which full details will be found. We follow a chronological arrangement, so far as it can be made out with any probability.

1. Paintings in the Temple of Theseus at Athens.

— It is true that the only authority for supposing him to have painted here at all is a conjectural emendation of a passage of Harpocration; but the conjecture is so simple, and agrees so well with what we know of the artist's history, and the only interpretation of the text as it stands is so forced, that we can hardly hesitate to admit the correction. Harpocration, followed by Suidas and Photius, says (s. v.) that Polygnotus obtained the citizenship of Athens, either because he painted the Stoa Poecile gratuitously, or, as others say, the pictures εν τῷ θανάτῳ τοῦ Αρείου. Now, we know that the Anaeicum was the temple of the Dioscuri, but what was the Theseaom? Böttiger (p. 270) replies, the public treasury in the Opisthodomus of the temple of Athena Polias. The objection, that it is strange that Polygnotus should have been employed to decorate the secret chamber of the temple, Böttiger endeavours to obviate by referring to the paintings of Evainthes in the opisthodomus of the temple of Jupiter Casius, mentioned by Achilles Tatius (iii. 6), not a very good authority (see Evainthes). It may also be objected that the name of Polygnotus is not mentioned in the extant inscription respecting the works of this temple. But it is perhaps enough to say that the conjecture is too violent to be admitted by itself; especially when it is contrasted with the explanation of Hesiodus, who, for ev τῷ ὕπαινῳ would ἐν τῷ ὕπαινῳ ἱερό. Now, the temple of Theseus was built during the administration of Cimon, after the translation of the hero's remains from Scyros to Athens in B.C. 468. If, therefore, as is almost certain, Cimon brought Polygnotus with him from Thasos in B.C. 463, it would almost certainly be partly with a view to the decoration of this very temple. PASAUSSAS, indeed, in his description of the temple (i. 17, § 2), ascribes the paintings in it to Micon, but this is rather a confirmation of the argument than otherwise, for these two artists more than once assisted in decorating the same building. It is an obvious conjecture, from a comparison of the dates, that Micon was already employed upon the painting of the temple before the arrival of Polygnotus, who was then appointed to assist him. [Comp. Bottiger, pp. 289—290.]

2. Paintings in the Stoa Poecile at Athens.—Among the works which Cimon undertook for the improvement of the city, after the final termination of the Persian wars, the spoils of which furnished him with the means, one of the first was the decoration of the places of public resort, such as the Agora and the Academy, the former of which he planted with plane-trees (Plut. Cim. 3). He also enlarged and improved the portico which ran along one side of the Agora, and which was called at first the Portico of Peisianax (ἡ Πεισιανακεσ στόα), but afterwards received the name of the Poecile or Painted Porico (ἡ τουθαλη στόα), from the paintings with which it was decorated. (Paus. l. 15; Müller, Phid. 6; Bottiger, p. 275.) Cimon executed this work soon after his return from Thasos (Plut. l. e), and employed Polygnotus and Micon to decorate the portico with those paintings, from which it afterwards obtained its name. The portico itself was a long colonnade, formed by a row of columns on one side and a wall on the other; and against this wall were placed the paintings, which were on panels. These paintings, as they appeared in the time of Pausanias, represented four subjects: — (1.) The battle of Oenoæ, fought between the Athenians and Lacedaemonians, the painter of which was unknown; (2.) The battle of Theseus and the Athenians with the Amazons, by Micon; (3.) The Greeks, after the taking of Troy, assembling to judge the case of Cassandra's violation by Ajax; this painting was by Polygnotus; (4.) The battle of Marathon, by Panæenus: also ascribed to Micon and to Polygnotus, who may have assisted in the work. (Paus. l. c.; Bottiger, pp. 274—290; Micon, Panæenus.) From the description of Pausanias, it would seem that, in the picture of Polygnotus, the Greek chieftains, sitting in judgment, formed the centre of the composition. With the Greek army grouped on the one side, and, on the other, the Trojan captives, among whom Cassandra was conspicuous. Bottiger supposes that, in his treatment of the subject, the artist followed the Ἴδην Πέφραν of the cyclic poet Arctius. Bottiger also supposes that there were two or three panels representing different stages of the event; a supposition for which there does not seem to be sufficient reason. The subject, as representing the first great victory of the united Greeks, was appropriately connected with the celebration of the Olympic festival. Pausanias says, "Among the Athenians, there was perhaps more ancient than the time of Cimon, who seems to have repaired and beautified it. Polygnotus painted the marriage of the daughters of Leucippus, as connected with the mythology of the Dionysus (Πολυγνώτου μὲν ἔκτοιτα ἐκ αὐτῶν ὑγραφὸν γάμον τῶν Τύχωντος τῶν Λευκίππον, Paus. i. 18. § 1), and Micon painted the Argonautic expedition. The subject of Polygnotus was evidently that favourite subject of ancient poetry and art, the rape of Phoebe and Hilara on their marriage-day, by Castor and Pollux: the ancient form of the legend, which was followed by Polygnotus, is supposed by Bottiger to have been contained in the cyclic poem entitled Σηγιαρία, which related to the events before the Ilian. We still possess, in bas-reliefs on ancient sarcophagi, three if not four representations of the story, which we may safely assume to have been derived from the picture of Polygnotus, and which strikingly display that uniform symmetry which we know to have been one characteristic of his works, in contradistinction to the more natural grouping of a later period. In modern times, Rubens has painted the story of Phoebe and Hilara in a picture, now at Munich, which would doubtless present a most interesting contrast to the treatment of the same subject by Polygnotus, if we had but the opportunity of comparing them. The sculptures also, which are presumed to have been taken after the painting of Polygnotus, have furnished David with some ideas for his Rape of the Sabine women. (Bottiger, pp. 291—295.)

4. In the temple of Athena Areia at Plataneus, Polygnotus and Onatas painted the walls of the front portico (that is, probably, the wall on each side of the principal entrance); Polygnotus represented Ulysses just after he had slain the suitors. (Paus. ix. 4. § 1; Hom. Od. xxiii.)

5. His paintings on the walls of the temple of Theseus have been already mentioned. Nothing is known of their subject.

6. Paintings in the Lecha of the Cukidiæ at Delphi.—Some of the same causes which led to the sudden development of art at Athens, in the age following that of the Persian wars, gave a similar impulse to its advancement about the same time in other places, especially at those two centres of the Greek union and religion, Olympia and Delphi. The great works at the former place have been spoken of under Pheidias; those at the latter appear to have been executed not only about the same time (or rather, perhaps, a little earlier), but also by Athenian artists chiefly. We know, for example, that the statues in the pediments of the temple at Delphi were made by Praxias of Athens, the disciple of Calamis, and finished, after his death, by Androsthenes, the disciple of Eceldamus (Paus. x. 10. § 33). These artists must have been contemporary with Pheidias and Polygnotus; and there are some other indications of the employment of Athenian artists at Delphi about the same period (Müller, Phid. p. 28, n. y.).
Taking, then, these facts in connection with the absence of any mention of Polygnotus's having been engaged on the great works of Pericles and Pheidias (except the Propylaea, at a later period), it may fairly be supposed that, after the death of his patron, Cimon, he was glad to accept the invitation, which the fame of his works at Athens caused him to receive, to unite with other Athenian artists in the decoration of the temple at Delphi. The people who gave him the commission were the Cnidians. It was customary for the different Greek cities to show their piety and patriotism, not only by enriching the temple at Delphi with valuable gifts, but by embellishing its precincts with edifices, chiefly treasuries to contain their gifts. Among the rest, the Cnidians had built at Delphi both a treasury, and one of those enclosed courts, or halls, which were called lēstai (places for conversation), which existed in considerable numbers in various Greek cities, and which were especially attached to the temples of Apollo. The most famous of all of them was this Lesche of the Cnidians at Delphi, which seems to have been a quadrangular or oblong court or peristyle, surrounded by colonnades, very much like our cloisters. It was the walls of the two principal colonnades of this building (those on the right and left of a person entering) that Polygnotus employed by the Cnidians to paint; and it is very interesting to observe the parallel between the most renowned works of the early stages of the art in ancient Greece and modern Italy,—the paintings of Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi, and those ascribed to Andrea Voragna, in the Campo Santo at Pisa.

Polygnotus took his subjects from the whole cycle of the epic poetry which described the wars of Troy, and the return of the Greek chieftains. There were two paintings, or rather series of paintings; the one upon the wall on the right hand; the other opposite to this, upon the wall on the left hand. The former represented, according to Pausanias (x. 25 § 2), the taking of Troy, and the Grecian fleet loosing from the shores of Ilium to return home; the latter, the descent of Ulysses into the lower world, which subject seems to have been treated with especial reference to the mysteries. In both pictures the figures seem to have been arranged in successive groups, and the groups, again, in two or more lines above each other, without any attempt at perspective, and with names affixed to the several figures. To the picture on the right hand was affixed the following epigram, which was ascribed to Simonides:—

Γράφει Πολύγνωτος, Θάδας γένος, Ἀγαλεφώτως τίδος, περιβλέπων τ' ἤλιον ἀκρότωλιν.

Pausanias devotes seven chapters to the description of these paintings (x. 25—31); from which, however, we gain little more than a catalogue of names. The numerous and difficult questions which arise, respecting the succession and grouping of the figures, the manner in which each of them was represented, the aesthetic and symbolic significations of the pictures, and so forth, have furnished a wide field of discussion for artists and archaeologists. The most important works upon the subject are the following:—Diderot, Correspond. vol. iii. pp. 270, & ed. 1831; Riepenhausen, F. et J., Peintures de Polygnoté à Delphes, dessinées et gravées d'après la Descr. de Pausanias, 1826, 1829, comp. Göttling, Gesch. d. Anz. 1827, p. 1399; Göthe, Werke, vol. xlv. pp. 97, f., old ed., vol. xxxi. p. 118, ed. 1840; Böttiger, pp. 296, f.; Otto Jahn, Die Gemälde des Polygnotos in der Lesche zu Delphi, Kieli, 1841; and, concerning the general subject of the Greek representations of the lower world, on ancient vases, compared with the description of Polygnotus's second picture, see Gerhard's Archäologische Zeitungs, 1843, 1844, Nos. xi.—xv. and Plates 11—15.

7. In the chamber adjoining to the Pronaos of the Aeropoleis were probably the last of his great works. The subjects were all from Homer and the epic cycle (Paus. i. 22; Böttiger, pp. 290, 291).

8. The panel-picture mentioned by Pliney as being at Rome in his time, shows that Polygnotus sometimes painted single figures, but Pliney's description of the work is perfectly unintelligible.

"in qua dubitatur ascendentem cum ellepeo pinxerit, an descendenter." (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35.)

P. S.

POLYGONUS (Πολύγωνος), a son of Proteus, a grandson of Poseidon and brother of Teleogous.

The two brothers were killed by Hercules at Taron, when they challenged him to a contest in wrestling. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9.)

[LS.]

POLYHYMNIA. [Πολυμηνία.] POLYIDUS (Πολύδος). 1. A son of Coeranus, a grandson of Abas and a great-grandson of Melampus. He was, like his ancestor, a famous soothsayer at Corinth, and is described as the father of Enchenor, Astyage and Manto. (Pind. Ol. xiii. 104; Hom. II. xiii. 656, &c.; Paus. i. 43. § 4; Apollod. iii. 3. § 1.) When Alcaeus had murdered his own son Callipolis at Megara, he was purified by Polydus, who erected at Megara a sanctuary to Dianysus, and a statue of the god, which was covered all over except the face. (Paus., Apollod. II. ii. cc.; Hygin. Fab. 136.)

2. A son of the Trojan Eurydamas, and a brother of Abas, was slain by Diomedes. (Hom. Il. v. 148.)

[LS.]

POLYIDUS (Πολύδος, Πολύδος, Πολύδας, Πολυεδῆς), all these forms occur, but the most usual is Πολύδος), a dithyrambic poet of the most flourishing period of the later Athenian dithyramb, and also skilful as a painter, was contemporary with Philexenus, Timotheus, and Telesias, about OL. 91, B.C. 449 (Diod. xiv. 46). The notices of him are very scanty; but he seems to have been esteemed almost as highly as Timotheus, whom indeed one of his pupils, Philotas, once conquered. It is related that, as Polydus was boasting of this victory, Statricamus, the musician, rebuked him by saying, "I wonder you do not understand that you make ψηφισματα, but Timotheus νόμους," an untranslatable witicism, intimating that Timotheus had been conquered by the voice of the people, and not by the merit of his opponent. (Ath. vili. p. 532, b.) It seems from a passage of Plutarch (De Mus. 21, p. 1138, b.), that Polydus went beyond Timotheus in those intricate variations, for the introduction of which the musicians of this period had so much been attracted. A remarkable testimony to his popularity throughout Greece is still extant in the form of a decree of the Cnossians, commending Meneceus of Teos for having played on the harp at Cnossus "after the manner of Timotheos and Polydus and the ancient Cretan poets, as becomes an accomplished man." (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. Graec. vol. ii. p. 641, No. 3053.)
POLYMELA.

One of his pieces was entitled "Atalas, and in it he represented Atlas as a Libyan shepherd, whom Perseus turned into stone by showing him the Gorgon's head; a remarkable example of the total want of ideal art, and of any poetical conception of the early mythology, which characterised the dithyrambic poets of that period. (Tzetzes, Schol. ad Lyophr. 679; Xen. Hellad. p. 152. 18; Elym. Mag. p. 104. 20; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 259. n.)

There are also two remarkable references in the Poetic (16, 17) of Aristotle to the Iphigenia of Polyidus, where Aristotle is mentioning examples of Æsop's fables. But here it seems from the context that a tragic poet is referred to; besides which it is improbable, Müller argues, that Aristotle would speak of the celebrated dithyrambic poet, as he does in the first of these passages, by the name of Poliœnœus του σοφατοῦ. On the other hand, there is the critical canon, which forbids us to assume an unknown person of the same name as one well known, if any other probable explanation can be suggested. Perhaps, in this case, the best solution of the difficulty is the conjecture of Welcker, that Polyidus was a sophist, who took a pride in cultivating different branches of art and literature, and who thus was at once a painter, a dithyrambic poet, and a tragedian. There are three iambic trimeter lines in Stobaeus (Serim. xxiii.) which appear at first sight to settle the point as to there being a tragic poet of this name; but it is easily shown that these lines are a quotation, not from a poet named Polyidus, but from the Polyidus of Euripides. (Müller, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. p. 287, or vol. ii. p. 59, Eng. trans.; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 610, fol.; Bode, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 323, vol. iii. pt. 1, p. 562; Schmidt, Diatrib. in Dithyranb. pp. 121—124; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. pp. 318—322; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 1043, 1044; Bartsch, de Chaeremon, p. 14; Bernhardy, Grundriss d. Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 554, 555.)

POLYDUS, artists. 1. Besides the painter and dithyrambic poet (see above), Vitruvius mentions the two following artists of this name, who may, however, very possibly have been one and the same person, since military engineers were often also architects.

2. Of Thessaly, a military engineer, who made improvements in the covered battering-ram (testudo ariedaia) during Philip's siege of Byzantium, b. c. 340. His pupils were Diades and Chaeremon, who served in the campaigns of Alexander. (Vitr. x. 19. s. 13. § 3. Schneider.)

POLYME'DE (Πολυμήδη), a daughter of Autolycus, was married to Aeson, and by him became the mother of Jason. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175.) Apollonius Rhodius (i. 238) calls her Alcimede. (Comp. Iason.)

POLYME'LA (Πολυμήλη). 1. A daughter of Peleus, and the wife of Menoeceus, by whom she became the mother of Patroclos. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8.) In some traditions she is called Philomela. (Patroclos.)

2. A daughter of Phylas, was married to Echecles, but became by Hermes the mother of Eudorus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 160, &c.)

POLYPHE.'MON (Πολυφήμων), the name of three mythical personages. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 305; Apollod. iii. 16. § 2; Paus. i. 38. § 5.)

3. A daughter of Acuelus, was beloved by Odysseus, but afterwards married her brother Diros. (Parthen. Erot. 2.) [L. S.]

POLYMESTOR or POLYMNESTOR. [POLYDORUS.]

POLYMNÆSTUS (Πολύμναστος), the father of Battus, the founder of Cyrene. [Battus, p. 476, a.]

POLYMNÆSTUS, or POLYMNÆSTUS (Πολύμναστος), the son of Meles of Colophon, was an epic, elegiac, and lyric poet, and a musician. He flourished not long after Thalæs, in honour of whom he made a poem at the request of the Spartan court. He was the brother of the same, who mentioned him (Plut. Muses. p. 1133, a.) It seems, therefore, that he was in part contemporaneous with both these poets, and the period during which he flourished may be roughly stated at b. c. 675—644. He belongs to the school of Dorian music, which flourished at this time at Sparta, where he carried on the improvements of Thalæs. He cultivated the orain names, and invented a new kind of auletic name, which was named after him, Polymnæstos (Plut. de Mus. pp. 1132—1135; Suid. s. c.; Hezych. s. v. Πολύμναστος θεωρ.). The Attic comedians attacked his poems for their erotic character. (Aristoph. Equit. 1287; Cratinus, ap. Schol. ibid.) As an elegiac poet, he may be regarded as the predecessor of his fellow-countryman, Mimnermus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 135; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. pt. 1, passim; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 291, 292, et alibi; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. a. d. 655, 657, 644, and p. 365.)

POLYMNÆUS, a statuary, whose name was first made known by the discovery of an inscription on a base in the Acropolis at Athens, in 1840, by Ross, who has thus restored it, [ΠΟΛΥΜΝΗΣΤΟΣ ΚΕΝ'ΧΡΑΙΜΕΙ] ΕΠΟΙΗΣΑΝ. From the form of the letters, Ross supposes the inscription to be of about the time of Praxiteles or Lyssippus. The only reason for the restoration of the name of the second of these artists, is the mention in Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 27) of a statuary named Cenchreus, among those who made comedians and athletes. (Racoul-Rochelet, Lettre à M. Selcarn, p. 390.)

POLYNÆIA or POLYNY'NIA (Πολυνία), a daughter of Zeus, and one of the nine Muses. She presided over lyric poetry, and was believed to have invented the lyre. (Hes. Thtg. 72; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1.) By Oenomaus she became the mother of Orpheus. (Schol. [L. c. i. 23.) In works of art she was usually represented in a pensive attitude. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 209; comp. Musae.)

POLYNÆICES, the son of Oucipus and Iocaste, and brother of Eteocles and Antigone. (Hom. Il. iv. 377; Adrastus.) [L. S.]

POLYPHANTAS (Πολυφάντας), a general in the service of Philip V. king of Macedonia, during the war against the Romans and Aetolians. In b. c. 208 he was left together with Minippus in the Peloponnesse to support the Achaeans with a force of 2500 men; and the following year (b. c. 207) was sent with a small force to the assistance of the Boeotians and Phocians. (Liv. xxviii. 32, xxix. 4; Polyb. x. 43.) (B. H. 81.)

POLYP'EMON (Πολυμήδων), the name of three mythical personages. (Hom. Od. xxiv. 305; Apollod. iii. 16. § 2; Paus. i. 38. § 5.) [L. S.]
POLYPHEMUS

POLYPHEMUS (Πολύφημος). 1. The celebrated Cyclops in the island of Thrinacia, was a son of Poseidon, and the nymph Thoosa. For an account of him see the article CYCLOPS.

2. A son of Eneas or Poseidon and Hippea, was one of the Lapithae at Larissa in Thessaly. He was married to Laonome, a sister of Hercules, with whom he was connected by friendship. He was also one of the Argonauts, but being left behind by them in Mysia, he founded Cios, and fell against the Chalybes. (Hom. Il. i. 264; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 40, 1241; iv. 1470; Val. Flacc. i. 457; Apollod. i. 9, §§ 16, 19.) [L.S.]

POLYPHRON (Πολύφρων), the brother of Jason of Phereas, Tagus of Thessaly, succeeded to the supreme power along with his brother Polydorus on the death of Jason, in B.C. 370. Shortly afterwards he murdered Polydorus [POLYDORUS], and thus became sole Tagus. He exercised his power with great cruelty, and converted his city into a tyranny. He murdered Polydamus of Pharsalus [POLYDAMAS], but was murdered in his turn, B.C. 303, by his nephew Alexander, who proved, however, a still greater tyrant. [ALEXANDER OF PHERAE.] (Xen. Hell. vi. 4. §§ 33, 34; Plut. Polyp. c. 29.)

POLYPOTÉS (Πολυπότης). 1. A son of Apollo and Pithia. (Apollod. i. 7. § 6; comp. AETOLUS.)

2. A son of Peirithous and Hippodameia, was one of the Lapithae, who joined the Greeks in the Trojan war, commanding the men of Argiss, Gyrtone, Orthe, Elone and Olooson. (Hom. Il. ii. 738, &c., comp. vi. 29, xili. 129.) At the funeral games of Patroclus, he gained the victory in throwing the iron ball. (Il. xxiii. 836, &c.) After the fall of Troy, Polypoetes and Leontes are said to have founded the town of Aspendus in Pamphylia. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 334.) [L.S.]

POLYSPERCHON (Πολύσπερχων). 1. Son of Simmias, a Macedonian of the province of Stympheae, and a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander the Great. Of his earlier services we know nothing, but it is certain that he was already a veteran and experienced warrior in B.C. 332, when he was appointed to succeed Ptolemy the son of Seleucus in the command of one of the divisions of the phalanx. We afterwards find him occupying the same post in the battle of Arbela, and lending the weight of his authority and experience to support the proposition of Parmenion before the action to attack the Persian camp by night. (Arr. Anab. iv. 12, iii. 11; Diod. xvi. 57; Curt. iv. 13. §§ 7, 28, who inaccurately calls him "Dux peregrini militis.") In the subsequent campaigns in the upper provinces of Asia and India, he bore an important part, and his name is frequently mentioned. Thus we find him associated with Coenus and Philotas at the passage of the Pyliæ Persici, and afterwards detached under Craterus against the revolted chiefs in Parnaeticæ, accompanying Alexander on his expedition against the Assagæi, and reducing with his own division only the strong fortress of Nora. His name occurs again at the passage of the Hydaspe, as well as in the descent of that river, on both which occasions he served under Craterus; and in B.C. 323 he was once more associated with that general as second in command of the army of invaders and veterans, which the latter was appointed to conduct home to Macedonia. (Arr.

Anab. iv. 16, 22, 25, v. 11, 18, vi. 5, vii. 12; Curt. v. 4. § 20, viii. 5. §§ 2, 11, § 1; Justin. xii. 10, 12.)

In consequence of his absence from Babylon on this service at the time of Alexander's death, he appears to have been passed over in the arrangements which followed that event, nor do we find any mention of his name for some time afterwards, but it seems certain that he must have returned with Craterus to Europe, and probably took part with him and Antipater in the Laman war. In B.C. 321, when the disensions between Antipater and Perdiccas had broken out into actual hostilities, and the former was preparing to follow Craterus into Asia, he entrusted to Polysperchon the chief command in Macedonia and Greece during his absence. The veteran general proved himself worthy of the charge; he repulsed the Aeolians who had invaded Thessaly, and cut to pieces a Macedonian force under Polycles, defeated Menon of Pharsalus, and recovered the whole of Thessaly. (Diod. xviii. 39; Justin. xiii. 6.) Though we do not learn that he obtained any reward for these services during the lifetime of Antipater, it is evident that he enjoyed the highest place in the confidence of the regent, of which the latter gave a striking proof on his deathbed, B.C. 319, by appointing Polysperchon to succeed him as regent and guardian of the king, while he assigned to his own son Cassander the subordinate station of Chiliaris (Ib. ib. 48.)

Polysperchon was at this time one of the oldest of the surviving generals of Alexander, and enjoyed in consequence the highest favour and popularity among the Macedonians; but he was aware that both Cassander and Antigonus were jealous of his elevation, and were beginning to form secret designs for the overthrow of his power. In order to strengthen himself against them he now made overtures to Olympias, who had been driven from Macedonia by Antipater, as well as to Eumenes, not knowing that he had obtained any reward for these services during the lifetime of Antipater. Nor were these measures unsuccessful: Olympias, though she still remained in Epeirus, lent all the support of her name and influence to Polysperchon, while Eumenes, who had escaped from his mountain fastness at Nora, and put himself at the head of the Arganaspids, prepared to contend with Antigonus for the possession of Asia. While his most formidable rival was thus occupied in the East, it remained for Polysperchon himself to contend with Cassander in Greece. The restoration of the democracy at Athens had attached that city to the cause of the regent, but Nicander held possession of the fortresses of Munychia and the Peirineus for Cassander, and refused to give them up notwithstanding the repeated orders of Olympias. Hereupon Polysperchon sent forward an army under his son Alexander into Attica, while he himself followed with the royal family. They had already advanced into Phocis when they were met by deputies from Athens, as well as by Phocion and others of the oligarchical party who had fled from the city. Both parties obtained a public hearing in the presence of the king, which ended in Phocion and his companions being given up to the opposite party by the express order of Polysperchon, and sent to Athens to undergo the form of a trial. (Diod. xvii. 49, 54—58, 62, 64—66; Plut. Phoc. 31—34. For a more detailed account of these transactions see Phocion.)

By the destruction of Phocion and his friends, the regent hoped to have secured the adherence of the Athenians; but he was still in Phocis with the king (n. c. 318), Cassander himself unexpectedly arrived in Attica with a considerable fleet and army, and established himself in the Peiraeus. Hereupon Polysperchon advanced into Attica and laid siege to the Peiraeus, but finding that he made little progress, he left his son Alexander to continue the blockade, while he himself advanced into the Peloponnesse with a large army. Here he at first met with little opposition; almost all the cities obeyed his mandates and expelled or put to death the leaders of their respective oligarchies: Megalopolis alone refused submission, and was immediately besieged by the regent himself with his whole army. Polysperchon had apparently expected an easy victory, but the valour of the citizens frustrated his calculations; all his attacks were repulsed, and after some time he found himself compelled to raise the siege and withdraw from the Peloponnesse. Shortly afterwards his admiral Cletus, who had been despatched with a fleet to the Hellespont, was totally defeated by that of Cassander under Nicomai, and his forces utterly destroyed. (Diod. xviii. 68—72.)

These reverses quickly produced an unfavourable turn in the disposition of the Greek states towards Polysperchon: and Athens in particular again abandoned his alliance for that of Cassander, who established an oligarchical government in the city under the presidency of Demetrius of Phalerus. (Id. vi. 74, 75.) At the same time Euridyce, the active and intriguing wife of the unhappy king Arrhidaeus, conceived the project of throwing off the yoke of the regent, and concluded an alliance with Cassander, while she herself assembled an army with which she obtained for a time the complete possession of Macedonia. But in the spring of 317 Polysperchon having united his forces with those of Aeacides king of Epirus who invaded Macedonia, accompanied by Olympias, whose presence alone quickly determined the contest. [OLYMPIA'.] During the subsequent events Polysperchon plays but a subordinate part. We do not learn that he interposed to prevent the cruelties of Olympias, or to save the life of the unhappy king, of whom he was the nominal guardian: and though he afterwards occupied the passes of Perraehia with an army, he was unable to prevent the advance of Cassander into Macedonia, or to avert the fall of Pydna, which fell into the hands of the enemy, while Polysperchon was still shut up in Perraehia. Here he was reduced to great straits by Cassander's general Callius, and was besieged in the town of Azorus, when the news of the death of Olympias (n. c. 316) caused him to despair of recovering his footing in Macedonia, and he withdrew with a small force into Attalia. (Diod. xix. 11, 35, 36, 52.)

From thence he appears to have joined his son Alexander in the Peloponnesse, where we find him in n. c. 315, when the altered position of affairs having united Cassander with Lysimachus, Ptolemy, and Seleucus in a general coalition against Antigonus, the latter sought to attach the aged Polysperchon to his cause, by offering him the chief command in the Peloponnesse. The bribe was accepted, and for a short time Polysperchon and his son conjointly carried on the war in the Peloponnesse against Cassander and the generals of Ptolemy. But before the end of the same year Alexander was gained over by Cassander; and Polysperchon, though he did not follow the example of his son, and coalesce with his old enemy, at least assumed a position hostile to Antigonus, as we find him in 313 defending Sicyon and Corinth against Telesphorus, the lieutenant of that general. (Id. vi. 60, 62, 64, 74.) From this time we lose sight of him till n. c. 310, when he again assumed an important part by reviving the long-forgotten pretensions of Heracles the son of Barsine (now the only surviving son of Alexander) to the throne of Macedonia. Having induced the unhappy youth to quit his retirement at Pergamus, and join him in the Peloponnesse, he persuaded the Aeolians to espouse his cause, and with their assistance raised a large army, with which he advanced towards Macedonia. He was met at Tramypae in Stymphalia by Cassander, but the latter, distrusting the fidelity of his own troops, instead of risking an engagement entered into secret negotiations with Polysperchon, and endeavoured by promises and flatteries to induce him to abandon thepretender whom he had himself set up. Polysperchon had the weakness to give way, and the meanness to serve the purposes of Cassander by the assassination of Heracles at a banquet. (Diod. xx. 20—28. For further details and authorities, see HERACLES.) It is satisfactory to know that Polysperchon did not reap the expected reward of his crime: Cassander had promised him the chief command of the Peloponnesse, but this he certainly never obtained, though we find him at a later period possessing a certain footing in that country: he seems to have occupied a subordinate and inglorious position. The last occasion on which his name occurs in history is in n. c. 303, when we find him co-operating with Cassander and Prepe- laus against Demetrius (Diod. xx. 106), but no notice of his subsequent fortunes or the period of his death has been transmitted to us.*

Polysperchon appears to have been a soldier of considerable merit, and to have been regarded by the Macedonians with favour as belonging to the older race of Alexander's generals; but he was altogether unequal to the position in which he found himself placed on the death of Antipater, and his weakness degenerated into the basest villany in such instances as the surrender of Phocion, and the assassination of Heracles.

POLYSTE'PHANUS (ΠΟΛΥΣΤΕΦάνους), a Greek writer, possessed no small reputation, but his writings were full of incredible tales. (Gell. ix. 4.) Harpocrate (Σ. Σ. λυτροφόρος) quotes a work of his πεπλωματα.

* Justin, by some inconceivable error, represents Polysperchon as killed in the war against Eume- nes, before the death of Antipater (xii. 8); and again (xv. 1, init.) alludes to him as dead before the murder of Heracles the son of Barsine.

POLYXENUS.

the sect, and was himself succeeded by Dionysius. (Diog. Laërt. x. 25.) Valerius Maximus relates that Polystratus and Hippoiciles were born on the same day, followed the sect of the same master Epicurus, shared their patronym in common, and supported the school together, and at last died at the same moment in extreme old age. (i. B. ext. § 17.)

2. An epigrammatic poet, who had a place in the Garland of Meleager. There are two of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology, one of which is on the destruction of Corinth, which took place in B. C. 146. He must therefore have lived some time within the seventy or eighty years preceding the time of Meleager, and probably soon after the taking of Corinth. A certain Polystratus, of Lepopolis in Egypt, is mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Πολυστράτου) and that is nothing to indicate whether he was the same person as the epigrammatist. (Brunc, Anth. vol. ii. p. 1; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. i, vol. xiii. p. 941.)

POLYSTRATUS, of Ambracia, a statutory, mentioned only by Titian, who ascribes to him a statue of Phalaris which stood at Agrigentum, and was very much admired. (Titian, adv. Graec. 54. p. 118, ed. Worth.)

POLYTECHNE, a mythical artificer (τεκτων), mentioned by Antoninus Liberalis (ii. pp. 70—72; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 590, 391.)

POLYTITUS, artists. 1. A sculptor, who was evidently a Greek freedmam, and who is known by the inscription POLYTITUS LIV, on the base of a statue of a young hunter in the Museum of the Capitol. (Welcker, Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 63. p. 331; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 391.)

POLYZEUS. (Πολύζευς) 1. A Syracusan of noble birth, whose sister was married to the illustrious HERMCOCRATES. When Dionysius, after his elevation to the despotic of his native country B. c. 406, became desirous to strengthen himself by connection with noble families, he gave his sister in marriage to Polyzenus at the same time that he himself married the daughter of Hermocrates (Diod. xiii. 96). From this time we find Polyzenus closely attached to the fortunes of the tyrant. During the rebellion of the Syracusans in B. c. 404, which threatened to overthrow the power of Dionysius, his brother-in-law was one of those who assisted him with their counsels; and again, in B. c. 393, when the Carthaginians were preparing to form the siege of Syracuse, Polyzenus was despatched to implore assistance from the Italian Greeks, as well as from the Corinthians and Lacedaemonians. This expedition failed, Polyzenus, however, returned to Sicily with a fleet of thirty ships furnished by the allies, and commanded by the Lacedaemonian Pharadidas; a reinforcement which contributed essentially to the liberation of Syracuse. (Id. xiv. 62, 63.)

2. A native of Taormenium in Sicily, who was sent as ambassador by his fellow-citizens to Nico- demus, the tyrant of Centoripe. (Timaeus, ap. Athen. xi. p. 471, l.) [E. H. B.]

POLYXO (Πολυξώ). 1. A nymph married to Danaus. (Apollod. ii. § 5.)

2. The wife of Nycteus and mother of Antiope. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1.)

3. One of the Hyades. (Hygin. Fab. 182.)

4. The nurse of queen Hypsipyle in Lemnos, which was celebrated as a poetess. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 608; Val. Phacc. ii. 316; Hygin. Fab. 15.)

5. An Argive woman, who was married to Theplemenus. (Paus. iii. 19. § 10.) [L. S.]

6. (Πολυξών) a Lacedaemonian, son of Deinomenes and brother of Gelon, the tyrant of Syracuse. His name was inscribed together with those of his three brothers on the tripods dedicated by Gelon to commemorate his victory at Himera, B. c. 480, whence we may conclude that Polyxenus himself bore a part in the success of that memorable day. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 155.) At his death, in B. c. 478, Gelon left the sovereign power to his brother Hieron, but bequeathed the hand of his widow Demarete, the daughter of Theron, together with the command of the army, to Polyxenus, who by this means obtained a degree of power and influence, which quickly excited the jealousy of Hieron. The latter in consequence deputed his brother to assist the Crotoniata, who had applied to him for support against the Sybarites, in hopes that he might perish in the war. Polyxenus, according to one account, refused to comply, and was, in consequence, driven into exile; but other authors state that he undertook the enterprise, and brought the war to a successful termination, but by this means only inflamed the jealousy of Hieron still more, and was ultimately compelled to quit Syracuse in consequence. He took refuge at the court of his father-in-law Theron, who readily espoused his cause, and even took up arms for the purpose of restoring Polyxenus to his country; but the war between Theron and Hieron was brought to a close by the intervention of the poet Simonides, and a reconciliation effected between the two brothers, in pursuance of which Polyxenus returned to Smyr-

POMONA. (Πομόνα) 1. Of Messene, an historian, who, according to one account, was, the father of the poet Ibycus. (Suid. s. v. Ἴβυς.) If so, he must have lived about B. c. 570.

2. Of Messina, a historian and poet, whose Ροδιάκα is quoted by Athenaeus (viii. p. 361, c.). He seems also to have written other works. Plutarch quotes him as an authority in his life of Solon (c. 15); and there is at least one other reference to him. (Schol. ad Hesiod. Op. 10; the passage in Ath. i. p. 31, e. refers to Polyzephyrus the comic poet.) Hyginus (Astron. ii. 14) gives, on the authority of Polyxenus, and evidently from his Ροδιάκα, an account of Phorbas killing the Thodian dragon. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 490, ed. Westermann.)

3. An Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, as some lines upon Theramenes, from his Δημοτυνδάρεως, clearly show (Phot. and Suid. a. v. τριών πατὼν) ; although the greater number of the titles of his plays refer to the nativities of the gods, a class of subjects which belongs to the Middle Comedy. He must therefore be assigned to the last period of the Old Comedy and the beginning of the Middle, in the year 383 B. c. His plays are quoted in the play already quoted, to Hyperbolus, who died in B. c. 411. (Schol. ad Lucian. Tim. 20.) This play, the Δημοτυνδάρεως, is conjectured by Kühn, with much ingenuity, to have been a sort of parody on the recital of Tyndarus to life, applying the fable to the resuscitation of the Athenian people. The period, at which such a subject is likely to have been chosen, would be the year B. c. 402, after the overthrow of the Thirty Tyrants. The titles of his plays, as mentioned by Suidas, are, Νίττρα, Δημοτυνδάρεως, Διωνύσου γο ναί, Μου σσίο ναί, Ἀργοδί της γο ναί, to which Eudocia adds Ἀρεώς γο ναί, (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 260, 261, vol. ii. pp. 867—872; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 488.) [P. S.]

POMÖONA, the Roman divinity of the fruit of trees, hence called Pomorum Patrona. Her name is evidently connected with Pomum. She is represented by the poets as having been beloved by several of the rustic deities, such as Silvanus, Pius, Vertumnus, and others (Ov. Met. xiv. 623, &c.; Propert. iv. 2, 21, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 190). Her worship must originally have been of considerable importance, as we learn from Varro POMPEIA.

(De L. L. vii. 45) that a special priest, under the name of Flamen Ponomatius, was appointed to attend to her service (comp. Plin. H. N. xxiii. 11). It is not impossible that Pumona may in reality be nothing but the personification of one of the attributes of Ops. (Hartung, Die Relig. d. Röm. vol. ii. pp. 158, &c.)

[Plut. Dion.] Plut. emperor, but made xlix. of Anius, nothing to Claudius Sextus mised in consul, dictator, marry Dion the she learned to her husband's house while she was celebrating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. (Suet. Caes. 6; Plut. Caes. 5, 10; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 45.)

3. The sister of the triumvir, married C. Memmius, who commanded in Sicily under her brother, in b.c. 67, and went as his quaestor into Spain, in the war against Sertorius, in which he was killed, b.c. 75. (Plut. Pomp. 11, Sert. 21; Cic. pro Balb. 2; Oros. v. 23.)

4. Daughter of the triumvir by his third wife Mucia. When her father, in b.c. 59, married Julia, the daughter of Julius Caesar, she was promised to Servilius Caepio, to whom Julia had been already betrothed. She did not, however, marry Caepio, but Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, to whom she had likewise been previously betrothed. Her husband perished in the African war, b.c. 46, and she and her children fell into the hands of Caesar, who, however, dismissed them in safety. (Plut. Caes. 14; Pomp. 47; Dion Cass. xiii. 13; Auct. Bel. Afric. 95.) She subsequently married L. Cornelius Cinna, and her son by this marriage, Cn. C-innus Magnus, entered into a conspiracy against Augustus (Dion Cass. iv. 14; Senec. de Clem. 1. 9.) She was with her brother Sextus in Sicily for some time, and she there made presents to the young Tiberius, subsequently emperor, when his parents fled for refuge to the island. (Suet. Tib. 6.) As her brother Sextus survived her, she must have died before b.c. 35. (Senec. Consol. ad Polig. 34.)

5. Daughter of Sex. Pompeius Magnus, the son of the triumvir and of Scribonia. At the peace of Misenum in b.c. 39 she was betrothed to M. Claudius Marcellus, the son of Octavia, the sister of Octavian, but was never married to him. She accompanied her father in his flight to Asia, b.c. 36. (Appian, B. C. v. 73; Dion Cass. xlvii. 38, xlix. 11.) She is not mentioned after this time, but it has been conjectured by commentators, with much probability, that she may have married Scribonia Libo, and had by him a son, Scribonius Libo Drusus; since Tacitus (Ann. ii. 27) calls Pompeius, the triumvirs, the proaurs of Libo Drusus; Scribonia, the wife of Augustus, his amita; and the two young Caesars his consobrinii. The descent of Libo Drusus would then be, 1. Cn. Pompeius, the triumvir, proaurs. 2. Sex. Pompeius, orus. 3. Pompeia, mater. 4. Libo Drusus.

6. Of uncertain origin, the wife of P. Vatinius, who was tribune, b.c. 59. She was still alive in b.c. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 11.)

POMPEIA CELEI'NA, the mother-in-law of the younger Pliny, to whom one of his letters is addressed. (Ep. i. 4.)

POMPEIA MACRI'NA, descended from Pompeia Theophanes, was the daughter of Pompeius Maccer, and was exiled by Tiberius a.d. 33. (Tac. Ann. vi. 18.)

POMPEIA PAULI'NA. [Paulina, No. 3.] POMPEIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned till the second century before the Christian era; the first member of it who obtained the consulship, Q. Pompeius, in b.c. 141, is described as a man of a humble and obscure origin (Cic. Ferr. v. 70, pro Muren. 7, Brut. 25). It is expressly stated that there were two or three distinct families of the Pompeii under the republic (Vell. Pat. ii. 21); and we can trace two, one of which was brought into celebrity by Q. Pompeius, the consul of b.c. 141, and the other is still better known as that to which the triumvir belonged. In the former family we find the surname of Rufus; in the latter, the father of the triumvir was distinguished by the personal cognomen of Strabo, and the triumvir himself gained that of Magnus, which he handed down to his children as an hereditary surname. The two of these cognomens we have in the Faustulus as a surname of a Sex. Pompeius, who is otherwise unknown, and Pius as a surname of Sextus, the son of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, to designate him as the avenger of his father and brother. (Eckelh, vol. v. p. 280, &c.) But as all the members of these families are usually spoken of under their gentile name, and not under their cognomens, they are given below under POMPEIUS. In addition to the cognomens already mentioned, we find many others, borne for the most part by freedmen or provincials, who had received the Roman franchise from the Pompei; of these an alphabetical list is given below.

POMPEIA'NUS, son of Lucilla and Claudius Pompeianus. We are told by Spartianus that he was employed by Caracalla in the conduct of the most important wars, and was twice raised to the consulship, but his name does not appear in the Fasti. The same authority adds that he was sent to death by the emperor, but in such a manner that he appeared to have perished by the hands of robbers. (Spartian. Caracall. 3.) [W. R.]

POMPEI'ANUS, TIB. CLAU'DIUS, the son of a Roman knight originally from Antioch, rose to the highest dignities under M. Aurelius. He was one of the legates despatched to oppose the barbarian Kelts from beyond the Rhine, when they threatened to burst into Italy [PertinaX]: he stands in the Fasti as consul for a. d. 173, was suspect probably in a. d. 176, and received in marriage Lucilla, the daughter of the emperor, before the regular period of mourning for her first husband L. Verus had expired. He was one of the trusty counsellors to whose charge the youthful Commodus was consigned, and one of the few who escaped the cruel persecution of that brutal savage, although he openly refused to countenance his follies, or to pander to his vices. During this unhappy period he passed his time chiefly in the country, excusing himself from appearing in public on account of age and weakness of sight. Pertinax, who had served under his command, treated him with the greatest distinction, and Didius Julianus is said to have invited him to quit his retirement at Tarraco, and to ascend the throne. Lampridius would lead us to suppose that he actually fell a POMPEIUS.

Having renounced the peace which he had obtained by terms of friendly intimacy, and having failed to put his hopes into execution, (Deutsch Roms, vol. iv. p. 306, &c.), he called on the Roman people to elect him consul, while still in possession of the highest offices of the state. He was consul b.c. 141 with Cn. Servilius Caepio, and gained his election in opposition to Lelius by assuring Scipio that he did not intend to become a candidate for the office, and then entering upon a vigorous canvass after he had thus thrown the friends of Lelius off their guard. Scipio had previously been on friendly terms with Pompeius, but now renounced all further connection with him. (Plut. L. c.; Cic. Lael. 21.) Pompeius in his consulship was sent into Nearer Spain as the successor of Q. Metellus (Val. Max. ix. 3. § 7), and not of Fabius Maximus Servilius, who commanded in Further Spain (Appian, Hisp. 63). Pompeius was unsuccessful in Spain: he experienced several defeats from the enemy, and in vain lied siege to Numantia. His troops, which he kept encamped before the walls of this town during the winter, perished in great numbers through the cold and disease; and, accordingly, fearing that the aristocracy would call him to account on his return to Rome, he proposed to the Numantines terms of peace. He required from them publicly an unconditional surrender; but in private only demanded from them hostages, the captives and deserters, and also thirty talents. The Numantines, who were weary of the war, gladly purchased peace on these conditions, and immediately paid part of the money; but on the arrival of M. Popilius Laenas in Spain shortly afterwards (b.c. 139), as the successor of Pompeius, the latter, who was now released from the responsibility of the war, had the effrontery to disown the treaty, although it had been witnessed by the officers of his own army.

Laenas referred the matter to the senate, to which the Numantine legates accordingly repaired. Pompeius persisted in the same lie; the senate declared the treaty invalid; and the war was accordingly renewed. Pompeius escaped all punishment for this conduct in relation to the treaty: he was, however, accused shortly afterwards of extortion in his province, but was fortunate enough to obtain an acquittal, although some of the most eminent men at Rome, such as Q. Metellus Macedoniens and L. Metellus Calvus, bore witness against him. (Val. Max. viii. 5. § 1; Cic. pro Font. 7.) His want of success in Spain did not lose him the favour of the people, for he was elected censor in b.c. 131 with Q. Metellus Macedoniens, the first time that he had been chosen from the plebs. (Appian, Hisp. 76—79; Liv. Epit. 54, 59; Oros. v. 4; Cic. de Off. iii. 30, de Fina. ii. 17.)

4. Pompeius, is mentioned as one of the opponents of Tib. Gracchus in b.c. 133: he stated that, as he lived near Gracchus, he knew that Eudemus of Pergamum had given a diadem out of the royal treasures and a purple robe to Gracchus, and he also promised to accuse the latter as soon as his year of office as tribune had expired. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 14; Oros. v. 8.) Drumm makes this Pompeius the son of No. 3, and likewise tribune of the plebs for b.c. 132; but although neither of these suppositions is impossible, there is still no authority for them. It is not impossible that this Pompeius is the same as the preceding; and as the latter very likely possessed public land, he would be ready enough to oppose Gracchus, although he had previously belonged to the popular party. We have likewise seen from his conduct in the Numantine war that he had no great regard for the state.

6. Q. Pompeius Q. f. Rufus, either son or grandson of No. 3, was a zealous supporter of the aristocratical party. In his tribunate of the plebs, b.c. 100, he brought forward a bill, in conjunction with his colleague L. Cato, for the recall of Metellus Macedoniens from banishment (Oros. v. 17.) He was praetor b.c. 91 (Cic. de Orat. i. 37), and consul, b.c. 83, with L. Sulla. In the latter year the civil war broke out between Marius and Sulla respecting the command of the Mithridatic war. The history of these events is related in the life of Marius [p. 957]; and it is only necessary to mention here that the tribune P. Sulpicius Rufus, who was the great agent of Marius, had previously been the personal friend of Pompeius; but such was the exasperation of political feeling, that Sulpicius had recourse to arms against his former friend, in order to carry his measure for incorporating the new citizens among the old tribes. In the riots which ensued, the young son of Pompeius was murdered. Pompeius himself was deprived of his consulship and fled to Nola, where Sulla had a powerful army. At the head of these troops the two consuls speedily returned to Rome, and proscribed Marius and his leading partizans. Sulla then set out for the East to conduct the war against Mithridates, leaving Italy in charge of Pompeius. To the latter was assigned the army of Cn. Pompeius Strabo, who was still engaged in carrying on war against the Marsi; but Strabo, who was unwilling to be deprived of the command, caused Pompeius Rufus to be murdered by the soldiers.

shortly after his arrival in the camp, having previously received him without opposition. [See below, No. 21.] Cicero mentions Pompeius Rufus among the orators whom he had heard in his youth; his orations were written or corrected by L. Aelius. (Appian, B. C. i. 55—57; 63; Vell. Pat. ii. 20; Liv. Epit. 77; Plut. Sull. 8; Cic. Lael. i. pro Cuent. 5, Brut. 56, 89.)

7. A Pompeius, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 102, may perhaps have been a younger son of No. 4. (Plut. Mar. 17.)

8. Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of No. 6, married Sulla's daughter, and was murdered by the party of Sulpicius and Marius in the forum in B. C. 88 (Appian, B. C. i. 56; Plut. Sull. 6).

9. Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of No. 8, and grand-son of the dictator Sulla, first appears in public in B. C. 54 as the accuser of M. Messalla, because he had gained his election to the consilium by bribery. [M. Messalla, No. 7, on his death, had no means of increasing the wrath of the people. Pompey was appointed sole consul; the laws which he proposed were supported by Rufus and his party, and Milo was condemned. But he had no sooner laid down his office of tribune, on the 10th of December in this year, than he was accused by one of his late colleagues, M. Caecilius, of violating the very law De Ví, which he had taken so active a part in passing. He was condemned, and lived in exile at Bauli in Campania. Here he was in great pecuniary difficulties, till M. Caecilius, who had accused him, generously compelled his mother Cornelia to surrender to him his paternal property. The last time that Rufus is mentioned is B. C. 51, when his enemies spread the false report that he had murdered Cicero on his journey to Cilicia. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 2. § 8, ad Att. iv. 16. § 9; Dion Cass. xl. 45, 49, 55; Ascorn. in Cic. Milon. passim; Caecilius, ad Fam. vili. 1. § 4; Val. Max. iv. 2. § 7.)

10. Pompeia, daughter of No. 8. [Pompeia, No. 2.]

11. Q. Pompeius Bithynicus, probably son of No. 7. [Bithynicus, No. 1.]

12. A. Pompeius Bithynicus, son of No. 11. [Bithynicus, No. 2.]

13. Q. Pompeius Rufus, praetor B. C. 63. His cognomen shows that he belonged to the preceding family, but his descent is quite uncertain. In his praetorship he was sent to Capua, where he remained part of the following year, because it was feared that the slaves in Campania and Apulia might rise in support of Catiline. In B. C. 61 he obtained the province of Africa, with the title of proconsul, which he governed with great integrity, according to Cicero. He did not, however, succeed in obtaining the consulship, although he was alive some years afterwards, for we find him bearing witness in B. C. 56 in behalf of M. Caecilius, who had been with him in Africa. (Sull. Cat. 30; Cic. pro Caet. 30.)

14. CN. Pompeius, only known from the Fasti Capitolini, as the grandfather of No. 21.

15. Sex. Pompeius, son of the preceding, married Lucilia, a sister of the poet C. Lucilius, who was therefore the grandmother, and not the mother of the triumvir, as is stated by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 29), and many modern writers.

16. Sex. Pompeius Sex. F. CN. N., was the son of No. 15, and we may conclude from his presence in the Catiline, that he was the son of his father's elder brother Strabo during the Social war, B. C. 89, but this is the only time in which his name occurs in public affairs. (Cic. Brut. 47, Philipp. xii. 11, De Orat. i. 15, iii. 21, De Off. i. 6.)

17. Sex. Pompeius, son of No. 16, only known as the father of No. 19.

18. Q. Pompeius Sex. F., probably younger son of No. 16, is recommended by Cicero in a letter, of which we do not know the date, to one Carius, proconsul of some province (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 49.)

19. Sex. Pompeius Sex. F., son of No. 17, was consul B. C. 33, with L. Cornificius, in which year Sex. Pompeius, the son of the triumvir, was killed, in that he was the Cassius Albus, of his sister.

20. Sex. Pompeius Sex. F. son of No. 19, was consul B. C. 14, with Sex. Appuleius, in which year the emperor Augustus died. These consuls were the first to render homage to Tiberius (Dion Cass. iv. 29; Tac. Ann. i. 7; Suet. Aug. 100; Vell. Pat. ii. 123). Sex Pompeius seems to have been a patron of literature. Ovid addressed him several letters during his exile (ex Pont. iv. 1. 4, 5, 15); and it was probably this same Sex. Pompeius, whom the writer Valerius Maximus accompanied to Asia, and of whom he speaks as his Alexander. (Val. Max. ii. 6. § 3, iv. 7. extern. § 2.)

21. CN. Pompeius Sex. F. CN. N. Strabo, younger son of No. 15, and father of the triumvir. His surname Strabo, which signifies one who squints, and which occurs in several other Roman gentes, is said to have been first given to his cook, Monogenes, and then to have been applied to Pompeius himself, from his likeness to his slave (Plin. H. N. vii. 10. s. 12; Val. Max. ix. 14. § 2). Whether this be true or false, Pompeius at all events adopted the name; and it appears on his coins, and in the Fasti. All the ancient writers agree in giving this Pompeius a thoroughly bad character. His name is first mentioned in connection with a discreditable matter. He had been a quaestor in Sardinia in B. C. 103, under the propraetor T. Albucius, against whom he collected materials for an accusation, although the Romans regarded the relation between praetor and quaestor as a sacred one, like that between father and POMPEIUS. son. For that reason he was not allowed to conduct the accusation, which was assigned to C. Caesar instead (Cic. Div. in Catull. 19). He was probably praetor in B. C. 94, and obtained in the following year the government of Sicily (Cic. Verr. iii. 16, v. 66). On the breaking out of the Social or Marseis war, in B. C. 90, Pompeius served as legate under the consul P. Rutilius Lupus. Pompeius was at first defeated, and obliged to take refuge at Firmum, where he was besieged by Afranius, one of the Italian generals. But when Sulpicius came to his assistance, Afranius was attacked at once by the two Roman armies, and lost his life in the battle: his troops fled in confusion to Asculum. To this town Pompeius proceeded to lay siege; and as he seems to have been regarded as a general of no mean abilities, he was elected to the consulsiphip, B. C. 89, with L. Porcius Cato. Soon after entering upon his consulship, he defeated the Italians on the east coast, who, ignorant that the Etruscans had made terms with the Romans, were marching to their assistance. He followed up this victory by others, and defeated, in succession, the Marsi, Marrucini, and Vestini. He at length took Asculum, and subdued the Picentines, and returned to Rome at the end of the year, which he entered in triumph on the 27th of December. Before he laid down his consulship, he probably brought forward the law (lex Pompeia), which gave to all the towns of the Transpadani the jus Latii or Latinitas. In the following year, B. C. 88, occurred the dreadful struggle between Marius and Sulla for the command of the Mithridatic war, which ended in the proscription of Marius, and his flight from Italy. Strabo had returned to his army, and was engaged in southern Italy in completing the subjugation of the Italians, when he learnt that the senate had deprived him of the command, and had assigned his army to the consul Q. Pompeius Rufus, to whom the care of Italy was entrusted, while his colleague Sulla was engaged in the Mithridatic war. But Strabo, who was excessively fond of power, was indignant at this decision. He however concealed his resentment and handed over the army to Rufus; but at the same time he secretly instigated the soldiers to murder their new commander, which they accordingly did shortly afterwards. He affected great horror of the crime, but took no steps to bring the perpetrators to justice; and Sulla, who was on the point of starting for the East, was obliged to overlook the murder.

Next year, B. C. 87, the Marian party obtained the upper hand. L. Cinna, who had been driven out of the city by his colleague Cn. Octavius, had collected a formidable army, and being joined by Marius, advanced against Rome. The aristocracy summoned Pompeius Strabo to their aid; but as he commanded against their wish, and had been refused a second consulship this year, he was unwilling to espouse their side. Still, not being prepared to join the other party, he advanced by slow marches to the relief of the city, and, contrary to his wishes, was obliged to fight near the Colline Gate with Cinna and Sertorius. The battle was not decisive, but Strabo was unable to play any longer a neutral part. Cinna attempted to remove him from the command, and being driven off by the energy and prudence of his son, who also quelled a dangerous mutiny among the soldiers. Shortly after these events, and in the course of the same year, B. C. 87, Strabo was killed by lightning. His avarice and cruelty had made him hated by the soldiers to such a degree, that they tore his corpse from the bier and dragged it through the streets. Cicero describes him (Brut. 47) as "worthy of hatred on account of his cruelty, avarice, and perfidy." He possessed some reputation as an orator, and still more as a general. He left behind him a considerable property, especially in Picenum; and his anxiety to protect his estates probably led him to make that neighbourhood one of the principal seats of the war against the Italians (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 47, 52, 66—68, 80; Liv. Epit. 74—79; Vell. Pat. ii. 20, 21; Flor. iii. 18; Oros. v. 18; Plut. Pompei. 1, 3; Cic. Philipp. xii. 11.)

22. Cic. Pompeius Magnus, the son of No. 21, and afterwards the triumvir, was born on the 9th of September, B. C. 106, in the consulship of Attius Serranus and Servilius Caepio. He was consequently a few months younger than Cicero, who was born on the 3d of January in this year, and six years older than Caesar. He had scarcely left school before he was summoned to serve under his father in the Social war. He fought under him in B. C. 89 against the Italians, when he was only seventeen years of age, and continued with him till his death two years afterwards. He was present at the battle of the Colline Gate, in B. C. 87, and, as has been already related, he saved the life of his father, and quelled an insurrection of the soldiers by his courage and activity. The death of his father soon after this event left Pompey his own master at the age of nineteen. The aristocratical party were no longer able to offer any opposition to Marius and Cinna, who accordingly entered Rome shortly afterwards, and took a bloody revenge on their opponents. Pompey's house was plundered; and he did not venture to appear in public till after the death of Marius in the following year, B. C. 86. His enemies, however, immediately accused him of having shared with his father in the plunder of Asculum. Not trusting either to the justice of his cause, or to the eloquence of his advocates, L. Marcus Philippus and Q. Hortensius, he agreed to marry the daughter of the praetor Antistius, who presided at the trial, and was in consequence acquitted.

In B. C. 84, the Marian party made great preparations to oppose Sulla, who had now finished the Mithridatic war, and was on his way to Italy. Pompey, though so young, was fired with the ambition of distinguishing himself above all the other leaders of the aristocracy; and while the rest were content to wait quietly for Sulla's arrival in Italy to deliver them from their enemies, Pompey resolved to share with Sulla the glory of crushing the Marian party. He accordingly fled from the camp of Cinna shortly before the latter was murdered, and hastened to Picenum, where he proceeded to levy troops without holding any public office, and without any authority from the senate or people. The influence which he possessed by his large estates in Picenum, and by his personal popularity, enabled him to raise an army of three legions by the beginning of the following year, B. C. 83. He sallied from the town of Auxemus, near the coast of Picenum, not far from Ariminum; and while the rest of the aristocracy hastened to join Sulla, who had landed at Brundisium, Pompey was anxious to distinguish himself by some brilliant success over the enemy. The faults of the Marian generals gave him the wished-for opportunity; he was surrounded by three armies, commanded by M. Brutus, C. Casaius Caldes, and C. Carrinas, whose great object seems to have been to prevent his escape to Sulla. Pompey now displayed for the first time the great military abilities for which he became afterwards so conspicuous; he concentrated all his forces in one spot, and then fell upon M. Brutus at a time when he could receive no assistance from the other generals, and completely defeated him. Pompey also distinguished himself by his personal bravery in this engagement, charging at the head of his cavalry, and striking down a Celtic horseman with his own hand. The Marian generals, after the loss of this battle, quarrelled among themselves, and withdrew from the country. Pompey, who had no longer an enemy to oppose him, set out to join Sulla, and was hailed as a deliverer by the towns of Picenum, who had now no other alternative but submission. He was proscribed by the senate, but his troops proved faithful to him, and he joined Sulla in Italy, having already gained for himself a brilliant reputation. He was received by Sulla with still greater distinction than he had anticipated; for when he leapt down from his horse, and saluted Sulla by the title of Imperator, the latter returned the compliment by addressing him by the same title. Pompey was only twenty-three, and had not held any public office when he received this unprecedented mark of honour.

Next year, B. C. 82, the war was prosecuted with vigour against the Marian party. Pompey took a prominent part in it as one of Sulla's legates, and by his success gained still further distinction. The younger Marius, who was now consul, was blocked in Praeneste, and his colleague, Carbo, was making every effort to relieve him. Sulla himself fought an indecisive battle against Carbo; but his legates, Marcus and Carrinas, were defeated by Pompey. Carbo then retreated to Ariminum, and sent Marius to the relief of Praeneste; but Pompey passed the latter again in the Apennines, and compelled him to retire. Despairing of success, Carbo then abandoned Marius to his fate, and set sail for Africa. Praeneste shortly afterwards surrendered. Sulla thus became the master of Italy, and was proclaimed dictator. He then proceeded to reward his partizans, and to take vengeance on his enemies; and in order to connect Pompey more closely with himself, he compelled him to marry his step-daughter Aemilia, the daughter of his wife Caecilia Metella, by her former husband Aemilius Scaurus. To effect this marriage two divorces had to take place: Pompey was obliged to put away his wife Antistia, though her father had been murdered by Marius as a partizan of Sulla, simply on account of his connection with Pompey; and Aemilia was obliged to leave her husband M. Gibbrio, although she was pregnant at the time. Aemilia died shortly afterwards in child-birth.

But although the war in Italy was brought to a close, the Marian party still held out in other parts of Europe; and Pompey, who was now regarded as one of the principal leaders of the aristocracy, was sent against them by Sulla. He first proceeded to Sicily, to which island Carbo had crossed over from Africa, but here met with no opposition; as soon as he landed, Carbo fled from the island, intending to take refuge in Egypt, but he was seized and brought in chains to Pompey, at Lillybœa, who put him to death, and sent his head to Sulla. He likewise executed several others of the Marian party; but he can scarcely be reproached with cruelty for so doing, as he had no other alternative, even if he had wished to save them; and he treated the cities which had espoused the popular side with greater leniency than might have been expected. Next year, B. C. 81, Pompey left Sicily, and passed over to Africa, in order to oppose Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the son-in-law of Cinn, who, with the assistance of Hiæthras, had collected a formidable army. But his troops, chiefly consisting of Numidians, were no match for the veterans who had conquered the well-disciplined Italian allies. Still they fought with great bravery, and out of 20,000 only 3000 are said to have survived the decisive battle. Their camp was taken, and Domitius fell. In a few months Pompey reduced the whole of Numidia; Hiæthras was taken prisoner and put to death, and his throne was given to Hiæmpal. But it was not only his military achievements that gained him great renown at Rome; unlike other Roman governors, he abstained from plundering the province, which seemed the more extraordinary, since the disturbed state of the country afforded him particular facilities for doing so. Intent upon triumphing, he collected a great number of elephants and lions in Numidia, and returned to Rome, in the same year, covered with glory. As he approached Rome, numbers flocked out of the city to meet him; and the dictator himself, who formed one of the crowd, greeted him with the surname of Magnus, which he bore ever afterwards, and handed down to his children.* But Pompey did not find it easy to obtain his wished-for triumph. Hitherto no one but a dictator, consul, or praetor, had enjoyed this distinction, and it seemed a monstrous thing for a simple eques, who had not yet obtained a place in the senate, to covet this honour. Sulla at first tried to dissuade Pompey from presuming his request; and as he would not relinquish his design, the matter was referred to the senate, and there Sulla positively opposed it. Pompey was not, however, to be cowed, and uttered a threat about the rising and the setting sun; whereupon Sulla, indignant at his impudence, shouted out contumeliously, "Let him triumph then!" It is true that Sulla's dominion was too firmly established to be overthrown by Pompey; but he probably could not have put him down without a struggle, and therefore thought it better to let him have his own way. Pompey therefore entered Rome in triumph as a simple eques in the month of September B. C. 81, and before he had completed his twenty-fifth year. Pompey's conduct in insisting upon a triumph on this occasion has been represented by many modern writers as vain and childish; but it should be recollected that it was a vanity which all distinguished Romans shared, and that to enter Rome drawn in

* There can be little doubt that this surname was given to Pompey on this occasion, though many writers assign it to a different time. The question is discussed at length by Drummel, vol. iv. p. 335. Pompey did not use it himself till he was appointed to the command of the war against Sertorius (Plut. Pomp. 13).

the triumphal car was regarded as one of the noblest objects of ambition.

Having thus succeeded in carrying his point against the dictator Pompey again exhibited his power in promoting in B.C. 79 the election of M. Aemilius Lepidus to the consulship, in opposition to the wishes of Sulla. Through Pompey's influence Lepidus was not only elected, but he had a greater number of votes than his colleague Q. Catulus, who was supported by Sulla. The latter had now retired from public affairs, and would not relinquish his Epicurean enjoyments for the purpose of defeating Pompey's plans, but contented himself with warning the latter, as he met him returning from the comitia in triumph, "Young man, it is time for you not to slumber, for you have strengthened your rival against yourself." The words of Sulla were prophetic; for upon his death, which happened in the course of the same year, Lepidus attempted to repeal the laws of Sulla, and to destroy the aristocratical constitution which he had established. He seems to have reckoned upon the support of Pompey; but in this he was disappointed, for Pompey remained faithful to the aristocracy, and thus saved his party. During the year of the consulship of Lepidus and Catulus, B.C. 79, a small town on the Po, whither he had retired after the surrender of Mutina, Pompey was much blamed for this cruel and pernicious act, which was however more in accordance with the spirit of his party than with his own general conduct. But he seems to have acted now in accordance with Sulla's principles; for he likewise put to death Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus, the son of Lepidus, whom he had taken prisoner at Alba in Lucania. The war in Italy was now at an end; for Lepidus, despairing of holding his ground in Etruria, had sailed with the remainder of his forces to Sardinia, where he died shortly afterwards.

The senate, who now began to dread Pompey, ordered him to disband his army; but he found various excuses for evading this command, as he was anxious to obtain the command of the war against Sertorius in Spain. Sertorius was the only surviving general of the Marian party, who still continued to hold out against the aristocracy. By his extraordinary genius and abilities he had won the hearts of the Spaniards, and had for the last three years successfully opposed Metellus Pius, one of the ablest of Sulla's generals [SERTORIUS]. The misfortunes of Metellus only increased Pompey's eagerness to gain laurels, where a veteran general had met with nothing but disasters; and he therefore still continued at the head of his army in the neighbourhood of Rome. The senate, however, hesitated to give him this opportunity for gaining fresh distinction and additional power; but as Sertorius was now joined by Perpenna, and was daily becoming more formidable, it became necessary for Pompey to strengthen Metellus; and as they had no general except Pompey, who was either competent or willing to conduct the war against Sertorius, they at length unwillingly determined to send him to Spain, with the title of Proconsul, and with equal powers to Metellus. In the debate in the senate which ended in his appointment, it was urged that no private man ought to receive the title of Proconsul, whereupon L. Philippus replied with bitter scorn, in allusion to the insignificance of the existing consuls, "Non ego illum mens sententia pro consule, sed pro consulibus mitto."

In forty days Pompey completed his preparations, and left Italy with an army of 30,000 foot and 1000 horse, at the beginning of B.C. 76, being then thirty years of age. He crossed the Alps between the sources of the Rhone and the Po, and advanced towards the southern coast of Spain. The Spanish tribes, through which he marched, did not offer him much resistance, and the town of Lauron (not far from Valencia) declared in his favour. But the approach of Sertorius quickly changed the face of matters, and taught Pompey that he had a more formidable enemy to deal with than any he had yet encountered. His army was suddenly surprised by Sertorius, and he was obliged to retreat with the loss of a legion. Sertorius followed up his victory by taking the town of Lauron, which he committed to the flames, almost before Pompey's face. Thus his first campaign in Spain ended ingloriously. He passed the winter in the Nearer Province, and at the beginning of B.C. 75 crossed the Iberus, and again marched southward against C. Herennius and Perpenna, the legates of Sertorius. These he defeated, with great loss, near Valencia; and elated with his success, and anxious to wipe off the disgrace of the preceding year, he hastened to attack Sertorius, hoping to crush him entirely before Metellus arrived to share the glory with him. Sertorius, who had advanced from the west, was equally eager to fight before the junction of the two Roman armies. The battle, thus eagerly desired by both generals, was fought on the banks of the Sucro (Xucar). It was obstinately contested, but was not decisive. The right wing, where Pompey commanded in person, was put to flight by Sertorius, and Pompey himself was nearly killed in the pursuit; his left wing, however, which was under the command of his legate L. Afranius, drove the right wing of Sertorius's army off the field, and took his camp. Night put an end to the battle; and the approach of Metellus on the following day obliged Sertorius to retire. Pompey and Metellus then continued together for a time, but were reduced to great straits for want of provisions, and were frequently obliged to separate in order to obtain food and fodder. On one of these occasions they were attacked at the same time, Pompey by Sertorius, and Metellus by Perpenna; Metellus defeated the latter with a loss of 5000 men, but Pompey was routed by Sertorius, and lost 6000 of his troops. Shortly after this Pompey retired, for the winter, to the country of the Vaccans, whence he wrote to the senate, in the most earnest terms, for a further supply of troops and corn, threatening to quit Spain if he did not receive them, as he was resolved to continue the war no longer at his own expence. His demands were complied with, and two legions were sent to his assistance; for the consul L. Lucullus, who then had great influence with the senate, feared that Pompey might execute his threat of returning to Italy, and then deprive him of the command of the Mithridatic war.

Of the campaigns of the next three years (B.C. 74—72) we have little information; but Sertorius, who had lost some of his influence by the Spanish tribune being an object of jealousy to M. Perperna and his principal Roman officers, was unable to prosecute the war with the same vigour as he had done during the two preceding years. Pompey accordingly gained some advantages over him, but the war was still far from a close; and the genius of Sertorius would probably have soon given a very different aspect to affairs, had he not been assassinated by Perperna in B.C. 72. [SERTORIUS.] Perperna had flattered himself that he should succeed to the power of Sertorius; but he soon found that he had murdered the only man who was able to save him from ruin and death. In his first battle with Pompey, he was completely defeated, his principal officers slain, and himself taken prisoner. Anxious to save his life he offered to deliver up to Pompey the papers of Sertorius, which contained letters from many of the leading men at Rome, inviting "Sertorius to Italy, and expressing a desire to change the constitution of which Sulla had been the founder." But Pompey refused to see him, and commanded him to be put to death, and the letters to be burnt: the latter was an act of prudence for which Pompey deserves no small praise. The war was now virtually at an end; and the remainder of the year was employed in subduing the towns which had compromised themselves too far to hope for forgiveness, and which accordingly still held out against Pompey. By the winter the greater part of Spain was reduced to obedience; and some of the Spaniards, who had distinguished themselves by their support of the troops of the republic, were rewarded by Pompey with the Roman franchise. Among those who received this honour was L. Cornelius Balbus, whose cause Cicero subsequently pleaded in an oration that has come down to us. [BALBUS.] Metellus had taken no part in the final struggle with Perperna, and returned to Italy before Pompey. The latter thus obtained the credit of bringing the war to a conclusion, and of making, in conjunction with commissioner: from the senate, the final arrangements for settling the affairs of the conquered country. His reputation, which had been a little dimmed by the long continuance of the war, now burst forth more brightly than ever; and the people longed for his return, that he might deliver Italy from Spartacus and his horde of gladiators, who had defeated the consuls, and were in possession of a great part of the country.

In B.C. 71 Pompey returned to Italy at the head of his army. Crassus, who had now the conduct of the war against Spartacus, hastened to bring it to a conclusion before the arrival of Pompey, who he feared might rob him of the laurels of the campaign. He accordingly fought a decisive battle with Spartacus in Lucania, in which the latter perished with a great part of his troops; but Pompey was fortunate enough to fall in with six thousand of the fugitives, who had rallied again, and whom he cut to pieces, and thereupon he wrote to the senate, "Crassus, indeed, has defeated the enemy, but I have extirpated the war by the roots." Thus he claimed for himself, in addition to all his other exploits, the glory of finishing the Servile war; and the people, who now idolized him, were only too willing to admit his claims. Crassus deeply felt the injustice that was done him, but he dared not show his resentment, as he was anxious for a consulship, and another opportunity presented. He accordingly resolved to answer the expectations which the people had formed respecting him, and declared himself in favour of a restoration of the tribunitian power, which had been abolished by Sulla. The senate dared not offer any resistance to his election; at the head of a powerful army, and backed by the popular enthusiasm, he could have played the part of Sulla, if he had chosen. The senate, therefore, thought it more prudent to release him from the laws, which disqualified him from the consulship; and he was accordingly elected without any open opposition along with M. Crassus, whom he had recommended to the people as his colleague. A triumph, of course, could not be refused him on account of his victories in Spain; and accordingly, on the 31st of December, B.C. 71, he entered the city a second time in his triumphal car, a simple eques.

On the 1st of January, B.C. 70, Pompey entered on his consulship with M. Crassus. One of his first acts was to redeem the pledge he had given to the people, by bringing forward a law for the restoration of the tribunician power. Sulla had allowed the tribunial office to continue, but had deprived it of the greater part of its power; and there was no object for which the people were so eager as its restoration in its former authority and with its ancient privileges. Modern writers have disputed whether its restoration was an injury or a benefit to the state; but such speculations are of little use, since it is certain, that the measure was inevitable, and that it was quite impossible to maintain the aristocratical constitution in the form in which it had been left by Sulla. It is probable enough that Pompey was chiefly induced by his love of popular favour to propose the law, but he may also have had the good sense to see, what the short-sightedness of the majority of the aristocracy blinded them to, that further opposition to the people would have been injurious to the interests of the aristocracy itself. The law was passed with little opposition; for the senate felt that it was worse than useless to contend against Pompey, supported as he was by the popular enthusiasm and by his troops, which were still in the immediate neighbourhood of the city. Later in the same year Pompey also struck another blow at the aristocracy by lending his all-powerful aid to the repeal of another of Sulla's laws. From the time of C. Gracchus (B.C. 123) to that of Sulla (B.C. 80), the judges had been taken exclusively from the equestrian order; but by one of Sulla's laws they had been chosen during the last ten years from the senate. The corruption and venality of the latter in the administration of justice had excited such general indignation that some change was clamorously demanded by the people. Accordingly, the praetor L. Aurelius Cotta, with the approbation of Pompey, proposed a law by which the judges were to be taken in future from the senator, equites, and tribuni aedilii, the latter probably representing the wealthier members of the third order in the state. (Comp. Madvig, De Tribunis aedilii in Opuscula, vol. ii. p. 242, &c.) This law was likewise carried; but it did not improve the purity of the administration of justice, since corruption was not confined to the senators, but pervaded all classes of the community alike. In carrying both these measures Pompey was strongly supported by Caesar, with whom he was thus brought into close connection, and who, though he was rapidly rising in popular favour, could as yet only hope to weaken the power of the aristocracy through Pompey's means.

Pompey had thus broken with the aristocracy, and had become the great popular hero. On the expiration of his consulship he dismissed his army, which he no longer needed for the purpose of overawing the senate, and for the next two years (B.C. 69 and 68) he remained in Rome, as he had previously declared that he would not accept a province. Having had little or no experience in civil affairs, he prudently kept aloof during this time from all public matters, and appeared seldom in public, and then never without a large retinue, in order to keep up among the people the feelings of respectful admiration with which they had hitherto regarded him. Pompey did not possess the diversified talents of Caesar: he was only a soldier, but he showed no small good sense in abstaining from meddling with matters which he did not understand. Having possessed such a large personal wealth did not allow him to remain long in inactivity. The Mediterranean sea was at this time swarming with pirates. From the earliest times down to the present day piracy has more or less prevailed in this sea, which, lying as it does between three continents, and abounding with numerous creeks and islands, presents at the same time both the greatest temptations and the greatest facilities for piratical pursuits. Moreover, in consequence of the civil wars in which the Romans had been engaged, and the absence of any fleet to preserve order upon the sea, piracy had reached an alarming height. The pirates possessed fleets in all parts of the Mediterranean, were in the habit of plundering the most wealthy cities on the coasts, not only of Greece and of the islands, but even of Italy itself, and had at length carried their audacity so far as to make descents upon the Appian road, and carry off Roman magistrates, with all their attendants and lictors. All communication between Rome and the provinces was cut off, or at least rendered extremely dangerous; the fleets of corn-vessels, upon which Rome to a great extent depended for its subsistence, could not reach the city, and the price of provisions in consequence rose enormously. Such a state of things had become intolerable, and all eyes were now directed to Pompey. He, however, was not willing to take any ordinary command, and the scarcity of provisions made the people ready to grant him any power he might ask. Still he was prudent enough not to ask in person for such extraordinary powers as he desired, and to appear only to yield to the earnest desires of the people. Accordingly, at the beginning of the year B.C. 67, he got the tribune A. Gabinius, a man of abandoned character, and whose services he had probably purchased, to bring forward a bill, which was intended to give Pompey almost absolute authority over the greater part of the Roman world. It proposed that the people should elect a man with consular rank, who should possess unlimited and irresponsible power for three years over the whole of the Mediterranean, and to a distance of fifty miles inland from its coasts,—who should have fifteen legates from the senate, a fleet of 200 ships, with as many soldiers and sailors as he thought necessary, and 6000 Attic talents. The bill did not name Pompey, but it was clear who was meant. The aristocracy were in the utmost alarm, for not only did they dread the ambition of Pompey, but they feared that he might interfere with many of their friends and relatives, who held provinces which would come under his imperium, and probably spoil their plans for making their fortunes by the plunder of the provincials. Accordingly, they resolved to offer the most vigorous opposition to the bill. In the senate Caesar was almost the only member of the senate who came forward in its support. Party spirit ran to such a height that the most serious riots ensued. The aristocracy, headed by the consul C. Piso, made an attack upon Gabinius, who, in danger of his life, fled for refuge to the people; and they, in their turn, led on by Gabinius, assaulted the senate-house, and would probably have sacrificed the consul to their fury, had not Gabinius effected his rescue, dreading the odium which such a catastrophe would have occasioned. Even Pompey himself was threatened by the consul, "If you emulate Romulus, you will not escape the punishment of Romulus." The day came for putting the bill to the vote, Pompey affected to be anxious for a little rest, and entreated the people to appoint another to the command, but this piece of hypocrisy deceived no one. Q. Catulus and Q. Hortensius spoke against the bill with great eloquence, but with no effect. Thereupon the tribune L. Trebellius, whom the aristocracy had gained over, placed his veto upon the voting; and as no threats nor entreaties could induce him to withdraw his opposition, Gabinius proposed that he should be deprived of his tribuneship. Even then it was not till seventeen out of the thirty-five tribes had voted for its degradation, that Trebellius gave way, and withdrew his veto. It was now too late in the day to come to any decision, but on the following morning the bill was passed, and became a law. When Pompey appeared before the people and accepted the command, he was received with shouts of joy; and upon his asking for still greater means in order to bring the war to a conclusion, his requests were readily complied with. He now obtained 500 vessels, 120,000 sailors and foot-soldiers, 5000 horse-soldiers, 24 legates, and the power of taking such sums of money as he might think fit out of the public treasury. On the day that the bill was passed the price of provisions at Rome immediately fell: this was to the people the most natural and easily comprehensible of all the consequences of the aristocracy, and showed, at all events, the immense confidence which all parties placed in the military abilities of Pompey.

Pompey completed all his preparations by the end of the winter, and was ready to commence operations early in the spring. His plans were formed with great skill and judgment and were crowned with complete success. He stationed his legates with different squadrons in various parts of the Mediterranean to prevent the pirates from uniting, and to hunt them out of the various bays and creeks in which they concealed themselves; while, at the same time, he swept the middle of the sea with the main body of his fleet, and drove them eastwards. In forty days he cleared the western sea of pirates, and restored communication between Spain, Africa, and Italy. After then remaining a short time in Italy, he sailed from Brundisium; and on his way towards Cilicia, where the pirates had gathered in large numbers, he stopped at Athens, where he was received with divine honours. With the assistance of his legates he cleared the seas as he went along; and, in consequence of his treating mercifully the crews which fell into his power, numbers surrendered themselves to him, and it was chiefly through their means that he was able to track out the lurking places of those who still lay in concealment. The main body of the pirates had deposited their families and property in the heights of Mount Taurus, and with their ships awaited Pompey's approach off the promontory of Coracaesium in Cilicia. Here the decisive battle was fought; the pirates were defeated, and fled for refuge into the town, which they shortly afterwards surrendered with all their property, and promised to evacuate all their strong places. The humanity with which Pompey had acted during the whole of the war, contributed very much to this result, and saved him a tedious and difficult campaign among the fastnesses of Mount Taurus. More than 20,000 prisoners fell into his hands; and as it would have been dangerous to turn them loose upon society without creating some provision for them, he settled them in various towns, where it would be difficult for them to resume their former habits of life. Those on whom most reliance could be placed were distributed among the small and somewhat depopulated cities of Cilicia, and a large number was settled at Soli, which had been lately deprived of its inhabitants by the Armenian king Tigranes, and which was henceforward called Pompeioopolis. The worse class were removed to Dyne in Achain, or to Calabria. The second part of this campaign, reckoning from the time that Pompey sailed from Brundisium, occupied only forty-nine days, and the whole war was brought to a conclusion in the course of three months; so that, to adopt the panegyric of Cicero (pro Leg. Mon. 12) "Pompey made his preparations for the war at the end of the winter, entered upon it at the commencement of spring, and finished it in the middle of the summer." Pompey, however, did not immediately return to Rome, but was employed during the remainder of this year and the beginning of the following (b.c. 66) in visiting the cities of Cilicia and Pamphylia, and providing for the government of the newly-conquered districts. It was during this time that he received ambassadors from the Cretans, and endeavoured to obtain the credit of the pacification of that island, which had been completed by Q. Metellus. The history of this event is related elsewhere. [METELLUS, No. 23.]

Pompey was now anxious to obtain the command of the war against Mithridates. The rapidity with which he had crushed the pirates, whose power had been so long an object of dread, formed a striking contrast to the long-continued struggle which Lucullus had been carrying on ever since the year b.c. 74 with the king of Pontus. Nay more, the victories which Lucullus had gained at first had been forgotten in the disasters, which the Roman armies had lately experienced, and in consequence of which Mithridates was now once more in possession of his hereditary dominions. The end of the war seemed more distant than ever. The people demanded again the invincible arm of Pompey. Accordingly, the tribune C. Manlius, who had been secured by Pompey and his friends, brought forward a bill at the beginning of b.c. 66, giving to Pompey the command of the war against Mithridates, with unlimited power over the army and the fleet in the East, and with the rights of a proconsul in the whole of Asia as far as Armenia. As his proconsular power already extended over all the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean in virtue of the Gabinian law, this new measure virtually placed almost the whole of the Roman dominions in his hands. But there was no power, however excessive, which the people were not ready to intrust to their favourite hero; and the bill was accordingly passed, notwithstanding the opposition of Hortensius, Catulus, and the aristocratical party. Cicero advocated the measure in an oration which has come down to us (Pro Leg. Manilia), and Caesar likewise supported it with his growing popularity and influence. On receiving intelligence of this new appointment, Pompey, who was then in Cilicia, complained that his enemies would not let him rest in peace, and that they were exposing him to new dangers in hopes of getting rid of him. This piece of hypocrisy, however, deceived no one, and Pompey himself exhibited no unwillingness to take the command which had been given him. He immediately crossed the Taurus, and received the army from Lucullus, whom he treated with marked contempt, repealing all his measures and disparaging his exploits.

The power of Mithridates had been broken by the previous victories of Lucullus, and the successes which the king had gained lately were only of a temporary nature, and were mainly owing to the disorganisation of the Roman army. The most difficult part of the war had already been finished before Pompey was appointed to the command, and it was therefore only left to him to bring it to a conclusion. For this purpose he had a more numerous army and a more powerful fleet than Lucullus had POMPEIUS. ever possessed. The plan of his campaign, however, was characterised by great military skill, and fully justified the confidence which the Roman people reposed in him. One of his first measures was to secure the friendship and alliance of the Parthian king, Phraates III., a step by which he not only deprived Mithridates of all hopes of the co-operation of that monarch, but likewise cut him off from all assistance from the Armenian king Tigranes, who was now obliged to look to the safety of his own dominions. Pompey next stationed his fleet in different squadrons around the coasts of Asia Minor, in order to deprive Mithridates of all communication from the sea, and he then proceeded in person at the head of his land forces against the King. Thus thrown back upon his own resources, Mithridates sued for peace, but as Pompey would hear of nothing but unqualified submission, the negotiation was broken off. The king was still at the head of an army of 30,000 foot and 2000 horse, but he knew too well the strength of a Roman army to venture an engagement with these forces, and accordingly withdrew gradually to the frontiers of Armenia. For a long time he succeeded in avoiding a battle, but he was at length surprised by Pompey in Lesser Armenia, as he was marching through a narrow pass, and was obliged to fight. The battle was soon decided; the king lost the greater number of his troops, and escaped with only a few horsemen to the fortress of Synorium, on the borders of the Greater Armenia. Here he collected again a considerable force; but as Tigranes refused to admit him into his dominions, because he suspected him of fomenting the intrigues of his son against him, Mithridates had no alternative but to take refuge in his own distant dominions in the Cimmer-erian Bosporus. To reach them he had to march through Colchis, and to fight his way through the wild and barbarous tribes that occupied the country between the Caucasus and the Euxine. He, however, succeeded eventually in his arduous attempt, and reached the Bosporus in safety in the course of next year. Pompey abandoned at present all thoughts of following the fugitive king, and resolved at once to attack the king of Armenia, who was now the more formidable of the two monarchs. But before commencing his march he founded the city of Nicopolis in Lesser Armenia as a memorial of his victory over Mithridates.

On entering Armenia Pompey met with no opposition. He was joined by the young Tigranes, who had revolted against his father, and all the cities submitted to them on their approach. When the Romans drew near to Artaxata, the king, deserted by his army and his court, had no alternative but submission, and accordingly went out to meet Pompey, and threw himself before him as a suppliant. Pompey received him with kindness, aknowledged him as king of Armenia, and demanded only the payment of 6000 talents. His foreign possessions, however, in Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia, Galatia, and Cappadocia, which had been conquered by Lucullus, were to belong to the Romans. To his son Tigranes Sophene and Gor-dyene were given as an independent kingdom; but as the young prince was discontented with this arrangement, and even ventured to utter threats, Pompey had him arrested, and kept him in chains to grace his triumph.

After thus settling the affairs of Armenia, fleet to cruise in the Euxine, and seize all vessels that attempted to carry provisions to the king in the Bosporus.

In the spring of B.C. 64 Pompey left his winter-quarters in Pontus, and set out for Syria. In his march he passed the field of battle near Zela, where Valerius Triarius, the legate of Lucullus, had been defeated by Mithridates three years before, with a loss of more than 7000 men. Pompey collected their bones which still lay upon the field, and buried them with due honours. On his arrival in Syria, he opposed Andronicus Asiaticus [Antiochus XIII.], whom Lucullus had allowed to take possession of the throne, after the defeat of Tigranes, and made the country a Roman province. He likewise compelled the neighbouring princes, who had established independent kingdoms on the ruins of the Syrian empire, to submit to the Roman dominion. The whole of this year was occupied with the settlement of Syria, and the adjacent countries.

Next year, B.C. 63, Pompey advanced farther south, in order to establish the Roman supremacy in Phoenicia, Coele-Syria and Palestine. In the latter country, however, a severe struggle awaited it. The country was at the time distracted by a civil war between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, the two sons of Aristobulus I., who died B.C. 105. Pompey espoused the side of Hyrcanus; and Aristobulus, who at first had made preparations for resistance, surrendered himself to Pompey, when the latter had advanced near to Jerusalem. But the Jews themselves refused to follow the example of their king: the more patriotic and fanatical took refuge in the fortress of the temple, broke down the bridge which connected it with the city, and prepared to hold out to the last. They refused to listen to any overtures for a surrender; and it was not till after a siege of three months that the place was taken. Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, the first time that any human being, except the high-priest, had dared to penetrate into this sacred spot. He reinstated Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, and left the government in his hands, but at the same time compelled him to recognise the authority of Rome by the payment of an annual tribute: Aristobulus he took with him as a prisoner. It was during this war in Palestine that Pompey received intelligence of the death of Mithridates. [MITHRIDATES, VI.] Pompey now led his troops back into Pontus for the winter, and began to make preparations for his return to Italy. He confirmed Pharmaces, the son and murderer of Mithridates, in the possession of the kingdom of Bosporus; Deiotarus, tetrarch of Galatia, who had supported the Romans in their war with Mithridates, was rewarded with an extension of territory, and Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, was restored to his kingdom. After making all the arrangements necessary to secure the Roman supremacy in the East, Pompey set out for Italy, which he reached at the end of B.C. 62. His arrival had been long looked for by all parties with various feelings of hope and fear. The aristocracy dreaded that he would come as their master; the popular party, and especially the enemies of Cicero, hoped that he would punish the latter for his unconstitutional proceedings in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy; and both parties felt that at the head of his victorious army he might seize upon the supreme power, and play the part of Sulla. Pompey, however, soon calmed these apprehensions. He disbanded his army almost immediately after landing at Brundisium; but he did not proceed straightforwardly to Rome, as he was anxious to learn something more accurately the state of parties before he made his appearance in the city. When he at length set out, he was received by all the cities through which he passed with an enthusiasm which knew no bounds; and as he approached the capital, the population flocked out to meet him, and greeted him with the wildest acclamations of joy. After remaining in the neighbourhood of the city for some months, he at length entered it in triumph, on his birth-day, the 30th of September, B.C. 61. Pompey had just completed his forty-fifth year, and this was the third time that he had enjoyed the honour of a triumph. His admirers represented him as celebrating now his victory over the third continent, just as his first triumph had been gained over Africa, and his second over Europe. This triumph, however, was not only the greatest of the three, but the most splendid that the Romans had ever yet seen. It lasted for two days, although there was no army to lengthen out the procession. In front, large tablets were carried, specifying the nations and kings he had conquered, and proclaiming that he had taken 1000 strong fortresses, and nearly 900 towns and 900 ships; that he had founded 50 cities, that he had raised the revenue of the Roman people from 50 millions to 85 millions, and that he had brought into the treasury 20,000 talents, in addition to 16,000 that he had distributed among his troops at Ephesus. Next followed an endless train of wagons loaded with the treasures of the East. On the second day Pompey himself entered the city in his triumphal car, preceded by the princes and chiefs whom he had taken prisoners, or received as hostages, 324 in number, and followed by his legates and military tribunes, who concluded the procession. After the triumph, he displayed his clemency by sparing the lives of his prisoners, and dismissing them to their various states, with the exception of Aristobulus and Tigranes, who, he feared, might excite commotions in Judaea and Armenia respectively, if they were set at liberty.

With this triumph the first and most glorious part of Pompey's life may be said to have ended. Hitherto he had been employed almost exclusively in war, and his whole life had been an almost uninterrupted succession of military glory. But now he was called upon to play a prominent part in the civil commotions of the commonwealth, a part for which neither his natural talents nor his previous habits had in the least fitted him. From the death of Sulla to the present time, a period of nearly twenty years, he had been unquestionably the first man in the Roman world, but he did not retain much longer this proud position, and eventually discovered that the genius of Caesar had reduced him to a second place in the state. It would seem as if Pompey on his return to Rome hardly knew himself what part to take in the politics of the city. He had been appointed to the command against the pirates and Mithridates in opposition to the aristocracy, and they still regarded him with jealousy and distrust. He could not therefore ally himself to them, especially too as some of their most influential leaders, such as M. Crassus, L. Lucullus, and Metellus Creticus, were his personal enemies. At the same time he does not seem to have been disposed to unite himself to the popular party, which had risen into importance during his absence in the East, and over which Caesar possessed unbounded influence. The object, however, which engaged the immediate attention of Pompey was to obtain from the senate a ratification for all his acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. In order to secure this object the more certainly, he had purchased the consulsiphip for one of his creatures, L. Afranius, who accordingly was elected with Q. Metellus for the year b.c. 60. But he was cruelly disappointed; L. Afranius was a man of slender ability and little courage, and did hardly any thing to promote the views of his patron: the senate, glad of an opportunity to put an affront upon a man whom they both feared and hated, resolutely refused to sanction Pompey's measures in Asia. This was the unwisest thing the senate could have done. If they had known their real interests, they would have yielded to all Pompey's wishes, and have sought by every means to win him over to their side, as a counterpoise to the growing and more dangerous influence of Caesar. But their shortsighted policy threw Pompey into Caesar's arms, and thus sealed the downfall of their party. Pompey was resolved to fulfill the promises he had made to his Asiatic clients and his veteran troops; his honour and reputation were pledged; and the refusal of the senate to redeem his pledge was an insult that he could not brook, more especially as he might have entered Rome at the head of his army, and have obtained his wishes with his sword. With these feelings Pompey broke off all connection with the aristocracy, and devoted himself to Caesar, who promised to obtain for him the ratification of his acts. Pompey, on his side, agreed to support Caesar in all his measures; and that they might be more sure of carrying their plans into execution, Caesar prevailed upon Pompey to become reconciled to Crassus, who by his connections, as well as by his immense wealth, had great influence at Rome. Pompey, Caesar, and Crassus, accordingly agreed to assist one another against their mutual enemies; and thus was first formed the first triumvirate.

This union of the three most powerful men at Rome crushed the aristocracy for the time. Supported by Pompey and Crassus, Caesar was able in his consulship, b.c. 59, to carry all his measures. An account of these is given elsewhere. [CAESAR, p. 543.] It is only necessary to mention here, that by Caesar's agrarian law, which divided the rich Campanian land among the poorer citizens, Pompey was able to fulfill the promises he had made to his veterans; and that Caesar likewise obtained from the people a ratification of all Pompey's acts in Asia. In order to cement their union more closely, Caesar gave to Pompey his daughter Julia in marriage, Pompey having shortly before divorced his wife Mucia. At the beginning of the following year, b.c. 58, Gabinius and Piso entered upon the consulsiphip, and Caesar went to his province in Gaul. Pompey retired with his wife Julia to his villa of Albanum near Rome, and took hardly any part in public affairs during this year. He quietly allowed Clodius to ruin Cicero, whom the triumvirs had determined to leave to his fate. Cicero therefore went into banishment; but after Clodius had once gained from the triumvirs the great object he had desired, he did not care any longer to consult their views. He restored Tigranes to liberty whom Pompey had kept in confinement, ridiculed the great Emperor before the people, and was accused of making an attempt upon Pompey's life. Pompey in revenge resolved to procure the recall of Cicero from banishment, and was thus brought again into some friendly connections with the aristocratical party. With Pompey's support the bill for Cicero's return was passed in b.c. 57, and the orator arrived at Rome in the month of September. To show his gratitude, Cicero proposed that Pompey should have the superintendence of the corn-market throughout the whole republic for a period of five years, since there was a scarcity of corn at Rome, and serious riots had ensued in consequence. A bill was accordingly passed, by which Pompey was made the Praefectus Amonae for five years. In this capacity he went to Sicily, and sent his legates to various parts of the Mediterranean, to collect corn for the capital; and the price in consequence soon fell. About this time there were many discussions in the senate respecting the restoration of Ptolemy Aeuleus to Egypt. Ptolemy had come to Rome, and been received by Pompey in his villa at Albanum, and it was generally believed that Pompey himself wished to be sent to the East at the head of an army for the purpose of restoring the Egyptian monarch. The senate, however, dreaded to let him return to the scene of his former triumphs, where he possessed unbounded influence; and accordingly they discovered, when he was in Sicily and Ptolemy in Ephesus, that the Silyline books forbade the employment of force.

Pompey returned to Rome early in b.c. 56; and though he could not obtain for himself the mission to the East, he used all his influence in order that the late consul, Lentulus Spinther, who had obtained the province of Cilicia, should restore Ptolemy to his kingdom. Clodius, who was now cured of sulphur, accused Milo at the beginning of February; and when Pompey spoke in his favour, he was abused by Milo in the foulest manner, and held up to laughter and scorn. At the same time he was attacked in the senate by the tribune C. Cato, who openly charged him with treachery towards Cicero. The evident delight with which the senate listened to the attack inflamed Pompey's anger to the highest pitch; he spoke openly of conspiracies against his life, denounced Crassus as the author of them, and threatened to take measures for his security. He had now lost the confidence of all parties; the senate hated and feared him; the people had deserted him for their favourite Clodius; and he had no other resource left but to strengthen his connection with Caesar, and to avail himself of the popularity of the conqueror of Gaul for the purpose of maintaining his own power and influence. This was a bitter draught for the conqueror of the East to swallow: he was already compelled to confess that he was only the second man in the state. But as he had no alternative, he repaired to Caesar's winter-quarters at Lucca, whither Crassus had already gone before him. Caesar reconciled Pompey and Crassus to one another, and concluded a secret agreement with them, in virtue of which they were to be consuls for the next year, and obtain provinces and armies, while he was to have his government prolonged for an.
other five years, and to receive pay for his troops. This arrangement took place about the middle of April. Pompey now hastened to Sardinia and Africa in order to have plenty of corn to distribute among the people, which was always one of the surest means of securing popularity with the rabble of the city. Pompey and Crassus, however, experienced more opposition to their election than they had anticipated. It is true that all the other candidates gave way with the exception of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus; but support for M. Cato and the interrex. The consul Lentulus Marcellinus likewise was resolved to use every means to prevent their election; and Pompey and Crassus, finding it impossible to carry their election while Marcellinus was in office, availed themselves of the veto of the tribunes Nonius Sufenas and C. Cato to prevent the consular comitia from being held this year. The elections therefore did not take place till the beginning of b.c. 55, under the presidency of an interrex. Even then Ahenobarbus and Cato did not relax in their opposition, and it was not till the armed bands of Pompey and Crassus had cleared the Campus Martius of their adversaries that they were declared consuls.

Thus, in b.c. 55, Pompey and Crassus were consuls the second time. They forthwith proceeded to carry into effect the compact that had been made at Luca. They got the tribune C. Trebonius to bring forward bills, one of which gave the province of the two Spains to Pompey, and that of Syria to Crassus, and the other prolonged Caesar’s government for five years more, namely from the 1st of January, b.c. 53, to the end of the year 49. Pompey was now at the head of the state, and at the expiration of his year of office, would no longer be a private man, but at the head of an army, and in the possession of the imperium. With an army he felt sure of regaining his former influence; and he did not see that Caesar had only used him as his tool to promote his own ends, and that sooner or later he must succumb to the superior genius of his colleague. Pompey had now completed the theatre which he had been some time building; and, as a means of regaining the popular favour, he resolved to open it with an exhibition of games of unparalleled splendour and magnificence. The theatre itself was worthy of the conqueror of the East. It was the first stone theatre that had been erected at Rome, and was sufficiently large to accommodate 40,000 spectators. It was situate in the Campus Martius, and was built on the model of one which Pompey had seen at Mytilene, in the year 62. The games exhibited by Pompey lasted many days, and consisted of scenic representations, in which the actor Aesopus appeared for the last time, gymnastic contests, gladiatorial combats, and fights of wild beasts. Five hundred African lions were killed, and eighteen elephants were attacked and most of them put to death by Gaetulian huntsmen. A rhinoceros was likewise exhibited on this occasion for the first time. The splendour of these games charmed the people for the moment, but were not sufficient to regain him his lost popularity. Of this he had a striking proof almost immediately afterwards; for the people began to express their dis- content when he levied troops in Italy and Cisalpine Gaul and sent them into Spain under the command of his legates, L. Afranius and M. Petreius, while he himself remained in the neighbourhood of the city. Pompey’s object now was to obtain the dictatorship, and to make himself the undisputed master of the Roman world. Caesar’s continued successes in Gaul and Britain, and his increasing power and influence, at length made it clear to Pompey that a struggle must take place between them, sooner or later; but down to the breaking out of the civil war, he seems to have thought that Caesar would never venture to draw the sword against him, and that as long as he could rule the senate and the comitia, his rival would likewise be obliged to submit to his sway. The death of his wife Julia, in b.c. 54, to whom he was tenderly attached, broke one link which still connected him with Caesar; and the fall of Crassus in the following year (b.c. 53), in the Parthian expedition, removed the only person who had the least chance of contesting the supremacy with them. In order to obtain the dictatorship, Pompey secretly encouraged the civil discord with which the state was torn asunder, hoping that the senate and the people, tired of a state of anarchy, would at length throw themselves into his arms for the purpose of regaining peace and order. In consequence of the riots, which he secretly abetted, the consular comitia could not be held in b.c. 54, and it was not till the middle of b.c. 53 that Domitius Calvinus and Valerius Messalla were chosen consuls, and that the other magistrates were elected. But new times had filled the mind of both with a desire for the consulship, and Clodius for the praetorship; each was attended by a band of hired ruffians; battles took place almost every day between them in the forum and the streets; all order and government were at an end. In such a state of things no elections could be held; and the confusion at length became downright anarchy, when Milo murdered Clodius on the 20th of January in the following year (b.c. 52). [Vol. I. p. 774.] The senate, unable to restore order, had now no alternative but calling in the assistance of Pompey. They therefore commissioned him to collect troops and put an end to the disturbances. Pompey, who had at length obtained the great object of his desires, obeyed with alacrity; he was invested with the supreme power of the state by being elected sole consul on the 25th of February; and in order to deliver the city from Milo and his myrmidons, he brought forward laws against violence (De Vr) and bribery at elections. Milo was put upon the trial; the court was surrounded with soldiers, and the accused went into exile. Others also were condemned, and peace was once more restored to the state. Having thus established order, he made Metellus Scipio, whose daughter Cornelia he had married since Julia’s death, his colleague on the 1st of August, and then held the comitia for the election of the consuls for the ensuing year. He next proceeded to strike a blow at Caesar. He brought forward an old law, which had fallen into disuse that no one should become a candidate for a public office in his absence, in order that Caesar might be obliged to resign his command, and to place himself in the power of his enemies at Rome, if he wished to obtain the consularship a second time. But the renewal of this enactment was so manifestly aimed at Caesar that his friends insisted he should be specially exempted from it; and as Pompey was not yet prepared to break openly with him, he thought it more expedient to yield. Pompey at the same time provided
The history of the next four years (b. c. 51—48) is related at length in the life of Caesar [Vol. I. pp. 549—552]; and it is, therefore, only necessary to give here a brief outline of the remaining events of Pompey’s life. In n. c. 51 Pompey became reconciled to the aristocracy, and was now regarded as their acknowledged head, though it appears that he never obtained the full confidence of the party. In the following year (n. c. 50) the struggle between Caesar and the aristocracy came to a crisis. The latter demanded that Caesar should resign his province and come to Rome as a private man in order to sue for the consulship; but it would have been madness in Caesar to place himself in the power of his enemies, who had an army in the neighbourhood of the city under the command of Pompey. There was no doubt that he would immediately have been brought to trial, and his condemnation would have been certain, since Pompey would have overawed the judges by his soldiery as he had done at the trial of Milo. Caesar, however, agreed to resign his provinces, and disband his army, provided Pompey would do the same. This proposition, however, was rejected, and Caesar prepared for war. He had reconquered Gaul, and could confidently rely on the fidelity of his veteran troops, whom he had so often led to victory and glory. At the same time he lost no opportunity of strengthening his interest at Rome; the immense wealth he had acquired by the conquest of Gaul was lavishly spent in gaining over many of the most influential men in the city; the services of the consul Aemilius Paulus and of the tribune Curio, who were reckoned devoted partizans of Pompey, were purchased by enormous bribes. Pompey, on the other hand, neglected to prepare for the coming contest; he was firmly convinced, as we have already remarked, that Caesar would never venture to march against the constituted authorities of the state; and if he were mad enough to draw the sword, Pompey believed that his troops would desert him in the desperate enterprise, while his own fame and the cause of the republic would attract to his standard a multitude of soldiers from all parts of Italy. So confident was he of success that he did not attempt to levy troops; and when some of his friends remonstrated with him, and pointed out the defenceless condition of their party, if Caesar advanced against the city, Pompey replied “that he had only to stamp with his foot in any part of Italy, and numbers of troops would immediately spring up.” He was confirmed in the conviction of his own popularity by the interest expressed on his behalf during a dangerous illness by which he was attacked this year at Nepolis. Many cities offered sacrifices for his restoration to health; and on his recovery public rejoicings took place in numerous towns of Italy. But he was soon cruelly undeceived. At the beginning of n. c. 49 the senate decreed that Caesar should disband his army by a certain day, or otherwise he would be regarded as an enemy of the state. Two of the tribunes put their veto upon the decree, but their opposition was set at nought, their lives were threatened, and they fled for refuge to Caesar’s camp. Caesar hesitated no longer; he crossed the Rubicon, which separated his province from Italy, and at the head of a single legion marched upon Rome. He was received with enthusiasm by the Italian towns; his march was like a triumphal progress; city after city threw open their gates to him; the troops of the aristocracy went over to his side; and Pompey, after all his confident boasting, found himself unable to defend the capital. He fled, with all the leading senators, first to Capua, where he remained for a short time, and subsequently to Brundisium. Caesar, however, gave him no rest; by the 8th of March he was under the walls of Brundisium; and as Pompey despaired of holding out in that city, he embarked on the 15th of the month, and crossed over to Greece. As Caesar had no ships he could not follow him for the present, and therefore marched against Pompey’s legates in Spain, whom he conquered in the course of the same year.

In the next year (n. c. 48) the war was decided. Early in January Caesar arrived in Greece, and forthwith commenced active operations. Pompey meantime had collected a numerous army in Greece, Egypt, and the East, the scene of his former glories. But although his troops far outnumbered Caesar’s, he well knew that they were no match for them in the field, and therefore prudently resolved to decline a battle. His superiority in cavalry enabled him to check off Caesar’s supply, and gave him the complete command of all the provinces of the country. The utmost scarcity began to prevail in Caesar’s camp; since not only could he obtain nothing from the country, but he was likewise unable to receive any supplies from Italy, in consequence of the fleet of Pompey, which had the entire command of the sea. But Pompey was prevented from carrying out the prudent plan which he had formed for conducting the campaign. His camp was filled with a multitude of Roman nobles, unacquainted with war, and anxious to return to their estates in Italy and to the luxuries of the capital. Their superior numbers made them sure of victory; and Pompey’s success at Dyrhacium, when he broke through Caesar’s lines and compelled him to retire with considerable loss, rendered them still more confident of success. Pompey’s unwillingness to fight, which only showed that he understood his position far better than the vain and ignorant nobles who would school him, was set down to his love of power and his anxiety to keep the senate in subjection. Stung with the reproaches with which he was assailed, and likewise elated to some degree by his victory at Dyrhacium, he resolved to bring the contest to an issue. Accordingly, he offered battle to Caesar in the plain of Pharsalia in Thessaly, on the 9th of August, and the result justified his previous fears. His numerous army was completely defeated by Caesar’s veterans. This defeat by his great rival seems at once to have driven Pompey to despair. He made no attempt to rally his forces, though he might still have collected a considerable army; but regarding every thing as lost, he hurried to the sea-coast with a few friends, only anxious to escape from the country. He embarked on board a merchant ship at the mouth of the river Penus, and first sailed to Lesbos, where he took up his wife Cornelia, who was staying in the island, and from thence made for the coast of Pamphylia, where he was joined by several vessels and many senators. His friends now advised him to seek refuge in Egypt, since he had been the means of restoring to his kingdom the lost part of the province of Egypt under monarch, and might, therefore, reckon upon the gratitude of the court. He accordingly set sail for Egypt, with a considerable fleet and about 2000 soldiers, and upon his arrival off the coast sent to beg for the protection of the king. The latter was only thirteen years of age, and the government was in the hands of Pothinus, an eunuch, Theodotus of Chios, and Achillas. These three men, dreading Caesar's anger if they received Pompey, and likewise fearing the resentment of the latter if they forbade him to land, resolved to release themselves from their difficulties by putting him to death. They accordingly sent out a small boat, took Pompey on board with three or four attendants, and rowed for the shore. His wife and friends watched him from the ship, anxious to see in what manner he would be received by the king, who was standing on the edge of the sea with his troops; but just as the boat reached the shore, Pompey threw down his hat, and, rising from his seat, in order to step on land, he was stabbed in the back by Septimius, who had formerly been one of his centurions, and was now in the service of the Egyptian monarch. Achillas and the rest then drew their swords; whereupon Pompey covered his face with his toga, without uttering a word, and calmly submitted to his fate. He was killed on the 29th of September, the day before his birth-day, B.c. 48, and had consequently just completed his 58th year. His head was cut off, and his body, which was thrown out naked on the shore, was buried by his freedman Philippus, who had accompanied him from the ship. The head was brought to Caesar when he arrived in Egypt soon afterwards, but he turned away from the sight, shed tears at the untimely end of his rival, and put his murderers to death.

The character of Pompey is not difficult to estimate. He was simply a soldier; his life from his seventeenth to his forty-second year was spent almost entirely in military service; and when he returned to Rome after the conquest of Mithridates, he did not possess any knowledge of civil affairs, and soon displayed his incompetency to take a leading part in the political commotions of the time. He had a high sense of his own importance, had been accustomed for years to the passive obedience which military discipline required, and expected to be treated at Rome with the same deference and respect which he had received in the camp. With an overweening sense of his own influence, he did not condescend to attach himself to any political party, and thus became an object of suspicion to both the aristocracy and the people. He soon found out, what Marius had discovered before him, that something more was required than military glory to retain the affections of the multitude; and he never learnt the way to win the heart of the people. He was of a cold and phlegmatic temperament, and seems to have possessed scarcely any personal friends among the Roman nobles. He was both a proud and a vain man, faults which above all others make a man disliked by his associates and equals. At the same time his moral character was superior to that of the majority of his contemporaries; and he was free from most of the vices which prevailed all the higher ranks of society at the time. The ancient writers bear almost unanimous testimony to the purity of his marriage life, to his affection for his intimate wives, to the simplicity and frugality of his mode of life, and to the control which he possessed over his passions and appetites. In his government of the provinces he also exhibited a striking contrast to most of the Roman nobles; justice was not to be purchased from him, nor did he enrich himself, according to the ordinary fashion, by plundering the subjects of Rome. His untimely death excites pity; but no one, who has well studied the state of parties at the downfall of the Roman commonwealth, can regret his fall. He had united himself to a party which was intent on its own aggrandizement and the ruin of its opponents; and there is abundant evidence to prove, that had that party gained the mastery, a proscription far more terrible than Sulla's would have taken place, the lives of every distinguished man on the other side would have been sacrificed, their property confiscated, and Italy and the provinces plundered of their most precious and profligate and unprincipled nobles. From such horrors the victory of Caesar saved the Roman world.

Pompey was married several times. His wives and children are mentioned in the Stemmata in p. 475, and an account of his two surviving sons is given below. Pompey never had his own portrait struck upon his coins; but it appears on the coins of Pompeipolis and on those of his sons Cneius and Sextus. [See below Nos. 24 and 25.]

(The principal ancient authorities for the life of Pompey are the biography of Plutarch, the histories of Dion Cassius, Appian, and Velleius Paterculus, the Civil War of Caesar, and the Letters and Orations of Cicero. His life is related at length by Drummans, Geschichtle Roms, vol. iv.)

23. Pompeia, sister of the triumvir. [Pompeia, No. 3.]

24. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, the eldest son of the triumvir [No. 22] by his third wife Mucia, was born between B.c. 80 and 75. He accompanied his father in the expedition against the pirates B.c. 67, but he must then have been too young to have taken any part in the war. On the breaking out of the civil war in B.c. 49, he was sent to Alexandria to obtain ships and troops for his father; and after procuring an Egyptian fleet of fifty ships he joined the squadron that was cruising in the Adriatic Sea in B.c. 48. Here he succeeded in taking several of Caesar's vessels off Oricum, and he made an unsuccessful attack upon the town of Lissus. After the defeat of his father at Pharsalia, he was deserted by the Egyptian fleet which he commanded, and he then repaired to the island of Corcyra, where many of the Roman nobles, who had survived the battle, had taken refuge. Here he maintained that, possessing as they did the command of the sea, they ought not to despair of success; and he was very nearly killing Cicero, when the latter recommended submission to the conqueror. On his way to Africa, which his party had resolved to make the scene of the war, he learnt from his brother Sextus the death of his father. He did not, however, remain long in Africa; but in the course of B.C. 47 set sail for Spain, in order to secure that country for his party, and by means of his father’s friends and dependents, to raise troops which might assist the aristocracy in Africa. But Cneius was some time in reaching Spain; after making an unsuccessful attack upon the town of Ascalum in Mauritania, he took possession of some of the islands off the Spanish coast, and appears not to have landed on the mainland till B.C. 46. He had not been here long before he was joined by his brother Sextus and others of his party, who had fled from Africa after their defeat at Thapsus. In a short time he was at the head of thirteen legions. Caesar sent his legate C. Didius against him, and towards the end of the year followed himself. The war was brought to a close by the battle of Munda, fought on the 17th of March, B.C. 45, in which Caesar entirely defeated the Pompeians. It was, however, the most bloody battle during the whole of the civil war; the Pompeians fought with the courage of despair; they drove back at first Caesar’s troops, and it was only by Caesar’s throwing himself into the front line of the battle, and exposing his person like a common soldier, that they were led back again to the charge. Cneius himself escaped with a severe wound, and fled to Carteia on the sea-coast. Here he embarked, and set sail with a squadron of twenty ships; but having been obliged to put to land again in consequence of neglecting to provide himself with water, he was surprised by Didius, who had sailed from Gades with a fleet, his ships were destroyed, and he himself obliged to take refuge in the interior of the country. But he could not remain concealed; the troops sent in pursuit of him overtook him near Laurum, and put him to death. His head was cut off, and carried to Caesar, who had it exposed to public view in the town of Hispalis, that there might be no doubt of his death. Cneius seems to have been by nature very gentle and passionate; and the misfortunes of his family rendered him cruel and suspicious. He burned to take vengeance on his enemies, and Rome had nothing to expect from him, if he had conquered, but a terrible and bloody proscription. (Caes. B. C. iii. 5, 40; Dion Cass. xiii. 12, 56, xiii. 14, 23–40; Appian, B. C. ii. 87, 103–105; Cic. ad Fam. vi. 18, xv. 19; Hirt, B. Afr. 22, 23; Aucler, B. Hist. 1–39.)

The annexed coin was probably struck by Cn. Pompey, when he was in Spain. It contains on the obverse the head of his father with CN. MAGN. IMP., and on the reverse a commander stepping out of a ship, and shaking hands with a woman, probably intended to represent Spain, with the legend M. MINAT. SABIN. PR. Q. Some writers suppose that this coin was struck by the triumvirs himself, but there is no reason to suppose that he ever had his own portrait struck upon his coins. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 292.)

25. Sex. Pompeius Magnus, the younger son of the triumvir [no. 22] by his third wife Mucia, was born B.C. 75; since he was forty at the time of his death in B.C. 35. (Appian, B. C. v. 144.)

During the campaign of his father against Caesar in Greece, Sextus was with his mother at Mytilene; and after the loss of the battle of Pharsalus in B.C. 48, he and his mother accompanied the elder Pompey to Egypt, and saw him murdered before their eyes. From thence they fled to Cyprus, and shortly afterwards joined Cn. Pompey and Cato. Sextus remained in Africa, while his brother Cneius went to Spain; but after the battle of Thapsus B.C. 46, which ruined all the hopes of the Pompeians in Africa, Sextus quitted that country, and repaired to his brother in Spain, together with Labienus and others of their party. In Spain he kept possession of Corduba till the defeat of his brother at the battle of Munda in March, B.C. 45. As soon as were the loss of this battle, he fled from Corduba, and lived for a time in concealment in the country of the Lactani, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees. Here he supported himself by robbery, and gradually collected a considerable band of followers, with whom he penetrated into the province of Baetica. The governor of the province, C. Carrinas, was unable to offer any effectual opposition to him; he was generally supported by the natives and the veterans of his father settled in the province; Carteia, and other towns, fell into his hands. The death of Caesar still further favoured his enterprises. Asinius Pollio, who had succeeded Carrinas in the government of the province, did not possess much military talent, and was on one occasion surprised and defeated by Sextus. This victory gave Sextus the command of almost the whole of Baetica, and turned towards him the attention of the parties that were now struggling for the supremacy at Rome. But as Sextus was already a man of mine for open war, his father, who had the command of the Neerest Spain and of Narbonese Gaul, was commissioned to make terms with Sextus. The latter agreed to lay aside hostilities on condition of his being allowed to return to Rome, and of receiving his patrimonial inheritance. These terms were assented to, and the senate voted a large sum of money to Sextus as an indemnification for that portion of his property which had been sold. So far matters seemed quiet, but they did not long continue so.

Antony and the aristocratical party soon came to an open rupture; Antony marched into Cisalpine Gaul to oppose Dec. Brutus, and the senate used every effort to obtain assistance against Antony. For this purpose they applied not only to Lepidus, but also to Pompey, who had come to Massilia with a fleet and an army in order to be nearer the scene of action, and to determine what course he should adopt. The senate, on the proposition of Cicero, passed a laudatory decree in his honour, and likewise appointed him to the command of the republican fleet; he did not, however, advance to the relief of Mutina, but remained inactive. Shortly after this Octavian threw off the mask he had hitherto worn, wrested the consulsiphip from the senate in the month of August (B.C. 43), and obtained the enactment of the Lex Pedla, by which all the murderers of Caesar were outlawed. Pompey was included among these murderers, although he had no share in the deed, and on the establishment of the triumvirate in October was proscribed. His fleet secured him safety; but as the governors of Gaul and Spain had declared in favour of the triumvirs, he had no fixed station on the mainland. He therefore cruised about, plundering the coasts both for the sake of support and with the view of injuring the triumvirs. His numbers gradually increased; some had been proscribed by the triumvirs, and multitudes of slaves, flocket to him; and he at length felt himself strong enough to take possession of Sicily, which he made his head quarters. The towns of Mylene, Tyndaris, Messana, and Sycnuse fell into his power, and the whole island eventually acknowledged his sway. A. Pompeius Bithynicus, who was propritor of Sicily, had at first repulsed Sextus in his attempts upon Messana, but had afterwards allowed him to obtain possession of the town on condition that they should rule together over Sicily; but this condition was never observed, and Sextus became the real master of the island. Sextus likewise received support from Q. Cornificius, the governor of Africa. Rome now began to suffer from want of its usual supplies, which were cut off by Sextus; and according Octavius sent against him a fleet commanded by his legate Q. Salvitiadius Rufus (c. 43). The latter succeeded in protecting the coasts of Italy from the ravages of Pompey's fleet but was defeated in the straits of Sicily when he ventured upon a naval engagement against the main body of Pompey's fleet. This battle was fought under the eyes of Octavian, who departed immediately afterwards for Greece, in order to prosecute the war against Brutus and Cassius. Pompey had now become stronger than ever. His naval superiority was incontestable; and in his arrogance he called himself the son of Neptune. About this time he put to death Pompeius Bithynicus under pretence of a conspiracy.

While the war was going on in Greece between the triumvirs and the republican party, Pompey remained inactive. This was a fatal mistake. He should either have attacked Italy and caused there a diversion in favour of Brutus and Cassius, or he should have supported the latter in Greece; for it was evident that if they fell, he must sooner or later fall likewise. But the fall of Pompey was delayed longer than might have been expected. Octavian on his return to Italy was engaged with the Perusian war (c. 41), and Pompey was thus enabled to continue his ravages upon the coasts of Italy without resistance. The continued misunderstandings between Octavian and Antony, which now threatened an open war, were still more favourable for Pompey. In the beginning of c. 40 Antony requested the assistance of Pompey against Octavian. Pompey forthwith sent troops into the south of Italy, but was obliged to withdraw them shortly afterwards, upon the reconciliation of the triumvirs at Brandisium. The triumvirs now resolved to make war upon Pompey; but as he was in possession of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, and his fleets plundered all the supplies of corn which came from Egypt and the eastern provinces, the utmost scarcity prevailed at Rome, and a famine seemed inevitable. The Roman populace were not content to wait for the conquest of Pompey; they rose in open insurrection and demanded of their new rulers a reconciliation with the master of the sea. Octavian thought it more prudent to yield; and accordingly a peace was negotiated between the triumvirs and Pompey, through the mediation of Scribonius Libo, the father-in-law of the latter. By this peace, which was concluded at Misenum in c. 39, the triumvirs granted to Pompey the provinces of Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, and Achaea, and promised him the consulsiply, the surname, and an indemnification of seventeen and a half million of drachmae for a private fortune: Pompey, on his part, promised to supply Italy with corn, to protect commerce in the Mediterranean, and to marry his daughter to M. Marcellus, the son of Octavia, the sister of the triumvir. But this peace was a mere farce. Antony refused to give up Achaea; and Pompey, therefore, recommended his piratical excursions. A war was inevitable: the only thing that could save Pompey was a quarrel between Octavian and Antony. In c. 38 Pompey sustained a severe loss in the desertion of one of his principal legates, Menas or Menodorus, who surrendered to Octavian Sardinia and Corsica, together with a large naval and military force [Menas]. This important accession determined Octavian to commence war immediately. He appointed C. Calvisius Sabinus to the command of his fleet, with Menas as his legate. This campaign was unfavourable to Octavian. His fleet was twice defeated by Antony's admirals, Cato and Cn. Cumaen by Menocrates, who, however, perished in the battle, and next off Messana, where his fleet was likewise almost destroyed by a storm. Pompey, however, did not follow up his success; he remained inactive, and lost, as usual, the favourable moment for action. Octavian, on the contrary, made every effort to equip a new fleet. He saw that it was absolutely necessary for him to crush Pompey before he ventured to measure his strength against Antony and Lepidus. He accordingly spent the whole of next year (c. 37) in making preparations for the war, and obtained assistance from both his colleagues, Antony and Lepidus. He appointed M. Vipsanius Agrippa to the supreme command of the whole fleet. Just before the breaking out of hostilities, Menas again played the deserter and returned to his old master's service, dissatisfied at having merely a subordinate command assigned to him. By the summer of c. 36, all the preparations of Octavian were completed, and the war commenced. He had three large fleets at his disposal; his own, stationed in the Julian harbour, which he had constructed near Baiae; that of Antony, under the command of Statilis Taurus, in the harbour of Tarentum: and that of Lepidus, off the coast of Africa. His plan was for all three fleets to set sail on the same day, and make a descent upon three different parts of Sicily. But a fearful storm marred this project; Lepidus alone reached the coast of Sicily, and landed at Lilybaeum; Statilis Taurus was able to put back to Tarentum; but Octavian, who was surprised by the storm off the Lucanian promontory of Palinurus, lost a great number of his ships, and was obliged to remain in Italy to repair his shattered fleet. This was a reprieve to Pompey, who offered sacrifices to Neptune for his timely assistance, but he still remained inactive. Menodorus, who had been already of considerable service to Pompey, again played the traitor and went over to Octavian. As soon as the fleet had been repaired, Octavian again set sail for Sicily. Agrippa defeated Pompey's.

fleet off Mylace, destroying thirty of his ships; but the decisive battle was fought on the third of September (a. c. 30), off Naulochus, a seaport between Mylace and the promontory of Pelorum. The Pompeian fleet was commanded by Demechares, and that of Octavian by Agrippa, each consisting of about 300 ships. Agrippa gained a brilliant victory; most of the Pompeian ships were destroyed or taken. Pompey himself fled first to Messana, where he straightway embarked together with his daughter, and set sail for the East with a squadron of seventeen ships. Octavian did not pursue him, as his attention was immediately called to the attempts of Lepidus to make himself independent of his colleague [LEPIDUS, p. 768, a.]. Pompey was thus enabled to reach Mytilene in safety, where he began to form schemes for seizing the eastern provinces of Antony, who had just returned from his disastrous campaign against the Parthians, in which he had barely escaped with his life. For this purpose he entered into negotiations with the chiefs in Thrace and the north-eastern coast of the Black Sea, and even opened a communication with the Parthians, thinking that they might, perhaps, trust him with an army, as he had done T. LAbienus a few years previously. He gave out that he was making preparations to carry on the war against Octavian.

In b. c. 35 Pompey crossed over from Lesbos to Asia. Here he soon disclosed his real designs by seizing upon Lampascus. Thereupon C. Furnius, the legate of Antony, declared open war against him; and Antony likewise sent Titius, with a fleet of 120 ships, to attack his naval forces. Unable to cope with so large a force, Pompey burnt his ships and united their crews to his army. His friends now recommended him to make terms with Antony; but, as their advice was not attended to, most of them deserted him, among whom was his father-in-law, Scribonius Libo. Thereupon he attempted to fly to Armenia, but he was overtaken by the troops of Antony, deserted by his own soldiers, and obliged to surrender. He was carried as a prisoner to Milletus, where he was shortly afterwards put to death (a. c. 35) by order of Titius. Titius, undoubtedly, would not have put Pompey to death on his own responsibility. It is probable that Plancus, the governor of Syria, to whom the execution of Pompey was attributed by many, had received orders from Antony to instruct his legates to execute Pompey, if he were seized in arms; but, as many persons lamented the death of Pompey, the son of the great conqueror of Asia, Antony was willing enough to throw the blame upon Plancus or Titius.

Sex. did not possess any great abilities. He took up arms from necessity, as he was first deprived of every thing by Caesar, and then proscribed by the triumvirs. His success was owing more to circumstances than to his own merits; the war between the triumvirs and the republicans, and subsequently the misunderstandings between Octavian and Antony, enabled him to obtain and keep possession of Sicily. He seems never to have aspired to supreme power. He would have been contented if he could have returned in safety to Rome, and have recovered his patrimony, and he carried on war for that purpose, and not for domination. He sought, however, to have seen that he could never have returned to Rome except as the conqueror of Octavian, and that his personal safety could only have been secured by his becoming the master of the Roman world. He was personally brave, but was deficient in refinement, and possessed scarcely any knowledge of literature. Veileins Paterculus says (li. 73) that he could not speak correctly, but this is doubtless an exaggeration; for Cicero saw little to alter in the letter which Sextus sent to him for correction before it was given to the consuls (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 4). Sextus assumed the surname of Pius, to show that he was an avenger of his father and brother. This surname appears on his coins [see below]. (Auct. B. Hisp. 3, &c. 32 ; Cic. ad Att. xii. 37, 44, xiv. 13, 21, 29, xv. 7, 20, 22, xvi. 1, Philipp. xiii. passim ; Appian, B. C. ii. 105, 122, iii. 4, iv. 84—117, v. 2—143 ; Dion Cass. lib. xvi. —xlix. ; Vell. Pat. ii. 73, 87 ; Liv. Epit. 123, 128, 129, 131.)

The coins of Sex. Pompey are numerous. On the obverse the head of his father is usually represented; and writers on numismatics state that the head on the obverse of his coins is always that of the triumvir; but we are tempted to think that it is in some cases that of Sextus himself. We subjoin a few specimens of some of the most important coins.

COINS OF SEX. POMPEIUS, THE SON OF THE TRIUMVIR.

The head on the obverse of the first two coins is supposed to be that of the triumvir. On the obverse of the former of these we have the legend Sex. Mag. PIVS. IMP. SAL. (the interpretation of which is doubtful), and on the reverse a female figure with the legend PIETAS. It has been already remarked that Sextus assumed the surname of Pius, to show that he wished to revenge the death of his father and brother; and for the same reason we find Pietas on the obverse of the coin. The obverse of the second coin has the legend Magnum IMP. ITER, with a lituus before the head of the triumvir, and an urceus behind; and the reverse has the legend PRAEP. CLAS. ET ORAE. MARIT. EX. S. C. He is called on this coin emperor a second time (iterum), because his victory over Asinius Pollio in Spain first gave him a claim.
to this title, and his defeat of the fleet of Augustus of Sicily enabled him to assume it a second time. The legend on the obverse, Praefectus Classis et Orar Mortimatis ex s. c., which appears on many of the coins of Sextus, has reference to the decree of the senate which conferred upon him the command of the fleet shortly after the death of Julius Caesar, as has been already related. The third coin is intended to indicate Pompey's command of the sea. It represents on the reverse a war-galley with a column, on which Neptune is standing, and on the reverse Seclia holding an oar in her two hands, and in the act of striking. (Eckhel, vol. vi. pp. 26—33.)

26. POMPÉA, the daughter of the triumvir, married Faustus Sulla. [POMPÉA, No. 4.]

27. POMPÉA, the daughter of Sex. Pompéius, No. 25. [POMPÉA, No. 5.]

28. CN. POMPÉIUS MAGNUS, was descended from the family of the triumvir, but his pedigree is not stated by the ancient writers. He was, most probably, a son of M. Licinius Crassus, Cos. a. d. 29, and Scribonia; the latter of whom was a daughter of Scribonius Libo and of Pompeia, the daughter of Sex. Pompey, who was a son of the triumvir. He would thus have been a great-grandson of Sex. Pompey, and great-grandson of the triumvir [see Sestius on p. 475]. It was not uncommon in the imperial period for persons to drop their paternal names, and assume the names of their maternal ancestors. Caligula would not allow this Pompey to use the cognomen of Magnus; but it was restored to him by the emperor Claudius, whose daughter Antonia he married. He was sent by his father-in-law to the senate to proclaim his victory over Britain. He was subsequently put to death by Claudius, at the instigation of Messalina. (Dion Cass. lx. 5, 21, 29; Zonar. xl. 9; Suet. Cal. 53, Claud. 27, 29; Senec. Apoloc. Claud.)

29. M. POMPÉIUS, the commander of the cavalry under Lucullus, in the third Mithridatic war. He was wounded and taken prisoner (Appian, Mithr. 79; Memnon, 45, ed. Orelli). Plutarch calls him Pompeonius (Lucull. 15), which Schweighäuser has introduced into the text of Appian, though all the MSS. of Appian have Pompéesis.

30. CN. POMPÉIUS, served in Caesar's army in Gaul, under the legate Q. Titurius, in b. c. 54. (Cass. B. G. v. 36.)

31. CN. POMPÉIUS, consul suffectus from the 1st of October, b. c. 31 (Fasti).

POMPÉIUS, a Latin grammarian of uncertain date, probably lived before Servius and Cassiodorus, as these writers appear to have made some use of his works. He wrote, 1. Commentarius artis Donati, on the different parts of speech, in thirty-one sections, and 2. Commentariolus in librum Donati de Barbaris et Metaphysmacis, in six sections. Both these works were published, for the first time, by Lindemann, Leipzig, 1821.

POMPÉIUS CATUSSA, an artist, whose name is found on a monument which he erected to his wife's memory, and which is now in the museum at Lyon. He is described in the inscription as a citizen of Sequana, and a tactor, that is, one of those artists who decorated the interiors of houses with ornamental plastering, a sort of work of which there are numerous examples at Pompeii. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 437.)

their matrimonial squabbles, of which he was an eye-witness (ad Att. v. 1). When their son, young Quintus, grew up, he endeavoured to reconcile his parents, and was encouraged in his filial task by both his uncles; but he did not meet with much success; and Q. Cicero, after leading a miserable life with his wife for almost twenty-four years, at length divorced her at the end of n. c. 45, or in the beginning of the following year. (Corn. Nep. Att. 5; Cic. ad Att. i. 5, v. 1, vii. 1, 5, xiv. 10, et alibi, ad Q. Fr. iii. 1, &c.)

3. The daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus. She is also called Caecilia, because her father was adopted by Q. Caecilius, and likewise Atticus. She was born in n. c. 51, after Cicero had left Italy for Cilicia. She is frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters to Atticus, and seems at an early age to have given promise of future excellence. She was still quite young when she was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. The marriage was negotiated by M. Antony, the triumvir, probably in n. c. 36. She was afterwards suspected of improper intercourse with the grammarian Q. Caecilius Epitrota, a freedman of her father, who instructed her. Her subsequent history is not known. Her husband Agrippa married Marcella in n. c. 28, and accordingly she must either have died or been divorced from her husband before that year. Her daughter Vipsania Agrippina married Tiberius, the successor of Augustus. (Cic. ad Att. v. 19, vi. 1, 2, 5, vii. 2, et alibi; Corn. Nep. Att. 12; Suet. Tib. 7. de Iustr. Gramm. 16.)

POMPONIA GRAECI'NA, the wife of A. Plautius, was accused in the reign of Claudius of practising religious worship unauthorised by the state; but her husband Plautius, who was allowed, on account of his victories in Britain, to judge her, in accordance with the old Roman law, declared her innocent. She was probably the daughter of P. Pomponius Graecinus, consul suffectus a. d. 16. She was related to Julius, the daughter of Drusus, and granddaughter of Pomponia, the daughter of Atticus; and she lived forty years after the death of Julius, who was executed by Claudius at the instigation of Messalina. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32.)

POMPONIA RUFI'NA, a Vestal virgin in the reign of Caracalla, put to death for violation of her vow of chastity. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 16.)

POMPONIA GENS, plebeian. Towards the end of the republic the Pomponii, like other Roman gentes, traced their origin to the remote times of the Roman state. They pretended to be descended from Pompe, one of the alleged sons of Numla (Plut. Num. 21); and they accordingly placed the image of this king upon their coins. In the earliest times the Pomponii were not distinguishable by any surname; and the only family that rose to importance in the time of the republic was that of Matho; the first member of which who obtained the consulship was M. Pomponius Matho in n. c. 253. On coins we also find the cognomens Mol'go, Musa and Rufus, but these surnames do not occur in ancient writers. The other cognomens in the time of the republic, such as Atticus, were not family names, but were rather descriptive of particular individuals. An alphabetical list of them is given below, as well as of the cognomens in the imperial period, which were rather numerous. (Comp. Drumann, Geschihte Rome, vol. v. p. 1, &c.)

POMPONI'NIUS. 1. M. POMPO'NIUS, one of the tribunes of the plebs, elected at the abolition of the decemvirs, b. c. 449. (Liv. iii. 54.)

2. M. Pomponius, consul tribune, b. c. 392, perhaps either a son or grandson of the preceding. (Liv. v. 13.)

3. Q. Pomponius, perhaps a younger brother of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs, b. c. 395, in which year he supported the views of the senate by opposing, in conjunction with his colleague, A. Virginius, the proposition that a portion of the senate and people should settle at Veii. He and his colleague were, in consequence, accused two years afterwards, and compelled to pay a heavy fine. (Liv. v. 29, comp. cc. 24, 25.)

4. M. Pomponius, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 392, brought an accusation against L. Manlius Imperiosus, who had been dictator in the preceding year, but was compelled to drop the accusation by the son of Manlius, afterwards surnamed Torquatus, who obtained admittance into the tribune's house, and threatened him with immediate death if he did not swear that he would abandon the impeachment of his father. (Liv. vii. 4, 5; Cic. de Off. iii. 30.; Val. Max. v. 4, § 3; Appian, Samn. 2.) [TORQUATUS.]

5. Sex. Pomponius, legatus of the consul Ti. Sempronius Longus in the first year of the first Punic war, b. c. 218. (Liv. xxi. 15.)

6. M. Pomponius, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 167, opposed, with his colleague M. Antonius, the proposition of the praetor M. Juventius Thalna, that war should be declared against the Rhodians. (Liv. xiv. 21.) Pomponius was praetor in b. c. 161, and in this year obtained a decree of the senate, by which philosophers and rhetoricians were forbidden to live in Rome. (Suet. de clar. Rhet. 1.; Gell. x. 11.)

7. M. Pomponius, a Roman eques, was one of the most intimate friends of C. Gracchus, and distinguished himself by his fidelity to the latter on the day of the death of b. c. 121. When Gracchus, despairing of his life, had retired to the temple of Diana, and was going to kill himself there, Pomponius and Licinius took his sword, and induced him to fly. As they fled across the Subelian bridge, hotly pursued, Pomponius and Licinius turned round, in order to give their friend time for escape, and they allowed no one to pass till they fell pierced with wounds. This is the account of Plutarch; the details are related a little differently by other writers. (Plut. C. Grach. 16, 17; Vell. Pat. ii. 6; Val. Max. iv. 7. § 2; Aurel. Vict. de Tri. Ill. 65; comp. Cic. de Div. ii. 29.)

8. M. Pomponius, nedile b. c. 82, in the consulship of the younger Marius. In the scenic games exhibited by him, the actors who then appeared, who was then a child of 12 years old, and who was again brought on the stage in L. d. 9, in her 104th year, in the votive games in honour of Augustus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 49, s. 48.)

9. Cn. Pomponius, who perished in the civil war between Marius and Sulla, was an orator of some repute, and is reckoned by Cicero as holding the next place to his two great contemporaries, C. Aurelius Cotta and P. Sulpicius Rufus. His oratory was characterised by great vehemence, and he did not express his meaning very clearly. (Cic. Brut. 57, 62, 69, 90, de Orat. iii. 15.)

10. M. Pomponius, as he is called by Plutarch (Lucull. 15.), the commander of the cavalry of Lu-POMPONIUS.

11. M. POMPONIUS, one of the legates of Pompey in the war against the pirates, B.C. 67, to whom Pompey assigned the superintendence of the gulf washing the south of Gaul and Liguria. (Appian, Mil. 98.)

12. P. POMPONIUS, accompanied P. Clodius, when he was murdered by Milo, B.C. 52. (Ascon. in Mil. p. 33, ed. Orelli.)

13. M. POMPONIUS, commanded the fleet of Caesar at Messana, the greater part of which was burnt in B.C. 48, by C. Cassius Longinus (Caes. B. C. ii. 101.)

POMPONIUS, was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43. He was in Rome at the time, but escaped by assuming the insignia of a praetor, and accompanied by his slaves as lectores, left Rome, travelled through Italy as a public magistrate, and eventually crossed into Spain, where he was killed by the orders of the state. (Appian, B. C. iv. 45.) Valerius Maximus relates (vi. 3, § 9) this circumstance of Sentius Saturninus Vetulio or Vetulo.

POMPO'NIUS, SEXTUS. Some writers are of opinion that there was only one jurist of this name: some think that there were two. (See the references in Zimmern, Geschichte des Römischen Privatrechts, vol. i. p. 338, n. 6.)

Pomponius is often cited by Julianus (Dig. 3. tit. 5. s. 6. § 6—8; Dig. 17. tit. 2. s. 63. § 9), and also under the name of Sextus.

Puchta (Cursor der Institutionen, vol. i. p. 444), says there is no reason for assuming that there were two Pomponii. As to the passage (Dig. 28. tit. 5. s. 41), at the head of which stands the name of Pomponius, he observes that the words "ut referit Sextus Pomponius," at the end of the extract, merely show that the compilers did not take the extract immediately from the work of Sextus Pomponius, but from some other work in which it was cited. He adds, that this kind of repetition is not unusual in the Digest; and he refers to another passage (Dig. 22. tit. 1. s. 26; Julianus, lib. vi. ex Minucio), in which the repetition is avoided, but in other respects it is exactly like Dig. 28. tit. 5. s. 41. As to the passage (Dig. 30. s. 32), "tam Sextus quam Pomponius," he observes that the expression would be highly inapt, if the name Pomponius belonged to both jurists. The weakest ground of all, as he considers it, for supposing that there were two Pomponii is that Julianus often cites Pomponius; and it is supposed that as Pomponius was a younger man than Julianus, and of less note, that Julianus would not have cited him.

Pomponius is the author of a long extract in the Digest (Dig. 1. tit. 1. s. 2), which is taken from a work of his in one book, entitled Enchiridion. His period may be approximately determined from the fact that Julianus is the last of the jurists whom he mentions, and the period of the activity of Julianus belongs to the reign of Hadrianus.

The number of extracts from Pomponius in the Digest is 585. He was a Cassianus (Gaius ii. 218), "sed Juliano et Sexto placuit:" where Sextus means Sextus Pomponius. In another passage he alludes to C. Cassius under the name of Caius noster (Dig. 45. tit. 3. s. 39); for in this passage, and in a passage of Julianus (Dig. 24. tit. 3. s. 59), Caius or Gaius means C. Cassius, and not the later jurist, now known by the name of Gaius. The same remark applies to Dig. 46. tit. 3. s. 78, which is an extract from C. Cassius made by Javolenus.

The works of Pomponius are the Enchiridion, which is not mentioned in the Florintine Index; Variae Lectiones, of which the Index mentions only fifteen books, though the twenty-fifth, the thirty-fourth, and even the fortieith and forty-first books are cited in the Digest (Dig. 8. tit. 5. s. 8; § 6); twenty books of Epistolae; five books of Fideicommissa; libri lectionum ad Q. Mucium; libri ad Plautium; liber singularis regularum; libri ad Sabinum; libri V. Sctorum; and the two books of an Enchiridion, which is mentioned in the Index. Some other writings of Pomponius are cited. The extract from the single book of the Enchiridion, De Origine Juris, is our chief authority for the Roman jurists, to the time of Julianus, and for our knowledge of the two sectae or Pompaei (Capreae).

The question of the two Pomponii is discussed by W. Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsularum, with which may be compared the works of Zimmern and Puchta, which have been already referred to. (G. L.)

POMPO'NIUS ATTICUS. [ATTICUS.]

POMPO'NIUS BASSUS. [BASSUS.]

L. POMPO'NIUS BONONIENSIS, the most celebrated writer of Fabulae Attelanae, was a native of Bononia (Bologna) in northern Italy, as his surname shows, and flourished in the second half of the 3rd century. (Euseb. Chron.) The nature of the Fabulae Attelanae is described at length in the Dict. of Antiq.; and it is therefore only necessary to state here that these fabres were originally not written, but produced by the ready fertility of the Italian improvisatori; and that it is probable that Pomponius and his contemporary Novius (NOVIIUS) were the first to write regular dramas of this kind. (Comp. Vell. Pat. ii. 9; Macrobr. Saturn. i. 10.)

There is an epigram of four lines, which Priscian attributes to Pomponius (p. 602, ed. Putschius); but in the passage of Varro (de L. L. vii. 28, ed. Müller), from which Priscian took it, the author of the epigram is called Papinianus.

M. POMPO'NIUS DIONYSIUS, a freedman of T. Pomponius Atticus, received his nomen from Atticus, his former master, according to the usual custom, but had the praenomen Marcus given in compliment to M. Tullius Cicero (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, comp. iv. 8, 11, 12). It is erroneously stated in Vol. i. p. 1039, a. init. that his full name was T. Pomponius Dionysius.

POMPO'NIUS FESTUS. [FESTUS.]

POMPO'NIUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

P. POMPO'NIUS GRACCIUS, consul suffectus, A. D. 16, was a friend and patron of Ovid, who addressed to him three of the epistles which were written by the poet from his place of banishment (ex Pont. i. 6, ii. 6, iv. 9). This Pomponius Graecinus was the brother of Pomponius Flaccus (FLACCUS), Pomponius, No. 2), and probably also the father of the Pomponia Graecina, who lived in the reign of Claudius. (POMONIA GRAECINA.)
POMPO'NIUS LABEO. [LABEO.] POMPO'NIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCEL-LUS.]

POMPO'NIUS MELA. [MELA.] POMPO'NIUS Rufus. [Rufus.] POMPO'NIUS SABI'NUS. [SABINUS.] POMPO'NIUS SECUN'DUS.
POMPO'NIUS SilVAN'US. [SILVANUS.]

T. POMPO'NIUS VEILANTA'NUS, commander of some of the allied troops in Southern Italy in B.C. 213, ventured to attack Hannibal, the Carthaginian general, was defeated and taken prisoner. He had formerly been one of the publican, and had earned a bad character by cheating
both the state and the farmers of the revenue with whom he was in partnership. (Liv. xxv.
1, 3.)

POMPO'SIA'NUS METTIUS. [METTIUS.]
C. POMP'TIUS, is first mentioned in B.C.
71, when he served as legate under M. Crassus, in the Servile war. (Frontin. Strat. ii. 4, § 8.)
He was praetor B.C. 43, in which year he rendered important service to Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, especially by the apprehension of the ambassadors of the Allobroges. He afterwards obtained the province of Gallic Narbonensis, and in B.C. 61 defeated the Allobroges, who had invaded the province. In consequence of this victory he sued for a triumph on his return to Rome; but as it was refused by the senate, he remained for some years beyond the pomerium, urging his claim. At length, in B.C. 54, his friends made a final attempt to procure him the long-desired honour. He was opposed by the praetors, M. Cato and P. Servilius Isaur-ius, and by the tribune Q. Mucius Scævola, who urged that he was not entitled to the privilege,
because he had not received the imperium by a lex curiata; but he was supported by the con consul Appius, and by most of the praetors and tribunes;
and as there was no hope of prevailing upon the senate to grant the honour, his former legate, Serv.
Sulpicius Galba, brought the matter before the people, and obtained from them a resolution, passed contrary to law before day-light, in virtue of which Pomptius at length entered the city in triumph.
(Sall. Cat. 45.; Cic. in Cat. iii. 2, de Prov. Cons.
13, in Pison. 14, ad Att. iv. 16, v. 1, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 14, ad Q. Fr. iii. 4, § 6; Dion Cass. xxxvii.
47, xxxix. 63; Liv. Epit. 103.)

In B.C. 51 Pomptinus accompanied Cicero as legate to Cicilia, but he did not remain there longer than a year, according to the stipulation he had previously made with Cicero. (Cic. ad Att.
v. 21. § 9, vi. 3, ad Fam. ii. 15. § 4, iii. 10. § 3, xxii. 8.) There is considerable variation in the orthography of the name. We find him called Pomptinius, Pontinius, Pomptinus and Pontiniius, as well as Pomptinus, which seems the preferable form.

POM'PYLUUS (Pom'piöltus), a slave of Theophrastus, who also became celebrated as a philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. v. 36; Gell. ii. 18; Macrobi.
Sat. i. 11.)

PONNA'NUS, the author of an epigram in the Latin Anthology (No. 539, ed. Meyer) on a picture respecting the death of Cleopatra, but of whom nothing is known.

PO'NTIA. 1. A woman in the reign of Nero, who obtained an infamous notoriety as the mur-derer of her own children (Juv. vi. 638, &c.; Martial, ii. 34, iv. 42. 5.) The scholiast on Juvenal states that she was the wife of P. (C.? C.) Petronius, who was condemned as one of the conspirators against Nero, that having been convicted,
after her husband's death, of destroying her own children by poison, she partook of a sumptuous banquet, and then put an end to her life by opening her veins. In an inscription published by Gruter (p. 921. 6), recording this act of villany, she is called the daughter of T. Pontius; but we may, with Heinrich (ad Juv. l. c.), question the genuineness of this inscription, as it was probably manufactured out of this passage of Juvenal.

2. PONTIA POSTUMIA, was slain by her lover, Octavius Sagitta, tribune of the plebs, a.D. 56,
because she refused to marry him after promising to do so. Sagitta was accused by the father of Pontia, and condemned under the lex Cornelia de Sicariis to the severest form of banishment (de-portatio in insulam). In the civil wars following the death of Nero, Sagitta returned from banishment, but was again condemned by the senate, in a.d. 70, to his former punishment. (Tac. Ann. xiii.
44. Hist. iv. 44.)

PONTIA GEN'S, plebeian, was originally Samnite. It never attained much eminence at Rome during the republic, but under the empire some of its members were raised to the consulship.
During the republican period Aquila is the only cognomen borne by the Roman Pontii; but in the imperial times we find various surnames, of which an alphabetical list is given below, after Pontius, where the Samnite Pontii are also mentioned.

PONTIA'NUS. 1. Mentioned in one of Cicero's letters (ad Att. xii. 44. § 2), appears to have been a friend of Mustela, and to have been defended upon some occasion by Cicero.

2. P. AUFI'DIUS PONTI'NIUS, of Amaturnum, spoken of by Varro. (R.R. ii. 8. § 6.)

3. SRR. OCTAVIUS LAE'NAS PONTI'NIUS, consul
a.d. 131, with M. Antonius Rufinus.

4. PONTIANUS, consul suffectus in a.d. 125.

5. PROCULUS PONTI'NIUS, consul a.d. 238.

PO'NTICUS, a Roman poet, and a contemporary of Ovid and Propertius, wrote an heroic poem on the Theban war, and hence is compared to Homer by Propertius (Ovid, Trist. iv. 10. 47; Propert. i. 7, i. 9. 26.)

PONTIDIA is mentioned twice in Cicero's letters (ad Att. v. 21. § 14. vi. 1. § 10), from which it appears that Cicero had entered into negotiations with her for the marriage of his daughter Tullia to her son.

PONTIDIUS. 1. C. PONTI'DIUS, is mentioned by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 16) as one of the leaders in the Social or Marseic war, b.c. 90. There may be no reason that he is the same person as Annius (R.C. i. 40) C. Pontilius; and as the name of Pontidius occurs elsewhere, the orthography in Velleius seems preferable.

2. M. PONTIDIUS, of Arpinnum, was an orator of some distinction, speaking with fluency, and acute in the management of a case, but vehement and passionate (Cic. Brut. 70, comp. de Orat.
ii. 65.)

TI. PONTIFICIUS, a tribune of the plebs, b.c. 450, attempted to introduce an agrarian law.
(Liv. ii. 44.)

PON'TIUS. [PONTI'DIUS, No. 1.]

PON'TIUS. [POMP'TI'NIUS.]

PO'NTIUS. 1. A friend of Scipio Afric anus minor, was mentioned by Cicero in his work De Fato. (Mucrob. Sat. ii. 12, or Cic. Frug. p. 235, ed. Orelli.)

2. Detected in adultery, and dreadfully punished by the husband, P. Cernius. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.)

3. T. Pontius, a centurion possessing great bodily strength, mentioned by Cicero (de Senect. 10), is perhaps the same centurion Pontius of whom Lucretias speaks (ap. Cic. de Fug. i. 3).

4. Pontius, one of Caesar's soldiers, was taken prisoner by Scipio, the father-in-law of Pompey, but preferred death rather than deserting his old general. (Val. Max. iii. 8. § 7.)

5. Pontius, one of the companions of Antony in his revels. (Cic. Phil. xiii. 2. § 3.)

Po'NTIU'S, a deacon of the African Church, the tried friend and constant companion of Cyprian, drew up a narrative of the life and sufferings of the martyred bishop, which is styled an excellent production (egregium volumen) by Jerome. If the piece extant under the name of Pontius, entitled De Vita et Passione S. Cypriani, be genuine, it certainly does not merit such high commendation, since it is composed in an ambitious declamatory style, full of affectation and rhetorical ornaments. Perhaps the original work may have formed the basis of what we now possess, which has probably leaked into its present form by the labour of various hands. It will be found attached to all the most important editions of Cyprian, and is contained also in the Acta Primorium Martyrum of Ruinart, 4to. Paris, 1690, and fol. Amst. 1713. The Acta Pontii are preserved in the Miscellanea of Baluze, 8vo. Par. 1678, vol. ii. p. 124, and in the Acta Sanctorum under 8th March, the day marked as his festival in the Roman Martyrologies. (Hieron. de Viris Ill. 68; Schönenmann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. i. c. iii. § 6.)

Po'NTIU'S AUFIDIANUS, a Roman eques, killed his daughter when she had been guilty of a breach of chastity. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 3.)

Po'NTIU'S COMINIUS. [COMINUS.]

Po'NTIU'S FREGELLA'NUS, was deprived of his rank as senator, a.d. 36, as one of the agents of the notorious Albucilla in her adulteries. (Tac. Ann. vi. 45.)

Po'NTIU'S HERENNIIUS, the father of C. Pontius, was an old man living at Caudium, when his son defeated the Roman army in the neighbourhood of that town in b.c. 321. The Sammites sent to ask his advice how they should avail themselves of their extraordinary good fortune. The reply which he gave is related at length by Livy (ix. 1, 3; comp. Appian, Samn. iv. 3.) It would appear from Cicero (de Senect. 12), that there was a tradition which supposed Herennius Pontius and Archytas of Tarentum to have been friends; and Niebuhr supposes that Nearchus had written a dialogue in which Archytas, the Samnite Pontius, and Plato, were speakers. (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. note 373.)

C. Po'NTIU'S, son of HERENNIIUS, the general of the Sammites in b.c. 321, defeated the Roman army under the two consuls T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius Albinius in one of the mountain passes in the neighbourhood of Caudium. The survivors, who were completely at the mercy of the Sammites, were dismissed unhurt by Pontius. They had to surrender their arms, and to pass under the yoke; and as the price of their deliverance, the consuls and the other commanders swore, in the name of the republic, to a humiliating peace. The Roman state however refused to ratify the treaty, and sent back the consuls and the other commanders to Pontius, who, however, refused to accept them. The name of Pontius does not occur again for nearly thirty years, but as Livy rarely mentions the names of the Samnite generals, it is not improbable that Pontius may have commanded them on many other occasions. At all events we find him again at the head of the Samnite forces in b.c. 292, in which year he defeated the Roman army under the command of the consul Q. Fabius Gurgises. This disaster, when nothing but victory was expected, so greatly exasperated the people that Fabius would have been deprived of his imperium, had not his father, the celebrated Fabius Maximus, offered to serve as his legate during the remainder of the war. It was in the same year that the decisive battle was fought, which brought the war to a conclusion. The Sammites were entirely defeated, and Pontius was taken prisoner. In the triumph of the consul Pontius was led in chains, and afterwards beheaded, an act which Niebuhr characterises as "the greatest stain in the Roman annals," and for which the plea of custom can be offered as the only palliation. (Livy xix. 55., 56, 57. 58. Sueton. Calig. c. 27. § 44.)

M. Po'NTIU'S LAELIA'NUS, consul a.d. 163 with Pastor.

Po'NTIU'S LUPUS, a Roman eques, who continued to plead in the courts after he had lost his sight. (Val. Max. viii. 7. § 5.)

Po'NTIU'S NIGRI'NUS. [NIGRINUS.]

Po'NTIU'S PAULIU'NUS. [PAULINUS. p. 114.]

Po'NTIU'S PILATU'S, was the sixth procurator of Judaea, and the successor of Valerius Gratus. He held the office for ten years in the reign of Tiberius, and it was during his government that Christ taught, suffered, and died. By his tyrannical conduct he excited an insurrection at Jerusalem, and at a later period commotions in Samaria also, which were not put down without the loss of life. The Sammites, complain of his conduct to Vitellius, the governor of Syria, who deprived him of his office, and sent him to Rome to answer before the emperor the accusations that were brought against him. As Pilatus reached Rome shortly after the death of Tiberius, which took place on the 16th of March, a.d. 37, he was probably deposed in the preceding year a.d. 36, and would therefore have entered upon his duties as procurator in a.d. 26. Eusebius states that Pilatus put an end to his own life at the commencement of the reign of Caligula, worn out by the many misfortunes he had experienced. (Tac. Ann. xv. 44.; Matthew xxvii.; Mark xv.; Luke iii. i. xxiii.; John xviii. xix.; Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 3. 1., &c., xviii. 4. § 1., &c., B. Jud. ii. 9. § 2.; Euseb. H. E. ii. 7.) The early Christian writers frequently refer to an official report, made by Pilatus to the emperor Tiberius, of the condemnation and death of Christ. (Just. Mart. Apol. i. pp. 76, 84; Tertull. Apol. 5. Euseb. H. E. ii. 2.; Oros. vii. 4.; Chrysost. Homil. VIII. in Parch.) It is not at all improbable that such a report was made; but considering, on the one hand, the frequency of forgeries in the early Christian Church, and on the other, that it was no part of the policy of the imperial government to publish such reports, we may reasonably question the genuineness of the document. At all events there can be no doubt that the acts of Pilate, as they are called, which are extant in Greek (Fabric. Apoor. vol. i. pp. 237, 239, vol. iii. p. 456, &c.), as well as his two Latin letters to the emperor (Fabric. Apoor. vol. i. p. 298, &c.), are the productions of a later age. (Comp. Winer, Biblioth. Realwörterbuch, art. Pilatus.)

PO'NTIUS TELES'I'NUS. 1. A Samnite, appears to have been appointed general of the Samnite forces in the Social war after the death of Pompeius Silo. At all events he was at the head of the Samnite army in b. c. 62, in which year Carbo and the younger Marius were consuls. Marius and the brother of Telesinus were besieged in Praeneste by Sulla. Telesinus himself, at the head of an army of 40,000 men, had marched to the neighbourhood of Praeneste, apparently with the intention of relieving the town, but in reality with another object, which he kept a profound secret. In the dead of the night he broke up from his quarters, and marched straight upon Rome, which had been left without any army for its protection. The Sammites were upon the point of avenging the many years of oppression which they had experienced from the Romans. Sulla scarcely arrived in time to save the city. Near the Colline gate the battle was fought, the most desperate and bloody of all the contests during the civil war. Pontius fell in the fight; his head was cut off, and carried under the walls of Praeneste, to let the younger Marius know that his last hope of succour was gone. (Appian. B. C. i. 90—93; Vell. Pat. ii. 27.)

2. A brother of the preceding, commanded the Samnite forces which had been sent to the assistance of the younger Marius, and shared in the defeat of the latter by Sulla, and with him took refuge in Praeneste, where they were besieged by the conqueror, b. c. 62. After the defeat of the Sammites and the death of the elder Telesinus, which have been related above, Marius and the younger Telesinus attempted to escape by a subterfuge: passage, which led from the town into the open country; but finding that the exit was guarded, they resolved to die by one another's hands. Telesinus fell first, and Marius accordingly put an end to his own life, or was stabbed by his slave. (Liv. Epit. 88; Vell. Pat. ii. 27.)

PO'NTIUS TITII'NUS, the son of Q. Titinius, adopted by Pontius, joined Caesar through fear, in b. c. 49. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 19, § 2.)

PONTIUS (θορτος), a personification of the ancient cosmogony as a son of Gaia, and as the father of Nereus, Thaumas, Phorcys, Ceto, and Eurybia, by his own mother. (Hes. Theog. 192, 233, &c.; Apollod. i. 2, § 6.) Hyginus (Fab. graec. p. 8, ed. Staveren) calls him a son of Aether and Gaia, and assigns to him several different descendants. [L. S.]

PO'PILLIA, was twice married, and had by her former husband Q. Lucretius Catulus, by her second C. Julius Caesar Strabo. Her son Catulus delivered a funeral oration over her grave, which was the first time that this honour had been paid to a female at Rome. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 11.)

PO'PILLIA GENS, plebeian. In manuscripts the name is sometimes written with one l, and sometimes with two; but as it always appears with a double l in the Capitoline Fasti, this form is to be preferred. There are no coins to decide the question; for those which Goltzius has published, are spurious. The Popillia gens is one of the great plebeian gentes that rose into eminence after the passing of the Licinian laws, which threw open the consulship to the plebeian order. The first member of it who obtained the consulship was M. Popillius Laenas, in b. c. 358, and he was the first plebeian who obtained the honour of a triumph. The only family of the Popillii mentioned under the republic, is that of LAENAS: the majority of the few Popilli, who occur without a surname, and who are given below, may have belonged to the same family, and their cognomen is probably omitted through inadvertence.

PO'PI'LLIUS. 1. T. Popilius, a legatus in the Roman army engaged in the siege of Capua, b. c. 211. (Liv. xxvi. 6.)

2. P. Popiliius, one of the three ambassadors sent to king Syphax in Africa, in b. c. 210. (Liv. xxvii. 4.)

3. C. Popiliius, surnamed Sabellus, a Roman eques, distinguished himself by his bravery in the campaign against the Istri in b. c. 178. (Liv. xii. 4.)

4. M. Popiliius, one of the ambassadors sent to the Astolians, in b. c. 174. (Liv. xii. 25.)

5. P. Popiliius, the son of a freedman, is said by Cicero to have been condemned for bribery. (Cic. pro Cluent. 36, 47.)

PO'PLI'CO'LA. [Publicola.]

PO'PPEA SAB'INNA. [Sabinus.]

PO'PPEAUS SABI'NUS. [Sabinus.]

PO'PPEAUS SECUNDUS. [Secundus.]

PO'PPEAUS SILVANUS. [Silvanus.]

PO'PPEAUS YOPIS'CUSS. [Yopiscus.]

PO'PULO'NIA, a surname of Juno among the Romans, by which she seems to have been characterized as the protectress of the whole Roman people. This opinion is confirmed by the fact that in her temple there was a small table, the symbol of political union. (Macrobi. Sat. iii. 11.)

PO'R'CIA. 1. The sister of Cato Uticensis, was brought up with her brother in the house of their uncle M. Livius Drusus, as they lost their parents in childhood. She married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was consul in b. c. 54, and, like her brother, one of the leaders of the aristocratical party. We learn from Cicero that she was at Naples in b. c. 49, when her husband was besieged at Corinthus by Caesar. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 3.) In the following year, b. c. 48, she lost her husband, who fell in the battle of Pharsalia. She herself died towards the end of b. c. 46, or the beginning of the next year, and her funeral panegyric was pronounced by Cicero, and likewise by M. Varro and Lollius. (Plut. Cat. 1, 41; Cic. ad Att. xiii. 37, 48.)

2. The daughter of Cato Uticensis by his first wife Atilla. She was married first to M. Bilulus, who was Caesar's colleague in the consulship b. c. 59, and to whom she bore three children. Bilulus died in b. c. 48; and in b. c. 45 she married M. Brutus, the assassin of Julius Caesar. She inherited all her father's republican principles, and likewise his courage and firmness of will. She induced her husband on the night before the 15th of March to disclose to her the conspiracy against Caesar's life, and she is reported to have wounded herself in the thigh in order to show that she had a courageous soul and could be trusted with the secret. At the same time her affection for her husband was stronger than her stoicism, and on the morning of the 15th, her anxiety for his safety was so great that she fainted away, and word was brought to Brutus in the senate-house that his wife was dying. She parted with Brutus at Velia in Lucania in the course of the same year, when he embarked for Greece. She then returned to Rome, where she continued to live unmolested by the triumvirs. But after she learnt the loss of the battle of Philippi and the death of Brutus in B.C. 42, she resolved not to survive the ruin of her party and the death of her husband, and accordingly put an end to her own life. The common tale was, that her friends, suspecting her design, had taken all weapons out of her way, and that she therefore destroyed herself by swallowing live coals. The real fact may have been that she suffocated herself by the vapour of a charcoal fire, which we know was a frequent means of self-destruction among the Romans. (Plut. Cat. 25, 73, Brut. 2, 13, 15, 23, 33; Dion Cass. xlv. 13, xlvi. 49; Appian, B. C. iv. 136; Val. Max. iii. 2. § 5, iv. 6. § 5; Polyaeon. vii. 32; Martial, i. 43.)

3. The daughter of Cato Uticensis by his second wife Marcia. She remained with her mother in Rome when her father left the city in B.C. 49 on Caesar's approach. (Plut. Cat. 52.) She probably died young.

PO'RCIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned till the middle of the third century before the Christian era; and the first member of the gens, who obtained written connexion, was M. Porcius Cato, in B.C. 195. The name was derived by the Romans from porcus, a pig, and was compared with Omnium, Caprilius, and Taurus, all of which names indicated connection with the breeding or feeding of cattle. (Plut. Public. 11; Var. de R. R. ii. 1.) The Porci were divided into three families under the republic, namely, those of Laeca, Licinus, and Cato, all of which names appear on coins. In the imperial period we find two or three other cognomina, which are given below.

PORCINA, an agnomen of M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul B.C. 137.

PO'RCIUS FESTUS. [Festus.]

PO'RCIUS LATRO. [Latro.]

PO'RCIUS SEPT'I'MIUS. [Septimius.]

PORPHY'RIA, POMPO'NIUS, the most celebrated among the ancient commentators on Homer. His annotations, however, in common with those of all the earlier Latin scholars, have been so altered and interpolated by the transcribers of the middle ages, that it is extremely difficult, and, in many cases impossible, to separate the genuine matter from what is supposititious. We know nothing regarding the history of Porphyryo, nor the period when he flourished, except that he was, if we can trust Charisius (p. 196, ed. Lindemann), later than Festus, and that he must have been later than Acro also, whom he quotes (ad Hor. Sat. i. 8. 25, ii. 3. 33.) (See Suringar, Historia Crit. Scholaris. Lat.) For the editions of Porphyrio, see the notice of the editions of Horatius. [W. R.]

PORPHY'RION (Porphyriaw). 1. One of the giants, a son of Uranus and Ge. During the fight between the giants and the gods, when Porphyryion intended to offer violence to Hera, or, according to others, attempted to throw the island of Delos against the gods, Zeus hurled a thunderbolt at him, and Hecules completed his destruction with his arrows. (Apollod. 3. 6. § 1, &c.; Pind. Pyth. viii. 12; Horat. Carm. iii. 4. 54; Claudian, Gigantom. 114, &c.)

2. According to a tradition of the Athenians, the most ancient king in Attica; he is said to have reigned even before Actaeus, and to have introduced into Attica the worship of Aphrodite. (Paus. i. 2. § 5, 14. § 6.) [L. J.]

PORPHY'RIUS (Porfyrwos), the celebrated antagonist of Christianity, was a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school. Eunapius and Suidas (following no doubt, Porphyry himself, Vit. Porph. p. 33) suppose that their biographies call him a Tyrian; but both St. Jerome (Præf. Epist. ad Gal.) and St. Chrysostom (Homil. vi. in L. ad Corinth., p. 58) term him Baravaeôs, a word on the fancied correction of which a good deal of ingenuity has been unnecessarily expended; some imagining that it is a corruption of some term of reproach (such as βαρανωσ, herb-eater, βοβανωτας, or βαλανωτας). The more reasonable view is that the word is correct enough, and describes more accurately the birth-place of Porphyryos,—Batanea, the Bashan of Scripture. To account for his being called a Tyrian some have supposed that he was originally of Jewish origin, and having first embraced, and afterwards renounced Christianity, called himself a Tyrian to conceal his real origin. Heumann, making a slight alteration in the text of Chrysostom, supposed that Porphyryos falsely assumed the epithet Baravaeos, to induce the belief that he was of Jewish origin, and his statements with regard to the Jewish Scriptures might have the more weight. None of these conjectures seems in any degree probable. The least improbable view is that of Jon- sius, who is followed by Fabricius, Brucker, and others, that there was a Tyrian settlement in the district of Batanea, and that Porphyryos was born there, but, from the neighbourhood of the more important place, called himself, and was called by others, a Tyrian. (Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philol. vol. ii. p. 210; Harles, ad Fabr. Bibliol. Gr. vol. v. p. 725.)

The original name of Porphyryos was Malchus (Μαλχος, the Greek form of the Syro-Phoenician Melech), a word, as he himself tells us, which signified king. His father bore the same name, and was a man of distinguished family (Porph. Vit. Porph. c. 16.). Aurelius, in dedicating a work to him, styled him Baraváes. The more euphonious name Porphýrōs (in allusion to the usual colour of royal robes), was subsequently devised for him by his preceptor Longinus (Eunap. Porph. p. 13; Suid. s. a.). Suidas states that he lived in the reign of Aurelian, and died in that of Diocletian. Eunapius says, more explicitly, that he lived in the reigns of Gallienus, Claudius, Tacitus, Aurelian, and Probus. Porphyryos himself tells us that he was thirty years of age when he first became the pupil of Plotinus, who was in the tenth year of the reign of Gallienus (Vit. Porph. c. 4. p. 99) ; the date of his birth was, therefore, A. D. 253.

From Porphyryos himself, as quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 19; comp. Proclus, in Tim. i. p. 20), it appears that when very young he was placed under the instruction of Origen. This could not have been, as some have imagined, at Alexandria, for about the time of the birth of Porphyryos Origen
Porphyr. 499

Augustine (Retract. ii. 31) styles him Siculum illum etiam celeberrima fama est. The notion that this work was written in Bithynia is quite without foundation, being merely derived from a passage of Lactantius (v. 2), referring to somebody whose name is not mentioned, and who wrote against the Christians, and which was supposed by Baronius to refer to Porphyrus. But the account does not suit him in any respect. It was very likely about this period that Porphyrus took occasion to visit Carthage. That he also went to Athens after the death of Plotinus, has been inferred (by Holstenius) from a passage quoted by Eusebius, where, as the text stands, Porphyrus is made to speak of celebrating the birth-day of Plotinus at Athens with Longinus. There can be little doubt, however, that the reading should be, as Brucker (l. c. p. 249) suggests, Πλατόνεια, and that the incident refers to the earlier part of the life of Porphyrus, otherwise the allusion will not accord with the history of either Porphyrus or Longinus.

Of the remainder of the life of Porphyrus we know very little. According to Eunapius he returned to Rome, where he taught, and gave frequent public exhibitions of his acquirements and talents as a speaker, and was held in high honour by the senate and people till he died. A curious illustration of his excitable and enthusiastic temperament is afforded by what he says of himself (Vit. Plot. c. 23), that in the 68th year of his age he himself, like Plotinus, was favoured with an ecstatic vision of the Deity. When probably at a somewhat advanced period of life he married Marcella, the widow of one of his friends, and the mother of seven children (ad Marc. 1), with the view, as he avowed, of superintending their education. About ten months after his marriage he had occasion to leave her and go on a journey; and to console her during his absence he wrote to her an epistle, which is still extant. The date of his death cannot be fixed with any exactness; it was probably about A. D. 305 or 306.

It appears from the testimony even of antagonists, and from what we have left of his writings, that Porphyrus was a man of great abilities and very extensive learning. Eusebius speaks of him as one of them most diligent, and of his rhetorical style, that by some it was said even to resemble that of Plotinus. He at least indirectly or indirectly illustrate, commend, or establish it. His rhetorical training, extensive learning, and comparative clearness of style, no doubt did good service in the cause of his school. Nevertheless, he is charged with inconsistencies and contradictions; his later views being frequently at variance with his earlier ones. (Eunap. Vit. Porph. fin.; Euseb. Porph. Ep. iv. 10; Lamb.-ap. Stobaeum, Eld. i. p. 866). The reason of this may probably be found in the vacillation of his views with respect to theology and philosophy, a vacillation which would doubtless attract the greater attention, as it was in opposition to the general tendencies of his age and year.
Porphyrius.

School that he ranked philosophy higher than the theurgic superstitions which were connected with the popular polytheism. With the latter, some features of his doctrines had considerable affinity. He insisted strongly on the contrast between the corporeal and the incorporeal, and the power of the latter over the former. The influence of the incorporeal was, in his view, unrestricted by the limits of space, and independent of the accident of contiguity. When free from intermixture with matter, it is omnipresent, and its power unlimited. His doctrine with regard to daemons pointed in the same direction. Over both them and the souls of the dead power could be obtained by enchantments (de Abst. ii. 38, 39, 41, 43, 47). Yet these notions seem to have been taken up by him rather in deference to the prevalent opinion of his times, than as forming an essential part of his philosophy. Though at first somewhat disposed to favour theory, he still ranked philosophy above it, considering, with Plotinus, that the true method of safety consisted in the purgation of the soul, and the contemplation of the eternal deity. The increasing value set upon theory, and the endeavour to raise it above philosophy itself, probably produced something like a reaction in his mind, and strengthened the doubts which he entertained with regard to the popular superstition. These doubts he set forth in a letter to the Egyptian prophet Anebos, in a series of questions. The distrust there expressed in regard to the popular notions of the gods, divinations, incantations, and other theurgic arts, may have been, as Ritter believes (Gesch. der Phl. vol. iv. p. 678), the modified opinion of his later years, provoked, perhaps, by the progress of that superstition to which at an earlier period he had been less opposed. The observation of Augustine is, doubtless, in the main correct: — "Ut videos eum inter viuum sacriagae curiositatis et philosophiae professionem fluctuasse, et nunc hanc artem tamquam fallacem, et in ipsa actione periculum, et legibus prohibatum, cavendum monere, nunc autem velut ejus auditorius cedendem, utilem dicere esse mandanei parti animae, non quidem intellectual qua rerum intelligibilium perciplatur veritas, nullas habetem similitudines corporum, sed spirituales, quae rerum corporalium capiatur imagin." The letter to Anebos called forth a reply, which is still extant, and known under the title Πελαγόρρων, and is the production probably of Lamblichus. The worship of the national gods seems to have been upheld by Porphyrius only on the consideration that respect should be shown to the ancient religious usage of the nation. He, however, set but small store by it. (Βεβηλιαδε ένεκ έπαραγομενου μεν ουδεν ἕπλαστου, αμελογεμενε ουδεν ἔπειλον, ad Marc.) He acknowledged one absolute, supreme deity, who is to be worshipped with pure words and thoughts (ad Marc. 18). He also, however, distinguished two classes of visible and invisible gods, the former being composed of body and soul, and consequently neither eternal nor immutable (de Abst. ii. 34, 36, 37—39). He also distinguished between good and evil daemons, and held that the latter ought to be appeased, but that it should be the object of the philosopher to free himself as much as possible from everything placed under the power of evil daemons. For that reason, among others, he rejected all animal sacrifices (de Abst. ii. 38, 39, 43). The ascetic tendency of his philosophy, as connected with his exalted ideas of the power of reason, which is superior to nature and the influence of daemons, conduced to raise him above the superstitious tendencies of his age; the spirit of the philosopher being, in his view, superior to all impressions from without. The object of the philosopher should be to free himself as much as possible from all desires of, or dependence on, that which is external, such appetites being the most hateful tyrants, from which we should be glad to be set free, even with the loss of the whole body (ad Marc. 34). We should therefore, restrain our sensuous desires as much as possible. It was mainly in this point of view that he rejected all enjoyment of animal food. Though bad genii have some power over us, yet through abstinence and the steady resistance of all disturbing influences, we can pursue the good in spite of them. If we could abstain from vegetable as well as animal food, he thought we should become still more like the gods. (De Abst. iii. 27.) It is by means of reason only that we are excited to the supreme God, to whom nothing material should be offered, for every thing material is unclean (de Abst. i. 39, 57, ii. 34, ad Marc. 15). He distinguishes four degrees of virtues, the lowest being political virtue, the virtue of a good man who moderates his passions. Superior to this is purifying virtue, which completely sets the soul free from affections. Its object is to make us resemble God, and by it we become daemonic men, or good daemons. In the highest grade, when entirely given up to knowledge and the soul, man becomes a god, till at last he lives only to reason, and so becomes the father of gods, one with the one supreme being. (Sent. 34.)

A great deal of discussion has taken place respecting the assertion of Socrates (H. E. iii. 29), that in his earlier years Porphyrius was a Christian, and that, having been treated with indignity by the Christians, he apostatized, and revenged himself by writing against them. The authority is so small, and the improbability of the story so great (for it does not appear that any of his antagonists charged him with apostacy, unless it was Eusebius), while it may so easily have arisen from the fact that in his early youth Porphyrius was instructed by Origen, that it may confidently be rejected. An able summary of the arguments on both sides is given by Brucker (ii. p. 251, &c.). Of the nature and merits of the work of Porphyrius against the Christians we are not able to judge, as it has not come down to us. It was publicly destroyed by order of the emperor Theodosius. The attack was, however, sufficiently vigorous to call down upon him the fiercest misjudgments and most virulent abuse. His name was employed as synonymous with everything silly, blaspheinous, impudent and calumnious. Socrates (i. p. 32) even adds an edict of Constantine the Great, ordaining that the Arians should be termed Porphyrian. A doubt has been raised as to the identity of the assailant of Christianity with the Neo-platonic philosopher; but it is totally without foundation. The attack upon Christianity is said to have called forth replies from above thirty different antagonists, the most distinguished of whom were Methodius, Apollinaris, and Eusebius.

As a writer Porphyrius deserves considerable praise. His style is tolerably clear, and not unfrequently exhibits both imagination and vigour. His learning was most extensive. Fabricius (Bibl.
Porphyrius. Grace. vol. v. p. 748, &c.), has compiled a list of about 250 authors quoted by him in those portions of his writings which we still possess. A great degree of critical and philosophical acumen was not to be expected in one so ardently attached to the enthusiastic and somewhat fanatical system of Plotinus. His attempt to prove the identity of the Platonic and Aristotelian systems would alone be sufficient to show this. Nevertheless, his acquaintance with the authors whom he quotes was manifestly far from superficial; but his judgment in using the stores of learning which he possessed was but small. Cyril (Adv. Jud. vi. init.) quotes a passage from his history of philosophers, from which it appears that his account of Socrates was a mere farce of the most absurd and calumnious stories respecting that philosopher. Indeed, his object would seem to have been to magnify Pythagoras at the expense of every other philosopher. Though far less confused and unintelligible than Plotinus, his statements of his own metaphysical views are often far from comprehensible. (See especially his Pròs tâ voutâ áfofriai.)

Of the various numerous writings of Porphyrius the following are extant: — 1. Ποδαγρόν βίος; supposed by many to be a fragment of his larger history of philosophers. 2. Περί Πολιτιστίν Βίου καὶ τῆς τάξεως τῶν βιβλίων αὐτοῦ. [Plotinus]. 3. Περί ἀποξήθες τῶν ἐμφύχων, in four books, dedicated to his friend and fellow-disciple Firmus Castricius. 4. Fragments of his epistle Pròs 'Ανένθω τῶν Ἀλλότρων. Large quotations from this work are made by Eusebius in his Praeparatio Evangelica. 5. Πάς τὰ νοστά ψρομά. 6. Ομηρικὸν ζητήματα, addressed to Anatolius. 7. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἁλεπέρον ἰδρύμων ἀπομονωμένων ἀνθρώπων, an allegorical interpretation of the description of the cave of the nympha in the Odyssey, showing both the ingenuity and the recklessness with which Porphyrius and other writers of his stamp press writers and authorities of all kinds into their service, as holders of the doctrines of their school. 8. A fragment from a treatise Περὶ Σταυροῦ, preserved by Stobaeus. 9. Εἰςαγγελία, or Περὶ τῶν πέντε φωνῶν, addressed to Chrysolorus, and written by Porphyrius while in Sicily. It is commonly prefixed to the Organon of Aristotle. 10. A Commentary on the Categories of Aristotle, in questions and answers. 11. Some fragments of a Commentary on Aristotle's books Περὶ φυσικῆς ἀκρόασεως. 12. A Commentary on the Harmonica of Ptolemaeus, leaving off at the seventh chapter of the second book. 13. Περὶ προφανείας, published by Villlison, anec. Graece, vol. ii. p. 103—118. 14. Scholia on the Iliad, preserved by Valckenar, in an appendix to Ursinus's Virgil, with a copious account of the scholia generally. Other scholia on the Iliad, preserved in the Vatican library, were published by Villlison (Anec. Gr. ii. p. 266, &c.), and in his edition of the Iliad. 15. Portions of a Commentary, apparently on the Ethics of Aristotle, and of one on the Organon. 16. Two books on the philosophy of Plato were affirmed to be extant by Gesner. 17. An epistle to his wife Marcella. This piece was discovered by Angelo Mai, in the Ambrosian library, and published at Milan, in 1816. The letter is not quite complete, as the end of the MS. is mutilated. The contents of it are of a general philosophical character, designed to incite to the practice of virtue and self-restraint, and the study of philosophy. The sentiments are a little obscure here and there, but many of the maxims and remarks exhibit great wisdom, and a considerable depth of very pure religious feeling. He considers sorrow to be a more wholesome discipline for the mind than pleasures (c. 7). With great energy and some eloquence he urges the cultivation of the soul and the practice of virtue, in preference to attention to the body. His views of the Deity, of his operations, and the right mode of contemplating and worshipping him, are of a very exalted kind, some reminding the reader strongly of passages in the Scriptures. The laws under which man is placed he distinguishes into natural, civil, and divine, and marks out their respective provinces with considerable beauty and clearness. 18. A poetical fragment, from the tenth book of a work entitled Περὶ τῆς ἐκ λογίων φιλοσοφίας, is published at the end of the preceding work. 19. An introduction to the Tetrabiblos of Ptolemaeus is also attributed by some to Porphyrius, by others to Antiochus. The ἔπειτα δηηγησεῖς εἰς τὰ καὶ ὡς Οὐρανον πλάνα, the production of Nicephorus Gregoras, has also been attributed by some to Porphyrius.

PORPHYRIUS, PUBLIUS OPTATIANUS, a Roman poet, who lived in the age of Constantine the Great. From his panegyric on this emperor, we learn that he had been banished for some reason; and Constantine was so pleased with the flattery of the poet, that he not only recalled him from exile, but honoured him with a letter. Hieronymus says that he was restored to his native country in A.D. 328; but the panegyric must have been presented to Constantine in A.D. 326, as in the manuscript it is said to have been composed in the Vicennalis of the emperor, which were celebrated in this year, and likewise from the fact that the poet praises Crispius, the son of Constantine, who was put to death by order of his father in A.D. 326. We may therefore conclude that the panegyric was written in the previous year, and was intended to celebrate the Vicennalis of the emperor. It is probable that Publius, after his return, was raised to offices of honour and trust, since Tillemon points out (Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. p. 364), from an ancient writer on the praefects of the city, that there was a Publius Optatianus, praefect of the city in A.D. 329, and again in 333, and it is likely enough that he was the same person as the poet. This is all that we know for certain respecting his life. From the way in which he speaks of Africa, it has been conjectured that he was a native of that province; and this is not unlikely, as the name of Optatus and Optatianus was a common one in Africa.

The poems of Porphyrius are some of the worst specimens of a dying literature. The author has purposely made them exceedingly difficult to be understood; and their merit in his eyes, and in those of his contemporaries, seems to have consisted in the artificial manner in which he was able to represent, by lines of various lengths, different objects, such as an altar, an organ, &c. The poems which have come down to us are:—

I. The Panegyric on Constantine, already mentioned, which consists properly of a series of short poems, all of them celebrating the praises of the emperor. There is prefixed a letter of Porphyrius to Constantine, and also a letter from the latter to the poet. This poem has been printed by Pithoeus, Poet. Vel. Paris, 1580, 12mo. and Genev. 1596, 8vo., and by Velscrus, Augustin Vindel. 1595, 4to.

II. Lydilia, of which we have three, namely, 1. Ara Pythias, 2. Spyrus, 3. Orophan, with the lines so arranged as to represent the form of these objects. These three poems are printed in Wernsdorff’s Poetae Latini Minores (vol. ii. pp. 365—413), who also discusses at length everything relating to the life and works of Porphyrius.

III. Epigrams, of which five are printed in the Latin Anthology (Nos. 236—240, ed. Meyer.).

POPHYROGENITUS, a surname of Constantius VII. [See Vol. i. p. 840.]

PORRIMA. *[Postverta.]

PORSENA,* or PORSENA, LARS, king of the Etruscan town of Clusium, plays a distinguished part in the legends of the Tarquins. According to the common tale, as related by Livy, Tarquinius Superbus, on his expulsion from Rome, applied first to Veii and Tarquinius for assistance; and when the people of these towns failed in restoring him to his kingdom, he next repaired to Lars Porsera, who willingly espoused his cause, and forthwith marched against Rome at the head of a vast army. The Romans could not meet him in the field; he took possession of the hill Janiculum, and would have entered the city by the bridge which connected Rome with the Janiculum, had it not been for the superhuman prowess of Horatius Cocles, who kept the whole Etruscan army at bay, while his comrades broke down the bridge behind him. [Cocles.] The Etruscans decided to lay siege to the city, which soon began to suffer from famine. Thereupon a young Roman, named C. Mucius, resolved to deliver his country by murdering the invading king. He accordingly went over to the Etruscan camp, but ignorant of the person of Porsea, killed the royal secretary instead. Seized, and threatened with torture, he thrust his right hand into the fire on the altar, and there let it burn, to show how little he heeded pain. Astonished at his courage, the king bade him depart in peace; and Scaevola, as he was henceforward called, told him, out of gratitude, to make peace with Rome, since three hundred noble youths, he said, had sworn to take the life of the king, and he was the first upon whom the lot had fallen. The story then went on to relate that Porsea withstoodlyf offered peace to the Romans on condition of their restoring to the Veientines the land which they had taken from them: that these terms were accepted, and that Porsea withdrew his troops from the Janiculum after receiving twenty hostages from the Romans. It is further stated that he subsequently restored these hostages [compare Cloelia], and also the land which had been given up to the Veientines. (Liv. ii. 9—15; comp. Dionys. v. 21—34; Plut. Publ. 16—19.)

Such was the tale by which Roman vanity concealed one of the earliest and greatest disasters of the city. The real fact is, that Rome was completely conquered by Porsea. This is expressly stated by Tacitus (Hist. iii. 72), and is confirmed by other writers. Thus, Dionysius relates (v. 34) that the senate sent Porsea an ivory throne, a sceptre, a golden crown and a triumphal robe, which implied that they did homage to him as their sovereign lord; for we find that the Etruscan cities are represented to have sent the same honours to the Roman king Tarquinius Priscus as an acknowledgment of his supremacy. (Dionys. iii. 62.) So thorough was the subjection of the Romans that they were expressly prohibited from using iron for any other purpose but agriculture. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 14. s. 39.) Even the common story related, that they were deprived of the land which they had taken from the Veientines; and Niebuhr shows that they lost all the territory which the kings had gained on the right bank of the Tiber, and that they did not recover it till a long time afterwards. He remarks that we find the thirty tribes, which were established by Servius Tullius, reduced to twenty after the war with Porsea, and that it appears clear from the history of the subsequent war with the Veientines that the Roman territory did not then extend much beyond the Janiculum.

The Romans, however, did not long remain subject to the Etruscans. After the conquest of Rome, Aruns, the son of Porsea, proceeded to attack Aria, but was defeated before the city by the united forces of the Latin cities, assisted by the Greeks of Cumae. (Liv. ii. 15; Dionys. v. 36, vii. 2—11.) The Etruscans appear, in consequence, to have been confined to their own territory on the right bank of the Tiber, and the Romans to have availed themselves of the opportunity to recover their independence.

The Romans of a later age were constantly reminded of Porsea's expedition against their city by the custom at all auctions of offering for sale first the goods of king Porsea. (Liv. i. 14; Plut. Public. 22.) Niebuhr conjectures, with much probability, that this custom may have arisen from the circumstance that, when the Romans recovered their independence, they must have obtained possession of property within the city belonging to Porsea, which they probably sold by auction.

The object of Porsea's expedition against Rome is said to have been the restoration of the Tarquins, and it is natural that such should have been the belief in later times, happening, as the war did, within a year or two of the establishment of the republic. But if such had been its real object, the Tarquins must have been restored to Rome on the conquest of the city. It is, therefore, more natural to believe that this war was in reality a great outburst of the Etruscan nations, who meditated the conquest of Latium, and attacked Rome first, because it was the first city that lay in their way. K. O. Müller even goes so far in opposition to the old tale, as to conjecture that it was Porsea, who expelled the Tarquins from Rome. (Etrusker, vol. i. p. 122.)

The sepulchre of Porsea at Clusium is described at length by Pliny, who borrowed his account from Varro. (H. N. xxxvi. 19. § 4.) It was said to have been an enormous quadrilateral building, each side being three hundred feet long, and fifty feet high. Within was an extraordinary labyrinth, and over the labyrinth were five pyramids, one at each corner and one in the middle, each pyramid being seventy-five wide at the base, and a hundred and fifty feet high. There are other details given, which are still more wonderful, and it is evident that the building, as described by Varro, is a work of the imagination. It is not impossible that we may have seen some remains of a building, which was said to be the tomb of Porsea, and that he found in Etruscan books the description which he has given.

(Respecting the sepulchre of Porsea, see Müller, Etrusker, vol. ii. p. 294, &c., and Letronne, Annal. dell' Instlt. arch. 1829, p. 391; and respecting the history of Porsea in general, see Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 541—551, and Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 125—127.)

PORTHA'ON (Πορθάων). 1. A son of Agenor and Epicaste, was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Aetolia, and married to Euryle, by whom he became the father of Oeneus, Agris, Alcathous, Melas, Leucopus, and Sterope. (Hom. ι. 115, &c.; Apollod. i. 7. § 7, &c.; Paus. iv. 35. § 1, vi. 20. § 8, 21. § 7; Hygin. Fab. 175.) It should be observed that his name is sometimes written Partheus (Huyne ad Apollod. l.c.), and under this name he is mentioned by Antonius Liberalis (2) who calls him a son of Ares.

2. A son of Periphetes. (Paus. viii. 24.) [L.S.] PORTICA'NUS. [Οξυκάνυς.] PORTU'NUS or PORTUMNUS, the protecting genius of harbours among the Romans. He was invoked to grant a happy return from a voyage. Hence a temple was erected to him at

PORUS.

The port of the Tiber, from whence the road descended to the port of Ostia. At his temple an annual festival, the Portunalia, was celebrated on the 17th of August. (Varro, De Ling. Lat. vi. 19; Arnob. iii. 23; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 26; Virg. Aen. v. 241.) He was represented with a key in his hand, portus as well as porta signifying a place which can be closed. At the time when the Romans became familiar with Greek mythology, Portunus was identified with the Greek Palaemon ( Festus, s. v. Portunus, p. 242, ed. Müller; comp. Palaemon [L. S.]).

PORUS (Πορος), the Greek form of the name of two Indian kings at the period of Alexander's invasion. Bohlen (Das alle Indien, vol. i. p. 91) considers it to be a corruption of the Sanskrit "Purusha," which signifies a hero.

1. King of the Indian provinces east of the river Hydaspes, which appears to have formed the boundary of his dominions on the west. It was here, accordingly, that he prepared to meet the invader, and, far from following the example of Taxilas and Abiaes, who had sent embassies of submission to Alexander, he assembled a large army, with which he occupied the left bank of the river. On the arrival of the king on the opposite side, the forces of Porus, and especially his elephants (more than 200 in number), presented so formidable an aspect that Alexander did not venture to attempt the passage in the face of them, but sought by delay, and by repeated feigned attempts at crossing, to lull the vigilance of the Indian monarch into security. These devices were partly successful, and at length Alexander, leaving Craterus with the main body of his army encamped opposite to Porus, effected the passage of the river himself, with a force of 6000 foot and 5000 horse. Porus immediately despatched his son, with a select body of cavalry, to check the march of the invaders, while he himself followed with all his best troops. The battle that ensued* was one of the most severely contested which occurred during the whole of Alexander's campaigns. Porus displayed much skill and judgment in the disposition of his forces, but his schemes were baffled by the superior generalship of his adversary, and his whole army at length thrown into confusion. Still the Indian king maintained his ground, and it was not till the troops around him were utterly routed, and he himself severely wounded in the shoulder, that he consented to quit the field. Alexander was struck with his courage, and sent emissaries in pursuit of him to assure him of safety. Hereupon Porus surrendered, and was conducted to the conqueror, of whom he proudly demanded to be treated in a manner worthy of a king. This magnanimity at once conciliated the favour of Alexander, who received him with the utmost honour, and not only restored to him his dominions, but increased them by large acces sions of territory. (Arrian, Anab. v. 8, 9—19, 20, 21; Curt. viii. 13, 14; Diod. xvii. 87—89; Plut. Alex. 60; Justin. xii. 8; Strab. xv. pp. 686, 691, 693.)

* It was fought, according to Arrian, in the month of Munychion, in the archonship of Hegemon, i.e. April or May, b.c. 326: but this date is subject to many difficulties. (See Clinton, E. H. vol. ii. p. 158; Droysen, Gesch. Alex. p. 400, note; and Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vii. p. 22, note.)

POSEIDIPPOS.

From this time Porus became firmly attached to his generous conqueror. He accompanied Alexander on his expedition against the neighbouring Indian tribes; but after he had crossed the Aeaces, was sent back to his own territory to raise an additional force, with which he rejoined the king at Sangala, and rendered him effective assistance against the Cathaeneans, a tribe with whom he himself was previously on terms of hostility. He subsequently accompanied Alexander with an auxiliary force as far as the banks of the Hyphasis, and after his return contributed actively to the equipment of his fleet. For these services he was rewarded by the king with the government of the whole region from the Hydaspes to the Hyphasis, including, it is said, seven towns and above two thousand cities. (Arrian, Anab. v. 22, 24, 29, vi. 2; Curt. ix. 2, § 5, 3, § 22; Diod. xvii. 93.) These dominions he continued to hold unmolested until the death of Alexander, and was allowed to retain them (apparently with the title of king) in the division of the provinces after that event, as well as in the subsequent partition at Triparadiseus, b.c. 321. Probably the generals were aware how difficult it would have been to dispossess him. Eudemos, however, who had been left in command of the Macedonian troops in the adjacent province, was able to decoy Porus into his power, and treacherously put him to death. (Diod. viii. 3, xix. 14; Curt. x. 1. § 20; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 72, a.)

We are told that Porus was a man of gigantic stature—not less than five cubits in height; and his personal strength and prowess in war were not less conspicuous than his valor. (Liv. 2. 21.) Servilius Rusca, who, at the time of Alexander's expedition, ruled over the district termed Gandarîs, east of the river Hydages, was a cousin of Porus, who, according to the preceding, but on hostile terms with him, who led up on the approach of Alexander to court the alliance of the Macedonian king, and to send envoys with offers of submission to the invader, both before and after the defeat of Porus. But on learning the favour with which his kinsman had been treated by Alexander, he became alarmed for his own safety, and fled on the approach of the conqueror. His dominions were subdued by Hephaestion, and annexed to those of his kinsman. (Arrian, Anab. v. 20, 21; Strab. xv. p. 699.)

POSEIDIPPOS or POSIDIPPOS (Ποσειδιππος, Ποσίδιππος, both forms are found in MSS.; the inscription on the statue in the Vatican gives the former). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Cynicus, and a native of Cassandra in Macedonia. He is one of the six who are mentioned by the anonymous writer on Comedy (p. xxx.) as the most celebrated poets of the New Comedy. In time, he was the last, not only of these six, but of all the poets of the New Comedy. He began to exhibit dramas in the third year after the death of Manander, that is, in Ol. 122. 3, b.c. 289, so that his time falls just at the era in Greek literary history which is marked by the accession of Ptolemy Philadelphia. (Suid. s. v.; Clinton, F. H., vol. ii. s. a. and p. ii.) Of the events of the poet’s life nothing is known; but his portrait is preserved to us in the beautiful sitting statue in the Vatican, which, with the accompanying statue of Manander, is esteemed by Winckelmann and others as among the finest works of Greek sculpture which have come down to us. (Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. iii. pp. 16—21; Winckelmann, Vorlittige Abhandlungen, c. iv. § 126; see also the description by Schlegel, quoted under Manander, Vol. II. p. 1031, b.)

Athenaeus (xiv. p. 652, d.) mentions a letter of the comic poet and grammarian, Lyceus of Samos, to Poseidippus.

In his language, Meineke (p. 484) has detected some new words, and old words in new senses, totally unknown to the best Attic writers.

According to Suidas, he wrote forty plays, of which the following eighteen titles are preserved: Ἀμαλθέων, Ἀσπίλακωτία, Γαλατία, Δήματα, Ἐρυθρόδωτος, Ἐστίστατος, Φλεγάντος, Κάθως, Λοκρίδη, Μεταφρασάμενος, Μώρυξ, Ὀμοιο, Πανθόρ, Πολυνασικόν, Σύντροφος, Φλοσόφος, Φτωκάτωρ, Χαρακτικόν. The extant fragments of these plays are not sufficient to enable us to form an accurate judgment of the poet’s style; but it seems, from the titles, that some of his plays were of a licentious character.

2. An epigrammatic poet, who was probably a different person from the comic poet, since he is mentioned with the appellation ὁ ἐπιγραμματογράφος (Schol. in Apoll. Rhod. i. 1289). He seems, however, to have lived about the same time as the comic poet, since Zeno and Cleantus, who were contemporary with the latter, are mentioned in one of his epigrams (No. 11), and another epigram (No. 21) is upon the temple which Ptolemy Philadelphia erected in honour of his sister and wife Arsinoé [Arsinoë]. He is several times referred to by Athenaeus, Stephanus Byzantinus, and the grammarians. His epigrams formed a part of the Gar- land of Meleager, who appears to mention him as a Sicilian (Proem. 45, 46); and twenty-two of them are preserved in the Greek Anthology; but some of these are also ascribed to Asclepiades and Callimachus. One of his epigrams, that on the statue of Opportunity by Lysippus (No. 13), is imitated by Ausonius (Epig. 12.)

3. An historian, who wrote a work respecting Cnidus, which contained several particulars respecting the Venus of Praxiteles. (Clem. Alex. Protrept. pp. 16, 17; Arnob. vi. 13.) He is also cited by Tzetzes, who concludes his quotation with an epigram by Poseidippus (Chil. vii. 144). From this and other circumstances it appears very probable that this historian was the same person as the epigrammatist. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 491, ed. Westermann.)

POSEIDON (Ποσείδων), the god of the Medi-terranean sea. His name seems to be connected with πότος, πόντος and ποταμός, according to which he is the god of the fluid element. (Müller, Proleg. p. 290.) He was a son of Cronos and Rhea (whence he is called Ρωθων and by Latin poets Saturnus, Pld. Ol. vii. 40; Virg. Aen. 799.) He was accordingly a brother of Zeus, Hades, Hera, Helius and Demeter, and it was determined by lot that he should rule over the sea. (Hom. Il. xiv. 156, xv. 187, &c.; Hes. Theog. 456.) Like his brothers and sisters, he was, after his birth, swallowed by his father Cronus, but thrown up again. (Apollod. i. 1 § 5, 2 § 1.) According to others, he was concealed by Rhea, after his birth, among a flock of lambs, and his mother pretended to have given birth to a young horse, which she gave to Cronus to devour. A well in the neighbourhood of Martineia, where this is said to have happened, was believed, from this circumstance, to have derived the name of the “Lamb’s Well,” or Arne. (Paus. viii. § 8.) According to Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. 644) the nurse of Poseidon bore the name of Arne; when Cronus searched after his son, Arne is said to have declared that she knew not where he was, and that her the town of Arne was believed to have received its name. According to others, again, he was brought up by the Telchines at the request of Rhea. (Diod. v. 55.) In the earliest poems, Poseidon is described as indeed equal to Zeus in dignity, but weaker. (Hom. Il. viii. 210, xv. 165, 186, 209; comp. xiii. 355, Od. xiii. 148.) Hence we find him angry when Zeus, by haughty words, attempts to intimidate him; nay, he even threatens his mightier brother, and once he conspired with Hera and Athena to put him into chains (Hom. Il. xv. 176, &c. 212, &c.; comp. i. 400.) But, on the other hand, we also find him yielding and submissive to Zeus (viii. 440). The palace of Poseidon was in the depth of the sea near Aegae in Euboea (xiii. 21; Od. v. 381), where he kept his horses with brazen hoofs and golden manes. With these horses he rides in a chariot over the waves of the sea, which become smooth as he approaches, and the monsters of the deep recognise him and play around his chariot. (Il. xii. 27; comp. Virg. Aen. v. 817, &c.; i. 147; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1240, &c.) Generally he himself put his horses to his chariot, but sometimes he was assisted by Amphitrite. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 1158, iv. 1225; Eurip. Androm. 1011; Virg. Aen. v. 817.) But although he generally dwelt in the sea, still he also appears in Olympus in the assembly of the gods. (Hom. Il. vii. 440, xii. 44, 352, xv. 161, 190, xx. 13.) Poseidon in conjunction with Apollo is said to have built the walls of Troy for Laomedon (vii. 452; Eurip. Androm. 1014), whence Troy is called Νετερίς. Poseidon is sometimes identified, Ov. Fast. i. 525, Herod. iii. 151; comp. Virg. Aen. vi. 810.) Accordingly, although he was otherwise well disposed towards the Greeks, yet he was jealous of the wall which the Greeks built around their own ships, and he lamented the inglorious manner in which the walls
POSEIDON.

The symbol of Poseidon's power was the trident, or a spear with three points, with which he used to shatter rocks, to call forth or subdue storms, to shake the earth, and the like. Herodotus (ii. 50, iv. 188) states, that the name and worship of Poseidon was imported to the Greeks from Libya, but he was probably a divinity of Pelasgian origin, and originally a personification of the fertilizing power of water, from which the transition to regarding him as the god of the sea was not difficult. It is a remarkable circumstance that in the legends about this divinity there are many in which he is said to have disputed the possession of certain countries with other gods. Thus, in order to take possession of Attica, he thrust his trident into the ground on the acropolis, where a well of sea-water was thereby called forth; but Athena created the olive tree, and the two divinities disputed, until the gods assigned Attica to Athena. Poseidon, indignant at this, caused the country to be inundated. (Herod. viii. 55; Apollod. iii. 14. § 1; Paus. i. 24. § 3, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 164.) With Athena he also disputed the possession of Troezen, and at the command of Zeus he shared the place with her. (Paus. ii. 30. § 6) With Helios he disputed the sovereignty of Corinth, which along with the isthmus was adjudged to him, while Helios received the acropolis. (ii. 1. § 8) With Hera he disputed the possession of Argolis, which was adjudged to the former by Inachus, Cepheus, and Asterion, in consequence of which Poseidon caused the rivers of these river-gods to be dried up. (ii. 15. § 5, 22. § 5; Apollod. ii. 1. § 4.) With Zeus, lastly, he disputed the possession of Aegina, and with Dionysus that of Naxos. (Plut. Sympos. ix. 6.) At one time Delphi belonged to him in consequence with Ge, but Apollon gave him Celauria as a compensation for it. (Paus. ii. 33. § 3; xx. § 3; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1243, with the Schol.)

The following legends also deserve to be mentioned. In conjunction with Zeus he fought against Cronos and the Titans (Apollod. i. 2. § 1), and in the contest with the Giants he pursued Polybotes across the sea as far as Cos, and there killed him by throwing the island upon him. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2; Paus. i. 2. § 4.) He further crushed the Centaurs when they were pursued by Hercules, under a mountain in Leucosia, the island of the Seirens. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 4.) He sued together with Zeus for the hand of Thetis, but he withdrew when Themis prophesied that the son of Thetis would be greater than his father. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 5; Tzetzes ad Lyc. 176.) When Ares had been caught in the wonderful net by Hephaestus, the latter set him free at the request of Poseidon (Hom. Od. viii. 344, &c.), but Poseidon afterwards brought a charge of these and other improper acts before the Aresiopagus, for having killed his son Halirrhothius. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 2.) At the request of Minos, king of Crete, Poseidon caused a bull to rise from the sea, which the king promised to sacrifice; but when Minos treacherously concealed the animal among a herd of oxen, the god punished Minos by causing his daughter Pasiphaë to fall in love with the bull. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 3, &c.; Pericyalmenos, who was either a son or a grandson of Poseidon, received from him the power of assuming various forms. (i. 9. § 9, iii. 6. § 8.)

Poseidon was married to Amphitrite, by whom he had three children, Triton, Rhodhe, and Benthesicyme (Hes. Theog. 930; Apollod. i. 4. § 6,

To the occasion of his first visit probably belongs the story that Poseidonius, to prevent the disappointment of his distinguished visitor, though severely afflicted with the gout, held a long discourse on the topic that pain is not an evil (Cic. Tusc. Disp. ii. 25). He seems to have availed himself of his acquaintance with Pompey to gain such additions as he could to his geographical and historical knowledge (Strab. xi. p. 492). In b. c. 51 Poseidonius removed to Rome, and appears to have died soon after. He was succeeded in his school by his disciple and grand-son Jason. [Jason, p. 556.] Among his disciples were Phanias (Diog. Laér. vii. 41), and Asclepiodotus (Senec. Nat. ii. 26, vii. 17). Besides Cicero, he seems to have had among his hearers C. Velleius, C. Cotta, Q. Lucilius Balbus, and probably Brutus. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 44; Plut. Brut. p. 984.) Of Pompey we have already spoken.

Poseidonius was a man of extensive and varied acquirements in almost all departments of human knowledge. Strabo (xvi. p. 753) calls him ἀνάλογα τῶν καθ’ ἴδιαν φιλολόγων πολυμέθυστον. Cicero thought so highly of his powers, that he requested him to write an account of his consulsip (ad Att. ii. 1). As a physical investigator he was greatly superior to the Stoics generally, attaching himself in this respect rather to Aristotle. His geographical and historical knowledge was very extensive. Though attached to the Stoic system, he was far less dogmatical and obstinate than the majority of that school, refusing to admit a dogma because it was one of the school, if it did not commend itself to him for its intrinsic merits. This scientific cast of his mind Galen attributes to his accurate acquaintance with geometry (De Plac. Hipp. et Plut. iv. p. 279, viii. p. 319). His style of composition also seems to have been far removed from the ungraceful stiffness which was frequently affected by Stoic writers. (Strab. v. p. 147; comp. Galen, l. c. iv. p. 281, v. p. 296.)
POSEIDONIUS.

Poseidonius adhered to the division of philosophy usual among the ancients, into physics, ethics, and dialectics (Diog. Laërt. vii. 59), comparing the first to the blood and flesh of an animal, the second to the bones and nerves, the last to the soul. (Sextus Empir. adv. Math. vi. 19; Diog. Laërt. vii. 40.) He recognised two principles (διαχωρισμός) — passive (matter), and active (God). His physical doctrines were, in the main, those of the Stoics generally, though he differed from them in some particulars. He held that the vacuum beyond the universe was not infinite, but only large enough to allow of the dissolution of the universe (he discarded the doctrine of its destruction by fire, Phil. Jud. de Aet. Mundi, ii. p. 497, ed. Mang.). He considered the heaven as the governing principle (τὸ ἐγκεκριμένον) of the universe (Diog. Laërt. vii. 139.) He cultivated astronomy with considerable diligence, and, unlike Panaetius, was a believer in astrology (Cic. de Div. ii. 42). Poseidonius also constructed a planetary machine, or revolving sphere, to exhibit the daily motions of the sun, moon and planets. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 34.) He inferred that the sun is larger than the earth, among other reasons he gives the circumference of the earth by a somewhat smaller number than that given by Eudoxus, Sipylos, and Rhodos. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 144;Macrobi. ad Somn. Scip. i. 20.) Its greater apparent magnitude as it sets was attributed to its being seen through dense and misty air, and supposed that if we could see it through a solid wall it would appear larger still. (Cleomedes, Cyc. Theor. ii. p. 430.) He calculated the diameter of the sun to be 4,000,000 stadia, on the assumption that the orbit of the sun was 10,000 times the circumference of the earth, and that it is within a space of 400 stadia N. and S. that the sun casts no shadow. (Cleomedes, l. c. p. 452.) The distance between the earth and the sun he set down at above 502,000,000 stadia. (Plin. H. N. ii. 21.) The moon also he considered to be larger than the earth, and composed of transparent elements, though on account of its great size the rays of the sun do not pass through it in eclipses. (Stob. Ed. Phys. i. p. 59; Cleomed. l. c. ii. p. 500.) Poseidonius, in this manner, that it is of an igneous nature, not so dense as stars, but somehow so much lighter, and intended to warm those parts of the universe which the sun's heat does not reach, was extensively adopted. (Macrobi. l. c. i. 15.) Poseidonius's calculation of the circumference of the earth differed widely from that of Eratosthenes. He made it only 160,000 stadia, and his measurement was pretty generally adopted. His calculation was founded on observations of the star Canopus made in Spain, not, as Cleomedes says, in Rhodes. (Strab. ii. p. 119; Cleom. l. c. i. 8.; comp. Mannert, Geogr. vol. i. p. 105, &c.) The shape of the habitable part of the earth he compared to that of a sling, the greatest extent being from E. to W. (Strab. ii. p. 207; Athisherus, ap. Hudson. Geogr. Min. vol. i. p. 2.) Of the connection between the moon and the tides he was well aware. (Strab. iii. p. 173.) Strabo frequently refers to Poseidonius as one of the most distinguished geographers. A great number of passages, containing the views of Poseidonius on various other geographical and astronomical points, has been collected by Bake.

As the basis of his ethical and mental philosophy Poseidonius took the Stoic system, though with considerable modifications, for he held it possible to amalgamate with it much of the systems of Plato and Aristotle. In some respects his views approximated to the Pythagorean doctrines. (Sext. Empir. Adv. Math. vii. 93; Galen. de Hipp. et Plat. Plac. v. p. 171.) It seems to have been his object as far as possible to 'banish contradiction from philosophy, and bring all the systems which had been propounded into harmony with each other, and to infuse into the decaying vitality of philosophical thought something of the vigour of past times. But that he could suppose the doctrines of Zeno, Aristotle and Plato capable of reconciliation with each other, shows that he could not have seized very distinctly the spirit of each. To give anything like plausibility to this attempt, it was of course necessary to introduce considerable modifications into the Stoic doctrines. In some points however in which he differed from Panaetius he rather returned to the views of the earlier Stoic philosophers. His fourfold division of virtue is apparently that followed by Cicero in his De Officiis. He did not think virtue by itself sufficient for perfect happiness, unless accompanied by external, bodily good. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 128.) Thus he regarded virtue in the contemplation of the truth and order of all things, and the fashioning oneself, as far as possible, in accordance therewith, being led aside as little as possible by the irrational part of the soul. (Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 416.) In the classification of the faculties of the soul he returned to the system of Plato, dividing them into reason, emotion, and appetite (δικαίωμα διοικούμενον ἢ ἁμαρτία τῶν ὅρμων, ἐπιθυμίας τε καὶ ἁμαρτίας καὶ λογισμούς, Galen. loc. vi. c. 319), with which division he considered questions of practical morality to be intimately connected (Galen. l. c. iv. p. 284, v. p. 291). It was apparently to keep up a bond of connection with the Stoic dogmas that he spoke of these ὅρμοι (nothing remaining so irrationally of the same essence (Galen. l. c. vi. p. 296), though other features of his system are not easily reconcilable with that view. But instead of regarding the ἁμαρτία of the soul as being, or ensuing upon, judgments (αἴσθησις), he considered it the reason, he deduced them from the inner faculties of the soul, appealing to the fact that emotion and appetite manifest themselves in irrational beings. He connected affections and perturbations of the mind with external influences, the union of the soul with the body, and the influence of the latter upon the former, some conditions of man being predominantly bodily, others spiritual; some passing from the body to the soul, others from the soul to the body. This idea he carried out to the permanent modifications of character produced by particular bodily organisations, founding thereon a sort of physiognomical system. (Galen. l. c. v. p. 290.) He sometimes spoke of appetite as corresponding to vegetable life, emotion to animal life, reason to the proper human (l. c. p. 170).

None of the writings of Poseidonius has come down to us entire. We find mention of the following:—1. Περὶ Σκῆς, consisting of at least thirteen books (Diog. Laërt. vii. 138). 2. Περὶ μαντικῆς, in five books. Poseidonius defended divination, and analysed its foundations. 3. Περὶ εἰμαρμηνείας. 4. Περὶ ἰδίων καὶ ἀδιάκριτων. 5. Φυσικός λόγος, consisting of at least fifteen books (Diog. Laërt. viii. 140). 6. Περὶ κόσμου. 7. Εἰρήνη τοῦ Πλατάνου Τιμίου. 8. Περὶ κενοῦ. 9. Περὶ μετεόρων: Dio- genes Laërtius cites from the seventeenth book of POSEIDONIUS.

It. 10. Μεταφορολογικοί Στοιχείωσις. 11. Περί τού ἑλεοῦ, μεγάλου. 12. Περί Ἀκανθοῦ. 13. Περί ψυχής. 14. Περί Πήγας τοῦ Σιδένων, or at least a mathematical work in which his views were controverted. 15. Ἡθικός λόγος. 16. Προτρεπτικά, in defence of the position, that the study of philosophy ought not to be neglected on account of the discrepancies in the systems of different philosophers.

17. Περί καθήκοντος (see Cic. ad Att. xvi. 11).

18. Περί συμβ. 19. A treatise on the connection between virtues and the division of the faculties of the mind (Galen. l.c. viii. p. 310).

20. Περί εὐτυχίας. 21. Εὐσυνοικία ἔργον. A grammatical work. 22. An extensive historical work, in at least forty-nine or fifty books (Athen. iv. p. 168, d.), and apparently of very miscellaneous contents, to judge by the tolerably numerous quotations of it in Athenaeus, and comprising events from the time of Alexander the Great to his own times.

Suidas, by a gross blunder, attributes to Poseidonius of Alexandria an historical work in fifty-two books, in continuation of the history of Polybius. Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 199, ed. Westermann) considers this work to be identical with the historical work of Poseidonius of Apameia. Bake dissents from this view, inasmuch as events were mentioned by Poseidonius earlier than those included in the history of Polybius, and assigns the work to Poseidonius of Olbiopoliis. His objection is not decisive, and Westermann coincides with Vossius. But the account which Suidas gives of the work is enormously wrong, as he says it ended with the Cyrenae war (n. c. 324), and yet was a continuation of the history of Polybius, which goes down to the destruction of Corinth by Mummium (b. c. 146). 23. A history of the life of Pompierius Magnus (Strab. x. p. 753). This may possibly have been a part of his larger historical work. 24. Τέχνη ταυτική (de Aice instruenda). 25. Various epistles.

All the relics which still remain of the writings of Poseidonius have been carefully collected and illustrated by Janus Bake, in a work entitled Posideoni Rhodii Reliquiae Doctrinae, Lugd. Bat. 1810. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 572; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 190, ed. Westermann; Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, bk. xi. c. 6, vol. iii. p. 700, &c.; Bake, l.c.).

There was an earlier Poseidonius, a native of Alexandria, and a disciple of Zeno, mentioned by Diogenes Laëtrius (vii. 38) and Suidas, who (besides the historical work above referred to) mentions some writings, of which, however, he is more disposed to consider Poseidonius of Olbiopoliis the author. The latter he describes as a sophist and historian, and the author of the following works:—Περί τοῦ Ἀκανθοῦ: Περί τῆς Τυρκίας καλουμένης χώρας: Άττικὰ ἱστορίας, in four books; Λήμνων, in eleven books; and some others. The first mentioned work is assigned by Bake to Poseidonius of Apameia.

There were also some others of the same name who are worth mentioning. [C. P. M.

POSEIDIOUS (Poseidonius), the name of two Greek physicians, who have been confounded together by Sprengel (Hist. de la Méd. vol. ii. p. 92, French transl.), and placed in "the time of Valens:" and also by M. Littre (Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. iii. p. 5), who, while correcting one half of Sprengel's chronological mistake, falls himself into the same error, and equally supposes them to have been one and the same individual, whom he places in the first century after Christ.

1. The author of some medical works, of which nothing but a few fragments remain, who quotes Archigenes (ap. Aest. ii. 12, p. 255), and is himself quoted by Rufus Ephesus (ap. Ang. Mai. Classic. Auctor. e Vatic. Codic. Edit. vol. iv. p. 11), and who must, therefore, have lived about the end of the first century after Christ. He is one of the earliest writers who is known to have mentioned the glandular or true plague, though this disease was, till quite lately, supposed to have been unknown till a much later period (see M. Littre, loco cit.). He is several times quoted by Aetius (i. 3, 121, ii. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 13, 18, 20, 21, 24, pp. 139, 243, 244, 246, 247, 248, 254, 255, 257, 258, 260), and Paulus Aegineta (vii. 3, 21, pp. 614, 692, 693). The name frequently occurs in Galen, but it is probable that in every passage the philosopher is referred to and not the physician. If (as seems upon the whole not unlikely) this Poseidonius is the pupil of Zopyrus at Alexandria, who is mentioned by Apollonius Cithaensis as his fellow-pupil (ap. Dictz, Schol. in Hippocr et Gal. vol. i. p. 2), there is a chronological difficulty which the writer is not at present able to explain.

2. The son of Philostorgius and brother of Philagrius, who lived in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ, during the reign of Valentinian and Valens. (Philostorg. H. E. viii. 10.) [W. A. G.]

POSEIDONIUS, of Ephesus, a celebrated silver-chaser, who was contemporary with Pastoteles, in the time of Pompey. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 12. s. 55.) Pliny mentions him also among the artists who made athletas et armatae et venatores sacrificantesque, and adds to the mention of his name the words qui et argentum caelestium nobiliter (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 34). Nagler (Künstler-Lexicon) makes the singular mistake of ascribing to him the sphere of the celebrated philosopher Poseidonius, which is mentioned by Cicero (de Nat. Deor. ii. 34). [P. S.]

POSIS, a Roman modeller, who lived in the first century a. e., and who was mentioned as an acquaintance by M. Varro, according to whom he made apples and grapes, which it was impossible to distinguish from the real objects. (Varro, op. Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 12. s. 45.) The text of the passage is very corrupt; but there can be little doubt that the reading as restored by Gronovius gives the meaning fairly, namely: M. Varro tradidit sibi cognitum Romae Postum nomine, a quo facta poma et uvas, ut non possis discernere a veris. These imitations of fruit must have been first modelled, and then painted. Their truthfulness would suggest the suspicion that they were in wax; but, from the absence of any statement to that effect, it must be supposed that they were only in some kind of clay or stucco or gypsum. [P. S.]

POSSIDIUS, a disciple of Augustine, with whom he lived upon intimate terms for nearly four years. In A.D. 307 he was appointed Bishop of Calama, a town in Numidia at no great distance from Hippo Regius; but this elevation brought no tranquillity nor ease, for his career from this time forward presents one continued struggle with a succession of fierce antagonists. For a long period he was engaged in active strife with the Donatists, maintained triumphant disputations in public with their leaders on several occasions, and was one of the four prelates dispatched in 410 by the orthodox party in Africa to Honorius, for the purpose of soliciting a repeal of the law which had been passed in favour of their heretical opponents. He next took a prominent part in the councils held against Caeslius and Pelagius. In A.D. 430 he was driven from Calama by the Vandals, sought refuge at Hippo, and while that city was besieged, watched over the deathbed of his preceptor and friend. Prosper relates in his chronicle (i. d. 437) that Possidius, along with Novatus and Severianus, strenuously resisted the efforts of Genesric to propagate the doctrines of Arianism, and it is generally believed, that having been expelled from Africa, after the capture of Carthage (A.d. 439), he made his way to Italy, and there died.

Two traits by Possidius are still extant.

1. Vita Augustini. 2. Indicius Scriptorum Augustini. These are attached to all the best editions of Augustine. The best edition of the Vita, in a separate form, is that of Salinas, 8vo. Rom. 1753, and Aug. Vindel. 1768; of the Indicius, that published at Venice, 8vo. 1735. [W. R.]

POSTUSIS (ΠΩΣΙΣ), a Greek writer, mentioned only by Athenaeus, who cites two of his works, namely the third book of his history of the Amazons (Ἀμαζόνις, vii. p. 296, d.), and the third book of his history of Magnesia (Μαγνησίαν, xii. p. 533, d.).

POSTVERTA or POSTVORTA, is properly a surname of Carmenta, describing her as turning backward and looking at the past, which she revealed to poets and other mortals. In like manner the prophetic power with which she looked into the future, is indicated by the surnames Anteverta, Prorsa (i.e. Proversa), and Porrima. Poets, however, have personified these attributes of Carmenta, and thus describe them as the companions of the goddess. (Ov. Fast. i. 633; Macrobi. Sat. i. 7; Gellius, xvi. 16; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 336.) [L. S.]

POSTUMIA. 1. A Vestal virgin, accused of incest in B.C. 419, in consequence of the elegance of her dress and the freedom of her remarks, but acquitted, with an admittance of the two more careful in her conduct for the future. (Liv. iv. 44.)

2. The wife of Ser. Sulpius, was a busy intriguing woman, and did not bear a good character. She is said to have been one of the mistresses of Julius Caesar (Suet. Jul. 50), and Cicero suspected that it was her charms which drew his legatus Pompeius from Cilicia to Rome. (Cic. ad Att. v. 21. § 9.) Her name frequently occurs in Cicero's correspondence at the time of the civil wars (ad Fam. iv. 2, ad Att. x. 3. A., x. 14, xii. 11. &c.).

POSTUMIA'GENS, patrician, was one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, and frequently held the highest offices of the state, from the banishment of the kings to the downfall of the republic. The most distinguished family in the gens was that of ALBVS or ALBINVS, but we also find at the commencement of the republic distinguished families of the names of MEGILLVS and TIBER'TVS. The first of the Postumii, who obtained the consulship, was P. Postumius Tubertus, in B.C. 503, only six years after the expulsion of the kings. REGILLVSUS is properly an agnomen of the ALBINVS, and accordingly persons with this surname are given under ALBINVS. In the insurrection of Ingenuus [Ingenuus], he committed his son Saloninus to the guardianship of Silvanus. Postumus, feeling alarmed by this arrangement, took advantage of the disaffection of the troops towards the royal family, raised the standard of rebellion, assumed the style and title of emperor, and drove Saloninus to take refuge in Colonia Agrippina, where he was besieged, and eventually put to death upon the capture of the city. These events took place in A.D. 258 and 259, while Valerian was prosecuting his unfortunate campaign against the Persians. Whatever guilt may attach to the circumstances under which Postumus established his sway—and these are differently represented by different authorities, since Pollio declares that he was urged on by the discontent of the army and the provincials rather than by any ambition of his own, denying, at the same time, that he had any hand in the death of the youth whom he represents as having been actually consigned to his protection—it seems certain that he exercised his power with firmness, moderation, and skill. Not only were the efforts of Gallienus to take vengeance for his son signally frustrated; but while the nominal sovereign was indulging in slothful pleasures, the pretender, beloved by all to whom his influence extended, maintained a strong and just government, and preserved Gaul from the devastation of the warlike tribes upon the eastern border. Hence the titles of Imperator and Germanicus Maximus, which recur upon the medals of several successive years, are in this case something better than a mere empty boast. At length, however, his fickle subjects became weary of submitting to the strict and well-regulated discipline enforced in all departments of the state, rallied round a new adventurer named Laelianus [Laelianus; Lolliianus], and Postumus, who assuredly may claim the highest place among the numerous pageants of royalty that sprung up and disappeared with such rapidity during this disturbed epoch, was slain A.D. 267, in the tenth year of his reign. The number of coins still extant bearing the effigy of this prince, and the skilful workmanship displayed in the gold pieces especially, prove that the arts of peace were not despised in his court, while the letters S. C. stamped after the usual fashion upon the brass money, seem to indicate that he had surrounded himself with a body of counsellors, whom he chose to consider the true Roman senate.

All questions connected with this reign have been investigated, with much diligence, accuracy, and learning, by Brequigny in the Mémoires de l’Académie de Sciences et Belles-Lettres, vol. xxx. p. 338, &c. There is also a dissertation on the Life of Postumus by Joach. Meierus, published in Walterek Elcet, p. 203. The chief ancient authorities are, Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. ii.; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 33, Epit. 32; Eutrop. ix. 7; Oros. vii. 22; Zosim. i. 38; Zonar. xii. 24. From inscriptions and medals we obtain the name given above, M. Cassianus Latinius Postumus, but Victor terms him Cassius Labienus Postumus, while Pollio uniformly designates him as Postumius, and erroneously limits the duration of his power to seven years.

[W. R.]

POSTUMUS, son of the foregoing, is mentioned by Trebellius Pollio, who presses in his name to swell the number of the 30 tyrants, stating that having received first the title of Caesar, and subsequently that of Augustus, he was slain along with his father. But when we recollect that notwithstanding the multitude of coins still existing of the elder Postumus, not one has been found commemorating the dignities of the younger, we are led with Eckhel to doubt the testimony of a writer notoriously inaccurate, and to conclude that no such person ever existed, or at all events that he was never invested with the title of Augustus or Caesar. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. Tyr. iii.; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 447.) It must not, however, be concealed, that in addition to the pieces described by Golzius, which every numismatologist rejects as spurious, there are to be found in some cabinets two very rare medals, one in gold, the other in billon, bearing upon the obverse the head of the elder Postumus, with the legend IMP. C. POSTUMUS. P. F. AUG., and on the reverse the bust of a more juvenile personage, with a radiated crown, and the words INVICTO. AUG. Whether we are justified in regarding this as a representation of the younger Postumus, is a question which can hardly be answered with certainty, but the arguments adduced to prove the affirmative are far from being conclusive. (See Mionnet, Médailles Romaines, vol. ii. p. 70.) A cut of the billon coin is placed below.

COIN OF POSTUMUS JUNIOR.

POSTUMUS, ACTIUS, a rhetorician, mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Controv. 21.)

POSTUMUS, AGrippa. [Agrippa, p. 78.]

POSTUMUS, CURTIUS. 1. 2. Qu. and CN. CURTI Postumii, two brothers, were argentarii, with whom Verres had pecuniary dealings. One of these, Quintus, who is called by Cicero a sodalis of Verres, was afterwards a judex questions in the trial of Verres. (Cic. Ferr. 1. 39, 61.)

3. M. CURTIUS POSTUMUS, was recommended by Cicero to Caesar in B.C. 54 for the post of tribune of the soldiers, which he obtained. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 15. § 3, iii. 1. § 3.) On the breaking out of the civil war, in B.C. 49, he espoused with zeal the cause of Caesar, and was, on that account, a disreputable guest to Cicero, whom he visited at his Formian villa. He appears to have entertained the hope of obtaining, through Caesar's influence, some of the higher dignities in the state (dibopham cognit). It appears that Atticus was afraid lest Curtius should prevent him from leaving Italy.
about this time. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 2, n. 5, 6, x. 13, § 3, ad Fam. ii. 16, § 7.) When Cicero had returned to Rome, after the defeat of the Pompeians, and considered it advisable to cultivate the friendship of Caesar, he renewed his acquaintance with Curtius, and accordingly speaks of him as one of his friends in b.c. 46; but in the following year he writes with indignation to Atticus that Curtius thinks of becoming a candidate for the consulship (ad Fam. vi. 12, § 2, ad Att. xii. 49.). After Caesar's death Curtius attacked with vehemence those persons, like Cicero, who rejoiced at Caesar's death, but defended his acts (ad Att. xiv. 9, § 2.). Instead of Curtius Postumus, we frequently find Curtius Postumius in many manuscripts and editions of Cicero, the son of the preceding.

POSTUMUS, M. EGNATIUS, one of the consules suffecti in a.d. 183.

POSTUMUS, T. FURCANIUS, was one of the judges at the trial of Milo in b.c. 52, and had previously suffered injuries from Clodius. (Cic. pro Mil. 27.) He appears to have been praetor in Sicily in b.c. 50 and 49, and in the latter year the senate appointed Postumius as his successor (ad Att. vii. 5, § 2.). [Postumus, No. 7.] He is again mentioned as the governor of Sicily, with the title of proconsul, in b.c. 45 (ad Fam. vi. 8, § 3, vi. 9.).

POSTUMUS, JULIUS, a paramour of Militia Priscia, who had great influence with Livia, the mother of Tiberius, and whom Sejanus employed to injure Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus, in the opinion of Livia, a.d. 23. (Tac. Ann. iv. 12.) In an inscription (Gruter, 113, 1) we find mention made of a C. Julius Sex. Postumus, who was prefect of Egypt under Claudius: he was the son of the preceding.

POSTUMUS, POENIUS. [Pomnus.]

POSTUMUS, C. RABIRIUS, whom Cicero defended in b.c. 54 in an oration, still extant, was a Roman equestrian, and the son of C. Curius, a wealthy farmer of the public revenues. He was born after the death of his father, who had married the sister of C. Rabirius, whom Cicero had defended in b.c. 63, when he was accused by T. Labienus; and he was adopted by his uncle Rabirius, whose name he consequently assumed. The younger Rabirius carried on a profitable business as a money-lender, and had among his debtors Ptolemy Auletes, who had been compelled to borrow large sums of money, in order to purchase the supply of the leading men at Rome, to keep him on the throne. To pay his Roman creditors, Ptolemy was obliged to oppress his subjects; and his actions became so intolerable, that the Egyptians expelled him from the kingdom. He accordingly fled to Rome in b.c. 57, and Rabirius and his other creditors supplied him with the means of corrupting the Roman nobles, as they had no hopes of regaining their money except by his restoration to the throne. Ptolemy at length obtained his object, and Gabinius, the proconsul of Syria, encouraged by Pompey, marched with a Roman army into Egypt in b.c. 55. Ptolemy thus regained his kingdom. Rabirius forthwith repaired to Alexandria, and was invested by the king with the office of Dioecetes, or chief treasurer, no doubt with the sanction of Gabinius. In this office he had to amass money both for himself and Gabinius; but his extortion was so terrible, that Ptolemy had him apprehended, either to secure him against the wrath of the people, or to satisfy their indignation; lest they should drive him again from his kingdom. Rabirius escaped from prison, probably through the connivance of the king, and returned to Rome. But here a trial awaited him. Gabinius was accused of extortion (repetundae) under the provisions of the lex Julia, passed in the consularship of Caesar, b.c. 59, and was condemned to pay a considerable fine. As Gabinius was unable to pay this sum, a suit was instituted under the same law against Rabirius, who was liable to make up the deficiency, if it could be proved that he had received any of the money of which Gabinius had illegally become possessed. The suit against Rabirius was, therefore, a supplementary appendage to the cause of Gabinius. The accuser, the prosecutor, and the judges, were the same; and as Cicero had defended Gabinius, he also performed the same office for Rabirius. (Cic. pro Rabirio Postumo, passim.) The issue of the trial is not mentioned; but as the judges had condemned Gabinius, they probably did not spare his tool. We may therefore conclude that he went into banishment, like his patron, and was recalled by Caesar from exile. At all events, we find him serving under Caesar in b.c. 46, who sent him from Africa into Sicily, in order to obtain provisions for the army. (Hirt. B. Afr. 8.)

POSTUMUS, Q. SEIUS, a Roman equestrian, said by Cicero to have been poisoned by P. Clodius, because he was unwilling to sell his house to the latter. (Cic. pro Dom. 44, 50, de Harsnp. Resp. 14.)

POSTUMUS, VI/BIUS, consul suffectus, a.d. 5, conquered the Dalmatians in a.d. 10, and received, in consequence, the honour of the triumphal orator. (Cic. de Cas. iv. 15; Vell. Pat. ii. 116; Flor. iv. 12, § 11.)

POTIAMUS, a Spaniard by birth, was bishop of Lisbon in the middle of the fourth century; and if the first of the pieces mentioned below be genuine, he must, in the early part of his career, have been a champion of the Catholic faith. Subsequently, however, he was a zealous Arian, and it is believed that he drew up the document known in ecclesiastical history as The second Sirinnian Creed. (Phoebeiarius.) The writings usually ascribed to Potiamus are:—1. Epistola ad Athanasium Episcopum Alexandrinum de Constantissimitate Filii Dei, in some MSS. entitled Epistola Postamii ad Athanasium ab Arianis (impertinem? postquam in Con- cilio Ariminiensi subscripsisset); composed in the year a.d. 355, while the opinions of the author were yet orthodox. The authenticity of this piece, however, which is characterised by great obscurity of thought and of expression, and often half barbarous in phraseology, is very doubtful. It was first published by the Benedictine D'Achery, in his Spicilegium veterum aliquid Scriptorum, 4to. Paris, 1661, vol. ii. p. 366, or vol. iii. p. 299, of the new edition by Baluze, fol. 1717, and will be found under its best form in Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. v. fol. Venet. 1769, p. 96. 2. Sermo de Lazarus, and 3. Sermo de Martyrio Eusebii Prophetæ. Two discourses resembling in style the epistle to Athanasius, long attributed to Zeno, bishop of Verona, and published, without suspicion, among his works, until the brothers Ballerini (S. Zenonis Sermones, fol. Venet. 1758, p. 287—303) proved that they must be assigned to Potiamus, whom however they supposed to be a person altogether different from the bishop of Lisbon, and belonging to a different age. The arguments which they employ to demonstrate this last position are founded upon the second title of the Epistolae ad Athenasium as given above, but this title Galland, Schoene- mann, and others, hold to be the blunder of an ignorant transcriber. The Sermones will be found in Galland, and the discussions with regard to the real author in the Prolegomena to the volume, cap. x. p. xvii. [W. R.]

POTAMON, PAPIRIUS, a scriba of Verres, and one of the instruments of his tyranny, is called by Cicero in irony "homo severus, ex vetere lilia equestri disciplina" (Cic. Ferr. iii. 69, 66). He was originally the scribes and friend of Q. Caecilius Niger, the quasser of Verres, and he remained with Verres, when Caecilius left the island. (Cic. Div. in Conjic. 9.)

POTAMON (Ποτάμων). 1. Of Alexandria. Of this philosopher we have notices in Diogenes Laërtius (Procem. § 21), Porphyry (de Vita Plotinii, in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 109, old ed.), and Suidas (s. v. ἄρσεις, Ποτάμων). Many attempts have been made to reconcile, by emendation and conjecture, the discrepancies found in these notices, or to ascertain the truth regarding him. Of these an elaborate account will be found in Brucker's Historia Critica Philosophiae (vol. ii. p. 193, &c.). This subject has also been investigated in a treatise by Gloeckner, entitled, De Po-tomonis Alex. Philosophia Elecctica, recentiorum Platonorum Disciplinae admodum dissimilis, Dis-
p. 4to. Lips. 1745. Of this an excellent abstract is given by Harless (in Fabric. Bibl. vol. iii. p. 184, &c.). What is chiefly interesting and important regarding Potamon, is the fact recorded by Laërtius, that, immediately before his time (πρὸ ἄρσεως), Potamon had introduced an eclectic sect of philosophy (ἐλεκτρικὴ τίς ἄρσεως). Modern writers have made too much of this solitary fact, for we read nowhere else of this school of Potamon. The meaning of Porphyry, in the passage referred to above, is by no means clear. It is impossible to tell whether he makes Potamon the occasional disciple of Plotinus, or Plotinus of Potamon. Suidas, in the article ἄρσεις, evidently quotes Laërtius, but in Ποτάμων he states, that he lived πρὸ ἀργυρωτῶν, καλ μετ' αὐτῶν. Whatever meaning these words may have—for that is one of the points of discussion in this question—the two articles are irreconsilable. Indeed, Suidas exhibits his usual confusion in this name. He makes (s. v. Ἀρσεών) Potamon the rhetorician [No. 2], a philosopher, and we need not encumber the question with his unsupported authority on a point of chronology. Yet, to accommodate his statement with those of Laërtius and Porphyry, Gloeckner and Harless suppose three Potamons. For this, or even for the supposition that there were two, there seems no necessity. Setting aside the authority of Suidas, remembering the uncertainty of the time of Laërtius — to determine which his mention of Potamon may furnish a new element,—we cannot but attach much weight to the statement of Porphyry, the contemporary of Plotinus, and who refers to Potamon, as a well-known name. We should, therefore, conclude that the Potamon mentioned by Laërtius and Porphyry are the same, and, on a minute investigation of the passages wherein he is mentioned by the latter author, that he was older than Plotinus, and entrusted his children to his guardianship. He may have brought from Alexandria to Rome the idea of an eclectic school. But he had no followers in his peculiar combinations. They were supplanted by the school that endeavoured to ingraft Christianity upon the older systems of philosophy. Indeed, the short notice given by Laërtius does not entitle Potamon to the distinction invariably conferred upon him, that he was the first to introduce an eclectic school; though, probably, he was the first who taught at Rome a system so called.

Laërtius states briefly a few of his tenets, de-Àived from his writings, from which we can only learn that he combined the doctrines of Plato with the Stoical and Aristotelian, and without original views of his own. According to Suidas he wrote a commentary on the Republic of Plato.

2. Of Mytilene (Strab. xiii. p. 617), son of Les-bonax the rhetorician, was himself a rhetorician, in the time of Tiberius Caesar, whose favour he enjoyed (Suidas, s. v.). Westermann, indeed, makes him a teacher of Tiberius, but this is stated nowhere else (Geschichte Griech. Bered. p. 106). He is mentioned as an authority regarding Alexander the Great, by Plutarch (Alex. 61). It is, probably, he whom Lucian states to have attained the age of ninety (Macrobr. § 23). Suidas informs us, that in addition to his life of Alexander the Great, he wrote several other works, namely, ἦρως Σαμωνί, Βραοῦντον ηγάμων, Περὶ τέκνων ἤμας. And, to the treatises mentioned by Suidas, should probably be added περὶ τῆς διάφορας, quoted by Ammonius in his treatise περὶ ὁμολογίων καὶ διαφόρων ἄρσεων, s. v. Ποταμος. (Suidas, s. v. Θεοδόρος Γα-θαρείς, Λεοπόταμ, Ποτάμων.)

POTHIAEUS (Ποθιαῖος), a Greek architect, of unknown age and country, who, in conjunction with Antiphilus and Megacles, made the treasury of the Carthaginians at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 19, § 4. s. 7.)

POTHINEUS (Ποθινεύοις), artists. 1. An Athenian sculptor, whose name is preserved on an inscription which was affixed to the portrait-statue of a certain Nymphodotus, in the palaestra at Athens. (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. No. 270, vol. i. p. 375. The inscription, as explained by Böckh, reads thus, Ἐκδόσα τὴν Ποθιαῖον . . ἐν εἰς ἔργα ἅρμα, which can only mean that Pothineus was both the sculptor and the dedicator of the statue. That artists not unfrequently dedicated their own works, is shown by Welecker, Kasselblatt, 1827, No. 83 ; comp. R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schor, p. 392.)

2. A vase-painter, whose name appears on a beautiful vessel, in the ancient style, representing the contest of Thésthes and Peleus, which was found in 1833 at Ponte dell' Abbadia, and is now in the museum at Berlin. It is doubtful whether the name inscribed on the vase is Ποθιαῖος or Ποθινεύοις; but it looks more like the latter. (Luevex, Verzeichniss, No. 1060, p. 246; Gerhard, Berina Ant. Bildwerke, No. 1065, p. 291; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schor, pp. 56, 57.) [P. S.]

dom recommended the assassination of Pompey, when the latter fled for refuge to Egypt after the loss of the battle of Pharsalia in B. C. 48 (Lucan, viii. 484, &c.). He plotted against Caesar when he came to Alexandria, later the same year. It was Pothinus who placed Achilles over the Egyptian forces, with directions to seize a favourable opportunity for attacking Caesar, but he himself remained with the young king in the quarters of Caesar. But as he was here detected in carrying on a treasonable correspondence with Achilles, he was put to death by order of Caesar. (Caes. B. C. iii. 108, 112; Dion Cass. xii. 36, 39; Plut. Caes. 48, 49; Lucan, x. 333, &c. 515, &c.)

POTHOS (Πόθος), a personification of love or desire, was represented along with Eros and Himeros, in the temple of Aphroditê at Megara, by the hand of Seopas. (Paus. i. 43. § 6; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4, 7.)

POTITII GENS, one of the most ancient patrician families at Rome, but it never attained any historical importance. The Potitii were, with the Pinarii, the hereditary priests of Hercules at Rome; the legend which related the establishment of the worship of this god, is given under Pinaria Gens. It is further stated that the Potitii and Pinarii continued to discharge the duties of their priesthood till the censorship of App. Claudius (b.c. 312), who induced the Potitii, by the sum of 50,000 pounds of copper, to instruct public slaves in the performance of the sacred rites; whereat the god was so angry, that the whole gens, containing twelve families and thirty grown up men, perished within a year, or, according to other accounts, within thirty days, and Appius himself became blind (Liv. i. 29; Festus, p. 237, ed. Müller; Val. Max. i. 1. § 17). Niebuhr remarks that if there is any truth in the tale respecting the destruction of the Potitii gens, they may have perished in the great plague which raged fifteen or twenty years earlier; since such legends are not scrupulous with respect to chronology. The same writer further observes that it is probable that the worship of Hercules, as attended to by the Potitii and the Pinarii, was a form of religion peculiar to these gentes, and had nothing to do with the religion of the Roman state; and that as App. Claudius wished to make these sacra privata part of the sacra publica, he induced the Potitii to instruct public slaves in the rites, since no foreign god could have aflame. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 309.)

POTITUS, P. AFRA'NIUS, vowed during an illness of Caligula, to sacrifice his life, if the emperor recovered, expecting to be rewarded for his devotion. But when Caligula got well, and Afranius was unwilling to fulfill his vow, the emperor had him decked out like a sacrificial victim, paraded through the streets, and then hurled down from theeminence (ex oppere) by the Colline gate. (Iust. xxxii. 2. 10; Cass. xii. 27.)

POTITUS, VALE'RIUS. P. Potitus was the name of one of the most ancient and most celebrated families of the Valeria Gens. This family, like many of the other ancient Roman families, disappears about the time of the Samnite wars; but the name was revived at a later period by the Valeria gens, as a praenomen: thus we find mention of a Potitus Valerius Messalla, who was consul suffectus in b.c. 29. The practice of using extinct family-names as praenomina was common to other gentes: as for instance in the Cornelia gens, where the Lentuli adopted, as a praenomen, the extinct cognomen of Cossus. [Cossus; Lentulus.]

1. L. Valerius Potitus, consul b.c. 483 and 470, the founder of the family, was a relation of the celebrated P. Valerius Publicola; but it is a matter of dispute whether he was his brother or his nephew. Dionysius, it is true, calls him (viii. 77) his brother;* but it has been conjectured by Glaresanus, Gellenius, and Syllburg, that we ought to read διδέρφων or διδέρφος instead of διδερ- φός; and this conjecture is confirmed by the fact that Dionysius elsewhere (viii. 87) speaks of him as the son of Marcus, whereas we know that the father of Publicola was Volusus. If Potitus was the son of Marcus, he was probably the son of the M. Valerius who was consul b.c. 505, four years after the kings were expelled, and who is described in the Fasti as M. Valerius Vol. f. Volusus. Moreover, seeing that Potitus was consul a second time in b.c. 470, that is, thirty-nine years after the expulsion of the kings, it is much more likely that he should have been a nephew than a brother of the man who took such a prominent part in the events of that time. We may, therefore, conclude with tolerable certainty that he was the nephew of Publicola.

Potitus is first mentioned in b.c. 485, in which year he was one of the questores parricidii, and, in conjunction with his colleague, K. Fabius, impeached Sp. Cassius Visellinus before the people. [Visellinus.] (Liv. ii. 41; Dionys. viii. 77.) He was consul in b.c. 483, with M. Fabius Vibulanus (Liv. ii. 42; Dionys. viii. 87), and again in 470 with T. Aemilius Mammercus. In the latter year he marched against the Aegoi; and as the enemy would not meet him in the open field, he proceeded to attack their camp, but was prevented from doing so by the indications of the divine will. (Liv. ii. 61, 92; Dionys. ix. 51, 52.)

2. L. Valerius Potitus, with M. Horatius Barbathus, in b.c. 449. Dionysius calls him a grandson of the great P. Valerius Publicola, and a son of the P. Valerius Publicola, who was consul in b.c. 460, and who was killed that year in the assault of the Capitol, which had been seized by Herdonius (Dionys. xi. 4); and hence we find him described as L. Valerius Publicola Potitus. But we think it more probable that he was the son or grandson of L. Valerius Potitus [No. 1]; first, because we find that Livy, Cicero, and Dionysius, invariably give him the surname of Potitus, and never that of Publicola, and secondly because the great popularity of Potitus would naturally give origin to the tradition that he was a lineal descendant of that member of the gens, who took such a prominent part in the expulsion of the kings.

The annals of the Valeria gens recorded that L. Valerius Potitus was the first person who offered opposition to the decemvirs; and whether this was the year 485 before the death of Virginia by her father; and when the plebeians had seduced to the Sacred Hill, he and Horatius were sent to them by the senate, as the only acceptable members, to negotiate the terms of peace. In this mission they succeeded; the decemvirs were abolished; and the two friends of the plebs, Valerius and Horatius, were elected consuls, b.c. 449. Their consulship is memorable by the

- * Dionysius also calls him L. Valerius Publicola, but this is opposed to the Fasti, and is in itself improbable.
enactment of the celebrated Valerii et Horatiae Leges, which secured the liberties of the plebs, and gave them additional power in the state. 1. The first law is said to have made a plebsictum binding on the whole people, but Niebuhr supposes that the sanction of the senate and the confirmation of the curiae were necessary to give a plebsictum the full force of a lex. [Comp. Philo, p. 298, a.] 2. The second law enacted that whoever should procure the election of a magistrate without appeal should be outlawed, and might be killed by any one with impunity. 3. The third law declared that, whoever harmed the tribunes of the plebs, the aediles, the judges, or the decemvirs, should be outlawed and accursed. It is doubtful who are meant by the judges and decemvirs: various conjectures have been made on the point by modern writers (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 386; Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 313). After the enactment of these laws, the consuls proceeded to march against the foreign enemies of the state. The people flocked to the standards of the popular consuls, and fought with enthusiasm under their orders. They accordingly met with great success; Valerius defeated the Aequi and the Volsci, Horatius the Sabines, and both armies returned to Rome covered with glory. The Senate refused to grant a triumph to these traitors to their order; whereupon the centuries conferred upon them this honour by their supreme authority, regardless of the opposition of the senate. (Liv. iii. 39—41, 49—55, 61—64; Dionys. xi. 4, &c. 45, &c.; Cic. de Rep. ii. 31, Brut. 14; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. pp. 345—367.) In B.C. 446 Valerius was chosen by the centuries one of the quaestores parcellidii (Tac. Ann. xi. 22; respecting the statement in Tacitus, see Dict. of Antig., s. v. Quaestor). 3. C. Valerius Potius Vulsonus, described in the Capitoline Fasti as L. F. Volusi, n., was consular tribune B.C. 415 (Liv. iv. 49), and consul with M. Acemius Mancernicus, b. C. 410. In his consulship he distinguished himself by his opposition to the agrarian law of the tribune M. Maenius; and he recovered the Arx Carventana, which had been taken by the Volsci, in consequence of which he entered the city in triumph. He was consular tribune a second time in B.C. 407, and a third time in B.C. 404. (Liv. iv. 57, 61.) 4. L. Valerius Pottius, described in the Capitoline Fasti as L. Fl. P. N., consular tribune five times, namely in B.C. 414, 466, 403, 401, 398 (Liv. iv. 49, 58, v. 11, 10, 14). He was also twice consul; first in B.C. 393, with P. Cornelius Maluginensis Cossus, in which year both consuls had to resign, through some fault in the auspices (vito facti), and L. Lucretius Flavus Tricipitinus and Ser. Sulpeius Camerinus were chosen in their stead; and a second time in the following year, B.C. 392, with M. Manlius, in which year both the consuls celebrated the great games, which had been vowed by the dictator M. Furius, and also carried on war against the Aequi. In consequence of their success in this war, Valerius obtained the honour of a triumph, and Manlius of an ovation (Liv. v. 31; Dionys. i. 74). In the same year Valerius was the third interrex appointed for holding the comitia (Liv. v. 31), and in B.C. 390, the year in which Rome was taken by the Gauls, he was magister equitum to the dictator M. Furius Camillus. (Liv. v. 48.) 5. P. Valerius Pottius Publicola, described in the Capitoline Fasti, as L. F. L. N., and consequently a son of No. 4, was consular tribune six times, namely, in B.C. 386, 384, 330, 377, 370, and 367. (Liv. vi. 6, 18, 27, 32, 38, 42.) 6. C. Valerius Pottius, a son of No. 3, judging from his pemenon, was consular tribune, B.C. 370. (Liv. vi. 36.) 7. C. Valerius Pottius Flaccus, * probably son or grandson of No. 6, was consul B.C. 351, with M. Claudius Marcellus. Livy says, that in some annals Valerius appeared with the cognomina of Pottius, and in others with that of Flaccus (Liv. viii. 18). Orosius, who mentions Valerius (iii. 10), calls him simply Valerius Flaccus, without the cognomen of Pottius. It is probable that he was the first of the family who assumed the surname of Flaccus, and that his descendants dropped the name of Pottius. If this supposition is correct, the Flaccii, who became afterwards a distinguished family of the Valeria gens, would be sprung from this Valerius Pottius. (Flaccus, Valerius.) 8. L. Valerius Pottius, probably a brother of No. 7, was magister equitum in B.C. 351, to the dictator Cn. Quintilius Varus. (Liv. viii. 18.) 9. M. Valerius Maximus Pottius, consul B.C. 296. [Maxim. Valerius, No. 6.] POTAENIUS, PRAECONS, PRACHIUS, artist. PRAECILIUS, the name of a father and a son, whom Cicero recommended to Caesar in B.C. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii.) PRAECONIUS, L. VALERIUS, a legatus who was defeated and killed by the Aquitani a year before Caesar's legatus, P. Crassus, made war upon this people, B.C. 56 (Caesar, B.G. i. 20). This defeat of Praeconis is not mentioned by any other writer, and we know nothing of him or of the history of the war. PRAENESTINA, a surname of the Roman Fortuna, who had a temple and oracle at Praeneste. (Ov. Fast. vi. 62; Suet. Domit. 15; comp. Fortuna.) [L. S.] PRAESENS, BRUTTIUS, to whom one of Pliny's letters is addressed (Ep. vii. 3), was probably the father of the following Praesens. PRAESENS, BRUTTIUS, the father of Crispina, wife of the emperor Commodus. He is generally supposed to be the C. Bruttius Praesens who appears in the Fasti as consul for A.D. 153, and again for A.D. 180. There is also a C. Bruttius Praesens marked as having been consul for the second time in A.D. 139, and another as consul in A.D. 217. (Capitolin. M. Aurel. 27; Lamp. Commot. 12; Censorin. 21.) [W. R.] PRAETEXTATUS, C. ASI'NIUS, consul A.D. 242, with C. Vetius Atticus. (Fast. b. Capitol. Gord. 26.) PRAETEXTATUS, A'TEIIUS. [ATEIIUS.] PRAETEXTATUS, SUL'PICIUS. 1. Q. Sulpicius Praecons Praetextatus consular tribune, B.C. 434. There was considerable difference in the annalists respecting the supreme magistrates for this year. We learn from Livy that Valerius Antias and Q. Tubero made Q. Sulpicius one of the consuls for the year. (Liv. iv. 23; Dio. xii. 53.) 2. SER. Sulpicius Praecons Praetextatus, four times consular tribune, namely in B.C. 377, 376, 370, 369. He married the elder daughter of M. Fabius Ambustus; and it is said that the younger daughter of Fabius, who was married to Licinius Stolo, urged on her husband to procure the consulship for... the plebeians, as she was jealous of the honours of her sister's husband. Niebuhr has pointed out the worthlessness and contradictions in this tale. (Liv. vi. 32—34, 36, 38; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. 2. 3.)

PRAETEXTATUS, VETTIUS AGORIUS, a senator of distinguished ability and uncorrupted morals, was proconsul of Achaea in the reign of Julian, Praefectus Urbii under Valentinian I., and Praefectus Pretorio under Theodosius. He died in the possession of the last office, when he was consul elect. (Amm. Marc. xxii. 7, xxvii. 9, xxviii. 1; Zosim. iv. 3; Symmach. Ep. x. 26; Valesius, ad Amm. Marc. xxii. 7.) It was at the house of this Vettius Praetextatus that Macrobius supposes the conversation to have taken place, which he has recorded in his Saturnalia. [See Vol. ii. p. 883.]

PRATINAS (Πράτινας), one of the early tragic poets who flourished at Athens at the beginning of the fifth century, B.C., and whose combined efforts brought the art to its perfection, was a native of Phlius, and was therefore by birth a Doric poet. His father's name was Pyrrenoiades or Ecomius. It is not stated at what time he went to Athens, but we find him exhibiting there, in competition with Chorierius and Aeschylus, about Ol. 70, B.C. 500—499. (Suid. s. v., Αἰθριάπα, Πρατίνας.) Of the two poets with whom he then contended, Chorierius had already been twenty years before the public, and Aeschylus now appeared, for the first time, at the age of twenty-five; Pratinas, who was younger than the former, but older than the latter, was probably in his full vigour at this very period.

The step in the progress of the art, which was ascribed to Pratinas, is very distinctly stated by the ancient writers; it was the separation of the satyric from the tragic drama. (Suid. s. v., πομος ἔγορος Ζαυρόπου; Acro, ad Hor. Art. Poët. 230, reading Pratinae for Pratini; respecting the alleged share of Chorierius in this improvement, see Chorierius, Vol. i. p. 697, b.) The change was a very important one, for it preserved a highly characteristical feature of the older form of tragedy, the entire rejection of which would have met with serious obstacles, not only from the popular taste, but from religious associations, and yet preserved it in such a manner as, while developing its own capabilities, to set free the tragic drama from the fetters it imposed. A band of Satyrs, as the companions of Dionysus, formed the original chorus of tragedy; and their jests and frolics were interspersed with the more serious action of the drama, without causing any more sense of incongruity than is felt in the reading of those jocose passages of Homer, from which Aristotle traces the origin of the satyrical drama and of comedy. As however tragedy came to be separated more and more from any reference to Dionysus, and the whole of the heroic mythology was included in its range of subjects, the chorus of Satyrs of course became more and more impracticable, and the same time the jocose element, which formed an essential part of the character of the chorus of Satyrs, became more and more incongruous with the earnest spirit and thrilling interest of the higher tragic dramas. It is easy to enter into the fun of the Prometheus the Fire-killer, where an old Satyr sings his beard in attempting to embrace the beautiful fire; but it is hard to fancy what the poet could have done with a chorus of Satyrs, in place of the ocean nymphs, in the Prometheus Bound. The innovation of Pratinas once relieved tragedy of this incubus, and gave the Satyra a free stage for themselves; where, by treating the same class of subjects on which the tragedies were founded, in a totally different spirit, the poet not only preserved so venerable and popular a feature of his art as the old chorus, but also, in the exhibition of the tetralogies, afforded a wholesome relaxation, as well as a pleasant diversion, to the overstrained minds of the spectators.

It has been suggested by some writers, that Pratinas was induced to cultivate the satyrical drama by his fear of being eclipsed by Æschylus in tragedy; a point which is one of pure conjecture. It is more to the purpose to observe that the early associations of Pratinas would very probably imbue him with a taste for that species of the drama; for his native city, Phlius, was the neighbour of Sicyon, the home of those "tragic choruses," which the Dorians claimed to be the inventors of tragedy; it was adjacent also to Corinth, where the cyclic choruses of Satyrs, which were ascribed to Arion, had been long established. (Herod. v. 67; Themist. Orat. xix.; Aristot. Poët. 3; Bentley, J. R.)

The innovation of Pratinas, like all the great improvements of that age of the development of the drama, was adopted by his contemporaries; but Pratinas is distinguished, as might be expected, by the large proportion of his satyrical dramas; having composed, according to Suidas, fifty plays, of which thirty-two were satyrical. He gained but one prize. (Suid. s. v.) Bökch, however, by an alteration in the text of Suidas, õ6V for õãV, assigns to Pratinas only twelve satyrical dramas, thus leaving a sufficient number of tragedies to make three for every satyrical drama, that is, twelve tetralogies and two single plays. (Trag. Gr. Praec. p. 125.) In merit, the satyrical dramas of Pratinas were esteemed the first, except only those of Aeschylus. (Paus. ii. 13, § 16.) His son Aristias was also highly distinguished for his satyrical plays. [Aristiast.]

Pratinas ranked high among the lyric, as well as the dramatic poets of his age. He cultivated two species of lyric poetry, the hyporchema and the dithyramb, of which the former was closely related to the satyrical drama by the jocular character which it often assumed, the latter by its ancient choruses of Satyrs. Pratinas may perhaps be considered to have shared with his contemporary Lasus the honour of founding the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry. Some interesting fragments of his hyporchemes are preserved, especially a considerable passage in Athenaeus (i. p. 22, a.) which gives an important indication of the contest for supremacy, which was then going on both between poetry and music, and between the different kinds of music. The poet complains that the voices of the singers were overpowered by the noise of the flute, and expresses his desire to supplant the prevailing Phrygian melody by the Dorian. It is impossible to say how much of his lyric poetry was separate from his dramas; in which, both from the age at which he lived, and from express testimony, we know that great importance was assigned not only to the songs, but also to the dances of the chorus. In the passage just cited Athenaeus mentions him as one of the poets who were called δράγοντικόλ, from the large part which the choral dances bore in their dramas.

PRAXAGORAS (Πραξαγόρας), an Athenian, lived after the time of Constantine the Great, probably under his son. He wrote at the age of nineteen, two books on the Athenian kings; at the age of twenty-two, two books on the history of Constantine; and at the age of thirty-one, six books on the history of Alexander the Great. All these works were written in the Ionic dialect. None of them has come down to us with the exception of a few extracts made by Phusiōs, from the history of Constantine. In this work Praxagoras, though a heathen, placed Constantine before all other emperors. (Phot. Cod. 62.)

PRAXAGORAS (Πραξαγόρας), a celebrated physician, who was a native of the island of Cos. (Galén, de Uteri Dissect. c. 10, vol. ii. p. 905, et alibi.) His father's name was Nicarchus* (Galén, loco cit.; de Facult. Nat. ii. 8, vol. ii. p. 141, de Tremore, c. 1, vol. vii. p. 584), and he belonged to the family of the Ascclœiades (id. de Med. Med. i. 3, vol. x. p. 28). He was the tutor of Philotimus (id. loco cit.; de Aliment. Facult. i. 12, vol. vi. p. 509), Pistonocus (Cels. de Med. i. præf. p. 6), and Herophilus (Galén, de Différ. Puls. iv. 3, vol. viii. p. 723, de Meth. Med. i. 3, vol. x. p. 28, de Tremore, c. 1, vol. vii. p. 585); and as he was a contemporary of Chrysippus, and lived shortly after Diocles Carpstius (Cels. de Med. i. præf. p. 5; Pliny, H. N. xxvi. 6), he may be safely placed in the fourth century b. c. He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici (Galén, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683), and was celebrated for his knowledge of medical science in general, and especially for his attainments in anatomy and physiology. He was one of the chief defenders of the humoral pathology, who placed the seat of all diseases in the humours of the body (id. ibid. c. 9, p. 699). He is supposed by Sprengel (Hist. de la Médec. i. vol. i. p. 422, 3), Hecker (Gesch. der Heilk. vol. i. p. 219), and others, to have been the first person who pointed out the distinction between the veins and the arteries; but this idea is controverted (and apparently with success) by M. Litré (Œuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 202, &c.), who shows that the distinction in question is alluded to by Aristotle (if the treatise de Spiritu be genuine), Hippocrates (or at least the author of the treatise de Articulis, who was anterior to Praxagoras), Diogenes Apolloniates, and Euryphon. Many of his anatomical opinions have been preserved, which show that he was in advance of his contemporaries in this branch of medical knowledge. On the other hand, several curious and capital errors have been attributed to him, as, for instance, that the heart was the source of the nerves (an opinion which he held with Aristotle), and that the ramifications of the artery, which he saw issue from the heart, were ultimately converted into nerves, as they contracted in diameter (Galén, de Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. i. 6, vol. v. p. 187).* Some parts of his medical practice appear to have been very bold, as, for instance, his venturing, in cases of lieus when attended with intrasusception, to open the abdomen in order to replace the intestine (Cæd. Aurel. de Morb. Acut. iii. 17, p. 244). He wrote several medical works, of which only the titles and some fragments remain, preserved by Galen, Cœlius Aurelius, and other writers. A fuller account of his opinions may be found in Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd., and Kühn's Commentatio de Praxagora Coo, reprinted in the second volume of his Opuscula Academica Medica et Philologica, p. 128, &c. There is an epitome by Cnina-goras, in honour of Praxagoras in the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Plan. 273.) [W. A. G.]

PRAXESPES (Πραξασπῆς), a Persian, who was high in favour with king Cambyses, and acted as his messenger. By his means Cambyses had his brother Smerdis assassinated. In one of his fits of madness, Cambyses shot the son of Prax- aspes with an arrow through the heart, in the presence of his father. When the news of the usurpation of Smerdis reached Cambyses, he naturally suspected Praxaspes of not having fulfilled his directions. The latter, however, succeeded in clearing himself. After the death of Cambyses, the Magians deemed it advisable to endeavour to secure the co-operation of Praxaspes, as he was the only person who could certify the death of Smerdis, having murdered him with his own hands. He at first assented to their proposals, but having been directed by them to proclaim to the assembled Persians that the pretender was really the son of Cyrus, he, on the contrary, declared the stratagem that was being practised, and then threw himself headlong from the tower on which he was standing, and perished. (Herod. iii. 30, 33, 34, 62, 66, 74.) [C. P. M.]

PRA'XIAS (Πραξίας), artists. 1. An Athenian sculptor of the age of Phedias, but of the more archaic school of Calamis, commenced the execution of the statues in the pediments of the great temple of Apollo at Delphi, but died while he was still engaged upon the work, which was completed by another Athenian artist, Androtheneus, the disciple of Eucalmus. (Paus. x. 19. § 3. s. d.)

The date of Praxias may be safely placed about Ol. 83, b. c. 448, and onwards. His master Cala- mis flourished about b. c. 467, and belonged to the last period of the archaic school, which immediately preceded Phedias. [See PHE DIAS, p. 245, b.] Moreover, the indications which we have of the time when the temple at Delphi was decorated by a number of Athenian artists, point to the period between b. c. 448 and 430, and go to show that the works were executed at about the very time

* As the word νευπόν sometimes signifies a ligament, as well as a nerve, in the ancient writers (see note to the Oxford edition of Theophilus de Corp. Hum. Fabr. p. 204, i. 5), Sprengel and others have supposed that the word bears this meaning in the passage referred to, but Kühn, with more probability considers that the more common signification of the word is the true one (Opusc. vol. ii. p. 140).
when the temples of Athena at Athens, and of Zeus at Olympia, were being adorned by Phidias and his disciples. (Comp. Phidias, p. 248, b.; Polygnotus, p. 467, b.; and Müller, Philol. pp. 28, 29.)

The sculptures themselves are described by Pausanias (l. c.) very briefly as consisting of Artemis and Leto, and Apollo and the Muses, and also the setting sun and Dionysus and the women called Thyaiades. In all probability, the first collection of runes, those connected with the genealogy of Apollo, occupied the front pediment, and the other pediment was filled with the remaining sculptures, namely those connected with the kindred divinity Dionysus, the inventor of the lyre and the patron of the dithyramb. As the temple was one of the largest in Greece, it is likely that there were, in each pediment, other figures subordinate to those mentioned by Pausanias. (Weleker, die Vorstellung der Giebelfelder und Metopen an dem Tempel zu Delphi, in the Rheinisches Museum, 1842, pp. 1-29.)

2. A vase-painter, whose name appears on one of the Camino vases, on which the education of Achilles is represented. The name, as reported by M. Orioli, the discoverer of the vase, is Πραξίλας, ΤΠΑ4-ΙΑΣ, a proper name, so totally unknown, as to raise a strong suspicion that the name has either been miswritten or misread, and that it ought to be ΠΡΑ4-ΙΑΣ. There is a similar diversity in the name of the vase-painter Eschias. (Raoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 57, Comp. pp. 44, 45, and De Witte, in the Recue de Philologie, 1847, vol. ii. p. 422.) [P. S.]

PRAXIKLAMAS (Πραξικλαμας). 1. A writer on poetry or music, probably the latter. Suidas is the only author who expressly mentions him (s. v. ψαλτας). Harpocratin (s. v. Μουσαρας) seems to allude to memoirs of Praxiklamas, written by Aristoxenus. He must, therefore, have lived between the time of Democritus, b. c. 460, and that of Aristoxenus, b. c. 320. (See Jonaeus, de Script. Hist. Phil. i. 14. 8, &c.)

The first artist that erected a statue of himself at Olympia (Ol. 59, b. c. 544), to commemorate his victory with the cestus. (Paus. vi. 18; Pindar. Nem. No. 27, &c.) [W. M. G.]

PRAXITELUS (Πραξιτηλος), i. e. the goddess who carries out the objects of justice, or watches the justice of men. When Molon arrived in Laconia, on his return from Troy, he set up a statue of Praxitela near Gytheium, not far from the spot where Paris, in carrying off Helen, had founded a sanctuary of Aphrodite Mignonis (Paus. iii. 22, § 2). Near Halicarnassus, in Boeotia, we meet with the worship of Praxidiea, in the plural (ix. 33, § 2), who were called daughters of Ogyges, and their names are Alacomeina, Thelinoe, and Aulia (ix. 33, § 4; Suid. s. v.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Πραξιτηλη). Their images consisted merely of heads, and their sacrifices only of the heads of animals. With the Orphic poet Praxidie seems to be a surname of Persephone. (Orph. Argon. 31, Hymn. 28. 5; comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 123, 2d edit.) [L. S.]

PRAXILLA (Πραξιλα), of Sycon, a lyric poetess, who flourished about Ol. 82. 2, b. c. 450, and was one of the nine poetesses who were distinguished as the Lyric Muses (Suid. s. v.; Euseb. Chron. s. a.; Anth. Theod. Ep. 23; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 114, Anth. Pal. ix. 26.) Her scolia were among the most celebrated compositions of that species. (Ath. xv. p. 694, a.) She was believed by some to be the author of the scolion preserved by Athenaeus (p. 695, c.), and in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 157), which was extremely popular at Athens (Paus. ap. Eustath. ad Ill. ii. 711; Aristoph. Vesp. 1231, et Schol.). She also composed dithyrambs (Hephaest. 9, p. 25, ed. Graef.)

This poetess appears to have been distinguished for the variety of her metres. The line of one of her dithyrambs, which Hesiod quotes in the passage just referred to, is a dactylic hexameter: it must not, however, be inferred that her dithyrambs were written in heroic verse, but rather that they were arranged in dactylic systems, in which the hexameter occasionally appeared. One species of logoeedic dactylic verse was named after her the Praxilean (Πραξιλειος), namely,

as in the following fragment:

δια των θυρων καλους εμπνευσας,
παρευνας την κεφαλαν, τα δ' ενερει νυφαι, which only differs from the Alcaic by having one more dactyl. (Hephaest. 24, p. 45; Hermann, Elem. Doct. Metr. p. 231.) Another name was Aphantus, the Logoi and Hymns, hexameter branchy-celestaic. (Hephaest. 36, p. 63.)

The few fragments and references to her poems, which we possess, lead to the supposition that the subjects of them were chiefly taken from the erotic stories of the old mythology especially as connected with the Dorians. In one of her poems, for example, she celebrated Carneius as the son of Zeus and Europa, as educated by Apollo and Leto, and as beloved by Apollo (Paus. iii. 13. § 3, s. 5; Schol. ad Theocr. v. 83): in another she represented Dionysus as the son of Aphrodite (Hesych. s. v. Παναχου Δαιμονι), in one she sang the death of Adonis (Zenob. Pron. iv. 21), and in another the rape of Chryspius by Zeus. (Ath. xiii. p. 603, a.) She belongs decidedly to the Dorian school of lyric poetry, but there were also traces of Aeolic influence in her rhythms, and even in her dialect. Tattian (auto. Grecsa. 52, p. 113, ed. Worth) mentions a statue of her, which was ascribed to Lyceippus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 183, 187; Müller, Hist. Greece. Lit. vol. i. pp. 188, 189; Boeckh, Genech. d. Gellen. Dietzkunst, vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 11. n. 120, 5.)

PRAXION (Πραξιον), a Greek writer, on the history of Megara (Suidas, Harpocrat. and Phot. s. v. Σιφωρ; Schol. ad Aristoph. Eccles. 18.)

PRAXIPHANES (Πραξιφανης). 1. A Peri-patetic philosopher, was a native either of Mytilene (Clem. Alex. i. p. 365, ed. Potter), or of Rhodes (Strab. xiv. p. 655). He lived in the time of Demetrius Poliorketes and Ptolemy Lagi, and was a pupil of Theophrastus, about b. c. 322 (Proclus, i. in Timaeum; Tzetzes, ad Hesiod. Op. et Dies, 1.) He subsequently opened a school himself, in which Epicurus is said to have been one of his pupils (Diog. Laërt. x. 19). Praxiphanes paid especial attention to grammatical studies, and is hence named along with Aristotle as the founder and creator of the science of grammar (Clemens Alex. l. c.; Bekker, Anc. loc. ii. p. 229, where Πραξιφανειος should be read instead of Πραξιφανειος). Of the writings of Praxiphanes, which appear to have been numerous, two are especially mentioned, a Dialogue Πραξιφανειος.
The position occupied by Praxiteles in the history of ancient art can be defined without much difficulty. He stands, with Scopas, at the head of the later Attic school, so called in contradistinction to the earlier Attic school of Pheidias. Without attempting those sublime impersonations of divine majesty, in which Pheidias had been so inimitably successful, Praxiteles was unsurpassed in the exhibition of the softer beauties of the human form, especially in the female figure. Without aiming at ideal majesty, he attained to a perfect ideal gracefulness; and, in this respect, he occupies a position in his own art very similar to that of Apelles in painting. In that species of the art to which he devoted himself, he was as perfect a master as Pheidias was in his department, though the species itself was immeasurably inferior. In fact, the character of each of these artists was a perfect exponent of the character of their respective times. The heroic spirit and the religious earnestness of the period preceding the Peloponnesian War gave to the productions of the Athenian the prevailing love of pleasure and sensual indulgences found its appropriate gratification in the other. The contrast was marked in their subjects as well as in their style. The chryselephantine statue of Zeus at Olympia realised, as nearly as art can realise, the illusion of the actual presence of the supreme divinity; and the spectator who desired to see its prototype could find it in no human form, but only in the sublimest conception of the same deity which the kindred art of poetry had formed: but the Cnidian Aphrodite of Praxiteles, though an ideal representation, expressed the ideal only of sensual charms and the emotions connected with them, and was awesomely modelled from a courtier. Thus also the subjects of Praxiteles in general were those divinities whose attributes were connected with sensual gratification, or whose forms were distinguished by soft and youthful beauty,—Aphrodite, Eros, Hermaphroditus, Dionysus. His works were chiefly imitated from the most beautiful living models he could find; but he scarcely ever executed any statues professedly as portraits. Quintilian (xii. 10) praises him and Lyaiusus for the natural character of their works.

His works are too numerous to be all mentioned here individually. The most important of them will be described according to the department of mythology from which their subjects were taken.

1. Statues of Aphrodite. By far the most celebrated work of the master, and that in which he doubtless put forth all his power, was the marble statue of Aphrodite, which was distinguished from other statues of the goddess by the name of the Cnidians, who purchased it. The story, related by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxv. 5. 4. § 5), is that the artist made two statues of Aphrodite, of which the one was draped, the other not. In his own opinion, they were of equal value, for he offered them for sale together at the same price. The people of Cos, who had always possessed a character for severe virtue, purchased the draped statue, "severum id ac pudicum arbitrantes;" the other was bought by the Cnidians, and its fame almost entirely eclipsed the merits of the rival work. It was always esteemed the most perfectly beautiful of the statues of the goddess. According to Pliny, it surpassed all other works, not only of Praxiteles, but in the whole world; and many made the voyage to Cnidus expressly to behold it. So highly did the Cnidians themselves esteem their treasure, that when King Nicomedes offered them, as the price of it, to pay off the whole of their heavy public debt, they preferred to endure any suffering rather than part with the work which gave their city its chief renown. It was afterwards carried, with the Samian Hera and the Lindian Athena, to Constantinople, where it perished by fire, with innumerable other works of art, in the reign of Justinian. (Zonar, xiv. 2.)

The temple in which it stood at Cnidus was so constructed, that the beauties of the statue could be seen equally well from every point of view.

Of the numerous descriptions and praises of the statue, which abound in the ancient authors, the one which gives us the best notion of it is that of Lucian (Amor, 13, 14, vol. ii. pp. 411, 412; comp. Imag, 6, vol. ii. p. 463.) The material was the purest and most brilliant Parian marble; the form was in every respect perfect; the position of the left hand was the same as in the Venus de Medici; the right hand held some drapery which fell towards the left, and was accentuated by her gentle smile; and the whole expression was supposed by the ancients to indicate the appearance of the goddess when Paris adjudged to her the prize of beauty:

Omega se Praxiteles tekhnowa, oth o idbaros, 'Ala' owtos estis, d' pote krinomene, an opinion, which, however well it may have accorded with the grace and beauty of the work, cannot be regarded as the true expression of the intention of the artist, for the drapery and vase by the side of the figure indicate that she has either just left or is about to enter the bath. The representation of the goddess as standing before Paris is rather to be seen in the Venus de Medici and in the copy, by Menophonatus, of the Aphrodite in the Troad. (Plato, Epip, 10, ap. Bruenck, Anad, vol. i. p. 171, Anth. Plan. iv. 161, Jacobs, Anth. Pat. of Ptol. vol. i. p. 675.) Several other epigrams, which stand with these in the Anthology of Planudes; Auson, Epig, 56; Athenag, Legat, pro Christ, 14, p. 61; Jacobs, in Wieland's Attisches Museum, vol. iii. pp. 24, f, 29, f.) This statue appears to have been the first instance in which any artist had ventured to represent the goddess entirely draped of divinity. The artist modelled it from a favourite "courtzan named Phryne (Asth. xiii. pp. 585, 591), of whom also he made more than one portrait statue. (Paus. ix. 27, § 4. s, 5, x. 14, § 5. s, 7; Aelian, V. H. ii. 32; Tatian, Ora, at Graec, 53, p. 115, ed. Worth.) This statue was, therefore, a new ideal of the goddess; which was frequently imitated by succeeding artists. It is, however, very doubtful which, or whether any, of the existing statues of Venus, are copies of the Cnidian Aphrodite. Its type is preserved on coins of Cnidus, struck in honour of the goddess, by most of the marble statues, which are probably copies of it, are the following: one in the garden of the Vatican; another in the Museo Pio-Clementine, which, however, is supposed by Büttiger to be a copy of the Cnian, on account of the drapery which covers part of the figure, which Visconti, and most of the subsequent writers, take to be a mere addition made by the artist in copying the Cnidian statue; another, which was formerly in the Bruschi palace, and is now in the Glyptothek at Munich; there are also some busts after it. (Rasche, Lex Rei Num. s. s. Cnidus; Eckhel, Dict. Num. Vet. vol. ii. p. 580; Lippert, Diepy, i. 1, 81; Pernier, No. 28; Episcopius, No. 86; Mus. Pio-Clem. i. 11; Flaxman, Lectures on Sculpture, pl. xxii.; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 127, n. 4, Denkmalter d. alt. Kunst, vol. i. p. xxxv. No. 146, a. b. c. d.; vol. ii. p. xxxv. No. 277.) It has been the subject of much discussion among the writers on art, whether or not the Venus de Medici is an imitation of the Cnidian Aphrodite. (See Heyne, Antiq. Aufsätte, vol. i. pp. 123, f; Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, b. v. c. 2. § 3; Meyer, zu Winck. l. c., and Beilage viii. zu b. i., Gesch. d. Kunst, vol. i. p. 113; Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. i. p. 18; Levezow, Ob die Med. Ven. ein Bild. d. Knid. sei; Thiersch, Epochen, p. 288; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, l. e.) The truth appears to be that Cioomenes, in making the Venus de Medici, had the Venus of Praxiteles in his mind, and imitated it in some degree; but the difference in the treatment of the subject is so great that it cannot be considered a copy of the other. Types between the two are seen in the Aphrodite of Menophonatus and in the Captolina Venus; of which the latter, while preserving the drapery and vessel of the Cnidian statue, has almost exactly the attitude and expression of the Venus de Medici. (See Müller, Denkmalter, vol. ii. p. xxvi. n. 278.)

The supposed copies of the Coan Venus are even more doubtful than those of the Cnidian. Indeed, with the exception of that in the Museo Pio-Clementino, already mentioned, there is none which can with any probability be regarded as a copy of it. A fine conjectural restoration of it is given in plate xxiii. to Flaxman's Lectures on Sculpture.

Besides the Coan and the Cnidian, Praxiteles made other statues of Aphrodite, namely: one in bronze which, Pliny tells us, was considered equal to the Cnidian, and which perished at Rome in the fire in the reign of Claudius (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. 32, 33); and one in Pentelic marble at Thessal (Paus. i. p. 27, § 3); another at Alexandria on Mt. Latmus. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. Eros, and other divinities connected with Aphrodite. Praxiteles made two marble statues of Eros, of the highest celebrity, the one of which was dedicated at Thespia, the other at Parium on the Propontis. Like all the early Greek artists, Praxiteles represented Eros, not as a child, but as in the flower of youth. The statue at Thespia, which was of Pentelic marble, with the wings girt (Julian. Or. ii. p. 54, c.), was dedicated by Phryne (Lucian, Am, 14, 17; Paus. i. p. 27, § 8), and an interesting story is told of the manner in which she became possessed of it. Praxiteles, in his fondness for Phryne, had promised to give her whichever of his works she might choose, but he was unwilling to tell her which of them, in his own opinion, was the best. To discover this, she sent some little slave to Phryne, who had broken out in his house, and that most of his works had already perished. On hearing this message, the artist rushed out, exclaiming that all his toil was lost, if the fire had touched his Satyr or his Eros. Upon this Phryne confessed the stratagem, and chose the Eros. (Paus. i. 20, § 2.) When Mummus plundered Thespia, like other Greek cities, of the works of art, he spared this statue, and it was still at Thespiae in the time of Cicero, who says that visits were made to that city expressly to see it. (In Verr. iv. 2.) It was removed to Rome by Caligula, restored to Thespiae by Claudius, and carried back by Nero to Rome, where it stood in Pliny's time in the schools of Octavia, and it finally perished in the conflagration that building in the reign of Titus. (Paus. ix. 27. § 3; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 3. s. 4. § 5; Dion Cass. lxxvi. 24.) Its place at Thespiae was supplied by a marble copy by Menodorus. (Paus. l. c.) There was in the same place a bronze statue of Eros, made by Lysippus, in emulation of the work of Praxiteles. (ib.)

The other statue of Eros, at Parium on the Propontis, is said by Pliny (l. c.) to have equalled the Cnidian Venus. Nothing is known of its history, unless it be (which is extremely probable) the same as that of which the Sicilian, Heius, was robbed by Verres. (Cic. in Verr. l. c.) Callistatus ascribes two bronze statues of Eros to Praxiteles; but the truth of this statement is doubtful, and the author may perhaps have confounded the bronze statue at Thespiae by Lysippus with the marble one by Praxiteles. (Callist. Epict. 3. 11.) A copy of one of these statues is seen in a beautiful torso found at Centocelle, on the road from Rome to Palestrina (Mus. Pio-Clam. i. pl. 12), of which there is a more perfect specimen at Naples (Mus. Borb. vi. 25); there is also a very similar figure among the Elgin Marbles in the British Museum. (Müller, Denkmäler, vol. i. pl. xxxv. n. 144, 145.) To this class of the artist's works belong also the statues of Peitho and Paregoros, in the temple of Aphrodite Praxis at Megara. (Paus. i. 43. § 6.)

3. Subjects from the Mythology of Dionysus. The artist's ideal of Dionysus was embodied in a bronze statue, which stood at Elis (Paus. vi. 26. § 1), and which is described by Callistatus (Epict. 8). It represented the god as a charming youth, clad with ivy, girt with a Faun's skin, carrying the lyre and the thyrsus. He also treated the subject in a famous bronze group, in which Dionysus was represented as attended by Intoxication and a Satyr (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 8. s. 19. § 10; Liberam Patrem et Ebratatem nobilissimum una Saturum, quem Graeci Peribolion nominant). According to these words of Pliny, the celebrated statue of a satyr, which Praxiteles, as above related, ranked among his best works, was the figure in this group. This may, however, be one of Pliny's numerous mistakes, for it seems, from Pausanias's account of this satyr, that it stood alone in the street of the tripod at Athens (Paus. i. 20. § 1; Ath. xiii. p. 591 b.; Heyne, Antiq. Aufsätze, vol. ii. p. 63). It is generally supposed that we have copies of this celebrated work in several marble statues representing a satyr resting against the trunk of a tree, the best specimen of which is that in the Capitoline Museum (Mus. Cap. iii. 32; Mus. Franco. ii. pl. 12; Mus. Pio-Clam. ii. 30; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 127, n. 2; Denkmäler, vol. i. pl. xxxvi. n. 143). Another satyr, of Parian marble, was at Megara. (Paus. i. 43. § 5.) Groups of Mænads, Thyiades, and dancing Caryatides are mentioned by Pliny among the marble works of Praxiteles; and also some Sileni in the collection of Asinius Pollio. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 5; Aeulilian, Ep. 2, ap. Brunck, Ascal. vol. ii. p. 275. Anth. Pal. ix. 756; Böttiger, Amath. vol. iii. p. 147; Müller, Archäol. l. c.)

PRAXI'THEA (Pra'xēēa). 1. A daughter of Phrasinus and Diogenea, was the wife of Erechtheus, and mother of Cecrops, Pandros, Meiton, Orneus, Procris, Ceryne, Chiton, and Oreithyia. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 1.) Some call her a daughter of Cephissus. (Lycurg. c. Locrot. 93.)

2. A daughter of Thespis. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

3. A daughter of Leus in Athens, and a sister of Theoe and Eubule. (Aelian, V. H. xii. 28.)

PRAXO, a lady of high rank at Delphi, who was connected by relations of hospitality with Perseus, king of Macedonia. It was at her house that the Cretan Evander, and the other emissaries employed by Perseus to assassinate Eumenes in n. c. 172, were lodged ; on which account she was suspected of participating in the plot, and was carried to Rome by C. Valerius. Her subsequent fate is not mentioned. (Liv. xlii. 15. § 17.)

PRECIANUS, a merchant of P. Cethegus, was courteously received by Lucullus in order to use her influence with Cethegus, when he was seeking to obtain the command against Mithridates. (Plut. Lucull. 6.)

CETHEGUS, NO. 7.

PRECIANUS, a juristconsultus, was a friend of Cicero and Trebatius, and had influence with Caesar. Cicero mentions him in n. c. 54 (Cic. ad PRIAMUS.

His name shows that his original name was Precius, and that he was adopted by a member of another gens.

L. PRECIUS, a distinguished Roman eques, who carried on business at Panormus, when Verres was governor of Sicily (Cic. Terr. v. 62, 65). A certain Precius left some property to Cicero, which is mentioned two or three times in his correspondence under the name of Preciana hereditas (ad Fam. xiv. 5. § 2, ad Att. vi. 9. § 2, vii. 1. § 9); but who this Precius was is not known.

PREPELAUS (Πρεπέλαος), a general in the service of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He is first mentioned in n. c. 315, when he was sent by Cassander on a secret mission to Alexander the son of Polyperchon, whom he succeeded in detaching from the cause of Antigonus and inducing to join his arms with those of Cassander (Diod. xix. 64). Shortly after, we find him commanding an army which was sent to support Asander in Caria, and co-operating with that general against Peleus, the king of Lydia (ib. 1. § 68). From this time we hear no more of him till n. c. 303, when he held the important fortress of Corinth with a large force, but was unable to prevent its falling into the hands of Demetrius, and only saved himself by a hasty flight (Id. xx. 103). In the following summer (n. c. 302) he was sent by Cassander, with a considerable army, to co-operate with Lysimachus in Asia, where his arms were crowned with the most brilliant successes; he reduced in a short space of time the important cities of Adramyttium, Ephesus, and Sardes, and made himself master of almost the whole of Aeolia and Ionia. But he was unable to prevent the recovery of a great part of these conquests by Demetrius, before the close of the same autumn (Id. xx. 107, 111). After this we hear no more of him. [E. H. B.]

PRESBON (Πρῆσβων), a son of Phrixus, by a daughter of Aetes, king of Colchis. He himself was the father of Clymenus, the celebrated Presbionades. (Paus. iii. 34, § 5, 37, § 2; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1125.) A son of Minyas was likewise called Presbon. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 230.) [L. S.]

P. PRESENTIEUS, one of the commanders of the allies in the Marian war, defeated the legate Perperna in n. c. 90. (Appian, B. C. i. 41.)

PRIAMUS (Πρὶαμος), the famous king of Troy, at the time of the Trojan war. He was a son of Laomedon and Strymo or Placia. His original name is said to have been Podarcis, i.e. "the swift-footed," which was changed into Priamus, "the ransomed" (from πριαμασι), because he was the only surviving son of Laomedon and was ransomed by his sister Hesione, after he had fallen into the hands of Heracles (Apollod. ii. 6. § 4, 11. § 3). He is said to have been first married to Arise, the daughter of Merops, by whom he became the father of Aeneas; but afterwards he gave his wife to Hecabe, and was married himself to Hecabe (Hephaestus), by whom he had the following children: Hector, Alexander or Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Patroclus, Antiphus, Hephaenops, Tyroldus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. By other women he had a great many children besides (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5). According to the Homeric tradition, he was the father of fifty sons, nineteen of whom were children of Hecabe, to whom others add an equal number of daughters (11om. H. xxiv. 493, &c., with the note of Eustath.)

comp. Hygin. Fab. 90; Theocr. xv. 139; Cit. Tucsc. i. 35). Previous to the outbreak of the war of the Greeks against his kingdom, he is said to have supported the Phrygians in their war against the Amazons (Hom. Il. iii. 184). When the Greeks landed on the Trojan coast Priam was already advanced in years, and took no active part in the war (xxiv. 487, 500). Only once did he venture upon the field of battle, to conclude the agreement respecting the single combat between Paris and Menelaus (iii. 250, &c.). After the death of his son Hector, Priam, accompanied by Hermes, went to the tent of Achilles to ransom Hector's body for burial, and obtained it (xxiv. 470). His death is not mentioned by Homer, but later poets have filled up this gap in the legend. When the Greeks entered the city of Troy, the aged king, it is said, put on his armour, and was on the point of rushing into the crowd of the enemy, but he was prevailed on by Hecabe to take refuge with herself and her daughters, a suppliant at the altar of Zeus Herceius. While he was sleeping in the temple, his son Polites, pursued by Pyrrhus, rushed into the temple, and expired at the feet of his father, whereupon Priam aimed at Pyrrhus, but was killed by him. (Virg. Aen. ii. 512, &c.; Eurip. Troad. 17; Paus. ii. 24. § 5, iv. 17. § 3.) His body remained unburied. (Virg. Aen. ii. 558; Senec. Troad. 50, &c.; Q. Smyrn. xiii. 240, &c.)

Another Priam is mentioned by Virgil (Aen. v. 564), as a son of Polites, and is accordingly a grandson of king Priam. [L. S.]

PRIAMUS, a Greek by birth, and a Roman freedman, whose name occurs in an inscription as Sicinius Priamus, with the designation Arip, that is, a worker in gold. (Muratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. emlxvii. n. 9; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 393.) [F. S.]

PRIAPATUS, a king of Parthia. [Arsaces, IV.]

PRIAPUS (Πριάπος), a son of Dionysus and Aphrodite (Paus. ix. 31. § 2; Diod. iv. 6; Thibull. i. 4. 7; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 932). Aphrodite, it is said, had yielded to the embraces of Dionysus, but during his expedition to India, she became faithless to him, and lived with Adonis. On Dionysus' return from India, she indeed went to meet him, but soon left him again, and went to Lampacus on the Hellespont, to give birth to the child of the god. But Hera, dissatisfied with her conduct, touched her, and, by her magic power, caused Aphrodite to give birth to a child of extreme ugliness, and with unusually large genitals. This child was Priapus. According to others, however, Priapus was a son of Dionysus and a Naiad or Chione, and gave his name to the town of Priapus (Strab. xiii. p. 587; Schol. ad Theocr. i. 21), while others again describe him as a son of Adonis, by Aphrodite (Tzet. ad Lyc. 831), as a son of Hermes (Hygin. F. A. 160, 165), or Helios, the son of a long-eared father, that is, of Pan or a Satyr (Macrob. Sat. vi. 5). The earliest Greek poets, such as Homer, Hesiod, and others, do not mention this divinity, and Strabo (xiii. p. 558) expressly states, that it was only in later times that he was honoured with divine worship, and that he was worshipped more especially at Lampacus on the Hellespont, whence he is sometimes called Hellespontinicus (Ov. Fast. iv. 440, vi. 341; Arnob. iii. 10). We have every reason to believe that he was regarded as the promoter of fertility both of the vegetation and of all animals connected with an agricultural life, and in this capacity he was worshipped as the protector of flocks of sheep and goats, of bees, the vine, all garden-produce, and even of fishing (Paus. ix. 31. § 2; Virg. EcL vii. 33. Georg. iv. 110, with the commentators). Like other divinities presiding over agricultural pursuits, he was believed to be possessed of prophetic powers, and is sometimes mentioned in the plural (Tibull. i. 4. 67; Moschus, iii. 27). As Priapus had many attributes in common with other gods of fertility, the Orphics identified him with their mystic Dionysus, Hermes, Helios, &c. (Schol. ad Theocr. i. 21; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 691, 242.) The Attic legends connect Priapus with such sensually licentious beings as Conisalus, Orthenes, and Tycheon. (Strab. i. c.; Aristoph. Lys. 982; comp. Diod. iv. 6.) In like manner he was confounded by the Italians with Mutinus or Muttunius, the personification of the fructifying power in nature (Salmis. ad Solin. p. 219; Arnob. iv. 11). The stories related to him consisted of the first-fruits of gardens, vineyards, and fields (Anthol. Palat. vi. 102), of milk, honey, cakes, rams, asses, and fishes. (Anthol. Palat. x. 14; Ov. Fast. i. 391, 416; Serv. ad Verg. Georg. ii. 84.) He was represented in carved images, mostly in the form of hermae, with very large genitals, carrying fruit in his garment, and either a sickle or cornucopia in his hand (Tibull. i. 1. 22, 4. 8; Virg. Georg. iv. 110; Horat. Sat. i. 8; Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. p. 172). The hermae of Priapus in Italy, like those of other rustic divinities, were usually painted red, whence the god is called ruber or rubrænus. (Ov. Fast. i. 413, vi. 318, 333.)

PRIAPUS, a maker of fictile vases, whose name occurs on a cup in the Durand collection, found at Vulci. (Cah. Durand. n. 692, p. 261; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 57.)

PRIMIGENIA, a surname of Fortuna, under which she had a celebrated sanctuary at Prænestæ, and at Rome on the Quirinal. (Cic. de Div. ii. 41; Liv. xxxiv. 53.)

PRIMUS, a Roman freedman, whose name appears on an inscription in the Museum at Naples, in the form M. Antonius M. L. Primus Architectus. M. Raoul-Rochette has copied and published the inscription; and he says that he was assured by M. C. Bonucci, that the stone came from the great theatre at Pompeii, of which, therefore, if this statement be correct, Primus was the architect. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 441.)

PRIMUS, M. ANTONIUS, was born at Tolosa in Gaul, and received in his boyhood the surname of Æceto, which signified in the Gallic language the stormy sea’s beacon. (Suet. Vitell. 18; Martial, ix. 106.) He afterwards went to Rome, and rose to the dignity of a senator; but having been condemned of forgery (faux) under the lex Cornelia in the reign of Nero, he was expelled from the senate, and banished from the city. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40; Dion Cass. lxv. 9.) After the death of Nero (A.D. 68), he was restored to his former rank by Galba, and appointed to the command of the seventh legion, which was stationed in Pannonia. It was believed that he subsequently wrote to Otho, offering to take the command of his forces; but as Otho would not employ him, he gave him no support in his struggle with Vitellius. When the fortunes of the latter began to decline (A.D. 69), Antonius was one of the first generals in Europe who declared in favour of Vespasian; and he rendered him the most important services. He was well fitted to play a conspicuous part in a civil war, being bold in action, ready in speech, unscrupulous in the use of means, equally ready to plunder and to bribe, and possessing considerable military abilities. It was by his influence that the legions in Moesia, as well as those in Pannonia, espoused the side of Vespasian. When the other generals of Vespasian were of opinion that they should remain in Pannonia, and await the arrival of Mucianus, who was marching from the East at the head of a powerful body of Vespasian’s troops, Antonius on the contrary urged an immediate invasion of Italy. His energy overruled all opposition. Without waiting till the army was ready, Antonius, with a small body of picked troops, and accompanied by Arrius Varus, who had gained great renown under Corbulon in the Armenian war, crossed the Alps and pushed forwards into Italy. He was not successful in his great success; he obtained possession of several towns in Transpadane Gaul, and at Patavium was joined by two legions which had followed him from the north. At Patavium he allowed his troops a short time for repose, and then marched upon Verona, which also fell into his power. Meantime Alienus Caecina, who had been sent by Vitellius at the head of a large army to oppose Antonius, adopted no active measures against him, though with his superior forces he might easily have driven him out of Italy. Shortly afterwards three more legions crossed the Alps and joined Antonius, who was now at the head of five legions. His authority however was shared by two generals of consular rank, T. Ampius Flavinus, the governor of Pannonia, and Aponius Saturninus, the governor of Moesia; but an inscription of the soldiers delivered him from these rivals, and obliged them to flee from the camp. Antonius affected great indignation at these proceedings, but it was believed by many that the mutiny had been instigated by himself that he might obtain the sole command. The army of Caecina meanwhile had been thrown into great confusion by the treason of their general Caecina, who had endeavoured to persuade his troops to desert Vitellius and espouse the cause of Vespasian; but not succeeding in his attempt, he had been thrown into chains, and new generals elected by the soldiers in his stead. Antonius resolved to avail himself of these favourable circumstances for making an immediate attack upon the army of Vitellius. He accordingly broke up from his quarters at Verona, and advanced as far as Bedriacum, a small town at no great distance from Cremona. At Bedriacum the enemy was found. The imprudence of Arrius Varus, who had charged the enemy too soon and was driven back with loss, threw the army of Antonius into confusion, and nearly caused the loss of the battle. Antonius only arrested the flight by killing one of his own standard-bearers who was in the act of flying, and by leading the men against the enemy with the standard in his hand. Victory at length declared for Antonius, and the enemy fled in confusion to Cremona, from which town they had marched to Bedriacum. In the night Antonius was attacked by another army of Vitellius, consisting of six legions, which had been stationed at Hostilia, thirty miles distant, and which had im-
Joseph. and forthwith the immediately his odium, many fought and yield whatever this about streets he destroyed, straight attacking and Antonius of and allowed order public revealed morning troops at incessant defence. 551 is Cremona, the and Augustine of Rome, Vitellius, and was immediately received by the senate and the whole city, as their master. But though Antonius was thus reduced to a subordinate position in the state, Mucianus was still jealous of him. He, therefore, would not allow him to accompany Domitian in his expedition into Germany; at which Antonius was so indignant that he repaired to Vespasian, who was at Alexandria. He was not received by Vespasian in the distinguished manner which he had expected, and to which he thought that he was entitled; for though the emperor treated him with kindness and consideration on account of the great services he had rendered him, he secretly regarded him with dislike and suspicion, in consequence of the accusations of Mucianus, and the haughty conduct of Antonius himself. (Tac. Hist. ii. 96, libb. iii.—iv.; Dion Cass. lxi. 16; Joseph. B. J. iv. 11.) This is the last time that Antonius is mentioned by Tacitus; but we learn from Martial, who was a friend of Antonius, that he was alive at the accession of Trajan. In an epigram of the tenth book, which was probably published in a.d. 100, the second year of Trajan's reign [see Vol. ii. p. 965, b.], Antonius is said to be in his sixtieth year. (Mart. x. 23, comp. x. 32, ix. 100.)

PRISCA, MUTI/LLA, a friend of Livia, the mother of the emperor Tiberius, and the mistress of Julius Postumus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 12.)

PRISCA, PUB/LIA, the wife of C. Geminius Rufus, who was put to death in a.d. 51, in the reign of Tiberius. Priscia was also accused and summoned before the senate, but stabbed herself in the senate-house. (Dion Cass. lix. 4.)

PRISCIA/NUS, one of the most celebrated grammarians of the later period of Roman literature. From the surname Caesariensis which is given to him, we gather that he was either born at Caesarea, or at least was educated there. The time at which he lived cannot be fixed with any great precision. He is spoken of as a contemporary of Cassiodorus, who lived from a.d. 468 to at least a.d. 562. (Paulus Diaconus, de Gest. Longob. i. 25.) According to a statement of Aldhelm (ap. Min. Aquit. Class. vol. v. p. 501, &c.), the emperor Theodosius the younger, who died in a.d. 450, copied out Priscian's grammatical work with his own hand. Some authorities, therefore, place him in the first half of the fifth century, others a little later in the same century, others in the beginning of the sixth century. The second is the only view at all consonant with both the above statements. Priscian was a pupil of Theoctitus. (Prisc. xviii. 5.) He himself taught grammar at Constantinople, and was in the receipt of a salary from the government from which, as well as from parts of his writings, especially his translation of the Perihegesis of Dionysius) it appears probable that he was a Christian. Of other particulars of his life we are ignorant. He was celebrated for the extent and depth of his grammatical knowledge, of which he has left the evidence in his work on the subject, entitled Commentariorum grammaticorum Libri XVIII., addressed to his friend and patron, the consul Julianus. Other titles are, however, frequently given to it. The first sixteen books treat upon the eight parts of speech recognised by the ancient grammarians, letters, syllables, &c. The last two books are on syntax, and in one MS.
PRISCIANUS.

are placed as a distinct work, under the title De Constructione. Priscianus made good use of the works of preceding grammarians, but the writers whom he mainly followed were Apollonius Dyscolus (Apollonius, opus auctoritate in omnia sequendum vult, xiv. 1, vol. i. p. 501, ed. Krehl) and Herodianus (ii. 6, vol. i. p. 76, ed. Krehl). The treatise of Priscianus soon became the standard work on Latin grammar, and in the epitome of Rabanus Maurus obtained an extensive circulation. One feature of value about it is the large number of quotations which it contains both from Latin and Greek writers, of whom nothing would otherwise have remained. His acquaintance with Greek as well as Latin enabled him to carry on a parallel between the two languages.

Besides the systematic grammatical work of Priscianus there are still extant the following writings:

1. A grammatical catechism on twelve lines of the Aeneid, manifestly intended as a school book.
2. A treatise on accents. 3. A treatise on the symbols used to denote numbers and weights, and on coins and numbers. 4. On the metres of Terence. 5. A translation of the Пρομηθία (Проехороизмата) of Hermogenes. The translation of the Greek original was discovered and published by Heeren in 1791. This and the two preceding pieces are addressed to Symmachus. 6. On the declensions of nouns. 7. A poem on the emperor Anastasius in 312 hexameters, with a preface in 22 iambic lines. 8. A piece De Ponderibus et Mensuris, in verse. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. v. p. 212, &c. 235, &c. 494, &c.) This piece has been attributed by some to the grammarian Rhennius Fannius Palaeon, by others to one Remus Favinus, but the authorship of Priscianus seems well established. 9. An Epitome phaenomenon, or De Sideribus, in verse. (Wernsdorf l. c. v. p. i. p. 239.) This and the two preceding pieces have been edited separately by Endlicher (Vienne. 1828), with a preliminary dissertation. 10. A free translation of the Periplus of Dionysius in 1427 lines, manifestly made for the instruction of youth. It follows the order of the Greek on the whole, but contains many variations from the original. In particular Priscianus has taken pains to substitute for the heathen allusions a phraseology better adapted for Christian times. 11. A couple of epigrams. (Anth. Lat. v. 47, 139.) To Priscianus also are usually attributed the acrostics prefixed to the plays of Plautus, and describing the plot.

The best edition of Priscianus is that by Krehl, which contains all but a few of the shorter poems (above, Nos. 7, 8, 9, 11). [C. P. M.]

PRISCIANUS, THEODORUS, a physician, who was a pupil of Vindicianus (Rer. Mol. iv. præf. p. 81, ed. Argent.), and who therefore lived in the fourth century after Christ. He is supposed to have lived at the court of Constantine, and to have attained the dignity of Archinter. He belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, but not without a certain mixture of the doctrines of the Methodici, and even of the Dogmatici. He is the author of a Latin work, entitled, "Rerum Medicarum Libri Quatuor," which is sometimes attributed to a person named Octavianus Horatianus. The first book treats of external diseases, the second of internal, the third of female diseases, and the fourth of physiology, &c. The author, in his preface, speaks against the learned and wordy disputes held by physicians at the bedside of the patient, and also their putting their whole reliance upon foreign remedies in preference to those which were indigenous. Several of the medicines which he mentions himself are absurd and superstitious; the style and language of the work are bad; and altogether it is of little interest and value. It was first published in 1532, in which year two editions appeared, one at Strasburg, fol., and the other at Basel, 4to. Of these the latter is more correct than the other, but not so complete, as the whole of the fourth book is wanting, and also several chapters of the first and second books. It is also to be found in Kraut's Experimentarius Medicinae, Argent., fol., 1544, and in the Aldine Collection of Medicina Antiqui Latinii, 1547, fol., Venet. A new edition was commenced by J. M. Bernhold, of which only the first volume was ever published (1791, 8vo. Ansbach), containing the first book and part of the second. A work "Diet," which is sometimes attributed to Theodorus Priscianus, is noticed under Theodorus. (See Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Chou-lant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Mecanistes, etc.) [W. A. G.]

PRISCILLA, CASSIA, a Roman female artist, whose name appears, with the addition of Pont., on a bas-relief, in the Borgia collection, at Velletri, representing Hercules and Omphale. (Millin, Galler. Myth. pl. cvii, n. 453; Muratori, Thes. vol. i. p. xcv. i; R. Roche, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 393.) [P. S.]

L. PRISCILLIANUS, acquired unenviable celebrity as an informer, under Caracalla, by whom he was made praefect of Achaia. He was celebrated also for his gladiatorial skill in wild beast fights, and eventually was banished to an island, during the reign of Macrinus, at the instance of the senate, whose hatred he had incurred by procuring the destruction of several members of their body. (Dion Cass. Ixxiv. 21.) [W. R.]

PRISCUS, PEDUCAEUS. [Peducaeus, Nos. 7 and 8.]

PRISCUS, artists. 1. Attius, a Roman painter, who lived under the Flavian emperors (about A. D. 10) and was one of the best artists of the period. In conjunction with Cornelius Pinus, he adorned with paintings the temple of Honos et Virtus, when it was restored by Vespasian. Of these two artists Priscus approached nearest to the ancients. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10, s. 37.)

2. Of Nicomedian, an architect and military engineer, who lived under Septimius Severus. (Dion Cass. Ixxiv. 11, Ixxx. 11.) [P. S.]

PRISCUS (Piirkos), one of the earliest and most important Byzantine historians, was surnamed PANTITES, because he was a native of Pa-nium in Thrace. We know little of his life in general, but much of a short, though highly interesting and important period of it, viz. from A. D.
445—447, when he was ambassador of Theodosius the Younger at the court of Attila. The embassy consisted of several persons. In later years he and one Maximinus transacted diplomatic business for the emperor Marcian, in Egypt and Arabia. He died in or about A. D. 471. Niobahr thinks he was a heathen. Priscus wrote an account of his embassy to Attila, enriched by digressions on the life and reign of that king, the Greek title of which is Ιστορία Βασιλέως και καλά Ἀττιᾶς, which was originally divided into eight books, according to Suidas. This is the most valuable account we have on Attila, and it is deeply to be regretted that only fragments of it have come down to posterity: it was written after the death of Theodosius, which took place in A.D. 450. Priscus is an excellent and trustworthy historian, and his style is remarkably elegant and pure. Suidas says that he also wrote Μελέται Προτερολόγια, Declamationes Rhetoricae and Epistolae, which are lost. Jornandes and Juvenals, the author of the Life of Attila, borrowed largely from the History of Priscus, whose name is often mentioned by them, as well as by other Byzantine writers, as, for instance, the emperor Arianus, who calls him Πρίσκων, and by Theophanes, who calls him Πρίσκος, both apparently mistakes or corruptions of the text. The fragments of the History were first edited in Greek by David Hoeschel, Augsburg, 1603, 4to; a Latin translation with notes, by Cantoclarius or Chantehclair, Paris, 1609, 8vo; the same reprinted together with the text, and revised by Fabrot in the Paris edition of Excerptae de Legationibus, together with Dexippus, Menander, and others; the same also in Labbe's Protrepticon, Paris, 1643, fol. The latest and best edition, together with the other writers who have furnished the materials for the Excerpta de Legationibus, is, by Niebuhr, in the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines, 1829, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 539, 540; Hancinius, de Script. Byzant.; Niebuhr's Notes on Priscus, in his edition mentioned above; Suidas, s. v. Επικρατεῖα.)

PRISCUS, a brother of the emperor Philip I. Having received the command of the Syrian armies, by his intolerable oppression he gave rise to the rebellion of Iotapians.

[IoTAPIANES.] (Zosim. i. 18, 21.)

[BR.]

PRISCUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who has addressed several of his letters to him; one on the death of Martial, another respecting the health of Fannia, &c. (Ep. ii. 13, iii. 21, vi. 8, vii. 8, 19). Pliny himself nowhere in the letters mentions his gentle name, but we find him called in the superscription of one of the letters, Cornelius Priscus: if this superscription is correct, he is probably the same as the Cornelius Priscus, who was consul in A.D. 95 [see below]. Some modern writers, among whom is Heineccius, thinks that the Priscus to whom Pliny wrote is the same as the jurist Nephatius Priscus, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian, and who was, therefore, a contemporary of Pliny.

[NERATIUS.]

PRISCUS, ANCHA'RIUS, accused Caesius Cordus, proconsul of Crete, of the crimes of repe-tundae and majestas, in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 21. (Tac. Ann. iii. 38, 70.)

PRISCUS, L. ATILI'US, consular tribune b.c. 399 and 396, is spoken of under Atilius, No. 1. The surname of Priscus is only given to him in the Capitoline Fasti.

PRISCUS ATTALUS. [ATTALUS, p. 411.]

PRISCUS, T. CAESON'NIUS, a Roman eques, was appointed by Tiberius the minister of a new office which he instituted, and which was styled a colophaturia. (Suet. Tib. 42.)

PRISCUS, CORNE'LIUS, consul, with Pompeius Colla, in a.d. 93, the year in which Agricola died. (Tac. Agr. 44.) See above Priscus, the friend of Pliny.

PRISCUS, FAB'RIUS, a legatus, the commander of a legion in the war against Civilis, A.D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 79.)

PRISCUS, FULCI'NIUS. [FULCI'NIUS.]

PRISCUS, HELVI'DIUS. 1. A legate of a legion under T. Ummidius Quadratus, governor of Syria, was sent by the latter across the Taurus, in A.D. 52, in consequence of the disorders that had arisen through the conduct of Julius Pelnigus, the governor of Cappadocia (Tac. Ann. xii. 49). This Priscus must have been a different person from the celebrated Helvidius Priscus mentioned below, since the latter did not obtain the questorship till the reign of Nero, and the legates of the legions were usually chosen at that time from persons of higher rank.

2. The son-in-law of Thrasea Paetus, and, like him, distinguished by his love of liberty, which he at length sealed with his blood. He was born at Tarracina, and was the son of a certain Cluvius, who had filled the post of chief centurion (primipilus). His name shows that he was adopted by an Helvidius Priscus, perhaps by the Helvidius who is mentioned above. In his youth he devoted himself with energy to the higher branches of study, not, says Tacitus, to disguise an idle leisure under a pompous name, but in order to enter upon public duties with a mind fortified against misfortune. He chose as his teachers of philosophy those who taught that nothing is good but what is honourable, nothing bad but what is disgraceful, and who did not reckon power, nobility, or any external things, either among blessings or evils. In other words he embraced with ardour the Stoic philosophy. So distinguished did he become for his virtue and nobleness of soul, that when questor he was chosen by Thrasea Paetus as his son-in-law; and by this connection he was still further strengthened in his love of liberty. He was questor in Achaia during the reign of Nero, and by the way in which he discharged the duties of his office, gained the love of the provincials. (Comp. Schol. ad Juv. v. 36.) Having obtained the tribunship of the plebs in A.D. 56, he exerted his influence to protect the poor against the severe proceedings of Obulonius Sabinus, the questor of the treasury. The name of Priscus is not mentioned again for a few years. His freedom of speech and love of independence could not prove pleasing to the court, and he, therefore, was not advanced to any of the higher offices of the state. It appears that he and his father-in-law were even imprudent enough to celebrate in their houses republican festivals, and to commemorate the birth-days of Brutus and Cassius.

These proceedings reached the ears of the emperor; Thrasea was put to death [THRASEA], and Priscus banished from Italy (A.D. 66). He retired with his wife, Fannia, to Apollonia in Macedonia, where he remained till the death of Nero. He was recalled to Rome by Galba (A.D. 68), and one of his first acts was to bring to trial Epius Marcellus, the accuser of his father-in-law; but as the sen-ments of Galba were doubtful, he dropped the accusation. On the murder of Galba at the beginning of the following year (A. D. 69), he obtained from Otho the corpse of the emperor, and took care that it was buried (Plut. Galb. 28). In the course of the same year he was nominated praetor for the next year, and as praetor elect ventured to oppose Vitellius in the senate. After the death of Vitellius in December, A. D. 69, Priscus again attacked his old enemy Eprius Marcellus. The contest between them arose respecting the manner in which the ambassadors were to be chosen who were to be sent to Vespasian; Priscus maintaining that they should be appointed by the magistrates, Marcellus that they should be chosen by lot, fearing that if the former method were adopted he might not be appointed, and might thus appear to have received some disgrace. Marcellus carried his point on this occasion. Priscus accused him, shortly afterwards, of having been one of the informers under Nero, but he was acquitted, in consequence of the support which he received from Mucianus and Domitian.

Although Vespasian was now emperor, and no one was left to dispute the throne with him, Priscus did not worship the rising sun. During Vespasian's continued absence in the East, Priscus, who was now praetor (A. D. 70), opposed various measures which had been brought forward by others with a view of pleasing the emperor. Thus he maintained that the retrenchments in the public expenses, which were rendered necessary by the exhausted state of the treasury, ought to be made by the senate, and not left to the emperor, as the consul elect had proposed; and he also brought forward a motion in the senate that the Capitol should be rebuilt at the public cost, and only with assistance from Vespasian. It may be mentioned, in passing, that later in the year Priscus, as praetor, dedicated the spot on which the Capitol was to be built. (Tac. Hist. iv. 53.) On the arrival of the emperor at Rome, Priscus was the only person who saluted him by his private name of Vespasian; and, not content with omitting his name in all the edicts which he published as praetor, he attacked both the person and the office of the emperor. Such conduct was downright folly; he could not by smart speeches and insulting acts restore the republic; and if his sayings and doings have been rightly reported, he had only himself to thank for his fate. Thus we are told by one of his admirers that Vespasian having forbidden him on one occasion from appearing in the senate, he replied, "You can expel me from the senate, but, as long as I am a member of it, I must go into the house."—"Well, then, go in, but be silent."—"Don't ask me for my opinion, or at least don't ask me for my silence, and I will be silent."—"But I must ask you."—"Then I must say what seems to me just."—"But if you do I will put you to death."—"Did I ever say to you that I was immortal? You do your part, and I will do mine. Yours is, to kill; mine, to die without fear; yours is, to banish; mine, to go into exile without sorrow." (Epictet. Dissert. i. 2.) After such a specimen of the way in which he bearded the emperor, we cannot be surprised at his banishment. His wife Fannia followed him a second time into exile. It appears that his place of banishment was at no great distance from the capital; and he had not been long in exile before he was executed by order of Vespasian. It would seem that the emperor was persuaded by some of the enemies of Priscus to issue the fatal mandate; for shortly afterwards he sent messengers to recall the executioners; and his life would have been saved, had it not been for the false report that he had already perished. The life of Priscus was written by Herennius Senecio at the request of his widow Fannia; and the tyrant Domitian, in consequence of this work, subsequently put Senecio to death, and sent Fannia into exile for the third time. Priscus left a son, who is called simply Helvidius, without any surname, and is therefore spoken of under Helvidius. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28, viii. 23, 33, 35, Hist. ii. 91, iv. 5—9, 43, 44, Agric. 2, Dial. de Orat. 5; Dion Cass. ivv. 7, lvii. 12, lviii. 13; Suet. Vesp. 15; Plin. Ep. viii. 13.)

PRISCUS, JAVOLE'NUS. [JAVOLENUS.]

PRISCUS, JUL'LIUS, a centurion, was appointed by Vitellius (A. D. 69) prefect of the praetorian guards on the recommendation of Fabius Valens. When news arrived that the army, which had espoused the side of Vespasian, was marching upon Rome, Julius Priscus was sent with Alpheus Varus at the head of fourteen praetorian cohorts and all the squadrons of cavalry to take possession of the passes of the Apennines, but he and Varus disgracefully deserted their post and returned to Rome. After the death of Vitellius, Priscus put an end to his life, more, says Tacitus, through shame than necessity. (Tac. Hist. ii. 92, iii. 55, 61, iv. 11.)

PRISCUS, JUN'TIUS, praetor in the reign of Caligula, was put to death by this emperor on account of his wealth, though accused as a pretext of other crimes. (Dion Cass. lix. 18.)

PRISCUS, C. LUTO-RIUS, a Roman eques, composed a poem on the death of Germanicus, which obtained great celebrity, and for which he was liberally paid by Tiberius. When Drusus fell ill, in A. D. 21, Priscus composed another poem on his death, anticipating, if he died, a still more handsome present from the emperor, as Drusus was his own son, while Germanicus had been only his son by adoption. Priscus was led by his vanity to recite this poem in a private house in presence of a distinguished company of women of rank. He was denounced in consequence to the senate; and this body, anxious to punish the insult to the imperial family, condemned Priscus to death, without consulting Tiberius, and had him executed forthwith. The proceeding, however, displeased Tiberius, not through any wish to save the life of Priscus, but because the senate had presumed to put a person to death without asking his opinion. He therefore caused a decree of the senate to be passed, that no decree of the body should be proposed in the aedilium till ten days had elapsed; and as they could not be carried into execution till this was done, no one could in future be executed till ten days after his condemnation. (Tac. Ann. iii. 49—51; Dion Cass. lix. 20.) It is recorded of this Luttorius Priscus that he paid Sejanus the enormous sum of 50,000,000 sestercies (quinquennis sextertium) for an eunuch of the name of Paezon. (Plin. H. N. vii. 39, s. 40.)

Seneca. He was accompanied in his exile by his wife Aratoria Flaccilla. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 71.) We learn from the Fasti that D. Novius Priscus was consul a.d. 78, in the reign of Vespasian. He was probably the same person as the one banished by Nero.

PRISCUS, T. NUMI/CIUS, consul b.c. 469 with A. Virginicius Tricostus Caecilomontanus, fought against the Volsci with success, and took Ceno, one of their towns. (Liv. ii. 63; Dionys. ix. 56.)

PRISCUS, PETRO'NIUS, banished by Nero, a.d. 66. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71.)

PRISCUS, SERVILIUS. The Prisci were an ancient family of the Servilia gens, and filled the highest offices of the state during the early years of the republic. They also bore the agnomens of Structus, which is always appended to their name in the Fasti, till it was supplanted by that of Fidenas, which was first obtained by Q. Servilius Priscus Structus, who took Fidenae in his dictatorship, b.c. 435 [see below, No. 6], and which was also borne by his descendants [Nos. 7 and 8].

1. P. Servilius Priscus Structus, consul b.c. 495 with Ap. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis. This year was memorable in the annals by the death of king Tarquin. The temple of Mercury was also dedicated in this year, and additional coins were issued to the colony of Sigma, which had been founded by Tarquin. The consuls carried on war against the Volsci with success, and took the town of Suessa Pometia; and Priscus subsequently defeated both the Sabines and Aurunci. In the struggles between the patricians and plebeians respecting the law of debt, Priscus was inclined to espouse the side of the latter, and published a proclamation favourable to the plebeians; but as he was unable to assist them in opposition to his colleague and the whole body of the patricians, he incurred the enmity of both parties. (Liv. ii. 21-27; Dionys. vi. 23-32; Val. Max. ix. 3, § 6; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 3.)

2. Q. Servilius Priscus Structus, a brother of No. 1, was magister equitum, in b.c. 494, to the dictator, M. Valerius Maximus. (Dionys. vi. 40.)

3. Sp. Servilius Priscus Structus, consul b.c. 476, with A. Virginicius Rutulus. In consequence of the destruction of the Fabii at the C cremena in the preceding year, the Etruscans had advanced up to the very walls of Rome, and taken possession of the hill Janiculum. In an attempt which Priscus made to take this hill by assault, he was repulsed with great loss, and would have sustained a total defeat, had not his colleague Virginius come to his assistance. In consequence of his rashness on this occasion, he was brought to trial by the tribunes, as soon as his year of office had expired, but was acquitted. (Liv. ii. 51, 52; Dionys. ix. 25, &c.)

4. Q. Servilius Priscus Structus, probably son of No. 2, was consul b.c. 468, with T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus, and again b.c. 466, with Sp. Postumius Albuc Regillensis. In each year Priscus commanded the Roman armies in the wars with the neighbouring nations, but did not perform anything worth recording. (Liv. ii. 64, iii. 2; Dionys. ix. 57, 60.)

5. P. Servilius Sp. f. P. n. Priscus Structus, son of No. 3, was consul b.c. 463, with L. Aebutius Elva, and was carried off in his consulship by the great plague which raged at Rome in this year. (Liv. iii. 6, 7; Dionys. ix. 67, 68; Oros. ii. 12.)

6. Q.* Servilius P. f. Sp. n. Priscus Structus Fidenas, son of No. 5, was appointed dictator b.c. 435, in consequence of the alarm excited by the invasion of the Veientes and Fidenates, who had taken advantage of the plague, which was then raging, to attempt to recover the Roman territory, and had advanced almost up to the Colline Gate. Servilius defeated the enemy without difficulty, and pursued the Fidenates to their town, to which he proceeded to lay siege, and which he took by means of a mine. From the conquest of this town he received the surname of Fidenas, which was afterwards adopted by his children in the place of Structus. Servilius is mentioned again in b.c. 431, when he called upon the tribunes of the plebs to compel the consuls to elect a dictator, in order to carry on the war against the Volsci and Aequi. In b.c. 418 the Roman army was defeated by the Aequi and the Lavician, in consequence of the dissensions and incompetency of the consular tribunes of that year. Servilius was therefore appointed dictator a second time; he carried on the war with success, defeated the Aequi, and took the point of Lavicum, where the senate forthwith established a Roman colony. (Liv. iv. 21, 22, 26-45.)

7. Q. Servilius Q. f. P. N. (Priscus) Fidenas, the son of No. 6, was consular tribune six times, namely in b.c. 402, 398, 395, 390, 383, 386. (Liv. v. 8, 14, 24, 36, vi. 4, 6.) He was also interrex in b.c. 397. (Liv. v. 17.) There can be no doubt that this Servilius was the son of No. 6, both from his praenomen Quintus, and his surname Fidenas, as well as from the circumstances that he is designated in the Capitoline Fasti, Q. f. P. N. A difficulty, however, arises from the statement of Livy, that the C. Servilius, who was consular tribune in b.c. 418, was the son of the conqueror of Fidenae (Livy iv. 45, 46); but this is probably a mistake, since the consular tribune of b.c. 418 is called, in the Capitoline Fasti, C. Servilius Q. f. P. N. Axilla. Besides which, if he were the son of the conqueror of Fidenae, he must have been a younger son, as his praenomen shows; and in that case the younger son would have obtained one of the highest dignities in the state sixteen years before his elder brother.

8. Q. Servilius Q. f. Q. N. (Priscus) Fidenas, the son of No. 7, was consular tribune three times, namely, in b.c. 382, 378, 369. (Liv. vi. 22, 31, 36.)

9. Sp. Servilius Priscus, censor B.c. 378, with Q. Cloelius Siculus (Livy vi. 31). As this Servilius does not bear the surname of Fidenas, he probably was not a descendant of the conqueror of Fidenae.

* Livy (iv. 21) calls him A. Servilius, in speaking of his dictatorship of b.c. 435, but Q. Servilius when he mentions his dictatorship of b.c. 418 (iv. 40), as well as when he speaks of him elsewhere (e.g. iv. 26). There can, therefore, be no doubt that the name of Quintus is to be preferred, which we find also in the Capitoline Fasti.
PRISCUS SENE'CIO, Q. SO'SIUS, consul A. d. 169, with P. Coelius Apollinaris (Fasti).

PRISCUS, STATI'TIUS, consul A. d. 159, with Plautius Quintianus, two years before the death of the emperor Antoninus (Fasti). He was one of the generals sent by his successor, M. Aurelius, to conduct the war against the Parthians, A. d. 162—165. He took Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, and rescued the whole of that country from the Parthian power. (Capitolin. Anton. Phil. 9, Verus, 7; Dion Cass. lxxi. Fragm. p. 1201, ed. Reimarus.)

PRISCUS, TARQU'NIUS, [TARQUINIIUS.]

PRISCUS, TARQU'TIUS, had been a legate of Statilius Taurus, in Africa, whom he accused, in order to gratify Agrippina, the wife of the emperor Claudius, who was anxious to obtain possession of his pleasure grounds. Taurus put an end to his life before sentence was pronounced; and the senate expelled Friscus from its body as an informer. He was restored, however, to his former rank by Nero, and appointed governor of Bithynia; but was condemned in A. d. 61, on account of extortion in his province, to the great delight of the senate. (Tac. Ann. xii. 59, xiv. 46.)

PRISCUS, M. TREBATIUS, consul suffectus in A. d. 109. (Fasti.)

PRISCUS, L. VA'LERIUS MESSA'LA TIRA'SEA, was distinguished alike by his birth and wisdom during the reign of Septimius Severus. He was consul in A. d. 196, and about seventeen years afterwards fell a victim to the cruelty of Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 5.)

PRISCUS, VE'CTIUS, a person mentioned by the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. vi. 12.)

PILVERNAS, an agnomen given to L. Acem'llius Mancernius, from his taking Privenurn in B. C. 329. [MAMERCINUS, No. 9.]

PROAERESIUS (PROAER'EIUS), a distinguished teacher of rhetoric, was a native of Armenia, born about A. d. 276, of good connections, though poor. He came to Antioch to study under the rhetorician Ulpius. Having soon risen to high distinction in his school, he removed to Athens, where he placed himself under Julian, then seated in the chair of rhetoric. There came along with him from Antioch his friend Hephæstion. A fact told by Eunapius in his life of Proaeresius (Vit. Soph. vol. i. p. 73, ed. Boissoneade), illustrates both the poverty and the zeal of these youths. They had between them but one change of raiment (ίματαν καὶ τριβάνων), and three thin, faded blankets (στρατι'ματα). When Proaeresius went forth to the public schools, his friend lay in bed working his exercises, and this they did alternately. Proaeresius soon acquired a high place in his master's esteem, of which, as well as his own merit, a singular proof is given by Julian (ibid. p. 71, &c.). On the death of Julian (according to Clinton, Fast. Rom. p. 401, in A. d. 349), who left Proaeresius his house (Eunap. ibid. p. 65), it was determined no longer to confine the chair of rhetoric to one, but to extend this honour to many. (Eunap. ibid. p. 79.) Epiphanius, Diophantus, Sopolis, Parmasius, and Hipheistiaen were chosen among from a crowd of competitors; but Hipheistiaen left Athens, dreading competition with Proaeresius. The students, generally, betook themselves to their professors, according to their nations; and there attached themselves to Proaeresius the students coming from the district south from Puntus inclusive, as far as Egypt and Lybia. His great success excited the jealousy of the others, who combined against him. Through the intervention of a corrupt consul, he was driven from Athens. A new pro-consul not only restored him, but, after a public trial, bestowed on him public marks of approbation, and placed him at once at the head of all the teachers of rhetoric in Athens. The fresh attempts of his enemies to supplant him by splendid entertainments, at which they endeavoured to win over men of power, were rendered nugatory by the arrival in Athens of Anatolius, the praefect of Illyrium. It is probable that the favour with which that accomplished man regarded Proaeresius, attracted to the latter the attention of the emperor Constans, who sent for him to Gaul, about A. d. 342. Constans detained him for more than one year (if we may found upon the expression θεμασι'αρ, Eunap. ibid. p. 69), and then sent him to Rome. Here he was highly esteemed, and having written or delivered a eulogy on the city, was honoured in return with a life-size statue of bronze, bearing the inscription, "Prince of Eloquence." On his departure from Rome, he obtained for Athens a tributary supply of provisions from several islands—a grant which was confirmed by the eparch of Athens at the solicitation of Anatolius—and he himself was honoured with the title of στρατηγός το'ρη. When the emperor Julian (A. d. 362) had promulgated the decree, for which he is so strongly censured, even by his eulogist Ammianus Marcellinus (xx. 10, xxv. 4), forbidding teachers belonging to the Christian religion to practise their art, we are told (Hieron. in Chronic. An. 2579), that Proaeresius was expressly exempted from its operation, but that he refused any immunity not enjoyed by his brethren. To this partial suspension of his rhetorical functions, Eunapius also alludes, but, distrusted by his love of the man, and his hatred of his religion, says doubtfully, "he seemed to be a Christian" (ibid. p. 92). Eunapius says that it was about this very time he himself arrived at Athens, and found in Proaeresius all the kindness of a father. It is probable, then, that this was in the year 363, when Julian was in the East, and we may suppose the edict less rigidly enforced. Proaeresius was then in his 87th year. Eunapius remained at Athens for five years, and states that his friend and teacher died not many days after his departure. Proaeresius had married Amphiclieia of Tralles, and by her he had several daughters, all of whom died in the bloom of youth, and on whom Miletus wrote him consolatory verses. His rival Diophantus pronounced his funeral oration (Eunap. ibid. p. 94), and his epitaph, written by his pupil Gregory Nazianzian, is given by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vi. p. 137).

From the account given of him by Eunapius, who had the best means of information, we learn that he was of gigantic stature (Casaubon and Wytenbach, ad Eunap. vol. ii. p. 285, conjecture that he was nine feet high!), and of stately bearing, so vigorous in his old age, that it was impossible to suppose him other than in the prime of life. His constitution was of iron strength (σιδηρευών), braving the winter colds of Gaul without shoes, and in light clothing, and drinking unwarmed the water of the Rhine when almost frozen. His style of eloquence seems to have been flowing, and graced with allusions to classic times. He had great powers of extemporaneous speaking, and a prodigious memory. He has no great credit, so far as style is concerned, in his pupil Eunapius, but the names of Basil the Great and Gregory Nazianzen (Sozomen, H. E. vi. 17), fully bear out his high reputation as a teacher of rhetoric. (Compare Suidas, s. v.; Clinton, Fast. Rom. pp. 401, 405, 449, 469; Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Beredt. p. 237.)

PROBUS. [FALCÔNIA.]

PROBUS. M. AURELIUS, Roman emperor A. D. 276—282, was a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His mother is said to have been of more noble extraction than his father Maximus, who after having served as a centurion with good reputation was raised to the rank of tribune, and died in Egypt, bequeathing a very moderate fortune to his widow and two children, a son and a daughter. Young Probus, at an early age, attracted the attention, and gained the favour of Valerian, from whom, in violation of the ordinary rules of military service, he received while almost a boy the commission of tribune. Letters have been preserved by Vopiscus, addressed by the prince to Gallienus, and to the prætorian prefect, in which he announces the promotion of the youth, whom he praises warmly, and recommends to their notice. Nor did he prove unworthy of this patronage. He conducted himself so gallantly in the war against the Sarmatians beyond the Danube, that he was forthwith entrusted with the command of a distinguished legion, and was presented in a public assembly with various military rewards, among others with the highest and most prized of all decorations, a civic crown, which he had earned by rescuing a noble youth, Valerius Flaccus, a kinsman of the emperor, from the hands of the Quadri. His subsequent exploits in Africa, Egypt, Arabia, Scythia, Persia, Germany, and Gaul, gained for him the esteem and admiration of Gallienus, Aurelian, and the second Claudius, all of whom expressed their feelings in the most earnest language, while his gentle though firm discipline, the mitigated care which he evinced in providing for the wants and comforts of the soldiers, and his liberality in dividing spoils, secured the zealous attachment of the troops. By Tacitus he was named governor of the whole East, and declared to be the firmest pillar of the Roman power, and, upon the death of that sovereign, the purple was forced upon his acceptance by the armies of Syria. The downfall of Florianus speedily removed his only rival, and he was enthusiastically hailed by the united voice of the senate, the people, and the legions.

The whole reign of Probus, which lasted for about six years, presents a series of the most brilliant achievements. His attention was first turned to Gaul, which had become disturbed upon the overthrow of Postumus, and after the death of Aurelian had been ravaged, occupied, and almost subjugated by the Germans. By a succession of victories the new ruler recovered sixty important cities, destroyed 400,000 of the invaders, and drove the rest across the Rhine. Following up his success, he penetrated into the heart of Germany, compelled the vanquished tribes to restore the whole of the plunder which they had borne away, and to furnish a contingent of 16,000 recruits, which were distributed in small numbers among the different armies of the empire; he established a line of posts stretching far into the interior, and even formed the scheme of disarming the inhabitants and of reducing the whole country to the form of a province. Passing onwards, every foe was swept away from the frontiers of Raedia and Noricum, which now enjoyed complete security, the Goths upon the Thracian borders, overawed by his name, tendered submission or were admitted to alliance, the robber hordes of Isauria and the savage Blemmyes of Ethiopia were crushed or dispersed, a treaty was concluded with the Persians at their own eager solicitation, while, in addition to the conquest of foreign foes, the rebellions of Saturninus at Alexandria, of Proculus and Bonosus in Gaul, were promptly suppressed. The emperor on his return to the metropolis celebrated a well-earned triumph, and determined forthwith to devote his whole energies to the regulation of the civil government. The privileges restored by his predecessor to the senate were confirmed, agricultura was promoted by the removal of various pernicious restrictions, large bodies of barbarians were transplanted from the frontiers to more tranquil regions, where they were presented with allotments of land in order that they might learn to dwell in fixed abodes, and to practise the occupations and duties of civilised life, while in every direction protection and encouragement were extended to industry. But the repose purchased by such unremitting exertion proved the cause of ruin to Probus. Fearing that the discipline of the troops might be relaxed by inactivity and ease, he employed them in laborious works of public utility, and was even rash enough to express the hope that the time was fast approaching when soldiers would be no longer necessary. Alarmed by these ill-judged expressions, and irritated by toils which they regarded as at once painful and degrading, a large body of men who were employed under his own inspection in draining the vast swamps which surrounded his native Sirmium, in a sudden transport of rage made an attack upon the emperor, who, having vainly attempted to save himself by taking refuge in a strong tower, was dragged forth and murdered by the infuriated mutineers.

History has unhesitatingly pronounced that the character of Probus stands without a rival in the annals of imperial Rome, combining all the best features of the best princes who adorned the purple, exhibiting at once the daring valour and martial skill of Aurelian, the activity and vast conceptions of Hadrian, the justice, moderation, simple habits, amiable disposition, and cultivated intellect of Trajan, the Antonines, and Alexander. We find no trace upon record of any counterbalancing vices or defects, and we can detect no motive which could have tempted the writers to flourished soon after his demise to employ the language of falsehood or flattery in depicting the career of an obscure Illyrian soldier, unconnected by blood or alliance alike with those who went before him, and with those who succeeded him on the throne.

Our chief authority is the biography, in the Augustan History, of Vopiscus, who complains that even when he wrote, the great achievements of this extraordinary man were rapidly sinking into oblivion, obliterated doubtless by the stirring events and radical changes in the constitution which followed with such rapidity the accession of Diocletian. By the aid, however, of the books and state papers which he had consulted in the Ulpinian and Tiberian libraries, the public acts, the journals of the senate, together with the private diary of a certain Turtulius Gallicanus, he was enabled to compile a loose and ill-connected narrative. We may refer also, but with much less confidence, to Zosimus, i. 64, &c., the concluding portion of the reign being lost; to Zonaras, xii. 29; Aurel. Vict. de Coes. xxxvii, Epit. xxxvii; Eutrop. ix. 11. [W. R.]

COIN OF PROBUS.

PROBUS, a name borne by several celebrated Roman grammarians, whom it is difficult to distinguish from each other.

1. M. VALERIIUS PROBUS, of Berytus, who having served in the army, and having long applied without success for promotion, at length besought himself, in disgust, to literary pursuits. He belongs to the age of Nero, since he stands last in order in the catalogue of Suetonius, immediately after Q. Remmius Palemon, who flourished in the reigns of Tiberius, Caius, and Claudius; this is fully confirmed by the notice of Jerome in the Eusebian chronicle under Olympiad cccix. i. (A. D. 56—7): "Probus Berytus erudissimissimus grammaticorum Romae agostrictur." Chance led him to study the more ancient writers, and he occupied himself in illustrating (amendare ac distinguere et adnotare caravat) their works. He published a few trifling remarks on some matters of minute controversy (minis pasca et exigua de quibusdam minuis quaestionibus edidit), and left behind him a considerable body of observations (silvam) on the earlier forms of the language. Although not in the habit of giving regular instructions to pupils, he had some admirers (sectatores), of whom he would occasionally admit three or four to benefit by his lore. To this Probus we may, with considerable probability, assign those annotations on Terence, from which fragments are quoted in the Scholia on the dramatist. (Sueton. de illus. Gramm. 24; Schopen, de Terentio et Donato eius interprete, 8vo. Bonn, 1821, p. 31.)

2. VALERIIUS PROBUS, termed by Macrobius "Vir perfectissimus," flourished some years before A. Gellius, and therefore about the beginning of the second century. He was the author of commentaries on Virgil, and possessed a copy of a portion at least of the Georgics, which had been corrected by the hand of the poet himself. These are the commentaries so frequently cited by Servius; but the Scholia in Bucolicis et Georgicis, now extant, under the name of Probus, belong to a much later period. (Gell. i. 15. § 18; iii. 1. § 5; ix. 9. § 12, 15, xiii. 20. § 1; xv. 30. § 5; Macrobi. Sat. v. 22; Heyne, de antiq. Virgil. interpret. subjoined to his notices "De Virgili editibus").

It must not be concealed, that many plausible reasons, founded upon the notices contained in the Nectes Atticæ, may be adduced for believing that the Valerius Probus of Gellius is one and the same person with the Probus Berytius of Suetonius and Hieronymus, for although Gellius, who speaks of having conversed with the pupils and friends of Valerius Probus, did not die before A. D. 180, it is by no means impossible, as far as we know to the contrary, that Probus Berytius might have lived on to the beginning of the second century, although the words of Martial (Ep. iii. 2, 12) cannot be admitted as evidence of the fact. This view has been adopted and ably supported by Jahn in the Preface to his edition of Persius, 8vo. Lips. 1843 (p. cxxvi. &c.). The chief difficulty, however, after all, arises from the chronology. Probus of Berytus is represented by Suetonius as having long sought the post of a centurion, and as having not applied himself to literature until he had lost all hopes of success; hence he must have been well advanced in life before he commenced his studies, and consequently, in all probability, must have been an old man in A. D. 57, when he was recognized at Rome as the most learned of grammarians. Moreover, a scholar who in the age of Nero undertook to illustrate Virgil, could scarcely with propriety have been represented as devoting himself to the ancient writers, who had fallen into neglect and almost into oblivion, for such is the meaning we should naturally attach to the words of Suetonius.

3. The life of Persius, commonly ascribed to Suetonius, is found in many of the best MSS. of the Satirist with the title Vita A. Persii Placi de Commentario Probi Valerii sublata. Now since this biography bears evident marks of having been composed by some one who lived at a period not very distant from the events which he relates, we may fairly ascribe it to the commentator on Virgil.

4. The name of the ancient scholarist on Juvenal was, according to Valla, by whom he was first published, Probus Grammaticus. (See In D. Juni Juv. Sess. Comment. vestae post Petloeli Curas, ed. D. A. G. Cramer, 8vo. Hamburg. 1823, p. 5.)

5. In the "Grammaticae Latinae auctores antiqui," 4to. Hannov. 1605, p. 1386—1494, we find a work upon grammar, in two books, entitled M. Valerii Probii Grammatici Institutiones, with a preface in verse, addressed to a certain Coelcistinus. The first book treats briefly of syllables, the parts of speech, and the principles of prosody. The second book, termed Cathedra, comprises general rules for the declension of nouns and verbs, with a few remarks on the arrangement of words and examples of the different species of metrical feet, corresponding throughout so closely with the treatise of M. Claudius Sacerdos [see Plotius Marusz], that it is evident that one of these writers must have copied from the other, or that both must have derived their materials from a common source. The text of this Probus has lately received important improvements from a collation of the Codex Boeiensis, now at Vienna, and appears under its best form in the "Corpus Grammaticorum Latinorum" of Lindemann, 4to. Lips. 1831, vol. i. pp. 79—148. The lines to Coelcistinus are included in the Anthol. Lat. de Burmann, vol. i. addend. p. 739, or No. 205, ed. Meyer.

6. In the same collection by Putschius, p. 1496—1541, is contained M. Valerii Probii Grammatici de Notis Romanorum Interpretandis Libellus, an explanation of the abbreviations employed in inscriptions and writings of various kinds.

PROBUS.
PROCILLUS

7. Endlicher, in his Analecta Grammatica, has published, from a Codex Bobiensis, now at Vienna, a fragment Valerii Prodi de Nomine.

It is not unlikely that the same individual may be the author of the three pieces last named, but this is a point on which it is vain to speak with confidence. (Quam, Beiträge zur Griechisch. und Romisch. Literatur-Geschichte, ii. p. 283; Jahn, L.C.; Suringar, Historia Critica Scholiast. Lat. [W. R.])

PRÓBUS, AEMILIUS. [NÉPOS, CORNELIUS.]

PRÓCAS, one of the fabulous kings of Alba Longa, succeeded Aventinus, reigned twenty-three years, and was the father of Numitor and Amulius. (Dionys. i. 71; Liv. i. 3; Appian, Rom. i. 1; Virg. Aen. vi. 767.)

PRÓCHIRUS, MICHAEL. [MICHELI, literary, No. 11.]

PRÓCHORA (Πρόχορα). There is extant in MS. a Greek life of St. John the Evangelist, professedly written by Prochorus, one of the seventy disciples, and also one of the seven deacons. (Luke, x. 1; Acts, vi. 5.) The work is professedly spurious, but critics are not determined as to its age. Vossius and others are disposed to identify this work with the Circuitus Joannis, mentioned in the Synopsis S. Scripturarum ascribed to Athanasius. Le Nourry and Ittigius assign to it a later date; and Tillemont regards it as comparatively recent, a forgery of the Middle Ages. It bears the title προχωρος του ετα των κρεσια των εκ τας κατασταθενων, ανεψυ της στρατον του πρωτομοδιου, περι λιωνυσι τω θεολογων και ευγελιστον ιστορια. Prochori qui fuit unus de septem ministerio praesfectis, consobrinus Stephani proto martyris, de Joanne theologo et evangelista historia.

J. C. M.]

PRÓCILLA, JULIA, the mother of Agricola (Tac. Agr. 4).

PROCILLOUS. 1. A Roman historian, a contemporary of Cicero. He appears to have written on early Roman history, as Varro quotes his account of the origin of the Curian lake, and likewise on later Roman history, as Pliny refers to him respecting Pompey's triumph on his return from Africa (Varr. L. L. v. 149, comp. v. 154, ed. Müller; Plin. H. N. viii. 2). He was held in high estimation by Atticus, but Cicero writes that researches was far superior to him, from which we may infer that Proculius wrote likewise on geographical subjects. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 2. § 2.)

2. Tribune of the plebe, b.c. 56, was accused by Clodius in b.c. 54, together with his colleagues, C. Cato and Nonius Sufenas, on account of the violent acts which they had committed in their tribuneship. Cato and Nonius were acquitted, but Proculius was condemned. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15. § 4, 16. § 5, ad Q. Fr. ii. 8. § 1; Drumm. Geschichte Romis. vol. ii. p. 339, vol. iii. p. 100.) This Proculius may have been the same person as the historian.

3. L. PROCILLOUS, whom we know only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Juno Sospita, and the reverse Juno in a chariot. We may infer from this coin that the Proculii came from Lanuvium, which was celebrated for its worship of Juno Sospita. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 239.)

COIN OF L. PROCILLOUS.

PROCILLOUS, C. VALE'RIUS, a Gallic chief, whose father C. Valerius Caburnus had received the Roman franchise from C. Valerius Flaccus. Caesar placed great confidence in Proculius, and reckoned him as one of his friends. He employed Proculius as his interpreter in the confidence interview which he had with Dativius, and he likewise sent him on a subsequent occasion, along with M. Mettius, as his ambassador to Ariovistus. Proculius was thrown into chains by Ariovistus, but, on the defeat of the latter, was rescued by Caesar in person, a circumstance which, Caesar states, caused him as much pleasure as the victory itself. (Caes. B. G. i. 19, 47, 53.)

PROCLEIA (Πρόκλεια), a daughter of Laomedon, and the wife of Ceymus, by whom she became the mother of Tennes and Hemithae. (Paus. x. 14. § 2; Teetz. ad Lyc. 292.)

PROCLES. 1. One of the twin sons of Aristodemus, who, according to the tradition respecting the Dorian conquest of Peleponnesus, on the death of their father, inherited jointly his share of the conquered territory, and became the ancestor of the two royal families of Sparta. Procles was usually regarded as the younger of the two brothers. The line of kings descended from him was called, after his son or grandson Eurypon, the Euryponidae. (Herod. viii. 191, vi. 51, &c.; Paus. iv. 1. § 7.)

2. Tyrant of Epidaurus, the father of Lysias or Melissa, the wife of Periander. Having revealed to the son of the latter the secret of his mother's death (ΠΡΙΑΝΔΡΕΩΣ), he incurred the imitable resentment of Periander, who attacked and captured Epidaurus, and took Procles prisoner. (Herod. iii. 50—52; Paus. ii. 28. § 6.)

3. The son of Pitryeus, was the leader of the Ionians who settled in the island of Samos. He was an Epidaurian by birth, and led with him a considerable number of Epidaurian exiles. Androcles and the Ephesians attacked Procles and his son Leogorus, who shared the royal power with him, and expelled them. (Paus. vii. 4. § 2.)

4. A descendant of Demaratus, king of Sparta, from whom, together with Eurysthenes, who was apparently his brother, he inherited the dominion of Elisernon and Teuthrania, in Asis Minor. He was among the Greeks who accompanied the younger Cyrus in his expedition against his brother, and is mentioned more than once by Xenophon (Anab. ii. 1. § 8, 2. § 1, 7, 8, 16.). He returned safe home; for at the time of the expedition of Thimbron into Asia Minor (v. c. 399) he and Eurytheneus were still governing their little principality, and readily attached themselves to the Lacedaemonian commander. (Xen. Helen. ii. 1. § 8.)

PROCLES, a distinguished Greek medallist, whose name appears on the coins of Naxos and of Catana. The name was first discovered on an extremely rare coin of Naxos, where it is engraved on the plinth of a statue of Silenus, which forms the reverse of the coin, in characters so fine as to require a strong lens to decipher them. There remained, however, a possibility of doubt whether the name was that of the engraver of the medal, or that of the maker of the original statue itself. This doubt has been fully set at rest by the discovery of the same name on a splendid medal of Catana, in this collection of the Duc de Luynes. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schoern, p. 93, with an engraving at the head of M. Raoul-Rochette's Preface.)

PROCLUS (Πρὸκλες), historical. I. Prefect of the city under Theodosius the Great. He was put to death in the tenth year of his reign. An epigram on the pedestal of an obelisk at Constantinople records his success in setting the obelisk upright. (Ant. Grac. iv. 17.) A Latin translation of the epigram by Hugo Grotius is given by Fabricius (Bibl. Grac. vol. ix. p. 368).

2. Surnamed Ονομασίος, according to some authorities (Theophanes, p. 140; Cedrenus, p. 298), predicted the death of the emperor Anastasius. It appears to be this Proclus of whom Zonaras (Anam. xiv. p. 55) relates that he set on fire the fleet of Vitalianus, who was in arms against Anastasius, by means of mirrors. Other accounts (Chron. Jann. Malalae, vi. p. 126) say that it was by means, not of mirrors, but of sulphur, that he effected this. This story has sometimes been erroneously referred to Proclus Diadochus (Fabric. Bibl. Grac. vol. ix. p. 370). (C. P. M.)

PROCLUS (Πρὸκλες), literary. I. Euthychnus Proclus, a grammarian who flourished in the 2nd century, born at Sica in Africa. He was the instructor of M. Antoninus (Jul. Capit. Vit. Ant. c. 2.). It is probably this Proclus who is mentioned by Trebellius Pollio (Aenul. Tyr.) as the most learned grammarian of his age. He was created consul by Antoninus (Fabric. Bibl. Grac. vol. ix. p. 365).

2. Or Proculus, son of Themison, held the office of hierophant at Laodicea in Syria. He wrote, according to Suidas, the following works:—1. Θεολογία. 2. Εἰς τὴν πατὴρ ημῶν τῆς Παναθήναιας μάθησιν. 3. Εἰς τὰ χρύσα ἐπτ. 4. Εἰς τὴν Νικομάχου Πολλίου τῆς ἐρωτήματικής, and some geometrical treatises.

3. Surnamed Μαλλώτης, a Stoic philosopher, a native of Cilicia. He was, according to Suidas (s. v.), the author of ὑπόμνημα τῶν Διόγενος σωφρομάτων, and a treatise against the Epicureans. It is probably this Proclus who is mentioned by Proclus Diadochus (in Tim. p. 160).

4. Or Proclus, a follower of Montanus, from whom a sect of heretics were called Procliani, who were deemed bad enough to require rebaptizing, if they returned to the church (Fabric. Bibli. Grac. ix. p. 366.).

5. A native of Naurcratis in Egypt. He was a man of distinction in his native city, but in consequence of the civil commotions there removed, while still young, to Athens. There he placed himself under the instructions of Adrius, and afterwards himself taught eloquence, and had Philostratus as one of his pupils. He possessed several houses in and near Athens, and imported considerable quantities of merchandise from Egypt, which he disposed of wholesale to the ordinary vendors. After the death of his wife and son he took a concubine, to whom he entirely surrendered the control of his household, and in consequence of her mismanagement, reapèd considerable discredit. It was his practice, if any one paid down 100 drachmae at once, to allow him admission to all his lectures. He also had a library, of which he allowed his pupils to make use. In the style of his discourses he imitated Hippias and Gorgias. He was remarkable for the tenacity of his memory, which he retained even in extreme old age. (Philipstr. Vit. Procl. p. 602, &c. ed. Olearius.)

6. Surnamed Διδάσκαλος (the successor), from his being regarded as the genuine successor of Plato in doctrine, was one of the most celebrated teachers of the Neoplatonic school. (Marin. c. 10. In some MSS. he is styled Διδάσκαλος Πλατανικός.) He was of Lycian origin, the son of Patricius and Marcella, who belonged to the city of Xanthus, which Proclus himself regarded as his native place. According, however, to the distinct statement of Marinus (Vit. Procl. c. 6) he was born at Byzantium, on the 8th of February, a. D. 412, as is clear from the data furnished by his horoscope, which Marinus has preserved. The earlier period of his life was spent at Xanthus. When still very young, he was distinguished by his remarkable eagerness for study, to which Marinus believes him to have been urged by Athena herself, who appeared to him in a vision. Such watchful care, indeed, did the gods, according to that writer, take of Proclus, that he was pernaturally cured of a dangerous malady in his youth by Apollo who appeared in his own person for the purpose. Statements like this indicate how large an abatement must be made in the extravagant account which Marinus gives of the precocity and progress of Proclus. From Xanthus he removed, while still young, to Alexandria, where his studies were conducted chiefly under the guidance of the rhetorician Leonas, who received him into his family, and treated him as though he had been his own son. Through him Proclus was introduced to the leading men and the most distinguished scholars of Alexandria, whose friendship he speedily secured by his abilities, character, and manners. He studied grammar under Orion. [Orion.] He also applied himself to learn the cursive language of the example of his father, to devote himself to the study of jurisprudence. Leonas having occasion to make a journey to Byzantium, took young Proclus with him, who eagerly embraced the opportunity of continuing his studies. On his return to Alexandria, Proclus abandoned rhetoric and law for the study of philosophy, in which his instructor was Olympiodorus. He also learnt ma-themes from Hero. Whether from the confusion of his doctrines, or the indistinctness of his mode of expounding them, Olympiodorus was rarely understood by his disciples. Proclus, by his extraordinary powers of apprehension and memory, was able, after the lectures, to repeat them almost verbatim to his fellow-pupils. He also with great ease, according to Marinus, learnt by heart the philosophical treatises of Aristotle. Olympiodorus was so delighted with him, that he offered him his daughter in marriage. Becoming at last dissatisfied with the instruction to be obtained at Alexandria, Proclus removed to Athens, where he was received by a fellow-countryman of the name of Nicolas. By Syrianus, with whom he formed an acquaintance, he was introduced to Plutarchus, the son of Nestorius, who was charmed with the aptitude and zeal displayed by so young a man (he was at the time not 20 years of age), so that though very old, he addressed himself to the task of instructing the young aspirant, and read with him Aristotle's treatises and Aristophanes' religious plays. Proclus even took him to reside with him, and termed him his son. Plutarchus at his death commended Proclus to the care of his successor Syrianus, who in his turn regarded him rather as a helper and ally in his philosophical pursuits, than as a disciple, and took him to cultivate with him the ascetic system of life, which was becoming the practice of the school; and soon selected him as his future successor. After a sufficient foundation had been laid by the study of Aristotle, Proclus was initiated into the philosophy of Plato and the mystic theology of the school. By his intense application and unwearied diligence, he achieved such rapid progress, that by his 28th year he had written his commentary on the Timaeus of Plato, as well as many other treatises. On the death of Syrianus he succeeded him, and inherited from him the house in which he resided and taught. The income which he derived from his school seems to have been considerable. (Note, p. 658.) He also found time to take part in public affairs, giving his advice on important occasions, and, by precept and example, endeavouring to guide the conduct of the leading men. Whether it was that his interference in this way provoked hostility, or (as Ritter, vol. iv. p. 658 believes) that his eager attachment to, and diligent observance of heathen practices had drawn down upon him the suspicion of violating the laws of the Christian emperors, Proclus was compelled to quit Athens for a time; he went to Asia, where he had the opportunity of making himself better acquainted with the mystic rites of the East. He himself compiled a collection of the Chaldaean oracles, on which he laboured for five years. After a year's absence, he came back to Athens. After his return he proceeded more circumspectly in his religious observances, concealing them even from his disciples, for which purpose, Marinus reports, his house was conveniently situated. The profounder secrets of his philosophy he proclaimed only to his most confidential disciples, in meetings with respect to which it appears secrecy was enjoined (Ἀγραφοὶ συνώσται). Marinus records, with intense admiration, the perfection to which he attained in all virtues. His ascetic temper led him to decline the numerous advantageous matrimonial connections that were offered to him; but towards all his friends he exhibited the greatest humanity, watchful
As a philosopher he enjoyed the highest celebrity among his contemporaries and successors. Marinus does not scruple to call him absolutely inspired, and to affirm that when he uttered his profound dogmas his countenance shone with a preternatural light. Besides his other philosophical attainments he was a distinguished mathematician, astronomer and grammarian. Cousin considers that all the philosophical myths which ever emanated from the great thinkers of Greece, Orpheus, Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Plotinus, &c. were concentrated in and re-emitted by Proclus (Proef. p. xxvi.). Such laudation is extravagant and absurd. Proclus was a fanciful speculator, but nothing more, though the vagueness and incomprehensibility of his system may have led some moderns to imagine that they were interpreting Proclus when they were only giving utterance to their own vague speculations. That Proclus, with all his profundity, was utterly destitute of good sense, may be gathered from what Marinus tells of him, that he used to say that, if he could have his way, he would destroy all the writings that were extant, except the oracles and the Timeaus of Plato; as indeed scarcely any other impression is left by the whole life which Marinus has written of him. That this want of good sense characterised the school generally is clear from the fact that as the successor of Proclus they could tolerate so very silly a person as Marinus.

In the writings of Proclus there is a great effort to give an appearance (and it is nothing more) of strict logical connection to the system developed in them, that form being in his view superior to the methods of symbols and images. He professed that his design was not to bring forward views of his own, but simply to expound Plato, in doing which he proceeded on the idea that everything in Plato must be brought into accordance with the mystical theology of Orpheus. He wrote a separate work on the coincidence of the doctrines of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Plato. It was in many respects a paragon in that it endeavoured to blend together the logical method of Aristotle and the fanciful speculations of Neoplatonic mysticism. Where reasoning fails him, he takes refuge in the παρασκηνικά of Plotinus, which is superior to knowledge, conducting us to the operations of theurgy, which transcends all human wisdom, and comprises within itself all the advantages of divinations, purifications, initiations, and all the activities of divine inspiration. Through it we are united with the primal unity, in which every motion and energy of our souls comes to rest. It is this principle which unites not only men with gods, but the gods with each other, and with the one,—the good, which is of all things the most credible.

Proclus held, in all its leading features, the doctrine of emanations from one ultimate, primal principle of all things, the absolute unity, towards union with which again all things strive. This union he did not, like Plotinus, conceive to be effected by means of pure reason, as even things destitute of reason and energy participate in it, purely as the result of their subsistence (Πραπίσις, Thol. Plat. i. 25, ii. 1, 4). In some unaccountable way, therefore, he must have conceived the παρασκηνικά, by which he represents this union as being effected, as something which did not involve rational or thinking activity. All inferior existences are connected with the highest only through the intermediate ones, and can return to the higher only through that which is intermediate. Every multitude, in a certain way, partakes of unity, and everything which becomes one, becomes so by partaking of the one. (Inst. Theol. 3.) Every particular is a union of the one and the many: that which unites the one and the many is nothing else than the pure, absolute one—the essential one, which makes every thing else partake of unity.

Proclus argued that there is either one principium, or many principia. If the latter, the principium must be either finite or infinite in number. If infinite, what is derived from them must be infinite, so that we should have a double infinite, or else, finite. But the finite can be derived only from the finite, so that the principium must be finite in number. There would then be a definite number of them. But number presupposes unity. Unity is therefore the principium of principia, and the cause of the finite multiplicity and of the being of all things. (Thol. Plat. ii. 1.) There is therefore one principium which is incorporeal, for the corporeal consists of parts, and the incorporeal is unchangeable, for every thing that moves, moves towards some object or end, which it seeks after. If the principium were moveable it must be in want of the good, and there must be something desirable outside it. But this is impossible, for the principium has need of nothing, and is itself the end towards which everything else strives. The principium, or first cause of all things, is superior to all actual being (αὐτὸς), and separated from it, and cannot even have it as an attribute. (l. c.) The absolutely one is not an object of cognition to any existing thing, nor can it be named (l. c. p. 95). But in contemplating the emanation of things from the one and their return into it we arrive at two words, the good, and the one, of which the first is analogical and positive, the latter negative only (l. c. p. 96). The absolutely one has produced not only earth and heaven, but all the gods which are above the world and in the world; it is the god of all gods, the unity of all unities (l. c. ii. p. 110). Everything which is perfect strives to produce something else, the full seeks to impart its fulness. Still more must this be the case with the absolute good, though in connection with that we must not conceive of any creative power or energy, for that would be to make the One imperfect and not simple, not fruitful through its very perfection (l. c. p. 101). Every emanation is less perfect than that from which it emanates (Inst. Theol. 7), but has a certain similarity with it, and, so far as this similarity goes, remains in it, departing from it so far as it is unlike, but as far as possible being one with it, and remaining in it (Inst. Theol. 31). What is produced from the absolutely one is produced as unity, or of the nature of unity. Thus the first produced things are independent unities (αὐτοτε-λείς εἰδικές). Of these independent unities some are simple, others more composite. The nearer the unities are to the absolute unity the simpler they are, but the greater is the sphere of their operation and their productive power. Thus out of unity there arises a multitude of things which depart farther and farther from the simplicity of the absolute one; and as the producing power diminishes, it introduces more and more conditions into things, while it diminishes their universality and simplicity. His whole system of emanations seems in fact to be a realization of the logical subordination of ideas. The simplest ideas which are contained in those which are composite being regarded by him as the principles of things.

The emanations of Proclus proceeded in a curious triadic manner. That which precedes all power, and emanates immediately from the primal cause of all things, is limit. The power or force which produces existence is infinity (Theol. Plat. iii. p. 133). From these two principia arises a third, a compound of the two—substance (as a sort of genus of all substances), that which in itself is absolutely an existing thing and nothing more (i.e. p. 133). Everything according to Proclus, contains in itself being (οὐδεία), life (ζωή), and intelligence (νοὴς). The life is the centre of the thing, for it is both an object of thought and exists. The intelligence is the limit of the thing, for the intellect (νοὴς) is in that which is the object of intellect (νοητόν), and the latter in the former; but the intellect or thought exists in the thing thought of objectively, and the thing thought of exists in the intellect productively (νοεῖν). This accordingly is the first triad, limit, infinitude, and the compound of the two. Of these the first—the limit—is the deity who advances to the extreme verge of the conceivable from the inconceivable, primal deity, measuring and defining all things, and establishes the paternal, concatenating and immaculate race of gods. The infinite is the inexhaustible power of this deity. The “mixed” is the first and highest world of gods, which in a concealed manner comprehends everything within itself.

Out of this first triad springs the second. As the first of the unities produces the highest existing thing, the intermediate unity produces the intermediate existing thing, in which there is something first—unity, divinity, reality; something intermediate—power; and something last—the existence in the second grade, conceivable life (νοητή ἄλησις); for there is in everything which is the object of thought, being (τά ἑλει), life (τά ζωή), and thought (τά νοεῖν). The third of the unities, the “mixed,” produces the third triad, in which the intelligence or thinking power (νο诐ς) attains to its subsistence. This thinking power is the limit and completion of everything which can be the object of thought. The first triad contains the principle of union,—the second of multiplicity and increase by means of continuous motion or life, for motion is a species of life,—the third, the principle of the separation of the manifold, and of formation and limitation.

In his treatise on Providence and Fate, Proclus seeks to explain the difference between the two, and to show that the second is subordinate to the first in such a manner that freedom is consistent with it. Both providence and fate are causes, the first the cause of all good, the second the cause of all connection (and connection as cause and effect). There are three sorts of things, some whose operation is as eternal as their substance, others whose substance does not exist, but is perpetually coming into existence, and, between these, things whose substance is eternal, but whose operation takes place in time. Proclus names these three kinds intellectual, animal and corporeal. The last alone are subjected to fate, which is identical with nature and is itself subject to providence, which is nothing else than the deity himself. The corporeal part of man is entirely subject to fate. The soul, as regards its substance, is superior to fate; as regards its operation, sometimes (referring to those operations which require corporeal organs and motions) beneath, sometimes superior to fate, and so forms the bond of connection between intellectual and corporeal existence. The freedom of the soul consists in its living according to virtue, for this alone does not involve servitude. Wickedness on the other hand is want of power, and by it the soul is subjected to fate, and is compelled to serve all that ministers to or hinders the gratification of the desires. Proclus strongly distinguished the soul from that which is material, pointing out its reflective power as a mark of difference; the corporeal not being able to turn back in that way upon itself, owing to its consisting of separable parts. He founded on this also an argument for the immortality of the soul. (Inst. Theol. 15.) Some of the topics touched upon in this treatise are carried out still further in the essay On Ten Questions about Providence.

In the treatise on the origin of evil (πεῖρα τῆς τῶν κακῶν ὑποτάσσεως), Proclus endeavours to show that evil does not originate with God, or with the daemons, or with matter. Evil is the consequence of a weakness, the absence of some power. As with the total absence of all power activity would be annihilated, there cannot be any total, unmixed evil. The good has one definite, eternal, universally operating cause, namely God. The causes of evil are manifold, indefinite, and not subject to rule. Evil has not an original, but only a derivative existence.

The following works of Proclus are still extant:—1. Εἰς τήν Πλατωνᾶν Θεολογίαν, in six books. 2. Στοιχεῖων Θεολογία (Institutio Theologica). This treatise was first published in the Latin translation of Franciscus Patricius. The Greek text, with the translation of Aem. Portus, is appended to the edition of the last-mentioned work, published at Hamburgh in 1618. 3. A commentary on the First Alcibiades of Plato. 4. A commentary on the Timaeus of Plato. Of this commentary on the Timaeus five books remain, but they only treat of about a third of the dialogue. It is appended to the first Basle edition of Plato. 5. Various notes on the Politeia of Plato, printed in the same edition of Plato as the last-mentioned work. 6. A commentary on the Parmenides of Plato, published in Stullbaum’s edition of that dialogue. 7. Portions of a commentary on the Cratylus of Plato, edited by Beisondo, Lips. 1820. 8. A paraphrase of various different parts of the treatise πεῖραι τῆς τεταρταῖας τομής of Ptolemaeus: first published, with a preface, by Melanchthon, at Basle, 1534. 9. A treatise on motion (πεῖρα κινήσεως), a sort of compendium of the last five books of Aristotle’s treatise πεῖραι φυσικής ἀκρόασεως. 10. Τοποτελείως τῶν ἀστρονομικῶν ὑπότασεως (Basle, 1520). 11. Σφαιρά, frequently appended to the works of the ancient astronomers. There are also several separate editions of it. 12. A commentary on the first book of Euclid’s elements (attached to various editions of the text of Euclid). 13. A commentary on the Εὐγένεικα καὶ θεματαί of Hesiod, in a somewhat mutilated form (Τευτονικὰ εἰς τὰ Ἡσιόδου ἕγερν καὶ θέματα), first published at Venice in 1537. A better edition is that by Hesiodus (Leyden, 1603). 14. Χρησκομεθέα γραμματική, or rather some

One of the most celebrated of his letters (περὶ πίστεως) was written in A. D. 455, when the bishops of Armenia applied to him for his opinion on certain propositions which had been disseminated in their dioceses, and were attributed to Theodorus of Mopsuestia. The discussion that ensued with respect to these propositions made a considerable stir in the East.

Proclus bestowed a great deal of pains upon his style, which is terse and sententious, but is crowded with antitheses and rhetorical points, and betrays a laboured endeavour to reiterate the same sentiment in every possible variety of form. From the quotations of subsequent authors, it appears that several of the writings of Proclus are lost.

The Platonic Theology of Proclus Diadochus has sometimes been erroneously described as a theological work of St. Proclus. The 24th of October is the day consecrated to the memory of St. Proclus by the Greek church. [C.P.M.]

PROCLUS (Πρώκλος), one of the eminent artists in mosaic who flourished in the Augustan age. His name occurs on two inscriptions found at Peirinthus, from one of which we learn that he adorned the temple of Fortune in that city, and that the Alexandrian merchants, who frequented the city, erected a statue in honour of him. The second inscription is the epitaph of a mosaic artist, who is said in it to have left a son, his associate and equal in the art; from which it would seem probable that both father and son were named Proclus. The second inscription, as restored, runs thus:

Πάρευς ἐν τολμήσει τέχνην ἐφέτοι πρὸ πάντων ψυχοθήκῃ, ἄρας Παλλάδος εὐφράμος, νικοῦντων βουλής συνεδρίων Πρώκλον ἱερέως τοι ἐνεκτείνετο ὁδόν καθνυκτὸν τούτῃ τάφρῳ λαξίν.

PROCOPIUS.

PROCLUS (Πρὸκλος), a physician, probably a native of Rhegium, among the Bruttii in Italy. He belonged to the medical sect of the Methodici (Galien, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 52, Intro. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 684), and must have lived about the end of the first century after Christ, as he was junior to Theessalus, and senior to Galen. He is no doubt the same physician who is called Proclus in our present editions of Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. iii. 8, p. 469), where he is said to have been one of the followers of Themison, and his opinion on the different kinds of droopy is quoted. He may also be the same person whose remedy for the gout and sciatica is mentioned by Paulus Aegineta (i.ii. 77, vii. 11, pp. 492, 661) and Joannes Actuaruis (De Meth. Med. v. 8, p. 205). [W. A. G.]

PROCLUS, LARGI'NUS, a person in Germany, who predicted that Domitian would die on a certain day. He was in consequence sent to Rome, where he was condemned to death; but as the punishment was deferred, in order that he might be executed after the fast day had passed, he escaped altogether, as Domitian died on the very day he had named. (Dion Cass. lxviii. 16; comp. Suet. Dom. 16.)

PROCNE (Ρόκρνη), a daughter of king Pandion of Athens, was the wife of Tereus, and was metamorphosed into a swallow. (Apollod. iii. 14, § 8; Thucyd. ii. 29.) [L. S.]

PROCOPIUS (Προκόπιος), Roman emperor in the East, through rebellion, from A. D. 363 to 366. According to all probability, he was a relation of the emperor Julian through Basilia, the mother of that emperor, and the second wife of Constantius Consul, who was the youngest son of Constantius Chorus. [See the genealogical table Vol. I. p. 832.] Procopius was a native of Cilicia, where he was born about A. D. 365. Constantius II. made him his secretary, and employed him in the field as tribune. The emperor Julian created him comes, and appointed him commander in Mesopotamia, but was defeated at Persia in A. D. 363. It was then said that Julian had advised him to assume the purple, or manifested a wish that he should be his successor in case he should lose his life in the projected expedition, and this saying afterwards found many believers, to the great advantage of Procopius. However, it was Jovian who succeeded Julian, in 363, and by him Procopius was charged with conducting the body of the fallen hero to Tarsus. Aware that Jovian entertained suspicions against him, or, perhaps, in order to carry out schemes which, at that period, nobody expected, Procopius went to Caesarea in Cappadocia, instead of returning to the imperial quarters. This step was sufficient to rouse the suspicions of Jovian, whatever might have been his previous disposition, and some troops were despatched to seize the fugitive, who, however, deceived his pursuers, and escaped with his family to Tauris. Afraid of being betrayed by the barbarians, he soon left that country and, returned to Asia Minor; a dangerous step, which, however, throws some light on his secret plans. During some time he wandered from place to place, and his return having been discovered by Valentinian and Valens, the successors of Jovian (364), he hid himself in the mountains, till at last he found refuge at the house of the senator Strategius, who lived near Chalcidon. Strategius became a confidant of the ambitious schemes of Procopius, who found further adherents among the numerous adversaries of Valens in Constantinople, whither the fugitive general often proceeded on secret visits. The eunuch Eugenius became one of the principal promoters of the plans of Procopius, which were now manifestly those of depositing Valens, and making himself master of the East. The plot broke out in 365, and owing to his numerous partisans and his own artifices, the people of Constantinople proclaimed him emperor on the 26th of September of that year. The emperor Valens was at that period staying at Caesarea in Cappadocia, but was soon informed of the rebellion, and prepared for effectual resistance. Meanwhile, Procopius set out for Asia Minor with a well-disciplined army, advanced as far as the Sangarius, and, through a bold stratagem, caused an imperial body, which defended the passage of that river, to desert their master, and join his own army. However, Valens advanced in his turn, and laid siege to Chalcidon, but was defeated under its walls, and obliged to retreat into Pphygia; Marcellus, a general of Procopius, took the important town of Cyzicus, and Procopius became master of Byzantium; a series of successes which turned his mind, made him haughty, and caused him more adversaries than adherents. The war was renewed with vigour in the spring of the following year 366, but to the great disadvantage of Procopius, whose army, commanded by the fugitive Persian prince, Hormisidas, was totally defeated by the celebrated general Arbition. Soon afterwards, on the 27th of May, 366, another battle was fought at Nacolia, in Pphygia, the two rivals commanding their armies in person, and it ended in the rout of the rebels. Procopius fled, accompanied by a few attendants, with whom he wandered some days in the mountains, when they treacherously seized him, and delivered him into the hands of Valens, by whose order he was immediately put to death. Socrates says that Procopius suffered death by being tied to two trees forcibly bent together, which, on snapping asunder, tore the body of the unfortunate man to pieces. The cruel conduct of Valens against the partisans of Procopius belongs to the history of the former. There are gold and silver coins of Procopius extant, the former being extremely rare, according to Eckhel. (Anm. Marc. xxvi. 6; Zosim. lib. iv.; Themist. Orat. 7; Socrat. iv. 3, &c.; Philostorg. ix. 5; Eckhel, vol. viii. pp. 156, 157.) [W. P.]

* That is, if in Galien, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 52, we read τοῦ Ρηγίουν instead of καὶ Ρηγίουν, an alteration which is not unlikely to be a sound one, as the name of Rheginius applied to a physician is probably not to be found elsewhere.
PROCOPIUS

PROCOPIUS (Procòpiou), one of the most eminent Byzantine historians, was a native of Cæsarea in Palestine, where he was born, at the beginning of the sixth century of the Christian era. He went to Constantinople when still a young man, and there obtained so much distinction as an advocate and a professor of eloquence, that he attracted the attention of Belisarius, who appointed him, in A. D. 527, his secretary, or secretary. In this capacity Procopius accompanied the great hero on his different wars in Asia, Africa, and Italy, being frequently employed in state business of importance, or in conducting military expeditions. In the Gothic war we find him entrusted with the commissariat department, and at the head of the Byzantine navy, a post of vital importance for the success of the campaign. Procopius returned with Belisarius to Constantinople a little before 542. His eminent talents and corresponding merits were appreciated by the emperor Justinian, who conferred upon him the title of illustrius, made him a senator, and in 562 created him prefect of Constantinople. Procopius died a little before, or a little after the death of Justinian, that is, about A. D. 565, at the age of sixty and upwards, probably nearer to seventy.

Of this great historian Gibbon says, with much truth, that according to the vicissitudes of courage or servitude, of favour or disgrace, he successively composed the history, the panegyric, and the satire of his own times. It is, however, still doubtful whether Procopius actually was the author of that collection of satire and scandal which is attributed to him, under the title of "Historia Arcana" or "Anecdotes." We shall speak of it after first mentioning two other points of doubt regarding our author, the solution of which has occupied the mind and the pen of eminent scholars. First, it has been questioned whether he was a Christian or a Pagan. Space, however, will not allow us to give even the shortest account of the different opinions that have been, or are still, prevalent on that subject, and we consequently merely mention that, while Eichel and La Mothe de Vayer, both quoted below, declared him to be a Pagan, Gerard Vossius, Fabricius, Harles, and others thought that he was a Christian. Indeed, Procopius frequently speaks of faith, either Christian or Pagan, in a manner inconsistent with his own words, so as fully to justify doubts respecting his creed. Assemani and Cave take a middle course. The latter thinks that he was neither Christian nor Pagan entirely, but being somewhat of a sceptical turn of mind (or perhaps we ought to say, extremely liberal and excessively tolerant in religious matters) he used to despise the superstitions of the Pagans in his conversations with Christians, and would admit, when in company with Pagans, that there was also truth without the sphere of Christianity. We may add that Justinian, who was a bigoted Christian, whether in orthodoxy or heterodoxy, would probably not have permitted a Pagan to discharge the functions of a senator, or a prefect of Constantinople. That other doubtful point alluded to above is of a very strange description. For, since Procopius has given a most graphic description of the plague which devastated Constantinople in 543, rendering his narrative still more lucid and scientifically descriptive, by entering into medical details concerning the symptoms of the disease, &c., it has been thought by some that he was a professional medical man. He thus figures as a physician in several French medical dictionaries. But this is going too far. Procopius betrays, in all his works, a vast deal of miscellaneous knowledge, and while describing the plague, probably derived some additional information from medical friends, which, however, no more makes him a physician, than his work on the Buildings of Justinian constitutes him a professional architect.

As an historian Procopius deserves great praise. Many of his contemporaries, as well as writers who lived a short time after him, speak of him with unreserved esteem. His style is good, formed upon classic models, often elegant, and generally plastic and full of vigour. The general impression of his writings is that of a man who has thought much and seen much, from a position at the highest quarters of information. Procopius is the principal historian for the eventful reign of Justinian.

Among the works of Procopius the most important is:—1. Historia, in 8 books; viz, two On the Persian War, containing the period from A. D. 400—553, and treating more fully of the author's own times; two On the War with the Vandals, from A. D. 435—549; four On the Gothic War, or properly speaking, only three books, the fourth (eighth) being a sort of supplement containing various matters, and going down to the beginning of A. D. 553. It was continued by Agathias till 555. The work is extremely interesting; the descriptions of the habits, &c. of the barbarians are faithful and masterly done. Photius gives an analysis of the first two books, and Agathias, the continuator of Procopius, gives an analysis of all the eight books, in the preface to his History. 2. Kríar',a, Libri VI. de Aedificiis conditis vel restoratis aepiscopo Justiniano. A work equally interesting and valuable in its kind, though apparently too much seasoned with flattery of the emperor. Gibbon thinks that Procopius was afraid of having offended the pride of Justinian, through too faithful a narrative of glorious events in which the emperor had no personal share, and that he subsequently wrote on the splendid buildings of his master, in order to regain his favour. 3. Ανεδυον, Historia Arcana, a collection of anecdotes, some of them witty and pleasant, but others extremely indecent and sometimes absurd, reflecting upon Justinian, the empress Theodora, Belisarius, and other eminent persons. It is a complete Chronique Scandaluse of the court of Constantinople, from A. D. 549 till 562. The authorship of Procopius has been much doubted, partly because his contemporaries do not mention it, and partly because such a production can hardly be reconciled with the character of a grave historian and statesman. However, the first writer who attributed this work to Procopius, namely Suidas (s. v. Procòpiou), does so in a very positive manner, and adds that it had until then not been issued for circulation, which, indeed, it was not fit for. Montesquieu and Gibbon both give credit to the Anecdotes, and do not doubt the authorship of Procopius.

On the names, probably extracts from the "History," which is rather overstocked with harangues and speeches.

Editions:—1. Historia. Latin Versions. The first of these was published under the title De Bello Italiaico adversus Gothos gesto, lib. iv. Foligno, 1470, fol., Vcen. 1471, fol., by Leonardo Artelio, or Leonardo Bruni of Arezzo, who, thinking that he had the only existing MS. of the work, was dis-

3. Historia Arcana. Graece et Latine, cum Notis N. Alemanni, Lyon, 1623, fol.; idem, Cologne, 1659, fol.; a Joann. Eicheho, Helsmatdt, 1654, 4to.; Excerpta, by Hugo Grotius, in his work quoted above. The famous Christian Thomasius intended to make a new edition, but it did not appear. There is an English translation, 1674, 8vo.; a German, by Paul Reinhard, Erlangen and Leipzig, 1753, 8vo.; and there are French and Italian versions.

4. Orationes, Basel, 1538, 8vo.

There are two collections of the Works of Procopius, with Latin versions, notes, &c.; the first by Claude Malret, Paris, 2 vols. fol. 1662, 1663, which is not very carefully edited, and was badly reprinted at Venice, 1729, fol.; and the second in the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines, by Dindorf, Bonn, 3 vols. 8vo., 1835—1838; it contains Allemann's valuable notes on the Historia Arcana, an index, and a text revised with great care. (Fabrici. Bibl. Gracc. vol. vii. p. 553, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 510; Hanckius, Script. Byzant.; La Mothe de Vayer, Jugemens sur les Historiens Grecs, in the 8th vol. of his Oeuvres. [W. P.])

PROCRIS (Πρόκρης), a daughter of Erechtheus in Athens, was married to Cephalus (Apollod. iii. 15. § 2; comp. CEPHALUS). A second Procris was a daughter of Theseus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

PROCURSTS (Προκορθύττας), that is, "the Stretcher," is a surname of the famous robber Polyphemon or Damastis. He used to force all the strangers that fell into his hands into a bed which was either too small or too large, and in which he had their limbs stretched by force until they died. He was slain by Theseus, on the Cepheus in Attica; the bed of Procrustes is used proverbially even at the present day. (Plut. The. 11; Paus. i. 38. § 5; Ov. Met. vii. 436.)

C. PROCULEIUS, a Roman eques, one of the friends of Octavian, was sent by the latter, after the victory at Actium, to Antony and Cleopatra.
in Liguria. Having entered upon the career of a soldier, he served with great distinction in the Roman legions, and frequently held the command of a tribe. In the year A. D. 280, he was persuaded by a bold ambitious wife to place himself at the head of the discontented inhabitants of Lyons, and to assume the purple. During the brief period of his sway, he achieved a victory over the Alemani; but having been attacked and routed by Probus, he sought refuge among the Franks, by whom he was delivered up to death. (Vopisc. Vita Proculi in Script. Hist. Aug.) [W. R.]

PRO'CULUS, the jurist. The fact that Proclus gave his name to the school or sect (Proculiani or Proculianani, as the name is also written), which was opposed to that of the Sabiniiani, shows that he was a jurist of note. He was a contemporary of Nerva the son [Nerva]. Proclus is often cited, and there are 37 extracts from him in the Digest from his eight books of Epitome. He is the second jurist in order of time who is excerpted in the Digest. Labeo is the first. According to the Florentine Index, he wrote eight books of Epitome; but he wrote at least eleven books. (Dig. 18, tit. 1, s. 69.) He appears also to have written notes on Labeo.

It is inferred that Proclus was named Sempronius Proclus, from the case put in the Digest (31a. 47); but in that passage Sempronius Proclus asks the opinion of his grandson (nepos), whose name, as the answer shows, was Proclus. If he was a daughter's son, his name would not necessarily be Sempronius. Proclus is called "non levis juris auctor" by the Divi Fratres (Dig. 37, tit. 14, s. 17.) Some writers suppose that Proclus is the Licius Proclus, who was Praefectus Praetorio under Otho. (Tacit. Hist. i. 46, 82, ii. 39, &c.) Lampridius (Alex. Severus, 66) makes Proclus one of the consiliarii of Alexander Severus; but that is not the only mistake which Lampridius commits in that passage. (Zimmerm, Geschichte des Röm. Rechts. 2d ed.)

PRO'CULUS, a physician. [Proclus.]

PRO'CULUS, ACER'RONIUS. [ACERRONIUS.]

PRO'CULUS, C. AR'TO'RIUS, a Roman grammarian, who erroneously gave the name of figurae to tropi. (Quintil. ix. 1, init.) This writer is frequently quoted by Festus, under the simple name of Artorius. (Festus, pp. 225, 352, 364, ed. Müller.)

PRO'CULUS, BA'RRIUS, one of the soldiers whom Otho employed to corrupt the fidelity of Galba's troops, when he was aspiring to the empire. (Tac. Hist. i. 25; Plut. Gall. 24.)

PRO'CULUS, CER'VARIUS, was privy to the conspiracy of Piso against Nero, but, in consequence of his turning informer and accusing Fenius Rufus, he obtained his pardon. (Tac. Ann. xv. 50, 66, 71.)

PRO'CULUS, CE'STIUS. [CESTIUS, No. 4.]

PRO'CULUS, CO'CECIUS, one of the speculatores (see Dict. of Ant. p. 508, b., 2d ed.) of the emperor Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 24.)

PRO'CULUS, FLAV'VIUS, a Roman eques in the reign of the emperor Claudius. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 2. s. 8.)

PRO'CULUS, JU'LIUS. 1. Is related in the legend of Romulus to have informed the sorrowing Roman people, after the strange departure of their king from the world, that Romulus had descended from heaven and appeared to him, bidding him tell the people to honour him in future as a god under the name of Quirinus. (Liv. i. 16; Ov. Fast. ii. 499, &c.; Flor. i. 1; Lactant. i. 15; Dion Cass. liv. 46.)

2. A friend of Martial. (Mart. i. 71.)

3. Slain by Commodus in Asia. (Lamprid. Commod. 7.)

PRO'CULUS, LIC'I'NIUS, was one of Otho's friends, and was advanced by him to the dignity of praefect of the praetorian cohorts. Otho placed more confidence in him than in any of his other generals, and he maintained his influence with the emperor by calumniating those who had more virtue than himself. His want of experience in war and his evil counsels hastened Otho's fall. He escaped with his life after the defeat at Bedriacum, and obtained his pardon from Vitellius by pleading that he had purposely betrayed his master. (Tac. Hist. i. 46, 82, 87, ii. 33, 39, 44, 60.)

PRO'CULUS, C. PLA'UTIUS, consul b. c. 358, with C. Fabius Ambustus, carried on war with the Hernici, whom he conquered, and obtained in consequence the honour of the champio. Two years afterwards, b. c. 356, he was named magister equitum by the dictator C. Marcus Rutulus. Rutulus was the first plebeian dictator, and Proclus the first plebeian magister equitum. (Liv. vii. 12, 15, 17.)

PRO'CULUS, SCRIBO'NIUS. 1. A senator, who was born to pieces by the senators in the senate-house, because Proteogenes, the instrument of Caligula's cruelties, exclaimed, as Proclus was going to salute him, "Do you, who hate the emperor so much, venture to salute me?" (Dion Cass. ix. 26; comp. Suet. Cal. 28.)

2. The brother of Scribonius Rufus. These brothers were distinguished by their wealth and their friendship for one another, and had governed the two Germanies at the same time. Having been summoned by Nero to Greece, they were accused on their arrival, and, as no opportunity was afforded them of clearing themselves of the charges brought against them, they put an end to their own lives (Dion Cass. lxi. 17). It is of these two brothers, Scribonius Proclus and Scribonius Rufus, that Tacitus speaks, calling them simply "Scribonii fratres." We learn from him that Pactus Africa- nus was supposed to have denounced them to Nero (Tac. Ann. xiii. 48, Hist. iv. 41). These brothers were probably the sons of the preceding Scribonius Proclus. (See Reimarvs, ad Dion Cass. l. c.)

PRO'CULUS, TIT'IUS, put to death in A. D. 48, because he had been privy to the adulteries of Silvia and Messalina. (Tac. Ann. xi. 35.)

PRO'CULUS, VEC'TIUS, the step-father (viri- tricuvs) of the wife of the younger Pliny (Plin. Ep. ix. 12, § 13.) Pliny addresses one of his letters (iii. 15) to a certain Proclus, who may perhaps be the same person as this Vectius Proclus.

PRO'CULUS, VOL'SIUS, had been one of the instruments employed by Nero in the murder of his mother, and was a commander of one of the ships in the fleet off the Campanian coast, when the conspiracy of Piso against Nero was formed. From a woman of the name of Epichris, he obtained some information respecting the plot, which he straightway communicated to Nero. (Tac. Ann. xv. 51, 57.)

PRO'DICUS (PRO'DIKOS), was a native of Iulis in the island of Ceos, the birthplace of Simonides.
PRODICUS.

(Plat. Protag. p. 316, d.; Suid. s. v.), whom he is described as having imitated (Plat. Prot. pp. 339, c., 340, e., 341, b.), and with whom he was without doubt acquainted, as the poet did not die till the 79th, or the beginning of the 80th Olympiad. Prodicus came frequently to Athens for the purpose of transacting business on behalf of his native city, and even attained admiration in the senate as an orator (Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 292, comp. Philos. Vit. Soph. 1023, ellen), although he showed not much desire to become an orator. Apology has introduced, the sounds of the lutes, and virtue was placed, in the dialogue of Plato, which is placed first (Plat. Protag. p. 316, a.; Philol. l. c.). Plutarch describes him as slender and weak (Plat. an sent ger. sit Resp. c. 15); and Plato also alludes to his weakling, and a degree of effeminacy which resulted therefrom (Plat. p. 315, d.). Philostratus is the first who taxes him with luxury and avarice (l. c., comp. Welcker, Kleine Schriften, ii. p. 513, &c.). In the Protagoras of Plato, which points to the 87th Olympiad (any more exact determination is disputable) as the time at which the dialogue is supposed to take place, Prodicus is mentioned as having previously arrived in Athens. He had been brought forward in a play of Eupolis, and in the Clouds and the Birds of Aristophanes (l. 360), which belong to Ol. 89 and Ol. 91, and came frequently to Athens on public business. (Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 292.)

Still later, when Isocrates (born Ol. 86. 1.) is mentioned as his disciple (see Welcker, Kleine Schriften, p. 282, &c.), Prodidus published in first the Rheinisches Museum der Philologie, von Welcker and Nake, i. 1—39, 533—545, afterwards in F. G. Welcker's Kleine Schriften, ii. p. 392—541, and in the year of the death of Socrates, Prodicus was still living. (Plat. Apol. p. 19. c.) The dates of his birth and death cannot be determined. The statement of Suidas (s. v., comp. Schol. on Plat. de Rep. x. p. 600. c.), that he was condemned to the hemlock cup as a corruptor of the youth in Athens, sounds very suspicious (comp. Welcker, p. 582). According to the statement of Philostratus (p. 483, comp. 496, ed. Olearius), on which little more reliance can be placed, he delivered his lecture on virtue and vice in Thebes and Sparta also. The Apology of Plato unites him with Gorgias and Hippias in the statement, that into whatever city they might come, they were competent to instruct the youth. Lucian (Vit. Herod. c. 3) mentions him among those who had held lectures at Olympia. In the dialogues of Plato he is mentioned or introduced, not indeed without irony, though, as compared with the other sophists, with a certain degree of esteem. (Hipp. Maj. p. 282, Theaud. p. 151, b., Phaedo, 60, Protag. p. 341, a., Charmid. p. 163, d., Memo, p. 96, Cratyl. p. 384, b., Symp. p. 177, Euthyd. p. 305.) Aristophanes in the Clouds (l. 369) deals more indulgently with him than with Socrates; and the Xenophontic Socrates, for the purpose of combating the voluptuosity of Aristippus, borrows from the book of the wise Prodicus (Probd. σφοτος) the story of the choice of Hercules (Memor. ii. 1 § 21, &c.). This separation of Prodicus from the other sophists has been pointed out by Welcker in the above-quoted treatise (p. 400, &c.). Like Protagoras and others, Prodicus delivered lectures in return for the payment of contributions (εμπειρηματα— Xen. Mem. ii. 1 § 21, comp. Philostr. p. 492; Diog. laert, ix. a., comp. Proclus, Porphyr. Plat. Prot. p. 314, b.) of from half a drachma to 50 drachmai, probably according as the hearers limited themselves to a single lecture, or entered into an agreement for a more complete course (Arioch. 6; Cratyl. p. 384, b.; Arist. Rhet. iii. 14 § 9; Suid. s. v.; comp. Weleker, p. 414). Prodicus is said to have amassed a great amount of money (Hipp. Maj. p. 292, d.; Xen. Symp. iv. 62, l. 5; on the practice of paying for instruction and lectures, comp. again Welcker, l. c. p. 412, &c.). The assertion that he hunted after rich young men, is due to Proclus in Philostratus (p. 490). As Prodicus and others maintained with regard to themselves, that they stood equally on the confines of philosophy and politics (Euthyd. p. 305, c.), so Plato represents his instructions as chiefly ethical (Meno, p. 96, d.; comp. de Rep. x. p. 600, c.), and gives the preference to his distinction of ideas, as of those of courage, rashness, boldness, over similar attempts of other sophists (Lach. p. 197, c.). What pertained to this point was probably only contained in individual show-ornations (Diog. Laert., Philol. ii. cc.), which he usually declined. (Philos. p. 482.) Though known to Callimachus, they do not appear to have been much longer preserved. (Welcker, p. 465, &c.) In contrast with Gorgias and others, who boasted of possessing the art of making the small appear great, the great small, and of expatiating in long or short speeches, Prodicus required that the speech should be neither long nor short, but of the proper measure (Plat. Theaet. p. 267, a.; comp. Gorg. p. 449, Protag. p. 334, e., 335, b., 338, d.; Arist. Rhet. iii. 17), and it is only as associated with other sophists that he is charged with endeavouring to make the weaker cause strong by means of his rhetoric. (Cic. Brut. c. 8.) He paid especial attention to the correct use of words (Plat. Euthyd. p. 187, e., Cratyl. p. 384, b., comp. Galen. in Hippocr. de Articul. iv. p. 461. 1), and the distinction of expressions related in sense (Lach. p. 197, d., Protag. p. 340, a., 341, a., Charmid. p. 163, d., Memo, p. 75, c., comp. Themist. Orat. iv. p. 113). As disciples of Prodicus in oratory, we find mentioned the orators Tharmaneses (Aeschin. in Athens. v. p. 220, b.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. p. 360), and Isocrates (Dionys. Hal. Isoc. 1; Phot. cod. 269; comp. Welcker, p. 463, &c.). Thucydides is said to have appropriated from him his accuracy in the use of words (Marcell. Vit. Thuc. xiii., Bekk.; comp. Schol. ap. Hemsterhus. Annot. in Lucian, App. 3; Maxim. Tyr. Dissert. vii. p. 72, Davis.)

The speech on the choice of Hercules (Philos. p. 496; Xenophon, Mem. ii. 1 § 21, only quotes the αγγελια περὶ τοῦ Ἡρακλῆσ) was entitled 'Oraia. (Suid. s. v. Ὅραι and Probd.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. l. 360. Respecting the different explanations of this title, see Welcker, p. 466, &c., who refers it to the youthful bloom of Hercules.) To Hercules, as he was on the point, at his entrance on the age of youth, of deciding for one of the two paths of life, that of virtue and that of vice, there appear two women, the one of dignified beauty, adorned with purity, modesty, and discretion, the other of a voluptuous form, and meretricious look and dress. The latter promises to lead him by the most shortest road, without any toil, to the enjoyment of every pleasure. The other, while she reminds him of his progenitors and his noble nature, does not conceal from him that the gods have not granted what is really beautiful and good apart from careful and slow striving. The former seeks to deter him from the path of virtue by urging the difficulty of it; the latter calls attention to the unnatural character of enjoyment which anticipates the need of it, its want of the highest joy, that arising from noble deeds, and the consequences of a life of voluptuousness, and how she herself, honoured by gods and men, leads to all noble works, and to true well-being in all circumstances of life. Hercules decides for virtue. This outline in Xenophon probably represents, in a very abbreviated form, and with the omission of all collateral references, the leading ideas of the original, of which no fragments remain (comp. Weucker, p. 469, &c., who also shows that the amplifications in Dio Chrysostomus and Themistius belong to these rhetoricians, and are not derived from the "Horse of Prodicus, p. 488, &c. Respecting the numerous imitations of this narrative in poets, philosophers, rhetoricians, and in works of art, see, in like manner, Weucker, p. 467, &c.). In another speech, which treated of riches, and the substance of which is reproduced in the dialogue "Eretria," Prodicus had undertaken to show that the growth of wealth depends simply upon the use which is made of them, and that virtue must be learnt. (Weucker endeavours to point out the coincidence of the former doctrine with that of Socrates and Antisthenes, p. 493, &c.) Similar sentiments were expressed in Prodicus's "Praise of Agriculture" (Themist. Orat. 30, p. 349; comp. Weucker, p. 496, &c.). His views respecting the worthlessness of earthly life in different ages and callings, and how we must long after freedom from connection with the body in the heavenly and cognate aether, are found represented in the dialogue "Aaxioschus," from a lecture by Prodicus; as also his doctrine that death is not to be feared, as it affects neither the living nor the departed (comp. Stob. "Serm. xx. 35). Whether the appended arguments for immortality are borrowed from him, as Weucker (p. 500) endeavours to show, is doubtful. The god, according as personifications of the sun, moon, rivers, fountains, and whatever else contributes to the comfort of our life ( Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 52; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 42), and he is therefore, though hastily, charged with atheism (ib. 55). [Ch. A. B.] PRODORUS, one of the statuaries mentioned by Pliny as of some celebrity, but not distinguished by any of their works. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 25.) [P. S.]

PROETUS (Προετοῦς). 1. A son of Abas and Ocelea, and a twin-brother of Acrisius. In the dispute between the two brothers for the kingdom of Argos, Proetus was defeated and expelled (Paus. ii. 25. § 6). The cause of this quarrel is traced by some to the conduct of Proetus towards Danae, the daughter of Acrisius (Apollod. ii. 4. § 1), and Ovid ("Met." v. 238) represents Acrisius as expelled by Proetus, and Perseus, the grandson of Acrisius, avenges his grandfather by changing Proetus into a block of stone, by means of the head of Medusa. But according to the common tradition, Proetus, when expelled from Argos, fled to Jobates or Amphimnax in Lycia, and married his daughter Antea or Sthenoeboea ("Hom. II. vi. 160; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 630, &c.; comp. Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 48). Jobates, thereupon, restored Proetus to his kingdom by armed force. Tiryuth was taken and fortified by the Cyclopes (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 555; Paus. ii. 16. § 4), and Acrisius then shared his kingdom with his brother, surrendering to him Tiryuth, i.e. the Heraeum, Midea and the coast of Argolis (Paus. ii. 16. § 2). By his wife Proetus became the father of three daughters, Lysippe, Iphinoe, and Iphinaeus (Servius, i. 7), and Ajas, the two last Hippoete and Cyrianassa, and Asiant, V. H. iii. 42, mentions only two daughters, Elige and Celaine). When these daughters arrived at the age of maturity, they were stricken with madness, the cause of which is differently stated by different authors; some say that it was a punishment inflicted upon them by Dionysus, because they had despised his worship (Apollod. l. c.; Diosd. iv. 68), and according to others, by Hera, because they presumed to consider themselves more handsome than the goddess, or because they had stolen some of the gold of her statue (Serv. ad Virg. "Eccl." vi. 48). In this state of madness they wandered through Peloponnesus. Melampus promised to cure them, if Proetus would give him one third of his kingdom. As Proetus refused to accept these terms, the madness of his daughters not only increased, but was communicated to the other women of Argos, who murdered their own children and ran about in a state of frenzy. Proetus then declared himself willing to listen to the proposal of Melampus; but the latter now also demanded for his brother Bias an equal share of the kingdom of Argos. Proetus consented (Herod. ix. 34; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ix. 30), and Melampus having chosen the most robust among the young men, gave chase to the mad women, amid shouting and dancing, and drove them as far as Sicyon. During this pursuit, Iphinoe, one of the daughters of Proetus, died, but the two others were cured by Melampus by means of purifications, and were then married to Melampus and Bias. There was a tradition that Proetus had founded a sanctuary of Hera, between Sicyon and Titane, and one of Apollo at Sicyon (Paus. ii. 7. § 7, 12. § 1). The place where the cure was effected upon his daughters is the same as that mentioned by Melampus, one mentioning the well Anigros (Strab. viii. p. 346), others the well Cleitor in Arcadia ("Ov. Met." x. 325), or Lusi in Arcadia (Paus. viii. § 3). Some even state that the Proctides were cured by Asclepius. (Pind. "Pyth." iii. 96.)

Besides these daughters, Proetus had a son, Megapenthex (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2; comp. MAGENPHEXES). When Bellerophontes came to Proetus to be purified of a murder which he had committed, the wife of Proetus fell in love with him, and invited him to come to her: but, as Bellerophontes refused to comply with her desire, she charged him before Proetus with having made improper proposals to her. Proetus then sent Bellerophontes to Jobates in Lycia, with a letter in which Jobates was desired to murder Bellerophontes. (Hom. ii. vi. 157, &c.; comp. Apollod. ii. 3. § 11; "Teut." ad Lyc. 17; comp. HIPPOUONES.)

2. A son of Thersander and father of Maera. (Paus. x. 30.; Schol. ad Od. xi. 253.) [L. S.]

PROMACHOMA (Προμαχόμα), i.e. "the protectress of the bay," was a surname of Athena, under which she had a sanctuary on mount Buphthalmos near Hermione. (Paus. ii. 34. § 9.) [L. S.]

PROMACHUS (Προμαχοῦς). 1. One of the Epigonoi, was a son of Parthenopaeus. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 2; Paus. x. 10. § 4.)

2. A son of Aeson, was killed by Pelias. (Apollod. i. 9. § 7; comp. PELIAS.)
PROMETHEUS.

3. A son of Alegenor, a Boeotian, fought in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. xiv. 475.)

4. A son of Hercules and brother of Echephron. (Paus. viii. 42. § 2; comp. Echephron.)

5. The name Promachus, that is, "the champion," also occurs as a surname of Hercules at Thebes (Paus. ix. 11. § 2), and of Hermes at Tanagra (ix. 22. § 2). [L. S.]

PROMATHIDES (Προμαθίδης), of Heraclea, wrote a work entitled Ἱδιμακός, which treated of mythological subjects (Athen. vii. p. 296, b.). Besides this work, which must have been in poetry, Promathides also wrote others in prose among which was one on the history of his native town. Athenaeus quotes his account of the cup-of Nestor (Athen. x. p. 439, b.; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1126, ii. 815, 847, 913, 931; Stel. Byz. s. v. Γάλας). Promathides is placed by Passow a little before the time of Augustus. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 492, ed. Westermann.)

PROMETHEUS (Προμηθέης), is sometimes called a Titan, though in reality he did not belong to the Titans, but was only a son of the Titan Iapetus (whence he is designated by the patronymic Ἰαπετειώτης, Hes. Theog. 528; Apollon Rhod. iii. 1067), by Clymene, so that he was a brother of Atlas, Menoetius, and Epimetheus (Hes. Theog. 507). His name signifies "forethought," as that of his brother Epimetheus denotes "afterthought."

Others call Prometheus a son of Themis (Aeschylus, Prom. 19), or of Uranus and Clymene, or of the Titans Oceanides and Cymone; and Homer, "Achilles, Hector, Odysseus, Lycus, and Hesiod: (Iliad. 1283; Odyssey. 190; Hes. Prom. 197). By Pandora, Hesione, or Aiothea, he is said to have been the father of Deucalion (Aesch. Prom. 560; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1238; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1086), by Pyrrha or Clymene he begot Hellen (and according to some also Deucalion; Schol. ad Apollon. i.c.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 69), and by Celeno he was the father of Lycus and Chimaereus (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 132, 219), while Herodotus (iv. 45) calls his wife Asia. The following is an outline of the legends related of him by the ancients. Once in the reign of Zeus, when gods and men were disputing with one another at Mecone (afterwards Sicyon, Schol. ad Pind. Nem. i. 123), Prometheus, with a view to deceive Zeus and rival him in prudence, cut up a bull and divided it into two parts: he wrapped up the best parts and the intestines in the skin, and at the top he placed the stomach, which is one of the worst parts, while the second heap consisted of the bones covered with fat. When Zeus pointed out to him how badly he had made the division, Prometheus desired him to choose, but Zeus, in his anger, and seeing through the stratagem of Prometheus, chose the heap of bones covered with the fat. The father of the gods avenged himself by withholding fire from mortals, but Prometheus stole it in a hollow tube (ferula, ráptis, Aeschyl. Prom. 110). Zeus now, in order to punish men, caused Hephæstus to mould a virgin, Pandora, of earth, whom Athena adorned with all the charms calculated to entice mortals; Prometheus himself was put in chains, and fastened to a pillar, where an eagle sent by Zeus consumed in the daytime his liver, which, in every succeeding night, was restored again. Prometheus was thus exposed to perpetual torture, but Hercules killed the eagle and delivered the sufferer, with the consent of Zeus, who thus had an opportunity of allowing his son to gain immortal fame (Hes. Theog. 521, &c., Op. et Dion. 47, &c.; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 15; Apollod. ii. 5, § 11). Prometheus had cautioned his brother Epimetheus against accepting any present from Zeus, but Epi-metheus, disregarding the advice, accepted Pandora, who was sent to him by Zeus, through the mediation of Hermes. Pandora then lifted the lid of the vessel in which the foresight of Prometheus had concealed all the evils which might torment mortals in life. Diseases and sufferings of every kind now issued forth, but deceitful hope alone remained behind (Hes. Op. et Dion. 83, &c.; comp. Ilios, Cat. M 47). This is an outline of the legend about Prometheus, as contained in the poems of Hesiod. Aeschylus, in his trilogy Prometheus, added various new features to it. for, according to him, Prometheus himself is an immortal god, the friend of the human race, the giver of fire, the inventor of the useful arts, an omniscient seer, an heroic sufferer, who is overcome by the superior power of Zeus, but will not bend his inflexible mind. Although he himself belonged to the Titans, he is nevertheless represented as having assisted Zeus against the Titans (Prom. 218), and he is further said to have opened the head of Zeus when the latter gave birth to Athena (Apollod. i. 3. § 6). But when Zeus succeeded to the kingdom of heaven, and wanted to extirpate the whole race of man, the place of which he proposed to give to quite a new race of beings, Prometheus prevented the execution of the scheme, and saved the human race from destruction (Prom. 230, 239). He deprived them of their knowledge of the future, and gave them hope instead (248, &c.). He further taught them the use of fire, made them acquainted with architecture, astronomy, mathematics, the art of writing, the treatment of domestic animals, navigation, medicine, the art of prophecy, working in metal, and all the other arts (252, 445, &c., 480, &c.). But, as in all these things he had acted contrary to the will of Zeus, the latter ordered Hephaestus to chain him to a rock in Scythia, which was done in the presence of Cronts and Bia, two ministers of Zeus. In Scythia he was visited by the Oceanides; he also came to him, and he foretold her the wanderings and sufferings which were yet in store for her, as well as her final relief (703, &c.). Hermes then likewise appears, and desires him to make known a prophecy which was of great importance to Zeus, for Prometheus knew that by a certain woman Zeus would beget a son, who was to destroy his father, and Zeus wanted to have a more accurate knowledge of the future. But Prometheus steadfastly refused to reveal the decree of fate, whereupon Zeus, by a thunderbolt, sent Prometheus, together with the rock to which he was chained, into Tartarus (Hom. Carm. ii. 18, 35). After the lapse of a long time, Prometheus returned to the upper world, to endure a fresh course of suffering, for he was now fastened to mount Caucasus, and tormented by an eagle, which every day, or every third day, devoured his liver, which was restored again in the night (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1247, &c.; iii. 653; Strab. xv. p. 688; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. ii. 3; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 15; Aeschyl. Prom. 1015, &c.). This state of suffering was to last until some other god, of his own accord, should take his place, and descend, into Tartarus for him (Prom. 1025). This came to pass when Cheiron, who had been incurably wounded by an arrow of Hercules, desired to go into Hades; and Zeus allowed him to supply the place of Prometheus (Apollod. i. 5, § 4; comp. Herion). According to others, however, Zeus himself delivered Prometheus, when at length the Titan was prevailed upon to reveal to Zeus the decree of fate, that, if he should become by Thetis the father of a son, that son should deprive him of the sovereign. (Serv. and Virg. Aen. vi. 42; Apollod. iii. 13. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 54; comp. Aeschy. Prom. 167, §c. 376.)

There was also an account, stating that Prometheus had created men out of earth and water, at the very beginning of the human race, or at the flood of Deucalion, when Zeus is said to have ordered him and Athena to make men out of the mud, and the winds to breathe life into them (Apollod. i. 7, § 1; Od. Met. i. 81; Etym. Mag. s. v. Προφητής). Prometheus is said to have given to men something of all the qualities possessed by the other animals (Horat. Carm. i. 16. 13). The kind of earth out of which Prometheus formed men was shown in later times near Panopoe in Phocis (Paus. x. 4. § 9), and it was at his suggestion that Deucalion, when the flood approached, built a ship and cast into it provisions, that he and Pyrrha might be able to support themselves during the calamity (Apollod. i. 7, § 2). Prometheus, in the legend, often appears in connection with Athena, e.g., he is said to have been punished on mount Caucasus for the criminal love he entertained for her (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1249); and he is further said, with her assistance, to have ascended into heaven, and there secretly to have lighted his torch at the chariot of Helios, in order to bring down the fire to man (Serv. ad Virg. Elog. vi. 42). At Athens Prometheus had a sanctuary in the Academy, from whence a torch-race took place in honour of him (Paus. i. 30. § 2; Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 55; Harpocrat. s. v. Λαμάτις). The myths of Prometheus is most minutely discussed by Welcker, in his Aeschylogische Trilogie Prometheus, Darmstadt, 1824; by Völcker, Mythologie des Iapet. Geschlechtes, 1824; and with especial reference to the Prometheus of Aeschylus, by Schoemann, Des Aeschylus Gegenfasser Prometheus, Greifswald, 1844, and by Blackie, in the Class. Mus. vol. v. p. 1, &c., which contain a very sound explanation of the myths, as developed by Aeschylus. [L. S.]

PRONAEA (Πρόναια), a surname of Athena, under which she had a chapel at Delphi, in front of the temple of Apollo. (Herod. i. 92; Aeschyl. Eum. 21; Paus. ix. 10. § 2.) Pronaea also occurs as a surname of Hermes. (Paus. l. c.) [L. S.]

PRONAPIDES (Προναπίδης), a various reading is Πρωναπίδης), an Athenian, is said to have been the teacher of Homer. (Tzetzes, Chil. v. 363.) He is enumerated among those who used the Pelasgic letters, before the introduction of the Phoenician, and is characterised as a graceful composer of song. (Diod. iii. 66.) Tatian (Orat. ad Graec. c. 62) mentions, among the early Greek writers, one Pronapides, an Athenian, whom Worr. in his edition of Tatian, plausibly conjectures to be Pronapides. According to the Scholiast on Theodosius the Grammarians, Pronapides invented the mode of writing from left to right now in use, as contradistinguished from the σπειρωδήν, the βουστρωφήδων, and other methods. (Bekker, Anecd. Graec. 786. 17; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 217.) [W. M. G.]

PRONAX (Πρόναξ), a son of Talassus and Lysi- neche, and a brother of Andrus and Ereiphe. Vol. III.

PROPERTIUS. 545

He was the father of Lycerus and Amphithea (Apollod. i. 7. § 13). According to some traditions the Nemean games were instituted in honour of Pronax. (Aelian, V. H. iv. 5; comp. Paus. iii. 18. § 7.) [L. S.]

PRONOE (Πρόνοη), the name of three mythical personages, one a Nereid (Hes. Theog. 261), the second a daughter of Phorbas, and mother of Pleron and Calydon, by Aetolus (Apollod. i. 7, § 7), and the third a Naiad. (Conon, 2.) [L. S.]

PRO'NOMUS (Πρόνομος), of Thebes, the son of Oeneiadas, was one of the most distinguished anetic musicians of Greece at the time of the Peloponnesian War (Epigr. Incert. 212, Brunck, Anotol. vol. iii. p. 194). He was the instructor of Alcibiades in flute-playing. (Ath. iv. p. 184, d.) He invented a new sort of flute, the compass of which was such, that melodies could be played upon it in all the three modes of music, the Dorian, the Phrygian, and the Lydian, for each of which, before this invention, a separate flute had been necessary. (Paus. ix. 12. § 4. s. 5, 6; Ath. xiv. p. 631, e.) One very celebrated composition of his was a Delian prosodia (that is, a prelude to be played at the sacred embassy to Delos approached the temple), which he made for the people of Chalcis in Euboea (Paus. l. c.). His melodies were brought forward, in competition with those of Saccadas, the Argive, in the musical contests which formed a part of the festivities celebrated at the foundation of Messene by Epaminondas (Paus. iv. 27. § 4. a. 7). Another proof of the high esteem in which he was held by his fellow-citizens was afforded by their erection of his statue near that of Epaminondas, in the temple of Apollo Spodius, at Thebes (Paus. ix. 12. § 4. s. 5, 6). He is mentioned once by Aristophanes (Eccles. 102, comp. Schol. and Suid. s. c.) but only to hang a jest on his long beard. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 136; Ulrici, Gescl. d. Hellen. Dieth. vol. ii. p. 76; Bode, Gescl. d. Hellen. Dieth. vol. ii. pt. l. pp. 43, n. 3, 207, 314, pl. ii. pp. 193, 236, 351.) [P. S.]

PROSOPUS (Προσωπος). 1. A son of Phlegueus, and brother of Agenor in Paphis, aew Alcmenee. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 6; comp. AEGORUS and ALCAMON; Schol. ad Thuc. i. 3.)

2. A Trojan who was slain by Patroclus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 399.) [L. S.]

PRONUBA, a surname of Juno among the Romans, describing her as the deity presiding over marriage. (Vig. Aen. iv. 166, vii. 319; Or. Herod. vi. 43.) [L. S.]

PROPERTIUS, SEX. AURELIUS. (The agnome, NAUTA, found in some Codices and early editions, seems to have been derived from a corrupt reading of ii. 24. 38.) The materials for a Life of Propertius are meagre and unsatisfactory, consisting almost entirely of the inferences which may be drawn from hints scattered in his writings. We know neither the precise place nor date of his birth. It is told us that he was a native of Umbria, where it borders on Etruria, but nowhere mentions the exact spot. Conjecture has assigned i., among other towns, to Mevania, Amerius, Hispellum, and Assium; of which one of the two last seems entitled to the preference. The date of his birth has been variously placed between the years of Rome 697 and 708 (b. c. 57 to 46). Lachmann, however, was the first who placed it so low as b. c. 48 or 47; and the latest date (b. c. 46) is that of Hertzberg, the recent German editor. The latter's computation proceeds on very strained inferences, which we have not space to discuss; but it may possibly be sufficient to state that one of his results is to place the tenth elegy of the second book, in which Propertius talks about his extremae aedae (v. 6) in n. c. 35, when, according to Hertzberg, he was one-and-twenty! For several reasons, too long to be here adduced, it might be shown that the year assigned by Mr. Clinton, namely, n. c. 31, is a more probable one, and agrees better with the relative ages of Propertius and Ovid. We know that the latter was born in n. c. 43, so that he would have been eight years younger than Propertius: a difference which would entitle him to call Propertius his predecessor, whilst at the same time it would not prevent the two poets from being sodales (Ov. Trist. iv. 10. 45).

Propertius was not descended from a family of any distinction (ii. 24. 37), nor can the inference that it was equestrian be sustained from the mention of the aurea bulla (iv. 1. 131), which was the common ornament of all children who were ingenii. (Cic. in Verr. ii. 1. 58, with the note of Asconius; Macrobr. i. 6.) The paternal estate, however, seems to have been sufficiently ample (Nam tua versarent cum multi rura juventi, iv. 1. 129); but of this he was deprived by an agrarian division, probably that in n. c. 36, after his father's death, and thus thrown into comparative poverty (in tenues cogeris ipse Lores, ib. 128). At the time of this misfortune he had not yet assumed the toga virilis, and was therefore under sixteen years of age. He had already lost his father, who, it has been conjectured, was one of the victims sacrificed after the taking of Perusia; but this notion does not rest on any satisfactory grounds. The elegy on which it is founded (i. 2) refers to a kinsman named Gallus. We have no account of Propertius's education; but from the elegy before quoted (iv. 1) it would seem that he was destined to be an advocate, but abandoned the profession for that of poetry. That he was carefully instructed appears from the learning displayed in his writings, and which was probably acquired altogether at Rome; the smallness of his means having prevented him from finishing his education at Athens, as was then commonly done by the wealthy Romans. At all events, it is plain from the sixth elegy of the first book, written after his connection with Cynthia had begun, that he had not then visited Greece. In the twenty-first elegy of the third book he meditates a journey thither, probably at the time when he had quarrelled with his mistress; but whether he ever carried the design into execution we have no means of knowing.

The history of Propertius's life, so far as it is known to us, is the history of his amours, nor can it be said how much of these is fiction. He was, what has been called in modern times "a man of wit and pleasure about town;" nor in the few particulars of his life which he communicates in the first elegy of the fourth book, does he drop the slightest hint of his ever having been engaged in any serious or useful employment. He began to write poetry at a very early age, and the merit of his productions soon attracted the attention and patronage of Maecenas. This was most probably shortly after the final discomfiture and death of Antony in n. c. 30, when, according to the com-and he has been followed by Barth and other critics. Masson's reasons for fixing on that year are that none of his elegies can be assigned to a later date than B.C. 16; and that Ovid twice mentions him in his Ars Amatoria (iii. 333 and 536) in a way that shows him to have been dead. The first of these proves nothing. It does not follow that Propertius ceased to live because he ceased to write; or that he ceased to write because nothing later has been preserved. The latter assertion, too, is not indisputable. There are no means of fixing the dates of several of his pieces; and Ep. iv. 6, which alludes to Caius and Lucius, the grandsons of Augustus (L. 62), was probably written considerably after B.C. 15. (Clinton, F. H. B. C. 26.)

With regard to Masson's second reason, the passages in the Ars Am. by no means show that Propertius was dead; and even if they did, it would be a strange method of proving a man defunct in B.C. 15, because he was so in n. c. 2. Masson's own date for the publication of that poem!

Propertius resided on the Esquiline, near the gardens of Maecenas. He seems to have cultivated the friendship of his brother poets, as Por- ticus, Bassus, Ovid, and others. He mentions Virgil (ii. 34. 63) in a way that shows he had heard parts of the Aeneid privately recited. But though he belonged to the circle of Maecenas, he never once mentions Horace. He is equally silent about Tibullus. His not mentioning Ovid is best explained by the difference in their ages; for Ovid alludes more than once to Propertius, and with evident affection.

In 1722, a stone, bearing a head and two inscriptions, one to Propertius, and one to a certain Cominius, was pretended to be discovered at Spello, the ancient Hispellum, in the palace of Theresa Grilli, Princess Pamphilia. Though the genuine-ness of this monument was maintained by Montfaucon and other antiquarians, as well as by several eminent critics, later researches have shown the inscription of Propertius's name to be a forgery. The same stone, discovered in the same place, was known to be extant in the previous century, but bearing only the inscription to Cominius. (See the authorities adduced by Hertzberg, Quaest. Propert. vol. i. p. 4.)

As an elegiac poet, a high rank must be awarded to Propertius, and among the ancients it was a most point whether the preference should be given to him or to Tibullus. (Quint. x. 1. § 93.) His genius, however, did not fit him for the sublimier flights of poetry, and he had the good sense to refrain from attempting them. (iii. 3. 15, &c.) Though he excels Ovid in warmth of passion, he never indulges in the grossness which disfigures some of the latter's compositions. It must, how- ever, be confessed that, to the modern reader, the elegies of Propertius are not nearly so attractive as those of Tibullus. This arises partly from their obscurity, but in a great measure also from a cer- tain want of nature in them. Muretus, in an admirable parallel of Tibullus and Propertius, in the preface to his Scholia on the latter, though he does not finally adjudicate the respective claims of the two poets, has very happily expressed the dif- ference between them in the following terms:—

"Illum (Tibullum) judices simplicius scripsisse quae cogitaret: hunc (Propertium) diligentius cogi- tasse quid scriberet. In illo plus naturae, in hoc plus curae atque industriae perspicacia." The fault of Propertius was too pedantic an imitation of the Greeks. His whole ambition was to become the Roman Callimachus (iv. 1. 63), whom, as well as Philetas and other of the Greek elegiac poets, he made his model. He abounds with obscure Greek myths, as well as Greek forms of expression, and the same pedantry infects even his versification. Tibullus generally, and Ovid almost invariably, close their pentameter with a word contained in an iambic foot; Propertius, especially in his first book, frequently ends with a word of three, four, or even five syllables. P. Burmann, and after him Paldamus, have pretended to discover that this termination is favourable to pathos; but Propertius's motive for adopting it may more probably be attributed to his close, not to say servile, imitation of the Greeks.

The obscurity of Propertius, which is such as Jot. Scaliger (Canticiones in Propertius, p. 169, Steph. 1577) did not hesitate to say that the second book was almost wholly unintelligible, is not owing solely to his reconcile learning, and to the studied brevity and precision of his style, but also to the very corrupt state in which his text has come down to us. Alexander ab Alexandro (Genial. Dier. ii. 1) relates, on the authority of Pontanus, that the Codex Archetypus was found under some casks in a wine cellar, in a very imperfect and illegible condition, when Pontanus, who was born in 1426, was a mere youth. This story was adopted by Jot. Scaliger (Ibid. p. 168), who, assuming as well the recklessness and negligence of the first transcriber, introduced many alterations and transpositions, which were adopted by subsequent critics to the age of Broukhius and Burmann. Van Santen, in the preface to his edition, published at Amsterdam, in 1700, was the first to question the truth of the story related by Alexander (p. x &c.), chiefly on the grounds that there is extant a MS. of Propositions, with an inscription by Pucius, dated in 1502, in which he mentions having collated it with a codex which had belonged to B. Valla, and which he styles antiquissimus; an epiteth he could not have applied to any copy of the MS. alluded to by Alexander. That this codex of Valla's was not that found in the wine cellar is shown by an annotation of Ant. Perreius, in a copy of Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius, dated in the early part of the sixteenth century, in which he distinguishes them. It may be observed that this reasoning allows that there was such a MS. as that mentioned by Alexander, who, however, does not say that it belonged to Pontanus. But though Van Santen's arguments do not seem quite conclusive, they have been adopted by most modern critics; and have been further strengthened by the observation that Petrucli, who flourished more than a hundred years after Pontanus, quotes a passage from Propositions (ii. 34. 65) just as it is now read, in his fictitious letters (the 2d to Cicero); and that one at least of the MSS. now extant (the Guelferbytanus or Neapolitan) is undoubtedly as old as the thirteenth century. Whatever may be the merits of this question, it cannot be doubted that the MS. from which our copies are derived was very corrupt; a fact which the followers of Van Santen do not pretend to deny.

The Edition Princeps of Propertius was printed in 1472, fol.; it is uncertain at what place. There is another edition of the same date in small 4to. The text was early illustrated and amended by the care of Beroaldus, Jot. Scaliger, Marcetus, Passerant, and other critics. The works of Propertius have been often printed with those of Catullus and Tibullus. The following are the best separate editions:—By Broukhius, Amsterdam, 1702, sm. 4to. By Vulpius, Padua, 1755, 2 vols. 4to. By Barbius, Leipsig, 1778, 8vo. By Burmannus, Utrecht, 1780, 4to. This edition appeared after Burmann's death, edited by Santenius. By Kuinoel, Leipsig, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo. By Lachmann, Leipsig, 1816, 8vo. This edition is chiefly critical. Many conjectures are introduced into the text, and the second book is divided into two, at the tenth elegy, on insufficient grounds. By Paldamus, Halle, 1827, 8vo. By Le Maire, Paris, 1832, 8vo, forming part of the Bibliothecas Latina. By Hertzgaell, Halle, 1844—5, 4 thin vols. 8vo. The commentary is ample, but prolix, and often fanciful and inaccurate. Propertius has been translated into French by St. Amand, Bourges et Paris, 1819, with the Latin text; into German by Hertzberg, Stuttgart, 1838 (Metzler's Collection); into Italian terza rima by Becello, Verona, 1742. There is no complete English translation, but there is a correct, though rugged, version of the first book, accompanied with the Latin text, anonymous, London 1781. [T. D.]

PROPERTIUS CELER, a man of praetorian rank in the reign of Tiberius, begged to be allowed to resign his senatorial rank on account of his poverty, but received from the emperor instead a million of sestertii, in order to support his dignity. (Tac. Ann. 1. 75.)

PROPIQUUS, POMPEIUS, the procurator of the province of Belgium, at the death of Nero, A. D. 68, was slain in the following year, when the troops proclaimed Vitellius emperor (Tac. Hist. i. 12. 58).

PROSURA, [Postverta.] PROSEPINA, [Persphone.]

PROSPER, surnamed Aquitanus or Aquitanicus, from the country of his birth, flourished during the first half of the fifth century. Regarding his family and education no records have been preserved; but in early life he settled in Provence, and there became intimately associated with a certain Hilarius, who, to avoid confusion, is usually distinguished as Hilarius Prosperi or Prosperianus. The two friends displayed great zeal in defending the doctrines of Augustin against the attacks of the Semipelagians who were making inroads upon the orthodoxy of Southern Gaul, and having opened a correspondence with the bishop of Hippo, they received in reply the two tracts still extant under the titles De Praedestinatione Sanctorum, and De Domino Perseverans. Finding that, notwithstanding these exertions, their antagonists were still alive and successful, they next undertook a journey to Rome, where they submitted the whole controversy to Pope Celestinus, and induced him by their representations to publish, in A. D. 431, his well-known Epistola ad Episcopos Gallorum, in which he denounces the heresy of Cassianus, and warns all the dignitaries of the church to prohibit their presbyters from entertaining and disseminating tenets so dangerous. Armed with this authority, Prosper returned home, and, from the numerous controversial tracts composed by him about this period, appears to have prosecuted his labours with unflagging enthusiasm. Soon after, however, he disappears from history, and we know nothing certain with regard either to his subsequent career or to the date of his death. In the chronicle of Ado (fl. A.D. 830) he is spoken of as the Nottarius of Pope Leo, and in some MSS. is styled Episcopus Rhegiensis (I. e. Ries in Provence), but ecclesiastical historians agree in believing that Prosper of Aquitaine had no claim to these titles.
PROSPER.

The works usually ascribed to this writer may be divided into three classes:—I. Theological. II. Historical. III. Poetical.

I. THEOLOGICAL.—1. Epistola ad Augustinium de Reliquiis Pelagianae Haereseos in Gallia. Written between a. d. 427—429, and considered of importance in affording materials for the history of Semipelagianism. 2. Epistola ad Rufinam de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio. Written while Augustin was still alive, and therefore not later than the middle of the year a. d. 430. 3. Pro Augustino Responsiones ad Capitula Observationum Gallorum Calamorum. Written about a. d. 431. 4. Pro Augustini Doctrina Respomiones ad Capitula Objectionum Vincentianarum. Written, probably, soon after the preceding. 5. Pro Augustino Responsiones ad Escepta qua de Genesius Civitate sunt visi, Belonging to the same epoch as the two preceding.
In reply to the doctrines of Cussianus respecting Free-will, as laid down in the thirteenth of his Collationes Patrum [Cassianus], whence the piece is frequently entitled De Gratia Dei adversus Collata-ren. Written about a. d. 432. 7. Psalmorarum a C. uspe ad CL. Expositio, assigned by the Benedictine editors to a. d. 435, but placed by Schoen-nann and others before a. d. 424. 8. Sententiaras ad Oecumen. S. Augustini de Quo Eccles.
Liber. Compiled about a. d. 436. The whole of the above will be found in the Benedictine edition of the works of Augustin; the epistle is numbered exxv., and is placed immediately before another upon the same subject by Hilarius; the remaining tracts are all included in the Appendix to vol. x.

The authenticity of the following is very doubtful:—1. Confessio. Sometimes ascribed to Prosper Aquitanicus, sometimes to Prosper Tiro. It was first published from a Vatican MS. by Sirmond (8vo. Par. 1619), in a volume containing also the Opuscula of Eugenius, bishop of Toledo, together with some poems by Dacontius and others. See also the collected works of Sirmond, Paris, 1696,
vol. ii. p. 913. 2. De Vocatione Gentium Libri duo. Ascribed in some MSS. to Ambrose. Great diversity of opinion exists with regard to the real author. Ermannus would assign it to Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, Vossius to Hilarius Prosperi, Quesnel to Leo the Great. The whole question is fully discussed by Antelmius, in an essay, of which the title is given at the end of this article, and by the brothers Ballerini in their edition of the works of Leo, vol. ii. p. 662 [Leo]. Those who assign it to Prosper suppose it to have been written about
a. d. 440, while the Ballerini bring it down as low as 496. 3. Ad Sacram Virginiem Demetriadem Epistola s. De Humilitate Christiana Tractus, supposed to have been written about a. d. 440.
It is placed among the letters of Ambrose (lixxiv).
in the earlier editions of that father, claimed for Prosper by Sottellis and Antelmius, chiefly on account of a real or fancied resemblance in style, and given by Quesnel to Leo the Great. See the edition of the works of Leo by the Ballerini, vol.
ii. p. 743. 4. Praeteritorum Sedis Apostolice

PROSPER.

Episcoporum Auctoritatis de Gratia Dei et Libero Voluntatis Arbitrio. Believed to have been complied about a.d. 431. It was first made known by Dionysius Eiguus who subjoined it to the Epistle of Coelestinus addressed to the bishops of Gaul. See the observations of the Ballerini in

The following, although bearing the name of Prosper, are certainly spurious:—1. De Vita Contemplativa Libri tres. Composed, in all probability, as Sirmond has pointed out, by Julianus Pomerius, a Gaulish presbyter, who flourished at the close of the fifth century. (Gennad. de Viris Ill. 98; Isidor. de Script. Eccles. 12.) 2. De Promitionibus and Praedictionibus Dei. Referred to Cassiodorus as the production of Prosper, but apparently the work of some African divine.

II. HISTORICAL.—Two, perhaps we should say three, chronicles are extant bearing the name of Prosper. It will be convenient to describe them separately according to the titles by which they are usually discriminated.

1. Chronicon Consulaire, extending from a. d.
379, the date at which the chronicle of Jerome ends, down to a. d. 455, the events being aranged according to the years of the Roman consuls. We find short notices with regard to the Roman emperors, the Roman bishops, and political occurrences in general, but the troubles of the Church are especially dwelt upon, and above all the Pelagian heresy. In the earlier editions this chronicle ended with the year a. d. 444, but appeared in its complete form in the Historiae Francorum Scriptiores Coetenes of Andrew Du Chesne, fol. Par. 1566—1640. Rössler infers from internal evidence that it was originally brought down by Prosper to a. d. 433, and that subsequent two additions were made to it, either by himself or by some other hand, the one reaching to a. d. 444, the other to a. d. 455. We ought to observe also that, as might be expected in a work of this nature, we find it in some MSS. continued still further, while in others it is presented in a compressed and mutilated form.

2. Chronicon Imperiale, called also Chronicon
Pilobaeum, because first made known by Peter Pithou, in 1588. It is comprized within precisely the same limits as the preceding (a. d.
379—455), but the computations proceed according to the years of the Roman emperors, and not according to the consuls. While it agrees with the Chronicon Consulaire in its general plan, it differs from it in many particulars, especially in the very brief allusions to the Pelagian controversy, and in the slight, almost disrespectful notices of Augustine. It is, moreover, much less accurate in its chronology, and is altogether to be regarded as inferior in authority.

The singular coincidence with regard to the period embraced by these two chronicles, a coincidence which, however, in some degree disappears
if we adopt the hypothesis of Rössler, would lead us to believe that they proceeded from the same source; but, on the other hand, the difference of arrangement, and the want of harmony in details, would lead to an opposite conclusion. Hence, while the greater number of critics agree in recgarding Prosper Aquitanicus as the framcr of the second, not a few are inclined to make over the second to Prosper Tiro, who, it is imagined, flourished in the sixth century. It must be remembered, at

3. Labbe, in his _Novis Bibliotheca MSS. Librorum_, fol. Paris, 1657, published the Chronicon Consularium, with another chronic prefixed, commencing with Adam, and reaching down to the point where the Consular begins. This was pronounced by Labbe to be the complete work as it issued from the hands of Prosper, the portion previously known having been, upon this supposition, detached from the rest, for the sake of being tacked as a supplement to the chronicle of Jerome. The form and style, however, of the earlier section are so completely different from the remainder, that the opinion of Labbe has found little favour with critics.

For full information with regard to these chronicles, and the various opinions which have been broached as to their origin, we may refer to Roncalli, _Vetust. Lat. Script. Chronicorum_, 4to. Patav. 1787; Rüster, _Chronica Medii Aevi_, Tubing. 1793; Graevius, _Thesaur. Antiq. Rom._, vol. xi.

III. PROTICAL. Among the works of the Christian poets which form the fifth volume of the "Collectio Pisauriensis" (4to. Pissur. 1766), the following are attributed to Prosper Aquitanicus, but we must premise that they have been collected from many different sources, that they unquestionably are not all from the same pen, and that it is very difficult to decide whether we are to regard Prosper Aquitanicus and Prosper Tiro, the latter name being prefixed to several of these pieces in the MSS, as the same or as distinct individuals.

1. _Exsententis S. Augustini Epigrammatum Liber unus_, a series of one hundred and six epigrams in elegiac verse, on various topics connected with speculative, dogmatical, and practical theology, and with morals. Thus the third is _De Essentia Dei_, the thirty-ninth _De Justitia et Gratia_, the twenty-second _De diligendo Deum_, the hundred and fifth _De colibenda Ira._

2. _Carmen de Ingratis_, in dactylic hexameters, divided into four parts and forty-five chapters. An introduction is prefixed in five elegiac couplets, of which the first two explain the nature and extent of the poem.

Unde voluntatis sanctae substrat origo,
Unde animis pietas insit, unde fides.

Adversum ingratos, falsos et virtute superbos,
Centenias decies versibus excolui.

3. _In Obstductorum S. Augustini Epigramma_, in five elegiac couplets. 4. Another, on the same subject, in six elegiac couplets. 5. _Epitaphium Nestoriam et Pelagianis haereseon_, in eleven elegiac couplets, in which "Nestoriana Haeresis loquitur." Written after the condemnation of the Nestorians by the council of Ephesus in A.D. 431.

6. _Uxorum hortatur ut se totam Deo dedicaet_, in fifty-three elegiac couplets, with an introduction in sixteen lambic Dimeters Cataleptic (Anacreontics). Besides the above there is a _Carmen de Providencia divina_, in some editions of Prosper, which is rejected by Antelmius, and made over by some scholars to Hilarius.

The first among the works ascribed to Prosper which issued from the press was the Epigrammata published at Mayence, 4to. 1494, as "Epigrammata Sancti Proserpi episcopi regiennis de Viitis et Virtutibus ex dictis Augustini," and reprinted by Aldus, 4to. Venet. 1501, along with other Christian poems. Next appeared the treatise _De Gratia Dei_, printed by Schoeffer at Mayence, 4to. 1524, as "S. Prosperi Presbyteri Aquitanici Libellus adversus inimicos Gratiae Dei contra Collatorum," in a volume containing the epistle of Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, the epistle of Pope Coelestinus, and other authorities upon the same subject. Then followed the _Epistola ad Regiam_ and the _Responsiones ad Excorpas_, &c. 8vo. Venet. 1538, and soon after Gryphius published at Leyden, fol. 1539, the first edition of the collected works, carefully corrected by the collation of MSS. The edition of Olivaris, 8vo. Ducci, 1577, was long regarded as the standard, but far superior to all others is the Benedictine, fol. Paris, 1711, superintended by Le Brun de Marette and D. Manegaut.

Full information with regard to the interminable controversies arising out of the works of Prosper is contained in the notes and dissertations of the Benedictines, in the dissertations of Quesnel and the Ballerini in their respective editions of the works of Leo the Great, and in a rare volume "De veris Operibus SS. Patrum Leonis Magni et Prosperi Aquitani Dissertatione criticae," &c. 4to. Paris, 1689, by Josephus Antelmius, to which Quesnel put forth a reply in the _Ephemerides Parisienses_, vii. and xv. August, 1689, and Antelmius a reply in two Epistolas dubius Epistolae P. Quesneli patriulis responsoriae, 4to. Paris, 1690.

PROSTAGORAS (Πρωταγόρας), was born at Abdera, according to the concurrent testimony of Plato and several other writers. (Protag. p. 309, c. _De Rep._ p. 606, c.; _Heracleides Pont. ap. Diog. Laert. ix. 55_; Cicero, _de Nat. Deor._ i. 23, &c.) By the comic poet Eupolis (ep. _Diog. Laert. ix._ 50), he is called a Teian (Τήιός), probably with reference to the Teian origin of that city (Herod. i. 168, &c.); just as Hecataeus the Abderite is by Strabo. (See Ed. Geist in a programme of the Paedagogium at Giessen, 1827; comp. Fr. Hermann in the Schulzeitung, 1830, ii. p. 508.) In the manifestly corrupted text of the _Pseudo-Galenus_ (de _Philos._ Hist. c. 8), he is termed an _Elean_ (compare J. Frei, _Quaestiones Protagorae_, Bonne, 1845, p. 5). By the one his father is called Ar- temon, by the others Maenandrus or Maenander (Diog. _Laert._ ix. 50, ib. Interp.), whom Philostratus (p. 494), probably confounding him with the father of Democritus, describes as very rich; _Diogenes Laertìus_ (ib. 53) as miserably poor. The well-known story, however, that Protagoras was once a poor porter, and that the skill with which he had fastened together, and poised upon his shoulders, a large bundle of wood, attracted the attention of Democritus, who conceived a liking for him, took him under his care, and instructed him (Epicurus _in Diog. Laert._ x. 6, ix. 53; _Aul.
Gellius, N. A. v. 3; comp. Athen. viii. 13, p. 354, c.).—appears to have arisen out of the statement of Aristotle, that Protagoras invented a sort of porter's knot (πόλυμ) for the more convenient carrying of burdens (Diog. Laërt. ix. 53; comp. Frei, l. c. p. 6, &c.). Moreover, whether Protagoras was, as later ancient authorities assumed (Diog. Laërt. ix. 50; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 301, &c.), a disciple of Democritus, with whom in point of doctrine he had absolutely nothing in common, is very doubtful, and Frei (l. c. p. 24, &c.) has undertaken to show that Protagoras was some twenty years older than Democritus. If, in fact, Anaxagoras, as is confirmed in various ways, was born about B.C. 500, and was forty years older than Democritus, according to the latter, the statement (Diog. Laërt. ix. 54), Protagoras must have been older than Democritus, as it is certain that Protagoras was older than Socrates, who was born B.C. 468 (Plat. Protag. p. 317, c., 314, b., 361, e.; comp. Diog. Laërt. ix. 42, 56), and died before him at the age of nearly seventy (Plat. Meno, p. 91, e.; comp. Theaet. p. 171, d., 164, e., Ethyld. p. 286, c.; the assumption of others, that he reached the age of ninety years, Diog. Laërt. ix. 55, Schol. in Plat. de Rep. x. p. 600, is of no weight), after he had practised the sophist art for forty years, and had by flight withdrawn himself from the accusation of Pythodorus, one of the Four Hundred, who governed Athens in B.C. 411 (Diog. Laërt. ix. 54; comp. Philostratus, l. c. Aristotle mentioned Euthalus, the disciple of Protagoras, as his accuser, Diog. Laërt. l. c.). Apollodoros, therefore, might very well assign the Olympiad 143 as the period when he flourished (Diog. Laërt. ix. 54, 56). A more accurate determination of the date of his death, and thence of his birth, cannot be extracted from a fragment of the Silli of Timon (in Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 57), and a passage of Plato (Theaet. p. 171, d.), as the placing together of Protagoras and Socrates in them does not presuppose that their deaths were contemporaneous. Nor are we justified in concluding from the boastful expression of the sophist (Plat. Prot. p. 317, c.), that he was twenty years older than Socrates. On the other hand, if Euripides alluded to his death in the Ixion (according to Philochorus in Diog. Laërt. ix. 55), he must have died before B.C. 406 or 407, i.e. before the death of Euripides. With preponderating probability, therefore, Frei places the death of Protagoras in B.C. 411, assuming that Pythodorus accused him during the government of the Four Hundred (Quaed. Protag. p. 64), and accordingly assigns about B.C. 480 as the date of his birth.

That Protagoras had already acquired fame during his residence in Abdera cannot be inferred from the doubtful statement, that he was termed by the Abderites λόγος, and Democritus φιλοσοφος or σοφία. (Aelian. Var. Hist. i. 29; comp. Suid. s. v. Πρωταγ. ἀνώμων, &c. Phavorinus, in Diog. Laërt. ix. 50, gives to Protagoras the designation of σοφία). He was the first who called himself a sophist, and taught for pay (Plat. Protag. p. 349, a.; Diog. Laërt. ix. 52). He must have come to Athens before B.C. 445, since, according to the statement of Heracleides Ponticus (Diog. Laërt. ix. 50), he gave laws to the Thuriens, or, what is more probable, adapted for the use of the new politicians, who left Athens for the first time in that year, the laws which had been drawn up at an earlier period by Charondas, for the use of the Chalcedic colonies (for according to Diod. xii. 11, 3, and others, these laws were in force at Thurii likewise). Whether he himself removed to Thurii, we do not learn, but at the time of the plague we find him again in Athens, as he could scarcely have mentioned the strength of mind displayed by Pericles at the death of his sons, in the way he does (in a fragment still extant, Plut. de Consol. ad Apoll. c. 53, p. 118, d.), had he not been an eye-witness. He had also, as it appears, returned to Athens after a long absence (Plut. Prot. p. 301, c.), at a time when the sons of Pericles were still alive (ibid. p. 314, e., 329, a.). A somewhat intimate relation between Protagoras and Pericles is intimated also elsewhere. (Plut. Peric. c. 26, p. 172, a.). His activity, however, was by no means restricted to Athens. He had spent some time in Sicily, and acquired fame there (Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 282, d.), and brought with him to Athens many admirers out of other Greek cities through which he had passed (Plat. Prot. p. 315, a.). The impeachment of Protagoras had been founded on his book on the gods, which began with the statement: "Respecting the gods, I am unable to know whether they exist or do not exist." (Diog. Laërt. ix. 51, &c.) The impeachment was followed by his banishment (Diog. Laërt. ix. 53; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 23; Euseb. Præp. Evang. xiv. 19, &c.), or, as others affirm, only by the burning of his book. (Philost. Vit. Soph. l. c.; Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 37; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 56; Cic. Diog. Laërt. ii. &c.)

Frei's account of the writings of Protagoras which Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 53) so little less bore from one of his Alexandria authorities (he describes them as still extant, ἀκαταμανημέναι αὐτοῦ βιβλία ταῦτα; comp. Welecker's account of Prodikos, in his Kleine Schriften, ii. p. 447, 465), and which he gives probably with his accustomed negligence, one may see that they comprised very different subjects:—εἰδίκες (περί ἄριτον καί περί τῶν οὐκ ἀρίτων τῶν ἀνθρώπων προασφάλειας, περί φιλοτιμίας, πολίτες (περί πολιτικῶν, περί τῆς ἐν ἀρχῇ κατοπτάσεως; comp. Frei, p. 182, &c.); rhetorιcος (ἀντίλογων δῶ, τέχνης ἔραινων), and other subjects of different kinds (προστακτικός, περί μαθημάτων, περί τάς, περί τῶν εἰς Ἀἴδου. The works which, in all probability, were the most important of those which Protagoras composed, Truth (Ἀλήθεια), and On the Gods (Περὶ Θεῶν), are omitted in that list, although in another passage (ix. 51) Diogenes Laërtius refers to them. The first contained the theory refuted by Plato in the Theatetus (Theaet. p. 161, c., 162, a., 166, c., 170, e.), and was probably identical with the work on the Existant (Περὶ τοῦ ἄντων), attributed to Protagoras by Porphyry (in Euseb. Præp. Evang. x. 3, p. 468, Viger). This work was directed against the Eeetics (Περὶ τού ἐν τῷ ἐν λέγοντα), and was still extant in the time of Porphyry, who describes the argumentation of the book as similar to that of Plato, though without adding any more exact statements. With the doctrine that was peculiar to Protagoras we obtain the most complete acquaintance from the Theaetetus of Plato, which was designed to refute it, and the fidelity of the quotations in which is confirmed by the much more scanty notices of Sextus Empiricus and others. The sophist started from the fundamental presup-

position of Heraclitus, that every thing is motion, and nothing besides or beyond it, and that out of it every thing comes into existence; that nothing at any time exists, but that everything is perpetually becoming (Plat. Theaet. pp. 156, 152: Sextus Empiricus inadecusately attributes to him matter in a perpetual state of flux, ἐν δεσιν, Pyrrhon. Hyp. i. 217, 218). He then distinguished two principal kinds of the infinitely manifold motions, an active and a passive; but premised that the motion which in one concurrence manifested itself actively, will in another appear as passive, so that the difference is as it were a fluctuating, not a permanent one (Theaet. pp. 156, 157). From the concurrence of two such motions arise sensation or perception, and that which is felt or perceived, according to the different velocity of the motion; and that in such a way that where there is homogeneity in what thus meets, as between seeing and colour, hearing and sound (ib. p. 150), the definitiveness of the colour and the seeing, and the definiteness of what is perceived, is produced by the concurrence of corresponding motions (p. 156, d., comp. 159, c.). Consequently, we never can speak of Being and Becoming in themselves, but only for something (τοῦ), or of something (τούτος), or to something (πρὸς τοῦ, p. 160, b., 156, c., 152, d.; Arist. Metaph. ix. 3; Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. 216, 218). Consequently there is or exists for each only that of which he has a sensation, and only that which he perceives is true for him (Theaet. p. 152, a., comp. Cratyl. p. 389; Aristocles, in Euseb. Praep. Evang. xiv. 20; Cic. Acad. ii. 49; Sext. Emp. L.c. and adv. Math. vii. 63, 369, 386, &c.); so that as sensation, like its objects, is engaged in a perpetual change of motion (Theaet. p. 152, b.; Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. p. 217, c.), opposite assertions might exist, according to the difference of the perception respecting each several object (Arist. Metaph. iv. 5; Diog. Laërt. ix. 5; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 674, a.; Seneca, Epist. 68) perception and that which is perceived, which he drew from the Heracleote doctrine of eternal Becoming, Protagoras summed up in the well-known proposition: The man is the measure of all things; of the existent that it exist; of the non-existent, that they do not exist (Theaet. p. 152, a., 160, d., Cratyl. p. 385, e.; Arist. Metaph. x. 1, xi. 6; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 60, Pyrrhon. Hyp. i. p. 216; Aristocles, in Euseb. Praep. Evang. xiv. 20; Diog. Laërt. ix. 51), and understood by the man, the perceiving or sensation-receiving subject. He was compelled, therefore, likewise to admit, that confutation was impossible, since every affirmation, if resting upon sensation or perception, is equally justifiable (Plat. Euthyd. p. 165, d. &c.; Isocr. Hellenae Encl. p. 231, Bekck.; Diog. Laërt. ix. 53) but, notwithstanding the equal truth and justifiableness of opposite affirmations, he endeavoured to establish a distinction of better and worse, referring them to the brute animal as the foundation of the perpetual subject, and promised to give directions for improving this condition, i.e. for attaining to higher activity (Theaet. p. 167; comp. Sext. Emp. Hyp. i. p. 218). Already, before Pito and Aristotle (Metaph. iv. 4, comp. the previously quoted passages), Democritus had applied himself to the confutation of this sensualism of Protagoras, which annihilated existence, knowledge, and all understanding (Plut. adv. Colot. p. 1109, a.; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 389).

When Protagoras, in his book on the Gods, maintained that we are not able to know whether and how they exist (Timon, in Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 56, comp. 58; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 1, 12, 23, 42; Diog. Laërt. ix. 51, &c. To regard the expression, ὰνῶν τινὲς εἰσι, quales sint, as Frei does, l.c. p. 98, as a foreign addition, seems to me to involve difficulties), he probably could only have in mind the mutually opposed statements on the point, and must himself have been disposed to a denial as he could scarcely have been conscious of a corresponding sensation or perception.

It is not every pleasure, but only pleasure in the beautiful, to which Protagoras, in the dialogue which bears his name (p. 351, b.), allows moral worth; and he refers virtue to a certain sense of shame (ἀφος) implanted in man by nature, and a certain conscious feeling of justice (δικαιος), which are to serve the purpose of securing the bonds of connection in private and political life (ibid. p. 322, c. &c.) and, accordingly, explains how they are developed, by means of activity (πρᾶξις), instruction, and laws (p. 325, c. &c., comp. 340, c.). He is not able, however, to define more exactly the difference between the beautiful and the pleasant, and at last again contents himself with affirming that pleasure or enjoyment is the proper aim of the good (p. 354, &c.). In just as confused a manner does he express himself with respect to the virtues, of which he admits five (holiness, διανοικτη— and four others), and with regard to which he maintains that they are distinguished from each other in the same way as the parts of the countenance (ib. p. 349, b., 329, c., &c.). As in these ethical opinions of Protagoras we see a want of scientific perception, so do we perceive in his conception of the Heraclitean doctrine of the eternal flow of all things, and the way in which he carries it out, a sophistical endeavour to establish, freed from the fetters of science, his subjective notions, setting aside the Heraclitean assumption of a higher cognition, and a commitment to means of activity (πρᾶξις), by the means of rhetorical art. That he was master of this in a high degree, the testimonies of the ancients leave indubitable. His endeavours, moreover, were mainly directed to the communication of this art by means of instruction (Plat. Prot. p. 312, c.), to render men capable of acting and speaking with readiness in domestic and political affairs (ib. p. 318, e.). He would teach how to make the weaker cause the stronger (τοῦ πρώτου λόγον κειμενο ποιεῖν, Arist. Rhet. ii. 24; A. Gellius, N. A. v. 3; Eudoxus, in Stephan. Byz. s. v. Ἀθηναία; comp. Aristoph. Nub. 113, &c. 245, &c. 673, 674, 679, &c.). By way of practice in the art he was accustomed to make his pupils discuss Theses (communes loci) on opposite sides (antimonically) (Diog. Laërt. ix. 52, &c.; comp. Suid. s. v.; Dionys. Halic. Isocr. Timon in Diog. Laërt. ix. 52; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 57; Cic. Brut. 12); an exercise which is also recommended by Cicero (ad Att. iv. 4), and Quintilian (x. 5, § 10). The method was probably unfolded in his Art of Dispute (τεχνὴ ὑποτασσόντων, see above). But he also directed his attention to language, endeavoured to explain difficult passages in the poets, though not always with the best success (Plat. Prot. p. 338, c. &c.; comp. respecting his and the opposed Platonic exposition of the well-known lines of Simonides, Frei, p. 122, &c.); entered at some length into the threefold gender of names (ἀνδρών, θηλέων, and σειδρέων, Arist. Rhet. iii. 5, Ed. Soph. c. 14; comp. Aristoph. Nub.

between him and his wife Laodameia, the daughter of Acastus. When she heard of the death of her husband, she prayed to the infernal gods to be allowed to converse with him only for the space of three hours. The prayer being granted, Hermes conducted Proteus for a few hours to the upper world, and when Proteus died a second time, Laodameia expired with him (Hygin. Fab. 108; Eustath. p. 525). This story, from which the account of Lucian differs only slightly, has been variously modified by the poets, for, according to some, Laodameia, after the second death of her husband, made an image of him, which she worshipped, and when her father Acastus ordered her to burn it, she threw herself with the image into the flames (Hygin. Fab. 104). According to others, Proteus, on returning from the lower world, found his wife embracing his image, and when he died the second time, he begged of her not to follow too late, whereupon she killed herself with a sword. Others again relate that Laodameia, being compelled by her father to marry another man, spent her nights with the image of Proteus (Eustath. l. c.); but Conon (Narrat. 13), lastly, has quite a different tradition, according to him, Proteus, after the Trojan war, took with him Aethylla, a sister of Priam, who was his prisoner. When, on his homeward voyage, he landed on the Macedonian peninsula of Pallene, between Mende and Scione, and had gone some distance from the coast, to fetch water, Aethylla prevailed upon the other women to set fire to the ships. Proteus, accordingly, was obliged to remain there, and built the town of Scione.

His tomb was shown near Eleus, in the Thracian Chersonesus (Strab. xiii. p. 559; Paus. i. 34 § 2; Tzetza. ad Lyc. 532). There was a belief that nymphs had planted elm-trees around his grave, and that those of their branches which grew on the Trojan side were sooner green than the others, but that at the same time the foliage faded and died earlier (Philost. Her. ii. 1); or it was said that the trees, when they had grown so high as to see Troy, died away, and that fresh shoots then sprang from their roots (Plin. H. N. xvi. 99; Anthol. Palat. vii. 141, 385). A magnificent temple was erected to Proteus at Eleus, and a sanctuary, at which funeral games were celebrated, existed in Phylace (Herod. vii. 33, 116, 120; Paus. iii. 4 § 5; Pind. l. c. i. 53, with the Schol.). Proteus himself was represented in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 30 § 1.)

PROTEUS (Πρωτέας), the prophetic old man of the sea (αἰών γύρω), occurs in the earliest legends as a subject of Poseidon, and is described as seeing through the whole depth of the sea, and tending the flocks (the seals) of Poseidon (Hom. Od. iv. 365, 383, 400; Virg. Georg. iv. 392; Theoc. ii. 58; Horat. Carm. i. 2. 7; Philost. Icon. i. 17). He resided in the island of Pharos, at the distance of one day's journey from the river Aegypus (Nile), whence he is also called the Egyptian (Hom. Od. iv. 355, 363). Virgil, however, instead of Pharos, mentions the island of Carpathos, between Crete and Rhodes (Geogr. iv. 307; comp. Hom. ii. ii. 67), whereas, according to the same poet, Proteus was born in Thessaly (Geogr. iv. 390, comp. Aen. xi. 262). His life is described as follows. At midday he rises from the flood, and sleeps in the shadow of the rocks of the coast, and around him lie the monsters of the deep (Hom. Od.
iv. 400; Virg. Georg. iv. 395). Any one wishing to compel him to foretell the future, was obliged to catch hold of him at that time; he, indeed, had the power of giving every possible shape, in order to escape the necessity of prophesying, but whenever he saw that his endeavours were of no avail, he resumed his usual appearance, and told the truth (Hom. Od. iv. 410, &c. 455, &c.; Ov. Art. Am. i. 761, Past. i. 369; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. i. 4). When he had finished his prophecy he returned into the sea (Hom. Od. iv. 570). Homer (Od. iv. 395) ascribes to him one daughter, Eidothea, but Apollodorus (ii. 72) mentions another called Gentius (as did authors of the 1st and 2nd century), and Zenodotus (ap. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1500) mentions Eurynome instead of Eidothea. He is sometimes represented as riding through the sea, in a chariot drawn by Hippocampa. (Virg. Georg. iv. 389.)

Another set of traditions describes Proteus as a son of Poseidon, and as a king of Egypt, who had two sons, Telegonus and Polygonus or Tomulus. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 3; Tzetz. ad Luc. 124.) Diodorus however observes (i. 62), that only the Greeks called him Proteus, and that the Egyptians called him Cetes. His wife is called Psimathei (Europ. Hel. 7) or Torone (Tzetz. ad Luc. 115), and, besides the above mentioned sons, Theoclymenus and Theonoe are likewise called his children. (Europ. Hel. 9, 13.) He is said to have hospital received Dionysus during his wanderings (Apollod. iii. 5. § 1), and Hermes brought to him Helena after her abduction (Europ. Hel. 46), or, according to others, Proteus himself took her from Paris, gave to the lover a phantom, and restored the true Helen to Menelus after his return from Troy. (Tzetz. ad Luc. 112, 920; Herod. ii. 112,118.) The story further relates that Proteus was originally an Egyptian, but that he went to Thrace and there married Torone. But as his sons by her used great violence towards strangers, he prayed to his father Poseidon to carry him back to Egypt. Poseidon accordingly opened a chasm in the earth in Pallene, and through a passage passing through the earth under the sea he led him back into Egypt. (Tzetz. ad Luc. 124; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 686.) A second personage of the name of Proteus is mentioned by Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5) among the sons of Amygous.

PROTHOE'NOI (Προθοενόι), a son of Areius, was one of the leaders of the Boeotians against Troy, where he was slain by Polydamas. (Hom. II. ii. 493, xiv. 450, &c.)

PROTHOUS (Πρόθοος), a son of Tenthredon, commander of the Magnesians who dwelt about mount Pelion and the river Peneus, was one of the Greek heroes at Troy. (Hom. II. ii. 758.) There are three other mythical personages of this name, the one a son of Agrius (Apollod. i. 6. § 6), the second a son of Lycon (iii. 8. § 1), and a third a son of Theseus and brother of Alcaeus. (Paus. viii. 45. § 5, who calls him Πρόθοος.) [L. S.]

PROATEGNEIA (Πρωταγενεία). 1. A daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha. (Apollod. i. 7. § 2.) She was married to Lócrus, but had no children; Zeus, however, who carried her off, became by her, on mount Maenalus in Arcadis, the father of Opus. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. ix. 83; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1730.) According to others she was not the mother, but a daughter of Opus. (Schol. ad Pind. l.c.) Endymion also is called a son of Protogeneia. (Conon, Narrat. 14.)

2. A daughter of Calydon and Aesol. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7.)

PROTOGENES (Πρωτόγενης), the chief instrument of the cruelties of the emperor Caligula, used to carry about him two books, one called the sword, and the other the dagger, in which were entered the names of the persons destined for death. These books were found, after the emperor's death, in his secret depositaries. They were burnt by order of Claudius, who likewise put Protogenes to death. (Dion Cass. lxi. 26, ix. 4; Suet. Cal. 37; Oros. vii. 5.)

PROTOKRÖ'GENES (Πρωτοκρόγενος), artists. 1. One of the most celebrated Greek painters, lived at the period of the greatest perfection of the art, and was contemporary with Apelles, about Ol. 112, a. c. 332. Almost all we know of him is contained in a passage of Pliny, the text of which is very much corrupted, yet not so as to affect any essential point in the history of the artist or his works. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 20.)

Protogenes was a native of Caunus, in Caria, a city subject to the Rhodians.* (Comp. Paus. i. 3. § 4; Plut. Demet. 22; Suidas makes him a native of Xanthus, in Lycia, s. c.) He resided at Rhodes almost entirely; the only other city of Greece which is said to have visited is Athens, where he executed one of his great works in the Propylaea. He appears to have been one of those men, who, combining the highest genius with modesty and contentment, only obtain by the exertions of generous friends the reputation which they have earned. Up to his fiftieth year he is said to have lived in poverty and in comparative obscurity, supporting himself by painting ships, which at that period used to be decorated with elaborate pictorial devices. His fame had, however, reached the ears of Apelles, who, upon visiting Rhodes, made it his first business to seek out Protogenes. The interesting trial of skill, by which the two artists introduced themselves to each other, has been related under Apelles. As the surest way of making the merits of Protogenes known to his fellow-citizens, Apelles offered him, for his finished works, on which Protogenes himself had set a very insignificant price, the enormous sum of fifty talents apiece (quinquagenis talentis), at the same time spreading the report, that he intended to sell the pictures as his own. The Rhodians were thus roused to an understanding of what an artist they had among them; and Apelles at once confirmed the impression by his own merit, who were anxious to retain such valuable works in their country pay for their previous indifference, by refusing to part with them except for an advanced price. (Plin. L. c. § 13.)

We possess the record of another interesting scene in the artist's tranquil life. When Demetrius Poliorcetes was using every effort to subdue Rhodes, he refrained from attacking the city at its most vulnerable point, lest he should injure the masterpieces of Protogenes, his Ialyus, which had been placed in that quarter; and he also paid the flattery interests to the artist himself. Protogenes, who was residing in his suburban cottage (comp.

* The words of Pliny, gentis Rhodis subjectae, which have given the critics much trouble, are now established as the true reading by the authority of the Bamberg MS., confirmed by historical testimonies as to the matter of fact. (See James's collation of the Bamberg MS., appended to Silling's edition of Pliny.)
PROTOGENES.

l. c. s. 37: casula Protogenes contentus est in hortutulo suo) amidst the very camp of Demetrius, when the hostilities commenced, proceeded in his works with his usual steady perseverance, and, on the king’s sending for him, amicably consented how he could be so bold as to live and work without the walls, he replied, that he knew that the king was at war with the Rhodians, but not with the arts.
His confidence had its reward. Demetrius stationed guards about his house, to preserve him from injury; and, instead of calling him away from his work to play the courtier, he himself withdrew from the military cares on which he was so intent, to visit the artist in his studio, and stood watching his work surrounded by the din of arms and the thunder of the battering engines. In the honourable tranquillity thus secured to him during this year of tumult, Protogenes completed one of his most celebrated works. (Plin. l. c.; comp. vii.
36. s. 39.)

This form of the story is not only the most interesting, but at least as credible as any other, when Pliny doubtless copied it from some old Greek writer upon art. According to Plutarch (Demetr. 22, Reg. et Imp. Apophth. p. 183 b.), the picture on which Protogenes was engaged in his suburban residence, was the Ialysus itself; and the Rhodians, alarmed for the safety of the unfinished work, sent heralds to Demetrius, to entreat him to spare it, to whom Demetrius replied, that he would rather destroy the images of his father than that picture. Aulus Gallius (xv. 3) gives still another, and the least probable version of the story.
(See also Suid. s. v.)

From this story it appears that Protogenes lived at least down to B. C. 303; and, connecting this with the statement that he was fifty years old before he attained to wealth and high reputation, the conjecture of Meyer (Gescht. d. bild. Künst.
voll. i. p. 189), that he was born about 01. 104, is not improbable. Müller gives 01. 112—120,
b. c. 332—300, as the time during which he flour-ihished.

Protogenes belongs to the number of self-taught artists; at least as in so far as, that he owed comparatively nothing of his merits or reputation to whatever instruction he may have received.
The name of his teacher was unknown; and the obscenity in which he so long lived is a proof that he had none of the prestige which attaches to the pupils of a celebrated school. His disadvantages in this respect he laboured to counteract by the most unwearied diligence. In characterizing the several painters of the period of the perfection of the art, Quinillian mentions Protogenes as excelling the rest in the care with which he wrought up his pictures (XII. 10, § 6). On his most celebrated picture he is said to have spent seven years, or seven, according to another statement, whereby he to have painted it four times over (Plin. l. c.; Aelian, xii. 41; Fronto, 11). In the opinion of Apelles, he carried this elaboration of his works to a fault, as we learn from an interesting story which is told, with some variations, by Pliny, Aelian, and Plutarch, respecting the criticisms of Apelles on the work just referred to, the Ialysus of Protogenes. On first beholding the picture, Apelles stood in silent admiration; and presently he remarked that the work and the artist were alike great, and that Protogenes was in every respect equal to himself or even superior, with the exception of two points, the one, that he did not know when to take his hand off his picture, the other,

that he was deficient in that peculiar grace which Apelles always claimed as the one great quality by which he himself excelled all other artists (Plin.
l. c. § 10; Phyt. Demetr. 22; Aelian, l. c.; comp.
Cic. Orat. 22). Several passages might be quoted to prove the high esteem in which Protogenes was held by the ancients. That truth to nature, which in various degrees characterised the works of all the great artists of the age, was so conspicuous in his,
that Petronius speaks of them as vying in truth with nature herself (Sat. 84). Cicero mentions him as one of the painters whose works were per-fet in every respect. (Brut. 18; see also Varro, L. L. ix. 12, ed. Müller; Colum. R. R. i. pref. §
31.)

The number of the works of Protogenes was comparatively small, as Pliny remarks, on account of the labour he bestowed upon each of them. His master-piece was the picture of Ialysus, the tutelary hero of Rhodes, to which reference has already been made. If we may believe the statement of Pliny, the artist lived, during all the years he was engaged on this picture, upon moistened lupines, in order that he might just satisfy the cravings of hunger and thirst, without subjecting himself to any sensation of corporeal pleasure which might interfere with the devotion of his whole faculties to the work. The same writer informs us that Protogenes painted this picture over four times, as a precaution against damage and decay, so that, if one surface should be removed, another might appear from beneath it. Nearly all modern artists treat this reason as absurd, and explain the fact mentioned by Pliny, supposing it to be correct, simply as an example of the artist’s elaborate finish. Very possibly the statement may be a conjecture of Pliny’s own, founded upon the appearance presented by some parts of the picture, where the colour had peeled off. Another of Pliny’s statements about the picture relates to the accidental production of one of the most effective parts of it, the foam at the mouth of a tired hound. The artist, he tells us, dissatisfied with his repeated atttempts to produce the desired effect, at last, in his vexation, dashed the sponge, with which he had repeatedly effaced his work, against the faulty place; and the sponge, charged as it was by repeated use with the necessary colours, left a mark in which the painter recognised the very form which his art had failed to produce. Amidst all this truly Plinian gossip about the picture, we are left in profound ignorance of its composition:
all that is clear is, that the hero was represented either as hunting, or as returning or just returned from the chase. It was, no doubt, dedicated in the temple of Ialysus at Rhodes, where it escaped de-bstruction in the siege by Demetrius, as above related, and where it was seen by Cicero (Orat. 5), who again refers to it in a manner which perhaps implies that it had suffered from neglect (ad Att.
ii. 21: we say perhaps, because the sentence is merely hypothetical). He also mentions it in his enunciation of the chief works of art existing in his time (in Verr. iv. 60). In the time of Strabo it was still at Rhodes (xiv. p. 682); but, when Pliny wrote, it had been carried to Rome, where it formed part of the rich collection in the temple of Peace. Suidas (e. v.) mentions the picture as a strange and wonderful work, but appears to have mistaken the hero Ialysus for Dionysus (the reading however is doubtful).

His next most famous picture was that which Pliny tells us he painted during the siege of Rhodes, and to which, from that circumstance, a peculiar interest was attached (Sequiturque tabulam ejus temporis haec fama, quod eam Protogenes sub gladio pinxerit). Its subject was a satyr resting (quem Anapauomenon vocavit), and still holding the pipes; a subject strikingly similar to the celebrated Satyr of Praxiteles, though, of course, treated differently in the two different departments of art. This picture was still at Rhodes in the time of Strabo, who mentions it and the Ialysus, and the Colossus, as the most remarkable objects at that place (l.c.). The Satyr (Strabo tells us) was leaning against a column, upon which the artist had originally painted a partridge sitting; but the people, who flocked to see the picture, were so struck with the perfectly natural appearance of the bird that they entirely overlooked the principal figure; and, to make matters worse, the bird-keepers brought tame partridges, which were no sooner placed opposite the picture than they began to chirp at the painted bird, thinking it alive, to the unbounded delight of the multitude. On this Protogenes, feeling that his labour was lost (apud v. frons paceron yé-yovos), obtained permission from the keepers of the temple, and obliterated the partridge from the picture.

Another celebrated work of Protogenes was that in the Propylaea of the Acropolis of Athens, which Pliny thus describes: nobilis Paralum et Ammonias, quam quidam Nausicaam vocavit. The Paralus, as is well known, was one of the two sacred ships of the Athenians, to which, at a later period, three more were added, of which one was the Ammonias, that is, the vessel in which offerings were sent to Jupiter Ammon. Thus much is clear; but how these vessels were represented, whether each formed a separate picture, or the two were combined in one composition, and what we are to understand by the phrase, quam quidam Nausicaam vocavit, that is, what the ship Ammonias (or the picture) had to do with Nausicaa and the island of the Phaeacians,—are questions extremely difficult to solve. Pausanias, indeed, tells us (i. 22 § 6) that one of the paintings in the Propylaea represented Nausicaa and her maidens bathing, with Ulysses near them, as described by Homer (Od. vi. init.); but he ascribes the picture to Polygnotus, and says not a word of the sacred ships. The only escape yet suggested from this labyrinth of confusion, is by following the clue furnished by the conjecture of Otfrid Müller (Arch. d. Kästl., Nachträge, p. 707, 2d ed.), that, instead of carrying on the nominate Polýgnotos in the passage of Pausanias, we should insert πρωτογέφυρας after ἔγραψε δ' καλ', so as to make him, and not Polygnotus, the painter of the picture which Pausanias describes as that of Nausicaa; and further, that the very subject of the painting was disputed among the ancients themselves, "some," as Pliny says, "taking it for Nausicaa," among whom was Pausanias; and others, of whom Pliny himself was one, regarding it as the representation of some harbour, into which the ships Paralus and Ammonias were sailing. A carding to this view the group which Pausanias took for Nausicaa and her companions may be explained as a group of maidens celebrating the festival of the god to whom the sacred vessels are bringing their offerings. This painting is also mentioned by Cicero, like the Ialysus, as one of the greatest works in existence, but he does not mention the artist's name (in Verr. l.c.). Pliny tells us that Protogenes, in memory of his former circumstances, added to this picture some little ships of war, as additional ornaments or bordering (parerga).

Another picture, which Protogenes painted at Athens, was that of the Thesmophoriae, in the senate-house of the Five Hundred (Paus. i. 3 § 4). The other works of Protogenes, in the list of Pliny, are Cyclops, Telephus, the tragic poet Phælius meditating (Phælius), an athlete, king Antigonus, and the mother of Aristotle. Pliny adds that the great philosopher advised the artist to paint Alexander "propter aeternitatem rerum;" but that his own taste and the impulse of his genius carried him to other subjects, so that there was only one of his pictures, and that the last, in which the Macedonian conqueror appeared: this composition is called by Pliny Alexander and Pan.

In the enumeration of his works, that celebrated panel must not be forgotten, which, in the three simple lines, preceded the memorial of the celebrated contest between Apelles and Protogenes, and excited more admiration than the great works of art near which it was preserved at Rome. To what has been said on this subject under Apelles, it need only be added that the words of Pliny, who had seen the picture (and that, no doubt, repeatedly), evidently describe mere lines drawn right across the panel (per tabulum); and even writers who object to such a display, as not even within the province of painting, and who seek for other ingenious and elaborate interpretations (such as that the three lines were three outlines of figures or limbs), are found to admit, not only that the notion of their being three simple lines is the only one countenanced by the text of Pliny (who, we repeat, saw the picture), but also that this feat, though merely manual, was all the greater and more wonderful, on account of their being mere lines of expressive thiness, the one as thick as the other, from the extraordinary command of the instrument, and precision of eye and hand which such a feat supposes. Let it be remembered also, how great was the importance which the ancients rightly attached to accurate drawing; and, we would add, let those who sneer at the performance attempt to reproduce it.

Protogenes excelled also as a statuary (Plin. l.c.), though none of his works are individually specified: Pliny only mentions him among the artists who made, in bronze, athletas et armatus et venatares sacri-ficientesque (H. N. xxxiv. 8, 19 § 34). According to Suidas, Protogenes wrote two works on art, namely, Περὶ γραφῆς καὶ χυμῆς τῶν βιβλίων. 2. A freedman in the family of Augustus, was an artist in gold and silver. (Bianchini, Sepolcro de' Servi, n. 191; R. Rocckette, Lettre à M. Nekorn, p. 394.) that is, “the work of Protoς, the chief of the artists’ workshop.” (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorau, pp. 394, 395.)

PRO’XENUS (Προ’ξενος). 1. A native of Boeotia (according to Dioec. xiv. 19, of Thebes). He was a disciple of Gorgias, and a friend of Xenophon. Being connected by the ties of hospitality with the younger Cyrus, the latter engaged him in his service. He came to Sardes at the head of 1,500 heavy armed, and 500 light armed soldiers. (Xen. Hellen. i. 3. § 1.) He was at his invitation that Xenophon was induced to enter the service of Cyrus (iii. 1. §§ 4, 8). He was one of the ill-fated generals whom Clearchus persuaded to accompany him to Tissaphernes. He was seized with the rest, and taken to the king of Persia, and afterwards put to death (ii. 5, § 31, &c. § 1). Xenophon speaks of him as a man whose ambition was under the influence of strict probity, and who was especially anxious to secure the affections of his soldiers, so that while the well-disposed readily obeyed him, he failed to inspir the rest with a wholesome fear of his authority (ii. 6. § 17, &c.). He was 80 years of age at the time of his death (b. c. 401). For other occasions on which he is mentioned by Xenophon, see Anab. i. 5. § 14, ii. 1. § 10, v. 3. § 5. (Comp. Diog. Laërt. ii. 49.)

2. A brother of Hermocrates of Syracuse. (Xen. Hellen. i. 3. § 13.)

3. One of the Tegrates, who was selected to join in founding Megalopoli. (Paus. viii. 27. § 2; Xen. Hellen. vi. 5. § 6.)

PRO’XENUS (Προ’ξενος), literary. 1. Two persons of this name, one of Posidonius, and the other of Sybaris, are mentioned among the followers of Pythagoras by Iamblichus (Vit. Pythk. cap. ult.).

2. A person mentioned in Aristotle’s will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 15.) From the directions given regarding his likeness, it is probable that he enjoyed the intimate friendship of the philosopher. (W. M. G.)

PRIMOXMUS, STATIUS, a tribune of the praetorian cohorts, joined the conspiracy of Piso against Nero. He was pardoned by the emperor, but put an end to his own life, through the foolish vanity of obtaining renown by dying when he might have lived. (Tac. Ann. xv. 50, 71.)

PRUDENTIUS, AURELIUS CLMENS. Our acquaintance with the personal history of Prudentius, whom Bentley has designated as “the Horace and Virgil of the Christians,” is derived exclusively from a short autobiography in verse, written when the poet was fifty-seven years old, and serving as an introduction to his works, of which it contains a catalogue. From this we gather that he was born during the reign of Constantius II. and Constant, in the consulship of Philippus and Saia, a. d. 348; that after acquiring, when a boy, the rudiments of liberal education, he frequented, as a youth, the schools of the rhetoricians, indulging freely in dissipated pleasures; that having attained to manhood, he practised as a lawyer and pleader; that he subsequently discharged the duties of a civil and criminal judge in two important cities; that he received from the emperor (Theodotus, probably, or Honorius), a high military appointment at court, which placed him in a station next to that of the prince, and that as he advanced in years, he became deeply sensible of the emptiness of worldly honour, and earnest in his devotion to the exercises of religion. Of his career after a. d. 405, or of the epoch of his death, we know nothing, for the praises of Stilicho, who suffered the penalty of his treason in 413, indicate that the piece in which they appear (C. Symm. ii.) must have been published before that date, but can lead to no inference with regard to the decease of the author.

The above notices are expressed with so much brevity, and in terms so indefinite, that a wide field has been thrown open to critics for the exercise of ingenuity in explaining and interpreting them. Every thing, however, beyond what we have stated, rests upon conjecture. We may, indeed, safely conclude that Prudentius was a Spaniard (see especially Peristeph. vi. 146); but the assertions with regard to the place of his birth, rest upon no sure foundation; for although he speaks of the inhabitants of Saragossa (Peristeph. iv. 1. comp. 97) as “noster populus,” he uses elsewhere the self-same phrase with regard to Rome (C. Symm. i. 192, comp. 36), and applies the same epithet to Calahorn (Peristeph. i. 116, iv. 31), and to Tarragona (Peristeph. iv. 143). In like manner the attempts to ascertain the towns in which he discharged his judicial functions, and to determine the nature of the dignity to which he was eventually elevated, have proved entirely abortive. With regard to the latter, Gemnadius concludes that he was what was called a Palatins miles, i.e. an officer of the household (Cod. Theod. 6. ttt. 57), and certainly it is highly improbable that he ever was employed in active service; others imagine that he was consul, or praefect of the city — or of the praetorium — or that he was raised to the rank of patriarch — opinions unsupported by even plausible arguments, and therefore not worth confuting.

The extant poems of Prudentius, of which we now proceed to give a list, are composed in a great variety of metres, and these we shall describe as we go along.

I. Paeifictio, containing, as we have already remarked, an autobiography and a catalogue of the author’s works. It extends to forty-five verses, and is composed in a stanza which would be termed technically Triocolon Tristrophon, the first line being a Choriambic Dimeter, the second a Choriambic Triimeter, the third a Choriambic Tetrameter, all acatalectic, and all formed upon the Homatian model.

II. Cathemerinon (i.e. καθημερινὸς ἡμέρα) Liber. A series of twelve hymns proper to be repeated or sung by the devout Christian; the first six at particular periods during each day; the remainder, with one exception, adapted to special occasions:

1. Ad Galliacauntum, 100 lines, Iambic Dim. Acat.

2. Hymmus Matutinus, 112 lines, same metre as the preceding.

PRUDENTIUS.

III. Apotheosis. On the divinity of Christ and his relation to the Father. The orthodox doctrine of the Trinity is here defended against the Sabellians, the Jews, the Ebionites, the Marcionites, and other heretics, while various discussions are intermingled on the Nature of the Soul, on Original Sin, and on the Resurrection. We have first a Praefatio of 56 lines in Iambic Trim. Acat. and Iambic Dim. Acat., placed alternately as in the first and second Epodes of Horace, after which follows the main body of the piece, comprised in 1084 heroic hexameters.

IV. Hamartigenia (Ἀμαρτγενεία). On the origin of evil and of sin, occupied chiefly with a refutation of the heresies of the Marcionites. We have first a Praefatio of 63 lines in Iambic Trim. Acat., after which follows the main body of the piece, comprised in 965 heroic hexameters.

V. Psychomachia. The conflict and triumph of virtue in the soul of the Christian, especially of Faith, Chastity, Meekness, Humility, Moderation, Libcrality, and Concord, against their antagonistic virtues. We have first a Praefatio of 63 lines in Iambic Trim. Acat., after which follows the main body of the piece, comprised in 915 heroic hexameters.

VI. Contra Symmachum Libror. I. An expose of the origin and worthlessness of the heathen gods, together with an account of the conversion of Rome to Christianity. We have first a Praefatio of 89 lines in Choriambic Trim. Acat., after which follows the main body of the piece comprised in 657 heroic hexameters.

VII. Contra Symmachum Libror. II. A refutation of the statements and arguments in the celebrated petition presented by Symmachus (Συμμαχος) to the emperor Valentinian, praying for the restoration of the altar and statue of Victory, cast down by Gratian. We have a second preface of 65 lines in Choriambic Dim. Acat., followed by 1132 heroic hexameters.

VIII. Persidiphasian Libor (Περί στρατάρχου), a series of letters written in honour of various saints, many of them Spanish, who had worn the crown of martyrdom. 1. Passio Emeterii et Chelidonii Calugarianorum Martyrum, 120 lines, Trochaic Tetram. Cat. 2. Passio Laurentii Martyris, 584 lines, Iambic Dim. Acat. 3. In Honorlem Eulaliae Virginis, 215 lines, Dactylic Trim. Hypercat. 4. Passio XVIII. Martyrum Caesarugustanorum, 200 lines, in the Sapphic Stanza. 5. Passio Vincentii, 575 lines, Iambic Dim. Acat. 6. In horem B. Fructuosi episcopi Tarraconensis et Aurelii episcopi Diaconorum, 162 lines, Phalaecean hendecasyllabics. 7. Passio Quirini episcopi ecclesiae Siscanae, 90 lines, Choriambic Dim. Acat. 8. De loco quo Martyres passi sunt, num Baptisterium Calugari, 16 lines in the Elegiac distich. 9. Passio Cassiani, 106 lines, consisting of the heroic hexameter and Iambic Trim. Acat., placed alternately as in Hor. Epod. xvi. 10. Romani Martyrum Suppletionem, 1140 lines, Iambic Trim. Acat. 11. Passio Hippolyti Martyris, 246 lines in the Elegiac distich. 12. Passio Petri et Pauli Apostolorum, 66 lines, in a distich consisting of a logoeidic verse placed alternately with the Iambic Trim. Cat., being the same measure as that employed by Horace, C. i. 4. 13. Passio Cypriani Martyris, 106 lines, a system of the logoeidic verses employed in the preceding. 14. Passio Agnatis Virginis, a system of 133 Alcaic Hendecasyllabic verses, the same with those which form the first two lines of the Alcaic stanza in Horace, IX. Dityphon (or Ditrochoeon). Forty-eight tetrastichs in heroic hexameters relating to remarkable events and characters in Bible history, twenty-four being appropriated to those connected with the Old and twenty-four to those belonging to the New Testament. A keen controversy has arisen with regard to the authenticity of these summaries. They are not mentioned by Prudentius in his autobiography, when enumerating the rest of his productions, and they have been considered of an inferior stamp. Moreover, although found in all the best MSS., they are frequently placed, as it were apart, after the Epilogus mentioned below, thus indicating some suspicion in regard to the authorship, and in one codex they are ascribed to Amaenas, which some suppose to be merely a complimentary epithet, while others, contending that it is a proper name, have called into existence an independent Prudentius Amaenas unheard of elsewhere. With regard to the title, we read in Gemmadius that the Prudentius, vir seculari lituram eruditus, composuit Διτροχαεων de toto Veteri et Novo Testamento personis exceptis. Now, this Διτροχαεων, which has been interpreted to signify ciliaun duplex (i. e. the Old and New Testaments), appears under the varying shapes Ditrochoeon, Ditrochoeon, Ditrochoeôn, Dityphon, as the designation prefixed to the tetrastichs in the MSS., and we can scarcely doubt that Dityphon (Διτροχαεω) is the true form, and that the rest are corruptions. On the whole, notwithstanding the formidable array of arguments in support of the opposite view of the question, there does not seem sufficient grounds for rejecting these little narratives as spurious, or for regarding them, as some have done, in the light of abridgments by a later hand, of a more voluminous original. The circumstance, that Prudentius does not include them in his list proves nothing, since they may have been written at a later period; and that some portion of the kind actually was written seems clear from the passage in Gemmadius, obscure though it be.

X. Epilogus, from which we may, perhaps, infer that the preceding pieces had been composed after Prudentius had withdrawn from public life; thirty-four lines, Trochaic Dim. Cat. and Iambic Trim. Cat. placed alternately.

The Hexameron and the Invitatio (or Invitatorium) ad Martyrium, placed by Gemmadius among the works of Prudentius, are no longer extant, and many doubt whether they ever existed. The clause in which the latter is named is so confused as to be almost unintelligible.

Although considerable diversity of opinion has always prevailed with regard to the merits of Prudentius, it is hard to understand how he ever acquired that amount of reputation which he has undoubtedly enjoyed among many eminent modern scholars. We are not at all surprised by the admiration with which he was viewed in the middle ages; and we may not feel, perhaps, much astonished by the panegyrics even of Fabricius, Barth and Tillemon; but how one so acute as Bentley, a critic little addicted to hyperbolical commendation, could have employed the phrase
PRUSIAS.

PRUSIAS I. (Ποπωτας), king of Bithynia, was the son of Zieus, whom he succeeded on the throne, and grandson of Nocmides I. The date of his accession is unknown, but it appears that it preceded the death of Antiochus Ilcras, and may therefore be placed at least as early as B. C. 226. (Trog. Pomp. Prot. xxvii.; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 413, 414; Niebuhr, Kl. Schrift. p. 287.) The first event of his reign, which is recorded to us, is a war with the Byzantines, in which we find him engaging in B. C. 220, in conjunction with the Rhodians. The latter were at first supported by Attalus, king of Pergamus, as well as by Achaeus, who had lately assumed the sovereignty of Asia Minor, and they endeavoured also to set up Tiboetcs, the uncle of Prusias, as a competitor for the throne of Bithynia. Their efforts were, however, unsuccessful: Prusias conquered all the possessions of the Byzantines in Asia, while the Thracians pressed them closely on the European side, and they were soon compelled to submit to a peace on disadvantageous terms. (Polyb. iv. 47—52.) Shortly after this, in B. C. 217, Prusias is mentioned among the princes who sent costly presents to the Rhodians after the great calamity they had suffered by an earthquake: and the following year (216) he obtained great distinction by defeating and cutting to pieces a formidable army of Gauls, who had been invited into Asia by Attalus, and had become the terror of the adjoining countries. (Id. v. 90, 111.) On the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Philip, king of Macedon, Prusias lent his assistance to the latter; and besides supplying him with an auxiliary squadron of ships, rendered him a more important service by invading the territories of his own neighbour and rival Attalus, whom he thus recalled from Greece to the defence of his own kingdom, B. C. 207. (Livy. xxviii. 30, xxviii. 7.) The name of the Bithynian monarch was, in consequence, included in the treaty of peace between Philip and the Romans in B. C. 205 (Livy. xxxix. 12), and we subsequently find the two kings uniting their forces to besiege Cius in Bithynia, which, after it had fallen into their hands, was sacked by order of Philip, the inhabitants sold as slaves, and the city itself given up to Prusias. (Polyb. xv. 21, xvii. 5; Livy. xxxix. 34; Strab. xii. p. 563.) It does not appear that the latter, though he was connected by marriage with the Macedonian king, took any part in the decisive struggle of Philip with the Roman power (B. C. 200—196); but in B. C. 190, when Antiochus was, in his turn, preparing to contend with the republic, he made repeated attempts to obtain the alliance of Prusias, who was at first disposed to lend a helping hand, but yielded. In the autumn of the two Scipios, and concluded an alliance with Rome, though he appears to have, in fact, taken no part in the war that followed. (Polyb. xxi. 9; Livy. xxxvii. 25; Appian. Syr. 23.) After the termination of that war, however, Prusias became involved in hostilities with Eumenes, king of Pergamus, by which he gave umbrage to the Romans, and he soon after greatly increased this offence by affording a shelter to his implacable enemy, the fugitive Hamibal. The exiled general rendered important services to the king in his contest with Eumenes, but, notwithstanding these obligations, Prusias was unwilling to brave the anger of Rome, and when Flamininus was deputed by the senate to demand the surrender of Hannibal, the king basely gave consent, and the Carthaginian general only escaped falling into the hands of his enemies by a voluntary death. (Polyb. xxiii. 18, xxiv. 1; Liv. xxxix. 51; Justin, xxxii. 4; Plut. Flaminius 20; Corn. Nep. Hanno. 10—12; App. Syr. 11; Eutrop. iv. 5; Oros. iv. 20; Strab. xii. p. 563.)

This is the last circumstance which can be referred with certainty to the elder Prusias: the period of his death, and of the accession of his son, is not mentioned by any ancient writer, but Mr. Clinton regards the Prusias mentioned in the treaty of B. c. 179, between Eumenes and Pharnaces, as the second king of this name; and this supposition, though not admitting of proof, appears at least a very probable one. (Clinton, R. I. vol. ii. p. 417.) In this case we must place his death between 183 and 179 B. C. It was apparently during the latter part of his reign that Prusias, who had already made himself master of Cierus, Ticio, and other dependencies of Heraclea, laid siege to that city itself; but while pressing the attack with vigour, he himself received a severe wound from a stone, which not only compelled him for a time to abandon the enterprise, but left him with a lameness for the remainder of his life. On this account he is sometimes distinguished by the epithet of the Lame (δ ο χαλκ) (Mennom. c. 27, ed. Orell.)

Prusias appears to have been a monarch of vigour and ability, and raised his kingdom of Bithynia to a much higher pitch of power and prosperity than it had previously attained. Like many of his contemporary princes, he sought distinction by the foundation or new settlement of cities, among the most conspicuous of which were Cius and Phrygiae, and the Propontis, which he repopulated and restored after their ruin by Philip, bestowing on the one his own name, while he called the other, his wife, Apameia. In addition to this, he gave the name of Prusias also to the small city of Cierus, which he had wrested from the Heracleans. (Strab. xii. p. 563; Steph. Byz. s. v. Προοσα and Ατταίεα, Mennom. c. 41, 47.) The foundation of Prusa, at the foot of Mount Olympus, is also ascribed to him by some authors. (Plin. v. 43. See on this point Droysen, Hettonism, vol. ii. p. 655.) Before the close of his reign, however, his power received a severe blow by the loss of the Helle-stone Phrygia, which he was compelled to cede to the kings of Pergamus; probably by the treaty which terminated the war already alluded to. (Strab. l. c.)

PRUSIAS II. (Προοσας), king of Bithynia, was the son and successor of the preceding. No mention is found in any extant author of the period that he was only known to it must have been subsequent to B. c. 183, as Strabo distinctly tells us (xii. p. 563), that the Prusias who received Hannibal at his court was the son of Zelias. In B. c. 179, we find the name of Prusias associated with Eumenes in the treaty concluded by that monarch with Pharnaces, king of Pontus (Polyb. xxvi. 6), and this is supposed by Clinton to be the younger Prusias. It is certain, at least, that he was already on the throne before the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Perseus, B. c. 171. Prusias had previously sued for and obtained in marriage a sister of the Macedonian king, but notwithstanding this alliance he determined to keep aloof from the impending contest, and await the result with a view to make his peace with whichever party should prove victorious. (Liv. xiii. 12, 29; Appian, Mithr. 2.) In B. c. 169, however, he ventured to send an embassy to Rome, to interpose his good offices in favour of Perseus, and endeavour to prevail upon the senate to grant him a peace upon favourable terms. His intervention, however, was haughtily rejected, and fortune having the next year decided in favour of the Romans, Prusias sought to avert any offence he might have given by this ill-judged step, by the most abject and sordid flatteries. He received the Roman deputies who were sent to his court, in the garb which was characteristic of an emancipated slave, and styled himself the freedman of the Roman people: and the following year, B. c. 167, he himself repaired to Rome, where he sought to conciliate the favour of the senate by similar acts of slavish adulation. By this meanness he disarmed the resentment of the Romans, and obtained a renewal of the league between him and the republic, accompanied even with an extension of territory. (Polyb. xxx. 16; Liv. xlv. 44; Diod. xxxi. Exc. Vat. p. 83, Exc. Legat. p. 565; Appian, Mithr. 2; Eutrop. iv. 8; Zonar. ix. 24.)

From this time we find Prusias repeatedly sending embassies to Rome to prefer complaints against Eumenes, which, however, led to no results (Polyb. xxxi. 6, 9, xxxii. 3, 5), until, at length, in B. c. 156, after the death of Eumenes, the disputes between his successor Attalus and the Bithynian king broke out into open hostilities. In these Prusias was at first successful, defeated Attalus in a great battle, and compelled him to take refuge in Pergamus, to which he led siege, but without effect. More in vogue, Attalus himself reported to Rome complaints of the aggression of the Bithynian king, and an embassy was sent by the senate, to order Prusias to desist: but he treated this command with contempt, and attacking Attalus a second time, again drove him within the walls of Pergamus. But the following year the arms of Attalus were more successful, and a fresh embassy from the senate at length compelled Prusias to make peace, B. c. 154. (Polyb. xxxii. 23, 26, xxxiii. 1, 10, 11; Appian, Mithr. 3; Diod. xxxi. Exc. Vales. p. 589.) Meanwhile, the Bithynian monarch had alienated the minds of his subjects by his vices and cruelties, and his son Nicomedes had become the object of the popular favour and admiration. This aroused the jealousy and suspicion of the old king, who, in order to remove his son from the eyes of his countrymen, sent him to Rome: and subsequently, as his apprehensions still increased, gave secret instructions to his ambassador Menas to murder him in presence of assassination. Menas, however, finding how high Nicomedes stood in the favour of the Roman senate, attached himself to the cause of the prince, and united with Andronicus the ambassador of Attalus in an attempt to establish Nicomedes on the throne of Bithynia. Prusias was unable to make head against the disaffection of his own subjects, supported by the arms of Attalus, and after an ineffectual appeal to the intervention of the Romans, who secretly favoured Nicomedes, shut himself up within the walls of Nicomedia. The gates were, however, opened by the inhabitants, and Prusias himself was slain in a temple, to which he had fled for refuge. His death took place in B. c. 149. (Ap-by Cambyses in B.C. 525, and his country made a province of the Persian empire. His life was spared by Cambyses, but as he was detected shortly afterwards in endeavouring to excite a revolt among the Egyptians, he was compelled to put an end to his life by drinking bull's blood. (Herod. iii. 10, 13—15.)

PSAMMIS (Ψαμμίς), king of Egypt, succeeded his father Necho in B.C. 601, and reigned six years. He carried on war against Ethiopia, and died immediately after his return from the latter country. He was succeeded by his son Apries in B.C. 596 or 595. (Herod. ii. 159—161.) In consequence of the shortness of his reign and his war with the Ethiopians, his name does not occur in the writers of the Old Testament, like those of his father and son. Herodotus is the only writer who calls him Psammithis. Manetho calls him Psammitithis, and Rosellini and Wilkinson make him Psametik II. (Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. p. 130.)

PSAMMITHICUS or PSAMMETICHUS (Ψαμμιθῐς ος, Ψαμμετῐχος), the Greek form of the Egyptian Psammitik. 1. A king of Egypt, and founder of the Saitic dynasty, reigned 54 years according to Herodotus, that is, from B.C. 671 to 617.* (Herod. ii. 157.) The manner in which Psammiticus obtained possession of the kingdom is related at length by Herodotus. After the death of Setho, the king and priest of Hephaestos, the dominion of Egypt was divided among twelve kings, of whom Psammiticus was one of these.

This period is usually called the Dodecarchia. The twelve kings probably obtained their independent sovereignty in the confusion which followed the death of Setho, of which Diodorus speaks (i. 66), and to which Isaiah probably alludes, when he says (Is. xix. 2), "they fought every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbour; city against city, and kingdom against kingdom." The Dodecarchia is not mentioned by Manetho, but he makes three kings of the Saitic dynasty intervene between the last of the Ethiopians and Psammitichus. This, however, need occasion us no surprise, because, as Bunsen remarks, lists of dynasties know nothing of anarchy or dodecarchies; and, in the chronological tables of a monarchy, the name of a prince has the dynastic right of occupying the period, which the historian must represent as an anarchy or a divided sovereignty. Thus Louis XVIII. did not enter France as king till the eighteenth year of his reign, and Louis XVII. is never even mentioned in French history.

But to return to the narrative of Herodotus. These

twelve kings reigned for a time in perfect harmony, and executed some great works in common, among which was the wonderful labyrinth near the lake Moeris. But an oracle had predicted, that whoever should pour a libation out of a brazen helmet in the temple of Hephaestus should become king of Egypt. Now it came to pass, that as the twelve kings were assembled on one occasion in the temple of Hephaestus, the priest, by accident, brought out only eleven golden goblets, and Psammitichus, who happened to be standing last, took off his brazen helmet, and used it as a substitute. The other kings, thinking that the oracle had been fulfilled, restored Psammitichus, and entertained him in their palaces. In these difficulties he sent to consult the oracle of Leto at Buto, and was told, “that vengeance would come by brazen men appearing from the sea.” This answer staggered his faith, but no long time afterwards word was brought to him, that brazen men had landed from the sea, and were plundering the country. These were Ionian and Carian pirates, who were dressed in an entire suit of brazen armour, which appears to have been unknown in Egypt. Believing that these were the men whom the oracle had foretold, he took them into his service, and with their aid conquered the other eleven kings, and became sole ruler of Egypt. (Herod. ii. 149—152.) The account of Herodotus, as Mr. Grote remarks, bears evident marks of being the genuine tale which he heard from the priests of Hephaestus, however little satisfactory it may be in an historical point of view. Diodorus (i. 66, 67) makes a more plausible historical narrative, which, however, is probably a corruption, by the later Greeks, of the genuine story. According to him, Psammitichus was king of Sais, and by his possession of the sea-coast, was enabled to carry on a profitable commerce with the Phoenicians and Greeks, by which he acquired so much wealth that his colleagues became jealous of him, and conspired against him. Psammitichus raised an army of mercenaries from Arabia, Caria, and Ionia, and defeated the other kings near Memphis. Polyænus (vii. 3) gives another version of the story about the Carian mercenaries. But whatever may have been the way in which Psammitichus obtained possession of the kingdom, there can be no doubt that Greek mercenaries rendered him most important assistance, and that he relied mainly upon them for preserving the power which he had gained by force. He accordingly provided for them a settlement on the Pelusiac or eastern branch of the Nile, a little below Bubastis, the Ionians on one side of the river, and the Carians on the other; and as the place, where they were stationed, was fortified, it was called Stratopedas, or the Camps. In order to facilitate intercourse between the Greeks and his other subjects, Psammitichus ordered a number of Egyptian children to live with them, that they might learn the Greek language; and from them sprang the class of interpreters (Herod. ii. 154). Strabo tells us (xvii. p. 801) that it was in the reign of Psammitichus that the Milesians, with a fleet of thirty ships, sailed up the Canopic or western branch of the Nile, and founded the city of Naukratis, which became one of the great emporia for commerce. It is certainly untrue that the Milesians founded Naukratis, as the city was of Egyptian origin; and it appears to have been the opinion of Herodotus that the Greeks first settled at Naukratis in the reign of Amasis. Still there are several circumstances which lead us to conclude that the Greeks had settled at Naukratis before the reign of the latter monarch, and it is therefore very probable that the western branch was opened in the reign of Psammitichus, for purposes of commerce. It appears, likewise, from the writers of the Old Testament, that many Jews settled in Egypt about this time. (Is. xix. 16; Jer. xlv. 1.)

The employment of foreign mercenaries by Psammitichus appears to have given great offence to the military caste in Egypt, and the king, relying on his large mercenary force, consulted his feelings and wishes of the native soldiery. It had been the previous practice to station the Egyptian troops on actual service at three different places: at Daphne, near Pelusium, on the eastern frontier, at Marea on the north-western frontier, and at Elephantine on the southern or Ethiopian frontier. As Psammitichus had no need of their services on the eastern frontier, which was guarded by his Greek mercenaries, he stationed a greater number than usual at the two other posts, and let them remain there unrelieved for the space of three years. Indignant at this treatment, and also because they were assigned a less honourable place in the line of battle than the Greek mercenaries, they emigrated in a body of 240,000 men, into Ethiopia, where settlements were assigned to them by the Ethiopian king (Herod. i. 50; Diod. i. 67). It must, therefore, have been chiefly with his Ionian and Carian troops that Psammitichus carried on his wars against Syria and Phoenicia, with the hope of bringing those rich and fertile countries under his dominion, an object which was followed up by his son and successor Neco. It is related of Psammitichus that he laid siege to the city of Azotus (the Ashdod of Scripture) for twenty-nine years, till he took it (Herod. ii. 157); and he was in Syria, when the Scythians were advancing against Egypt, and induced them by large presents to abandon their undertaking. (Herod. i. 105.)

As Psammitichus had displeased a large portion of his subjects by the introduction of foreigners, he seems to have paid especial court to the priesthood. He built the southern propylæa of the temple of Hephaestus at Memphis, and a splendid aula, with a portico round it, for the habitation of Apis, in front of the temple (Herod. ii. 153). (On the reign of Psammitichus, see Heeren, African Nations. vol. ii. p. 305, &c.; Bunsen, Aegypten Stille in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. p. 150, &c.; Böckh, Manetho und die Handstempelpériode, p. 341, &c.; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 429, &c.)

2. The father of Inaros, who defeated and slew Achaemenes, the son of Dareius Hystaspis. (Herod. vii. 7.) [INAROS.]

PSAYON (=Wasps), of Platea, a Greek writer, who continued the history of Dylus in 30 books. (Diod. xxi. 5, p. 490, ed. Wesseling; Dionys. Comp. Verb. c. 4.) [DIYLUS.]

PSELLUS (Ψέλλος). There are several Greek writers of this name, concerning whom Leo Allatius wrote a valuable dissertation, which was appended by Fabricius to the fifth volume of his Bibliotheca Graeca, and is repeated by Harless in an abridged form, but with additions and corrections, in the second edition (vol. x. pp. 41, &c.).

1. Simon, surnamed Pselius, though a Hebrew, PSELLUS.
and not himself a writer, deserves mention here, as he was the grandfather of Josephus (Jos. Vit. 1).

2. Michael Psellus, the elder, of Andros, flourished in the 9th century A.D. He was extremely learned in ancient literature and philosophy, and endeavoured to resist the torrent of ignorance and barbarism which was coming upon the Christian world. He was also an eager student of the Alexandrian philosophy. By these pursuits he incurred the suspicion of one of his own pupils, named Constantine, who attacked him in some elegiac verses, and to which he had renounced Christianity.

Upon this, Psellus wrote a defence of the celebrated Photius, and having thus improved his knowledge of theology, he replied to his adversary in a long iambic poem, which is not now extant. Cave places him at A.D. 870 (Hist. Litt. s. a. vol. ii. p. 55); Baronius and others at A.D. 859 (Saxe, Onomast.). Some writers have stated that he was the tutor of the emperor Leo VI., surnamed Sapientis; but this arises from a confusion of the emperor Leo, who was a pupil of Photius, with Leo Byzantinus, surnamed Philosopher, the grandson of John the patriarch: it was the latter who was the pupil of Psellus. Except the poem already referred to, we have no mention of any writings of the elder Psellus; but it is suspected by Cave, Allatius, and others, that he was the real author of some of the works which are ascribed to the younger Psellus, especially of the Dialogue on the Operations of Daemons, an unedited tract On Daemons, and a small work On Stones. The reasons for ascribing these works to the elder Psellus are their inferiority in style to the writings of the younger, and the traces they exhibit of the Alexandrian philosophy; but it is confessed that these reasons are indecisive. The Paraphrase to several Books of Aristotle, which is generally ascribed to Michael of Ephesus, is also thought by these scholars to be the work of the elder Psellus. (Compare Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. vol. iii. p. 538.)

3. Michael Constantinus Psellus the younger, a far more celebrated person, flourished in the 11th century of our era. He was born at Constantinople, of a consular and patrician family, A.D. 1020. When five years old he was placed in the hands of a tutor, to whom, however, he is said to have been far less indebted than to his own prodigious industry and talent. He afterwards studied at Athens, and excelled in all the learning of the age; so that he was a proficient at once in theology, jurisprudence, physics, mathematics, philosophy, and history. He taught philosophy, rhetoric, and dialectics, at Constantinople, where he stood forth as almost the last upholder of the falling cause of learning. The emperors honoured him with the title of Prince of the Philosophers (φιλοσοφόν ἐπίταρος), and did not disdain to use his counsels, and in effecting their elevation he even had a share. The period during which he thus flourished at Constantinople extends over the reigns of Constantius Monomachus (A.D. 1042—1054), his empress Theodora (to A.D. 1056), and Michael Stratonicus, who succeeded Theodora, and who entrusted Psellus with a conciliatory mission to Isaac Commnenus, whom the soldiers had saluted emperor in A.D. 1057. He still remained in favour with both these emperors, and with Constantinus Ducas, who succeeded Commnenus in A.D. 1060, and also with his successor Andocia, and her three sons. When Romanus Diogenes, whom Eudocia had married, was also declared emperor (A.D. 1068), Psellus was one of his counsellors; but three years afterwards he was the chief adviser, among the senators, of the measure by which Diogenes was deposed, and Michael VII. Ducas, the son of Constantinus Ducas, elected in his place, A.D. 1071. Michael was the pupil of Psellus himself, by whom he had been so thoroughly imbued with the love of letters, that, in spite of the remonstrances of Psellus, he devoted himself to study and wandering, to the neglect of his imperial duties. To this fall Michael is much indebted for the ingratitude of permitting his tutor to be supplanted in his favour by Joannes Italus, a man of far less talent, but an eloquent sophist, and a great favourite with the nobles, in discussions with whom the emperor spent his time. The deposition of Michael Ducas (A.D. 1078) was followed by the fall of Psellus, who was compelled by the new emperor, Nicephorus Botanius, to retire into a monastery; and in his dishonoured old age he witnessed the elevation of his rival to the title of Prince of the Philosophers, which he himself had so long held, and which the next emperor, Alexius Comnenus, conferred upon Joannes, in A.D. 1081. Psellus appears to have lived at least till A.D. 1105; some suppose that he was still alive in 1110, the thirtieth year of Alexius Comnenus.

He was not only the most accomplished scholar, but also the most voluminous writer of his age. His works are both prose and poetry, on a vast variety of subjects, and distinguished by a lofty eloquence and taste which are worthy of a better period.

A great number of the works of Psellus are still unedited. Of those which have been printed there is no complete collection. In 1532 a work was printed at Venice, in 8vo., and reprinted at Paris in 1541, in 12mo., entitled Pselli Introductio in sex Philosophiae Modus: Synopsis quinque vocum et decem Categoriarum, together with similar works by Blemmides and Georgius Pachymerius. With this exception, all his works have been published singly, as follows:—1. Περὶ ἐνεργειας βασιλεως διαλογος, de Operazione Daemonum Dia- logus, Gr. ed. G. Gualminus, Paris, 1613, 8vo.; carelessly reprinted, Kilon, 1688, 12mo. 2. De Lopidum Virtutibus, Gr. Lat. ed. Phill. Jacc. Maus- sacus, Tolos, 1615, 8vo.; re-edited by Jo. Steph. Bernardus, Lugd. Bat. 1745, 8vo. (It has been already stated that some scholars attribute these works to the elder Psellus.) 3. Synopsis Organis Aristotelicis, Gr. Lat. ed. a Elia Ehinger F. Aug. Vind. 1597, 8vo. 4. Mathematical Works, namely, (1) complete; Pselli Opus in quatuor Mathematicas Disciplinas, Arithmeticum, Musicum, Geometria, et Astronomiam, ed. Arsenio, Archiepisc. Monembas. Gr. 4. Joannes Pselus, a Byzantine writer, whose time is unknown, and to whom are ascribed three poems. Constantinian Psellus, and some other writers of the same name, scarcely deserve mention. Very little is known of them, and in the statements which are made respecting them they are perpetually confounded with the younger Michael Psellus. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 97.)

PSEIAX, an Athenian vase-painter, whose name is found inscribed on a lecythos made by Hilitos, in the following form, ΦΣΙΑΞ ΕΠΑΦΕΝ.

PSILAS (ΨΙΑΣ), i.e. "the giver of wings," or "the unbearded," a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Amycle. (Paus. iii. 19. § 6; Loback ad Parynvich. p. 435.)

PSOPHIS (Ψωφης), the founder of the town of Psophis in Arcadia, was, according to some, a son of Arrhon, but, according to others, Psophis was a woman, a daughter of Xanthius or of Eryx. (Paus. viii. 24. § 1.)

PSYCH'E (Ψυχη), that is, "breath of the soul," occurs in the later times of antiquity, as a personification of the human soul, and Apuleius (Met. iv. 28, &c.) relates about her the following beautiful allegoric story. Psyche was the youngest of the three daughters of some king, and excited by her beauty the jealousy and envy of Venus. In order to avenge herself, the goddess ordered Amor to inspire Psyche with a love for the most contemptible of all men: but Amor was so stricken with her beauty that he himself fell in love with her. He accordingly conveyed her to some charming place, where he, unseen and unknown, visited her every night, and left her as soon as the day began to dawn. Psyche might have continued to have enjoyed without interruption this state of happiness, if she had attended to the advice of her beloved, never to give way to her curiosity, or to inquire who he was. But her jealous sisters made her believe that in the darkness of night she was embracing some hideous monster, and accordingly one night, while Amor was asleep, she approached him with a lamp, and, to her amazement, she beheld the most handsome and lovely of the gods. In her excitement of joy and fear, a drop of hot oil fell from her lamp upon his shoulder. This awoke Amor, who censured her for her mistrust, and escaped. Psyche's peace was now gone all at once, and after having attempted in vain to throw herself into a river, she wandered about from temple to temple, inquiring after her beloved, and at length came to the palace of Venus. There her real sufferings began, for Venus retained her, treated her as a slave, and imposed upon her the hardest and most humiliating labours. Psyche would have perished under the weight of her sufferings, had not Amor, who still loved her in secret, invisibly comforted and assisted her in her labours. With his aid she at last succeeded in overcoming the jealousy and hatred of Venus; she became immortal, and was united with him for ever. It is not difficult to recognise in this lovely story the idea of which it is merely the mythical embodiment, for Psyche is evidently the human soul, which is purified by passions and misfortunes, and is thus prepared for the enjoyment of true and pure happiness. (Comp. Manso, Versucre, p. 346, &c.) In works of art Psyche is represented as a maiden with the wings of a butterfly, along with Amor in the different situations described in the allegoric story. (Hirt, Mystol. Bilderb. p. 222, Tafel. 32.)

PSYCHRISTUS, JACOBUS. [JACOBUS, No. 1.]

PTERAS (Πηδας), of Delphi, a mythical artist, who was said to have built the second temple of Apollo at Delphi. The tradition was that the first temple was made of branches of the wild laurel from Tempe; and that the second was made of bees, of wax and bees' wings. The name of Pteras shows that the story of his building the temple is only a rationalistic interpretation of this fable. Another story about Pteras was that the Apteraei in Crete took their name from him. (Paus. x. 5 § 8 s. 9, 10.)

[ P. S. ]

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), the name of two mythical personages, one a son of Peiranæus, who accompanied Agamemnon as charioteer to Troy (Hom. Il. iv. 228), and the other a son of Damasichthon, king of Thebes. (Paus. ix. 4 § 8.) [Lo. S.]

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), minor historical persons. (Several persons of this name, which appears to have been one in its origin exclusively. Macedonian, occur among the officers and generals of Alexander the Great, whom it is not always easy to distinguish from one another.)

1. Son of Lagus. [PTOLEMAEUS I. king of Egypt.]

2. Son of Philip, an officer who commanded the leading squadron of Macedonian cavalry at the passage of the Granicus. (Arr. Anab. i. 14.) It is supposed by Gronovius (ad Arr. l. c.) and by Droysen, that he is the same who was afterwards left by Alexander with a force of 3000 foot and 200 horse to defend the province of Caria, and who subsequently, together with Asander the governor of Lydia, defeated the Persian general Orontobates, B. C. 332. (Arr. Anab. i. 23, ii. 5.)

3. One of the select officers called Somatophylaces, or guards of the king's person, who was killed at the siege of Halicarnassus, B. C. 334. (Arr. Anab. i. 22.) Freinsheim, in his supplement to Curtius (ii. 10 § 13), has assumed this to be the son of Philip, but it is more probable, as already pointed out, that the latter was the governor of Caria.

4. Son of Seleucus, another of the Somatophylaces, who combined with that distinguished post the command of one of the divisions of the phalanx. He was lately married when he accompanied Alexander on his expedition to Asia, B. C. 334, on which account he was selected by the king to command the body of Macedonians, who were allowed to return home for the winter at the end of the first campaign. In the following spring he rejoined Alexander at Gordium, with the troops under his command, accompanied by fresh reinforcements. At the battle of Issus (B. C. 332) his division of the phalanx was one of those opposed to the Greek mercenaries under Dareius, and upon which the real brunt of the action consequently devolved; and he himself fell in the conflict, after displaying the utmost valour. (Arr. Anab. i. 24, 29, ii. 8, 10; Curt. iii. 9 § 7.)

5. An officer who commanded a force of Thracian mercenaries, with which he joined Alexander in Bactria, B. C. 329. (Arr. Anab. iv. 7; Curt. vii. 10, § 11.)

6. Son of Ptolemy, an officer appointed by Antipater in B. C. 321, to be one of the Somatophylaces of the titular king, Philip Arrhidaeus. (Arr. ap. Plat. p. 72, a.) Nothing more is known of him, but Droysen conjectures that he was a son of No. 4. (Hellenicum, vol. i. p. 154.)

7. Nephew of Antigonus, the general of Alexander, who afterwards became king of Asia. His name is first mentioned as present with his uncle at the siege of Nora in B. C. 320, when he was given up to Eumenes as a hostage for the safety of the latter during a conference with Antigonus. (Plut. Eum. 10.) At a later period we find him entrusted by his uncle with commands of importance. Thus in B. C. 315, when Antigonus was preparing to make head against the formidable coalition organized against him, he placed Ptolemy at the head of the army which was destined to carry on operations in Asia Minor against the generals of Cassander. This object the young general successfully carried out—relieved Amisus, which was besieged by Asclepiodorus, and recovered the whole strait of Cappadocia; after which he advanced into Bithynia, of which he compelled the king Zipoetes to join his alliance, and then occupied Ionia, from whence Seleucus withdrew on his approach. (Diod. xix. 57, 60.) He next threatened Caria, which was however for a time defended by Myrmidon, the Egyptian general; but the following year Ptolemy was able to strike a decisive blow in that quarter against Eupolemus, the general of Cassander, whom he surprised and totally defeated. (Id. ib. 62, 68.) The next summer (B. C. 313) the arrival of Antigonus himself gave a decided preponderance to his arms in Asia Minor, and Ptolemy, after rendering active assistance in the sieges of Caunus and Iassus, was sent with a considerable army to Greece to carry on the war there against Cassander. His successes were at first rapid: he drove out the garrisons of his adversary from Chalcis and Orchius, invaded Attica, where he compelled Demetrius of Phalerus to make overtures of submission, and then carried his arms triumphantly through Boeotia, Phocis, and Locris. Wherever he went he expelled the Macedonian garrisons, and proclaimed the liberty and independence of the several cities. After this he directed his march to the Peloponnese, where the authority of Antigonus had been endangered by the recent defection of his general Telesphorus. (Id. ib. 75, 77, 78, 87.) Here he appears to have remained till the peace of 311 suspended hostilities in that quarter. But he considered that his services had not met with their due reward from Antigonus; and when, therefore, in B. C. 310 the kings of Macedonia and Egypt were preparing to renew the war, Ptolemy suddenly abandoned the cause of his uncle and concluded a treaty with Cassander and the son of Lagus. Probably his object was to establish himself in the chief command in the Peloponnese; but the reconciliation of Polyperchon with Cassander must have frustrated this object; and on the arrival of the Egyptian king with a fleet at Cos, Ptolemy repaired from Chalcis to join him. He was received at first with the utmost favour, but soon gave offence to his new patron by his intrigues and ambitious demonstrations, and was in consequence thrown into prison and compelled to put an end to his life by poison, B. C. 309. (Id. xx. 19, 27.) Schlosser has represented this general as an enthusiast in the cause of the liberty of Greece, but there seems no reason to suppose that his professions to that effect were more earnest or sincere than those of his contemporaries.

8. Son of Lysimachus, king of Thrace. He was the eldest of the three sons of that monarch by his last wife Arsinoë, and the only one who escaped falling into the hands of Ptolemy Ceraunus. Having in vain urged his mother not to trust to the friendly professions of the usurper, he himself appears to have made his escape and taken refuge with Monennius, king of the Dardanians, whom he persuaded to take up arms in his cause, but we know nothing of the events of the war. (Justin. xxiv. 2; Trog. Pomp. ProI. xxiv.) It is probable, however, that the Ptolemy who is mentioned as establishing, or asserting, a transient claim to the throne of Macedonia, during the period of anarchy which followed the death of Ptolemy Cærenus (b. c. 280—277), is nothing other than the one in question. (Porphyry, ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 157; Dexippus, ap. Syncl. p. 267.)

9. Of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, by his wife Antigone, the step-daughter of Ptolemy Lagi. When only fifteen years of age he was left by his father in charge of his hereditary dominions, when Pyrrhus himself set out on his expedition to Italy, b. c. 280. (Justin. xviii. 1.) Of his proceedings during his father's absence we know nothing; but immediately after the return of Pyrrhus, b. c. 274, we find Ptolemy actively co-operating with him, reducing Corcyra with a small force: and after the defeat of Antigonus Gonatas, repulsing him in an attempt to recover his lost kingdom, and inflicting on him a second defeat. He afterwards accompanied Pyrrhus on his expedition to the Peloponnesus, b. c. 273, and took a prominent part in the attack on Sparta, but in the march from thence towards Argos, Arcus having occupied the mountain passes, a severe combat ensued, in which Ptolemy, who commanded the advanced guard of his father's army, was slain. Young as he was, he had given those striking proofs of daring courage and personal prowess, and, had his life been spared, would probably have rivalled the renown of his father. (Justin. xxi. 3, 4; Plut. Pyrrh. 28, 30.)

10. Of Alexander II. king of Epirus. [PTOLEMAEUS, king of EPIRUS.]

11. An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Philadelpheus, king of Egypt, who was appointed by his father to command at Ephesus, when that important city fell into his hands during the war with Antiochus II. Ptolemy was subsequently induced to revolt from his father, in conjunction with Timarchus, tyrant of Miletus, and attempted to establish his own power at Ephesus, but was compelled by a mutiny of his Thracian mercenaries to take refuge in the temple of Diana, where he was slain together with his mistress Eirene. (Trog. Pomp. ProI. xxvi.; Athen. xiii. p. 533, a.; Niebuhr, AL. Schriften. p. 266—271.)

12. Of Chryseus, an officer high in the confidence of Ptolemy Philopator. He had been for some time on friendly terms with Cleomenes, whom he visited during his confinement; but accidentally betrayed to the latter the true intentions of the king of Egypt in regard to him, and thus gave rise to his attempted insurrection. On the first breaking out of the tumult Ptolemy, having issued forth from the palace, was instantly attacked and put to death by three of the friends of Cleomenes, b. c. 220. (Plut. Cleom. 36, 37.)

13. Another person of the same name was governor of the city of Alexandria at the time of the outbreak of Cleomenes, and having fallen in with the little band of Spartans, was dragged from his chariot and put to death. (Polyb. v. 39; Plut. Cleom. 37.)

14. A Macedonian officer of high rank in the army of Philip V. during the Social War, who joined with Leontius and Mogales in promoting the treasonable designs of Apelles, and was in consequence put to death by Philip, n. c. 218. (Polyb. v. 25, 26, 29.)

15. Son of Thraseas, a leader of Greek mercenaries in the service of Ptolemy Philopator, who was appointed, together with Andromachus, to command the phalanx in the war against Antiochus, n. c. 217. (Polyb. v. 65.)

16. Son of Aëropus, an officer in the service of Antiochus the Great at the battle of Panium, n. c. 193. (Id. xvi. 18.)

17. Of Euphrates, an officer in the service of Ptolemy Epiphanes king of Egypt, who was charged with the duty of arresting Scopas, and bringing him to trial. [SCOPAS.] (Polyb. xviii. 36.)

18. Son of Sosibius, the minister of Ptolemy Philopator. He was naturally of a haughty and ambitious character, and these qualities were increased by a visit he paid to the Macedonian court during the minority of Ptolemy Epiphanes. Hence, on his return to Egypt, he made common cause with his brother Sosibius, and took a prominent part against Tlepolemus who held the chief direction of affairs. Their intrigues were however defeated, and the party of Tlepolemus prevailed. (Polyb. xvi. 22.)

19. Surnamed Macron, an Egyptian officer, who was appointed to the government of Cyprus during the minority of Ptolemy Philometor; an office which he discharged with zeal and ability. By prudent economy in the administration of the island, he amassed a large sum of money which he sent to Philometor, on his attaining his majority, and thus secured the favour of the young king (Polyb. xxvii. 12, and Vales. ad loc.*). What led to the change in his policy we know not, but we subsequently find him betraying his trust, and giving over the island of Cyprus to Antiochus Epiphanes. (2 Macc. x. 12.)

20. A rhetorician of Alexandria, who was employed as ambassador by Ptolemy Euergetes II. to Antiochus Epiphanes when the latter was besieging Alexandria, n. c. 170 (Polyb. xxviii. 16). He is perhaps the same person with the brother of Comanus, whom we find accompanying that minister on his embassy to Rome in n. c. 162. (Id. xxvii. 27.)

21. An Egyptian, surnamed Symphesis, who was appointed by Ptolemy Euergetes II. to govern Cyrene during his absence, when he went to Rome in n. c. 162, to prefer his complaints in person against his brother Philometor. He subsequently joined in the revolt of the Cyrenæans against Euergetes, and appears to have commanded the army with which they defeated him near the Catabathmus. (Polyb. xxxi. 26.)

22. Surnamed Caesarion, a son of C. Julius Caesar and Cleopatra. [CAESARION.]

23. Surnamed Philadelphus, a son of M. Antony, the Triumvir, by Cleopatra. He was the youngest of their three children, and could therefore hardly have been born before n. c. 39. (Dion Cass. xlix. 32.) In n. c. 34, he was proclaimed by his father king of Syria, including Cilicia, and all the provinces west of the Euphrates (Dion Cass. xlix. 41; Plut. Ant. 34). After the death of Antony, and the subjugation of Egypt, n. c. 30, his life was spared by Augustus, at the intercession of Juba and Cleopatra, and he was brought up by Octavia with her own children, but we hear nothing more of him. (Dion Cass. li. 15; Plut. Ant. 97.) [E. II. B.] PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), literary. The celebrated astronomer and geographer of this name is spoken of below PTOLEMAEUS, CLAUDIUS.

I. HISTORIANS. 1. Of Megalopolis, the son of Agesarchus, wrote a history of king Ptolemy IV. Philopator, which is quoted by Atheneus (vi. p. 246, c., x. p. 423, c., xiii. p. 577, f.), Clemens Alexandrinus (Protrep. p. 15), and Arroubius (vi. 4). From these passages it is clear that the historian lived at the court of Ptolemy, who reigned from b.c. 222 to b.c. 204. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 157, ed. Westermann ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 295.) Schweighäuser supposes that the Ptolemy, that was governor of Cyprus during the regency of Ptolemy Philometor, is the same as Ptolemy of Megalopolis (Polyb. xxvii. 12); but the governor of Cyprus was a different person. [See above, No. 19.]

2. An Egyptian priest, of Mendes, who wrote on the ancient history of Egypt (τα Ἀργυτίων ἄνθη- θεν ιστοράς, Syncll, p. 64). He related the acts of the Egyptian kings in three books, as we learn from Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 138), who immediately before quotes from Ptolemy ἐν τοῖς χρόνοις, by which it appears doubtful whether we are to understand another distinct work, or a set of chronological tables connected with his great work on Egyptian history. Tatian also (adv. Graec. 59) mentions him as a distinguished chronolger, and presently afterwards refers to his χρόνοι. A scholar on Homer also quotes from Ptolemy, ἐν τῷ πρῶτῳ χρόνῳ (Sekol. Buttin. in Od. iv. 238). He is also referred to by Justin (Exhort. ad Graec. p. 10), Eusebius (Præp. Evang. x. 12), Tertullian (Apol. 19), and Cyril (c. Julian. i. p. 15).

He probably lived under the first Roman emperors; for, since his work on Egypt was quoted by Apion (Clem. Alex. i. c.), it could not have been written later than the time of Tiberius; and, on the other hand, the absence of any allusion to it in Strabo, or any earlier writer, affords some presumption that it could not have been written earlier than the time of Augustus. This conclusion would become certain, if we were to adopt the opinion of Meursius and Vossius, that this Ptolemy was the author of a work upon King Herod, which is quoted by Ammonius (de Veri. Diff. s. e. Θουαίοι) ; but it is at least as probable that the author there cited is Ptolemy of Ascalon, of whose authority Ammonius makes use in other articles. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 225, 226, ed. Westermann ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 296.)

II. PHILOSOPHERS AND SOPHISTS. 3. 4. Of Alexandria, two disciples of Epicurus, of whom the only further information we possess is, that they were distinguished as δ βελταν ασισνικα (Diog. Laërt. x. 25).

5. Of Cyr. a, a sceptic, was the disciple of Babulus, the disciple of Euphranor, the disciple of Timon. Diogenes tells us, that Timon had no successor until his school was restored by Ptolemy (ix. 115, 116).

6. Of Naufragia, a sophist, named Marathon, was a herter of Heroes Atticus, but an imitator of Polemon; and an opponent of Heracleides Lycius. The particulars of his life, which are not of sufficient importance to be mentioned here, may be read in Philostratus. (Vit. Sophist. ii. pp. 591, &c. 600).

7. A sophist and Peripatetic philosopher, of the beginning of the third century of our era, whom Longinus mentions that he had seen in his youth. We also learn from Longinus that Ptolemy left no writings except poems and declamations. (Proefr. ad Lib. περὶ τέλους, ap. Porphyr. Vit. Ptolom. p. 127; comp. Harless, ad Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 504, n. 77.)

8. A Platonist philosopher, of whom nothing is known, except that he lived before Proclus, who quotes him in his work on the Timeaues of Plato (i. p. 7, b).

9. GRAMMARIANS. 9. Of Alexandria, surnamed Pindarion, was the son of Oroseas, and the disciple of Aristarchus (Suid. s. v.). Suidas mentions the following as his works:— Ορομνων ἀναθηματων Βιβλια γ', περὶ τοῦ Ὀμηρικοῦ χαρακ-

10. Another disciple of Aristarchus, on account of his close adherence to whom he was called Ἐπιβερος or Ἐπιβέττης. He was also a hearer of the grammarian Hellanicus. He wrote upon the Wounds mentioned by Homer (περὶ τῶν παρ.'Ομηρο πληγῶν), and a Commentary on the Odys-say (Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. cc.).

11. The father of the grammarian Aristionicus, who himself was also a grammarian. Both father and son were distinguished as teachers at Rome. The following were his works:— τὰ διομίσιν ἑξημένων τῶν τραγωδιών, ἐς 'Ομηρον Βιβλία β', τὰ περὶ τῆς ποιητῆς ἑξισμῶν ἱστορίαν, τὰ περὶ Μουκάλ καὶ Νερσώνων (Suid. s. e.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. cc.).

12. Of Ascalon, taught at Rome. His works were, προσυνή 'Ομηρική, περὶ Ἑλληνισμοῦ ἦτο ὀρθοσελάντας βιβλία β', περὶ μέτρων, περὶ τῆς ἐν Ὀδυσσείας Ἀριστάρχου διοριστῶν, περὶ διαφοράς λέξων, and other grammatical works. The most important of these works was that περὶ διαφοράς λέξων, which formed the foundation of the similar work of Ammonius. It is still extant, and it is printed in the Bibliotheca Graecae of Fabricius (vol. vi. pp. 156—163, comp. vol. i. p. 52).

13. Of Alexandria, surnamed Chennus, flourished under Trajan and Hadrian. His works were, περὶ παραδόζων ιστοριών; an historical drama, entitled Σληθ ; an epic poem, in twenty-four rhapsodies, entitled Ἀρήμωσα, and some others. (Suid. s. v.) We still possess in the Bibliotheca of Photius (Cod. 190) an epitome of the work of Ptolemy, περὶ τῆς εἰς τολμακινα κατεχόμενης ιστοριας, in seven books, which there can be little doubt is the same work as that which Suidas mentions by the title περὶ παραδόζων ιστοριῶν. Photius commends the work as containing in a small space information which a whole life might be spent in collecting from other books; but he adds, that it contains many things which are marvellous and absurd, and badly put together. It is in fact a farrago of the most heterogeneous materials. It is addressed to a certain learned lady named Tertullia.

Suidas and Photius speak of Ptolemy as ὁ Ἰεράφοντας, which is naturally interpreted the son of Hephaestion; but there is some doubt whether it ought not rather to be understood as meaning the father or teacher of Hephaestion (see Ioni- sius, de Script. Hist. Ptol. i. 2, § 5, and Villois, Proleg. ad Apollon. Lex. Hom. p. iv.). Tzetzes calls him Ptolemy Hephaestion.
PTOLEMAEUS.

Suidas mentions a Ptolemy of Cythera, an epic poet, who wrote a poem about the virtues of the plant called psalmacausta; but this statement is perhaps the result of some confusion, since the work of Ptolemy Chennus contains various marvelous statements respecting that very plant.

PTOLEMAEUS (Ptolemaios), a surgeon, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Celsus (De Med. vi. 7, 2, p. 126), and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ.

He is perhaps the same person whose opinion on the cause of dropsy is quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. iii. 8, p. 479), and who is called by him a follower of Erasistratus. Perhaps also he is the physician whose medical formulae are quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacides (ap. Galen. De Compo. Medicam. sec. loc. ii. 2, vol. xii. p. 584; see also Ibid. iv. 7, p. 789, De Compo. Medicam. sec. Gen. v. 14, vol. xiii. pp. 849, 853.)

[ W. A. G. ]

PTOLEMAEUS (Ptolemaios) of Aloros, regent, or according to some authors king of Macedon. The circumstances connected with his elevation, and the revolutions in which he took part, are very variously related. Diodorus (xv. 71) calls him a son of Amyntas II.; but this seems to be certainly a mistake, and Dexippus (ap. Syncell. p. 263, b.) says that he was a stranger to the royal family. During the short reign of Alexander II., the eldest son of Amyntas, we find Ptolemy engaged in war with that prince, and apparently disputing the throne with him. Their differences were terminated for a time by the intervention of Ptolodidas, but the reconciliation was a hollow one, and Ptolemy soon took an opportunity to remove the young king by assassination, b. c. 367. (Plut. Ptol. 26, 27; Diod. xv. 71; Marzyns ap. Athen. xiv. p. 629, d.) It seems probable that this murder was perpetrated with the connivance, if not at the instigation, of the queen-mother Eurydice [Eurydike, No. 1.]; and Ptolemy in consequence obtained possession of the supreme power without opposition. But the appearance of a new pretender to the throne, Pausanias, soon reduced him to great difficulties, from which he was rescued by the intervention of the Athenian general Iphicrates, who established the brother of Alexander, Perdiccas III., upon the throne, while Ptolemy exercised the virtual sovereignty under the name of regent. (Aesch. de F. Leg. pp. 31, 32; Corn. Nep. Iphicr. 3.) It was probably after this that the partisans of the late king invoked the assistance of Ptolodidas, who invaded Macedonia with a mercenary force, but was defeated by Ptolemy, who disarmed his resentment by presentations of submission, and obtained the confirmation of his authority as regent, giving hostages for his friendly disposition towards the Thebans. (Plut. Pelop. 27.) To this new alliance it may be ascribed that Ptolemy abandoned his friendly relations with the Athenians, notwithstanding the benefits he had received from Iphicrates. (Aesch. l. c. p. 32.) He continued to administer the sovereign power for a period of three years, when he was, in his turn, assassinated by the young king Perdiccas III., *b. c. 364. (Diod. xv. 77.) Diodorus gives Ptolemy the title of king, and his name is included by the chroniclers among the Macedonian kings (Dexippus ap. Syncellus) and by Euseb. Hist. Armenian. It would, however, seem more probable that he assumed the royal authority without its designation. (Compare, in regard to the above facts, Thirlwall's Graec. vol. i. pp. 162—165; Plut. Gesch. Macedoniens. vol. i. p. 38—40; and Abel, Makedonien vor König Philipp. p. 217—224.)

PTOLEMAEUS (Ptolemyios), surnamed Apion (Ἀπιών) king of Cyrene, was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Phuscon, king of Egypt, by his mistress Eirene. His father left him his will, and the kingdom of the Cyrenaica, to which he appears to have succeeded without opposition, on the death of Phuscon, b. c. 117. We know nothing of the events of his reign, but at his death in b. c. 96, he bequeathed his kingdom by his will to the Roman people. The senate, however, refused to accept the legacy, and declared the cities of the Cyrenaica free. They were not reduced to the condition of a province until nearly thirty years afterwards; a circumstance which has given rise to much confusion, some of the later Roman writers having considered this latter date to be that of the death of Apion, and the accompanying bequest. Hence Sextius Rufus, Ammianus, and Hieronymus were led to suppose that there were two kings of the name of Apion, an error in which they have been followed by Scaliger, Preinshemius, and other modern writers. The subject has been satisfactorily examined by Valesius in his notes to Ammianus, and by Clinton. (Justin. xxxix. 5; Liv. Epit. lxx.; Jul. Obsequens, c. 109; Eutrop. vii. 3; Sext. Ruf. c. 13; Amm. Marc. xxii. 16. § 54; and Vales. ad loc.; Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Ol. 171. 1, and Ol. 178. 3; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. p. 369, note.)

[ E. H. B. ]

PTOLEMAEUS (Ptolemaios), surnamed Ceraunus, king of Macedonia, was the son of Ptolemy I. king of Egypt, by his second wife Eurydice. The period of his birth is not mentioned; but if Droysen is right in assigning the marriage of Eurydice with Ptolemy to the year b. c. 321 (see Hellenism. vol. i. p. 154), their son cannot have been born till b. c. 320. He must, at all events, have been above thirty years old in b. c. 265, when the aged king of Egypt came to the resolution of setting aside his claim to the throne, and appointing his younger son, Ptolemy Philadelphus, his successor. (Appian. Syri. 62; Justin. xvi. 2.) To this step we are told that the old king was led not only by his warm attachment to his wife Berenice and her son Philadelphus, but by apprehensions of the violent and passionate character of his eldest son, which subsequent events proved to be but too well founded. Ptolemy Ceraunus quitted the court of Egypt in disgust, and repaired to that of Lysimachus, where his sister Lysandra was married to Agathocles, the heir to the Thracian crown. On the other hand, Arsinōe, the sister of Ptolemy Philadelphus, was the wife of Lysimachus himself, and exercised great influence over the mind of the old king. But instead of this being employed against her half-brother Ceraunus, she appears soon to have made common cause with him; and he not only assisted her in her intrigues against Agathocles, but is even said to have assassinated that unhappy prince with his own hand. (Mennon. c. 8; Justin. xvii. 1.) The conduct of Ptolemy in the war that followed between Lysimachus and Seleucus is differently reported: Pausanias (i. 16. § 2) represents him as quitting the court of Lysimachus, and taking refuge with his rival, while Mennon (c. 12) states, with more probability, that he adhered to Lysimachus to the last, but after his death made his peace with Seleucus. It is certain, however, that he was received by the latter in the most friendly manner, and treated with all the distinction due to his royal birth. Seleucus, we are told, even held out hopes to him of establishing him on the throne of Egypt, when Ptolemy, probably deeming the crown of Macedonia to be more easily within his grasp, basely assassinated his new patron at Lysimachia, n. c. 280, and immediately assumed the diadem himself. (Appian. Syr. 62; Mennon. c. 12; Justin. xvii. 2; Paus. i. 16. § 2; Euseb. Ann. 157.)

His authority appears to have been acknowledged without opposition by the army, and this enabled him to make himself master, with little difficulty, of the European dominions of Lysimachus. Antiochus, the son of Seleucus, was sufficiently occupied with maintaining his Asiatic and hereditary possessions, and Ptolemy Philadelphus was well contented to see his half-brother established on another throne, which led him to abandon all projects concerning that of Egypt. The usurper had the address to gain over Pyrrhus king of Epeirus, who might have proved his most dangerous rival, by a promise of assisting him with an auxiliary force in his expedition to Italy. Thus his only remaining opponent was Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, who now attempted to recover the throne of his father, and for him Ptolemy was more than a match. His fleet, supported by an auxiliary squadron of the Heraclaeans, totally defeated that of Antigonus, and compelled the latter to withdraw into Boeotia, while Ptolemy established himself, without further opposition, on the throne of Macedonia. (Mennon. c. 13; Justin. xvii. 2, xxiv. 1.)

He was now able to fortify himself in his new position by a treaty with Antiochus, who acknowledged him as sovereign of Macedonia. But his jealousy and apprehensions were still excited by Arsinōe, the widow of Lysimachus, who had taken refuge at Cassandreia with her two sons, Lysimachus and Philip; and he endeavoured to decry them into his power by offering to marry Arsinōe, and share the kingdom with her children. The queen, notwithstanding her previous experience of her character, gave credit to his oaths and protestations and received him at Cassandreia, but Ptolemy took the opportunity, during the nuptial festivities, to seize on the fortress, and immediately caused the two young princes to be assassinated. (Justin. xxiv. 1—3.) Their elder brother Ptolemy had, it appears, made his escape, and taken refuge with Monunius, king of the Dardanians, who for a time espoused his cause, and waged war, though with-out effect, against the Macedonian king. (Trog. Pomp. Proc. xxiv.)

Ptolemy, however, was not destined long to enjoy the throne which he had obtained by so many crimes. Before the close of the year which had witnessed the death of Seleucus, he was alarmed by the approach of a new and formidable enemy, the Gauls, who now, for the first time, appeared on the frontiers of Macedonia. Their chief, Belquis, sent overtures for a treaty to Ptolemy, but the Macedonian king haughtily refused them, and rejecting the proffered assistance of Monniius, hastened to meet and give battle to the barbarian host. The result was most disastrous; the Macedonian army was totally routed, and the king, having been thrown from the elephant on which he was riding, fell alive into the hands of the enemy, by whom he was put to death in the most barbarous manner, and his head carried about on the point of a spear, in token of victory. (Justin. xxiv. 3—5; Paus. x. 19. § 7; Mennon. c. 14; Diod. xxi. Exc. Hoeschel. p. 495, Exc. Valer. p. 592; Dexippus ap. Syncell. p. 266; Polyb. ix. 35. § 4.)

Concerning the chronology of these events, see Clinton's 'F. H.' vol. ii. pp. 257, 258. It seems certain that the death of Ptolemy was announced before the end of n. c. 280, and that the period of seventeen months assigned to his reign by Dexippus (i.e.) must be reckoned from the death of Lysimachus, and not from that of Seleucus.

Ptolemaeus (Πτολεμαίος), tetrarch of Chalciς in Syria, the son of Memnæus. He appears to have held the cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis as well as the mountain district of Ituraea, from whence he was in the habit of infesting Damascus and the more wealthy parts of Coele-Syria with predatory incursions. These Alexan-dra, queen of Judæa, endeavoured to repress by sending against him her son Aristobulus with an army, but without much success. Subsequently, when Pompey came into Syria, b. c. 64, Ptolemy was summoned to answer for his misdeeds, but was able to purchase impunity from the conqueror with a sum of a thousand talents. In b. c. 49, when Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, was put to death at Antioch by the partisans of Pompey, Ptolemy afforded shelter and protection to the brothers and sisters of the deceased prince, and his son Philippin at first married one of the fugitive princesses, Alexandra: but, afterwards, Ptolemy becoming enamoured of her himself, put Philippin to death, and made Alexandra his own wife.

After the battle of Pharsalia Ptolemy was confirmed by Caesar in the possession of his dominions, over which he continued to rule till his death in b. c. 40, when he was succeeded by his son Ly-sanias. The only occasion on which we meet with his name during this interval is in b. c. 42, when he united with Marion, prince of Tyre, in an attempt to restore Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, to the throne of Judæa. They were, however, both defeated by Herod. (Strab. xvi. p. 753; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 16. § 3, xiv. 3. § 2, 7. § 4; B. J. i. 9. § 2, 13. § 1.) We learn from his coins that he assumed the title of tetrarch. (Eckhel. vol. iii. p. 264.)

Ptolemaeus, Clau'dius (Πτολεμαῖος Κλαύδιος). A few words will be necessary on PTOLEMAEUS.

The plan we intend to adopt in this article. Ptolemy stands before us in two distinct points of view: as a mathematician and astronomer; and as a geographer. There must of course be a separate treatment of these two characters. As an astronomer, it must be said that the history of the science, for a long train of centuries, presents nothing but comments on his writings: to treat the history of the latter would be so far to write that of astronomy itself. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves to the account of these writings, their principal contents, and the chief points of their bibliography; the account of commentators, or to the effect of the writings themselves, on the progress of science. And, though obliged to do this by the necessity of selection which our limits impose, we are also of opinion that the plan is otherwise the most advantageous. For, owing to that very close connection of Ptolemy's name with the history of astronomy of which we have spoken, the accessible articles on the subject are so discursive, that the reader may lose sight of the distinction between Ptolemy and his followers. The two other great leaders, Aristotle and Euclid, are precisely in the same predicament.

Of Ptolemy himself we know absolutely nothing but his date, which an astronomer always leaves in his works. He certainly appeared in A.D. 139, at Alexandria; and Suidas and others call him Alexandrius. If the canon presently mentioned be genuine (and it is not doubted), he survived Antoninus and therefore lived at least A.D. 161. Old manuscripts of his works call him Pelusiensis and Pheladianus. But Theodorus, surnamed Melite-niota (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 411), in the thirteenth century, describes him as of Ptolemais in the Thebaid, called Hermeus. Accordingly, our personal knowledge of one of the most illustrious men that ever lived, both in merits and fame, and who resided and wrote in what might well be called the sister university to Athens, is limited to two accounts of one circumstance, between the uncertainties of which it is impossible to decide, and which give his birth to opposite sides of the Nile. Weidler (Hist. Astron. p. 177) cites some description of his personal appearance from an Arabic writer, who does not state his source of information. Some writers call him King Ptolemy, probably misled by the name, which is nevertheless known to have been borne by private persons, besides the astronomer. On this, and some other gossip not worth citing, because no way Graecus, see Halma's preface, p. 101. Ptolemy is then, to us, the author of certain works; and appears in the character of promulgator of his own researches, and deliverer and extender of those of Hipparchus. In this last character there is some difficulty about his writings. It is not easy to distinguish him from his illustrious predecessor. It is on this account that we have deferred specific mention of Hipparchus, as an astronomer, to the present article.

The writings of Ptolemy (independently of the work on geography, which will be noted apart) as an astronomer, are as follows:

1. Μεγάλα Στοιχεῖα τῆς Αστρονομίας, as Fabricius has it, and as it is very commonly called: but the Greek, both in Gryneus and Halma, begins with μαθηματικά συντάξεως Βιβλία πρῶτον. But the Tetrabiblos presently mentioned, the work on astrology, is also σύνταξις, in Fabricius μαθηματική συντάξις: and the heading Mathemaecos Syntaxis, in several places of Schweiger, Hoffmann &c., would rather puzzle a beginner. To distinguish the two, the Arabs probably called the greater work μεγάλη, and afterwards μεγαλπτη: the title Almagest is a compound of this last adjective and the Arabic article, and must be considered as the European as well as the Arabic vernacular title. To this name we shall adhere; for though Syntaxis be more Greek, yet, as there are two syntaxes of Ptolemy, and others of other writers, we prefer a well-known and widely-spread word, adopted by all middle Latin writers, and detach from numerous historical associations. It reminds us, too, of those who preserved and communicated the work in question; and but for whose just appreciation it would have probably been lost.

On the manuscripts of the Almagest, see Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 281) and Halma's preface, p. xlv. &c. Doppelmayer (we copy Halma) says the manuscript used by Gryneus, the first therefore printed from, was given to the Nuremberg library by Regiomontanus, to whom it was given (probably as a legacy) by Cardinal Bessarion. De Murr could not find this manuscript at Nuremberg, but only that of Theon's commentary, given by Regiomontanus, as described: but Montignot testifies to having caused it to be consulted for his version of the catalogue. Halma somewhat hastily concludes that there are difficulties in the way of supposing this manuscript to have been used: but public libraries do sometimes lose their manuscripts. This Basle edition may count as one manuscript known; and Halma marked its holders, in the Royal Library at Paris, principally five, as follows:—First, a Paris manuscript (No. 2339) nearly perfect, cited by some who have used it as of the sixth century, but pretty certainly not later than the eighth. It bears a presentation inscription to John Lascaris, of the imperial family, who is known to have been sent by Lorenzo di Medicius twice to Constantinople, after its occupation by the Turks, to procure manuscripts. Secondly, a Florence manuscript of the twelfth century, marked 2390. Thirdly, a Venice manuscript, marked 313, supposed to be of the eleventh century. Fourthly, two Vatican manuscripts, marked 560 and 184, of about the twelfth century. These Florence, Venice, and Vatican manuscripts were probably returned to their original owners at the peace of 1015. The seizures made by the French in Italy have procured us the only two editions of Euclid and Ptolemy which give various readings.

The first appearance of the Almagest by print is in the epistle left by Regiomontanus, and edited by Grossech and Roemer, Venice, 1496, folio, headed "Epytoma Joannis de Monte regio in almagestum Ptolomei." The dedication to Cardinal Bessarion calls it the epistle of Purbach, who commenced it, and his pupil Regiomontanus, who finished it. It is a full epitome, omitting, in parti-

* So far was this appropriation of the word Syntaxis carried, that it was applied to various astronomical works having nothing to do with Ptolemy. Hoffmann has two works in his list which he supposes to be English translations of the astronomical syntaxes, because they bear as titles "the Compost of Pholomene." We have one of them; which is a common astrological almanack, having just as much relation to Ptolemy as the current number of Moore, namely, a folly in common with him.
cicular, the catalogue of stars. It was reprinted (Lalande) Basle, 1543, folio; Nuremberg, 1550, folio; and, apparently in the same year, another title was put to it (Halma, preface, p. 33.). The first complete edition is the Latin version of Peter Liechtenstein, "Almagestum Claudii Ptolemai, Pheludiensis Alexandri," Venice, 1531, folio (Lalande and Baily). It is scarce, but there is a copy in the Royal Society's library. Baily says that it bears internal marks of having, and often from the Arabic (as was indeed generally admitted), and throws great light on the subsequent Greek editions and versions. Next comes the version of George of Trebizond, "Ptolemaei Almagestum, ex Versione Latina Georgii Trapezuntii," Venice, 1535, folio. (Fabricius, who is in doubt as to whether it was not 1527, and confines it with the former version.) From all we can collect, however, no one asserts himself to have seen an earlier edition of the version of Trapezuntius than that of Venice, 1528, folio (with a red lily in the title page); and Hoffman sets down none earlier. Its title (from a copy before us) is "Claudii Ptolemai Pheludiensis Alexandri Almagestum... latina donatum lingu a Georgio Trapezuntio... anno salutis M DXXVIII labente." This version is stated in the preface to have been made from the Greek: the editor was Lucas Gauricus. The nine books of astronomy by the Arab Geber, edited by Peter Apian, Nuremberg, 1534, folio, and often set down as a commentary on, almost an edition of, the Almagest, have no right whatever to either name, as we say from examination. Halma, observing in the epitome of Purbach and Regiomon- tanus strong marks of Arabic origin, and taking Geber to be in fact Ptolomy, concludes that the epitome was made from Geber, and reproves them for not naming their original. Halma must have taken Geber's work to be actually the Almagest, for, with the above censure, he admits that the two epitomists have caught the meaning and spirit of Ptolomy. It is worth while, therefore, to state, from examination of Geber (whom Halma had not seen), and comparison of it with the epitome in question, that neither is Geber a commentary on the Almagest, nor the epitome formed from Geber.

The first Greek text of the Almagest (as well as that of Euclid) was published by Symon Grynoeus, Basle, 1538, folio. "K. Προτελειον μεγάλης λυ- ταφίων μηδένα γεωμε- τρείων βιβλία γαρ..." It is Greek only, and contains the Almagest, and the commentary of Theon [PAPPUS]. Basle, 1541, folio. Jerome Gemmaeus published "...omnis quae extant opera (Geogra-

* It is a slight matter, but it is difficult to say how small an error is not worth correcting when great names support it. Halma, followed by Baily, says that Trapezuntius got his Greek manuscript from a copy of one in the Vatican, made by order of the abbot Bartolini. But what Gauricus says is "Georg. Træp. magnum hunc Astronomum... e Graecæ in Latinam transituli linguam. Quem Lauren- tius Bartolinius... e Vaticano exemplari... transcribendum curavit." The quam seems to refer to Trapezuntius, who had long been dead: Gauricus explains how he came by a copy. Andrew Trapezuntius, in his preface to his father's work (which follows that of Gauricus), though dedicating to the pope, does not hint at the manuscript from the pope's library, nor at any manuscript in particu-

This edition contains the Almagest, Tetrabiblon, Centiloquium, and Inerrantium Stellarum Significationes of Ptolomy, and the Hypotyposes of Proclus. Except as containing the first professed collection of the works, it is not of note. As to its Almagest, it is Trapezuntius as given by Gauricus. The publisher, H. Petrus, seems to have found reason to know that he had been mistaken in his editor. In 1551 (Basle, folio) he republished it as "Helymam quod extant opera... praeter Geographiam, quam non dissimili forma [double column] nuperimè addidimus: summa cura et diligentia castigata ab Erasmo Oswaldio Schrek- henfuchso..." The contents are the same as in the former edition, with notes added by the new editor. Erasmus Reinbold published the first book only (Gr. Lat. with Scholla), Wittenberg, 1549, 8vo. (Lalande, who gives also 1560), and also 1569 (Halma). S. Graecilis (Legrende) published the second book in Latin, Paris, 1556, 8vo. (Lal. Halm.). J. B. Porta gave the first book in Latin, with Theon, Naples, 1588, 4to. (Lal.), and the first and second books in the same way, Naples, 1605, 4to. (Lal. Halm.).

* Mr. Baily, who closely examined all his editions, as will presently be noted, does not even give the name of this one, though to our knowledge it was one of those he tried to make use of.
catalogue is the one which should be cited. It gives the readings of the Florence and Paris manuscripts (from Halma), of the Greek of Grynoeus and Halma, and of the Latin of Liechtenstein and Trapezuntius, with corrections from our present astronomical knowledge very sparingly, and we believe very judiciously, introduced. The astronomer might easily make Ptolemy's catalogue what it ought to have been; the scholar, from criticism alone, would certainly place many stars where it is impossible Ptolemy could have recorded them, being. From frequent conversation with Mr. Dailly during the progress of his task, we can confidently say that he had no bias in favour of making his text astronomically correct at the expense of critical evidence; but that he was as fully impressed with the necessity of producing Ptolemy's errors as his truths.

Mr. Dailly remarks, as to the catalogue, and the same appears as to other parts of the Almagest, that Halma often gives in the text he has chosen readings different from those of all his principal subjects of collation. This means that he has, in a considerable number of cases, either amended his text conjecturally, or preferred the reading of some minor manuscript, without particular mention. This is no great harm, since, as the readings of all his great sources are always given, it amounts to having one more choice from an unnamed quarter. But it is important that the critical reader of the edition should have frequent notice of it; and the more so, as much of the readings are at the end of each volume, without text-reference from the places in which they occur.

On the preceding summary of the bibliographical history of the Almagest, we shall remark that the reader is not to measure the currency of it by the number of its editions. It was the gold which lay in the Bank, while paper circulated on its authority. All the European books on astronomy were fashioned upon it, and it was only the more learned astronomers who went to the common original. Euclid was actually read, and accordingly, as we have seen, the presses were crowded with editions of the Elements. But Ptolemy, in his own words, was better known by his astrology than by his astronomy. We now come to his other writings, on which we have less to say.

2. Τετραβιβλίον, generally called Τετραβιβλίον, or Quadrivium Per Apatotematibus et Judicis Astrorum. With this goes another small work, called ανάρως, or Fructus Liberorum Suorum, often called Centiloquium, from its containing a hundred aphorisms. Both of these works are astrological, and it has been doubted by some whether they be genuine. But the doubt merely arises from the feeling that the contents are unworthy of Ptolemy. The Tetrabiblon itself is, like the Almagest and other writings, dedicated to his brother Syrus; it refers, in the introduction, to another work on the mathematical theory. Both works have been twice printed in Greek, and together;

first, by John Cannarius (Gr. Lat.), Nuremberg, 1535, 4to; secondly, with new Latin version and preface, by Philip Melanchton, Basle, 1553, 8vo. (Fabricius, Hoffmann.) Among the Latin editions, over and above those already noted as accompanying editions of the Almagest, Hain mentions two (of both works) of the fifteenth century; one by Ratdolt, Venice, 1494, 4to; another by Bonetus (with other astrological writings) at Basle, 1493, fol. There was also translated by Gogava, Louvain, 1548, 4to. (Hoffmann, Lalande); and there is another attached to the collection made by Hervagius (which begins with Julius Firmicus, and ends with Manilius), Basle, 1563, fol.; and all except the Firmicus and Manilius seem to have been printed before, Venice, 1519, fol (Lalande). There is mention of two other editions, of Basle and Venice, 1551 and 1507, including both Firmicus and Manilius (Lalande). The Centiloquium has been sometimes attributed to Hermes Trismegistus; but this last-named author had a Centiloquium of his own, which is printed in the edition just described, and is certainly not in matter the same as Ptolemy's. Fabricius, mentioning the Centiloquium, says that Ptolemy de Electionibus, appeared (Lat.), Venice, 1509,—. Perhaps this is the same work as the one of the same title, afterwards published as that of the Arab Zahel. The English translation (1541) and the Latin (1547), and 1551, 'ed.' by the 'Quadrupartite' (Hoffmann), must be from the paraphrase by Proclus, as appears from its title-page containing the name of Leo Allatius, who edited the latter. The usual Latin of the Centiloquium is by Jobini Fontanus: whether the Commentaries attributed to him, printed, Basle, 1581, 4to; (Lalande), &c., are any thing more than the version, we must leave to the professedly astrological bibliographer. It was printed without the Quadrpartitum several times, as at Cologne, 1544, 8vo: and this is said to be with the comment of Trapezuntius, meaning probably the version. The Commentaries or introductions, two in number, attributed to Proclus and Porphyry, were printed (Gr. Lat.) Basle, 1559, folio (Lalande).

3. Λαρίδον Ἀναγράφων. This is a catalogue of Assyrian, Persian, Greek, and Roman sovereigns, with the length of their reigns, several times referred to by Synecellus, and found, with continuation, in Theon. It is considered an undoubted work of Ptolemy. It is a scrap which has been printed by Saliger, Calvius (who valued it highly), Petavius and Dodwell; but most formally by Bainbridge (in the work presently cited), and by Halma, as above noticed.

4. Φύσεως ἀκλανών ἀκτώρων καὶ συναγαγμένης ἐπιστημονικής, De Apparentiis et Significationibus inerrantibus. This annual list of sidereal phenomena has been printed three times in Greek: by Petavius, in his Uranologion, Paris, 1630, folio; partially in Fabricius, but deferred by Harless to a supplementary volume which did not appear; and by Halma, as above noticed. There are three other works of the same name or character, which have been attributed to Ptolemy, and all three are given, with the genuine one, by Petavius, as above. Two of them are Roman calendars, not worth notice. The third was published, in Latin, from a Greek manuscript, by Nic. Leonisii, Venice, Val. 16 (Fabricius); and this is reprinted in the collection beginning with Julian Firminus, above noticed. We have mentioned the versions of the genuine work which are found with those of the Almagest.

5. 6. De Analemmata and Planisphaerium. These works are obtained from the Arabic. Fabrius, who had not seen them, conjectures that they are the same, but he does not correct. The Analemma is a collection of graphical processes for facilitating the construction of sun-dials, grounded on what we now call the orthographic projection of the sphere, a perspective in which, mathematically speaking, the eye is at an infinite distance. The Planisphere is a description of the stereographic projection, in which the eye is at the pole of the circle on which the sphere is projected. Delambre seems to think, from the former work, that Ptolemy knew the gnomonic projection, in which the eye is at the centre of the sphere; but, though he uses some propositions which are closely connected with the theory of that projection, we cannot find any thing which indicates distinct knowledge of it. There is but one edition of the work De Analemmate, edited by Commandine, Rome, 1592, 4to. (Lalande says there is a Venetian title of the same date. He also mentions another edition, Rome, 1572, 4to., perhaps an error of copying). Nothing is told about the Arabic original, or the translator. The Planisphaerium first appeared in print in the edition of the Geography, Rome (?), 1507, fol. (Hoffmann); next in Valder's collection, entitled "Sphaerica atque Astrorum Coelestium Ratio . . . ." Basle (? no place is named), 1536, 4to. With this is joined the Planisphaerium of Jordanus. There is also an edition of Toulouse, 1544, fol. (Hoffmann). But the best edition is that of Commandine, Venice, 1558, 4to. Lalande says it was reprinted in 1588. Suidas records that Ptolemy wrote ἀπλωνω ἐπωρειας σφαῖρας, which is commonly taken to be the work on the planisphere. Both the works are addressed to Syria.

7. Περὶ υποθέσεων τῶν πλανημέων, De Planeta- riis Hypothetibus. This is a brief statement of the principal hypotheses employed in the Almagest (to which it refers in a preliminary address to Syria) for the explanation of the heavenly motions. Simplicius refers to two books of hypotheses, of which we may suppose this is one. It was first printed (Gr. Lat.) by Bainbridge, with the sphere of Proclus and the canon above noted, London, 1620, 4to., with a page of Bainbridge's corrections at the end; afterwards by Halma, as already described.

8. Αρμονικόν νησίλεα γ. This treatise on the theory of the musical scale was first published (Gr. Lat.) in the collection of Greek musicians, by Gogavinus. Venice, 1562, 4to. (Fabricius). Next by Wallis (Gr. Lat.), Oxford, 1682, 4to., with various readings and copious notes. This last edition was reprinted (with Porphyry's commentary, then first published) in the third volume of Wallis's works, Oxford, 1699, folio.

9. Περὶ κρατηρίων καὶ ἡγεμονικῶν, De Judicandi Facultate et Animæ Principate, a metaphysical work, attributed to Ptolemy. It was edited by Bouillass (Gr. Lat.), Paris, 1663, 4to., and the edition had a new title page (and nothing more) in 1681.

In Lalande we find attributed to Ptolemy, "Regulae Arithmeticae" (Gr. Lat.), 1569, 8vo., with explanations by Erasmus Reinhold.

The collection made by Fabricius of the lost works of Ptolemy is as follows: — From Simplicius, Περὶ μετρητῶν μοναδῆδων, to prove that there can be only three dimensions of space; Περὶ βολῶν βιβλίων, mentioned also by Eutocius; Πτολεμαίου, two books of hypotheses. From Suidas, three books Μυχακών. From Herodianus and Simplicius, Οιστικὴ πραγματεία. From Tzetzes, Περὶ τοῦ Πυθαγόρου, and from Stephen of Byzantium, Περὶ σωτήρων. There have been many modern forgeries in Ptolemy's name, mostly astrological.

It must rest an unsettled question whether the work written by Ptolemy on optics be lost or not. The matter now stands thus: Alhacen, the principal Arab writer on optics, does not mention Ptolemy, nor indeed, any one else. Some passages from Roger Bacon, taken to be opinions passed on a manuscript purporting to be that of Ptolemy, led Montuclia to speak highly of Ptolemy as an optical writer. This mention probably led Laplace to examine a Latin version from the Arabic, existing in the Royal Library at Paris, and purporting to be Ptolemy's treatise. The consequence was Laplace's assertion, that Ptolemy had given a detailed account of the phenomena of refraction, in all respects better than those of Alhazen and Tycho Brabé, or of any one before Cassini. With regard to the genuineness of the book, on the one hand there is its worthiness of Ptolemy on the point of refraction, and the attribution of it to him. On the other hand, there is the absence of allusion, either to the Almagest in the book on optics, or to the subject of refraction in the Almagest. Delambre, who appears convinced of the genuineness, supposes that it was written after the Almagest. But on this supposition, it must be supposed that Ptolemy, who does not unfrequently refer to the Almagest in his other writings, has omitted to do so in this one, and that upon points which are taken from the Almagest, as the assertion that the moon has a colour of its own, seen in eclipses. But what weighs most with us is the account which Delambre gives of the geometry of the author. Ptolemy was in geometry, perspicacious, elegant, profound, and powerful; the author of the optics could not even succeed in being clear on the very points in which Euclid (or another, if it be not Euclid) had been clear before him. Delambre observes, in two passages, "La démonstration de Potelémée est fort embrouillée; celle d’Euclide est et plus courte et plus claire.", "Euclide avait prouvé proposition 21 et 22, que les objets pa- raissent diminués dans les miroirs convexes. On entrevoit que Ptolémée a voulu aussi démontrer les mêmes propositions." Again, the refraction apart,
PTOLEMAEUS.

Delambre remarks of Alhazen that he is "plus riche, plus savant, et plus géomètre que Ptolémée." Taking all this with confidence, for Delambre, though severe, was an excellent judge of relative merit, we think the reader of the Almagest will pause before he believes that the man who had written this last work (which supposition is absolutely necessary) became a poor geometer, on the authority of one manuscript headed with his name. The subject wants further investigation from such sources as still exist: it is not unlikely that the Arabic original may be found. Were we speaking for Ptolemy, we should urge that a little diminution of his fame as a mathematician would be well compensated by so splendid an addition to his experimental character as the credit of a true theory of refraction. But the question is, how stands the fact? and for our own parts, we cannot but suspend our opinion.

We now come to speak of Ptolemy as an astronomer, and of the contents of the Almagest. And with his name we must couple that of his great predecessor, Hipparchus. The latter was alive at B.C. 150, and the former at A.D. 150, which, is of easy remembrance. From the latter to the latter of Ptolemy, it is from 250 to 260 years. Between the two there is nothing to fill the gap: we cannot construct an intermediate school out of the names of Geminus, Poseidonius, Theodosius, Sosigenes, Hyginus, Manilius, Seneca, Menelans, Cleomedes, &c.: and we have no others. We must, therefore, regard Ptolemy as the first who appreciated Hipparchus, and followed in his steps. This is no small merit in itself.

What Hipparchus did is to be collected mostly from the writings of Ptolemy himself, who has evidently intended that his predecessor should lose no fame in his hands. The historian who has taken most pains to discriminate, and to separate what is due to Hipparchus, is Delambre. If he should be held rather too partial to the predecessor of Ptolemy, those who think so will be obliged to admit that he gives his verdict upon the evidence, and not upon any prepossession gained before trial. He is too much given, it may be, to claim old astronomers by what he has done for us, but this does not often disturb his estimate of the relative merit of the ancients. And it is no small testimony that an historian so deeply versed in modern practice, so conversant with ancient writings, so niggard of his praise, and so apt to deny it altogether to any thing which has since been surpassed, cannot get through his task without making it evident that Hipparchus has become a chief favourite. The summing up on the merits of the true father of astronomy, as the historian calls him, is the best enumeration of his services which we can make, and will save the citation of authorities. The following is translated from the preliminary discourse (which, it is important to remember, means the last part written) of the Histoire de l'Astronomie Ancienne.

Let no one be astonished at the errors of half a degree with which we charge Hipparchus, perhaps with an air of reprehension. We must bear in mind that his astrolabe was only an armillary sphere; that its diameter was but moderate, the subdivisions of a degree hardly sensible; and that he had neither telescope, vernier, nor micrometer. What could we do even now, if we were deprived of these helps, if we were ignorant of refraction and of the true altitude of the pole, as to which, even at Alexandria, and in spite of armillary circles of every kind, an error of a quarter of a degree was committed. In our day we dispute about the fraction of a second; in that of Hipparchus they could not answer for the fraction of a degree; they might mistake* by as much as the diameter of the sun or moon. Let us rather turn our attention to the essential services rendered by Hipparchus to astronomy, of which he is the real founder. He is the first who gave and demonstrated the means of solving all triangles, rectilinear and spherical, both. He constructed a table of chords, of which he made the same sort of use as we make of our sines. He made more observations than his predecessors, and understood them better. He established the theory of the sun in such a manner that Ptolemy, 263 years afterwards, found nothing to change for the better. It is true that he was mistaken in the amount of the sun's inequality; but I have shown that this arose from a mistake of half a day in the time of the solstices. He himself admits that his result may be wrong by a quarter of a day; and we may always, without scruple, double the error supposed by any observer without doubting his good faith, but only attributing self-delusion. He determined the first inequality of the moon, and Ptolemy changed nothing in it; he gave the motion of the moon, of her apogee and of her nodes, and Ptolemy's corrections are but slight and of more than doubtful goodness. He had a glimpse (il a entrevu) of the second inequality; he made all the observations necessary for a discovery of the honour of which was reserved for Ptolemy; a discovery which perhaps he had not time to finish, but for which he had prepared every thing. He showed that all the hypotheses of his predecessors were insufficient to explain the double inequality of the planets; he predicted that nothing would do except the combination of the two hypotheses of the excentric and epicycle. Observations were wanting to him, because these demand intervals of time exceeding the duration of the longest life: he prepared them for his successors. We owe to his catalogue the important knowledge of the retrograde motion of the equinoctial points. We could, it is true, obtain this knowledge from much better observations, made during the last hundred years: but such observations would not give proof that the motion is sensibly uniform for a long succession of centuries; and the observations of Hipparchus, by their number and their antiquity, in spite of the errors which we cannot help finding in them, give us this important confirmation of one of the fundamental points of Astronomy. He was here the first discoverer. He invented the planisphere, or the mode of representing the starry heavens upon a plane, and of producing the solutions of problems of spherical astronomy, in a manner often as exact as, and more commodious than, the use of the globe itself. He is also the father of true geography, by his happy idea of marking the position of spots on

* The reader must not think that Delambre says the diameter of the sun is a degree, or near it. By not answering for the fraction of a degree, he means that they could be sure of no more than the nearest degree, which leaves them open to any error under half a degree, which is about the diameter of the sun or moon.
the earth, as was done with the stars, by circles drawn from the pole perpendicularly to the equator, that is, by latitudes and longitudes. His method of eclipses was long the only one by which difference of meridians could be determined; and it is by the projection of his invention that to this day we construct our maps of the world and our best geographical charts. We shall now proceed to give a short synopsis of the subjects treated in the Almagest: the reader will find a longer and better one in the second volume of the work of Delambre just cited.

The first book opens with some remarks on theory and practice, on the division of the sciences, and the certainty of mathematical knowledge: this preamble concludes with an announcement of the author's intention to avail himself of his predecessors, to run over all that has been sufficiently explained, and to dwell upon what has not been done completely and well. It then describes as the intention of the work to treat in order:—the relations of the earth and heaven; the effect of position upon the earth; the theory of the sun and moon, without which that of the stars cannot be undertaken; the sphere of the fixed stars, and those of the five stars called planets. Arguments are then produced for the spherical form and motion of the heavens, for the sensibly spherical form of the earth, for the earth being in the centre of the heavens, for its being but a point in comparison with the distances of the stars, and its having no motion of translation. Some, it is said, admitting these reasons, nevertheless think that the earth may have a motion of rotation, which causes the (then) only apparent motion of the heavens. Admiring the simplicity of this solution, Ptolemy then gives his reasons why it cannot be. With these, as well as his preceding arguments, our readers are familiar. Two circular celestial motions are then admitted: one which all the stars have in common, another which several of them have of their own. From several expressions here used, various writers have imagined that Ptolemy held the opinion maintained by many of his followers, namely, that the celestial spheres are solid. Delambre inclines to the contrary, and we follow him. It seems to us that, though, as was natural, Ptolemy was led into the phraseology of the solid-orb system, it is only in the convenient mode which is common enough in all systems. When a modern astronomer speaks of the variation of the eccentricity of the moon's orbit as producing a certain effect upon, say her longitude, any one might suppose that this orbit was a solid transparent tube, within which the moon is materially restrained to move. Had it not been for the notion of his successors, no one would have attributed the same to Ptolemy: and if the literal meaning of phrases have weight, Copernicus is at least as much open to a like conclusion as Ptolemy.

Then follows the geometrical exposition of the theory, by means of a table of chords; and the table itself to half degrees for the whole of the semicircle, with differences for minutes, after the manner of recent modern tables. This morceau of geometry is one of the most beautiful in the Greek writers: some propositions from it are added to many editions of Euclid. Delambre, who thinks as meanly as he can of Ptolemy on all occasions, mentions it with a doubt as to whether it is his own, or collected from his predecessors. In this, as in many other instances, he shows no attempt to judge a mathematical argument by any thing except its result: had it been otherwise, the unity and power of this chapter would have established a strong presumption in favour of its originality. Though Hipparchus constructed chords, it is to be remembered we know nothing of his manner as a mathematician; nothing, indeed, except some results. The next chapter is on the obliquity of the ecliptic as determined by observation. It is followed by spherical geometry and trigonometry enough for the determination of the connection between the sun's right ascension, declination, and longitude, and for the formation of a table of declinations to each degree of longitude. Delambre says he found both this and the table of chords very exact.

The second book is one of deduction from the general doctrine of the sphere, on the effect of position on the earth, the longest days, the determination of latitude, the points at which the sun is vertical, the equinoctial and solstitial shadows of the gnomon, and other things which change with the spectator's position. Also on the arcs of the ecliptic and equator which pass the horizon simultaneously, with tables for different climates, or parallels of latitude having longest days of given durations. This is followed by the consideration of oblique spherical problems, for the purpose of calculating angles made by the ecliptic with the vertical, of which he gives tables.

The third book is on the length of the year, and on the theory of the solar motion. Ptolemy forms us of the manner in which Hipparchus made the discovery of the precession of the equinoxes, by observation of the revolution from one equinox to the same again being somewhat shorter than the actual revolution in the heavens. He discusses the reasons which induced his predecessor to think there was a small inequality in the length of the year, decides that he was wrong, and produces the comparison of his own observations with those of Hipparchus, to show that the latter had the true and constant value (one three-hundredth of a day less than 3651 days). As this is more than six minutes too great, and as the error, in the whole interval between two amounts to more than a day and a quarter, Delambre is surprised, and with reason, that Ptolemy should not have detected it. He hints that Ptolemy's observations may have been calculated from their required result; on which we shall presently speak. It must be remembered that Delambre watches every process of Ptolemy with the eye of a lynx, to claim it for Hipparchus, if he can; and when it is certain that the latter did not attain it, then he might have attained it, or would if he had lived, or at the least it is to be matter of astonishment that he did not.

Ptolemy then begins to explain his mode of applying the celebrated theory of eccentricities, or revolutions in a circle which has the spectator out of its centre; of epicycles, or circles, the centres of which revolve on other circles, &c. As we cannot give mathematical explanations, we shall refer the reader to the general notion which he probably has on this subject, to Nairrien's History of Astronomy, or to Delambre himself. As to the solar theory, it may be sufficient to say that Ptolemy explains the one inequality then known, as Hipparchus did before him, by the supposition that the circle of the sun is an excentric; and that he does not appear to have added to his predecessor at all, in discovery at least.

On this theory of epicycles, we may say a word or two. The common notion is that it was a cumbrous and useless apparatus, thrown away by the moderns, and originating in the Ptolemaic, or rather Platonic, notion, that all celestial motions must either be circular and uniform motions, or compounded of them. But on the contrary, it was an elegant and most efficient mathematical instrument, which enabled Ptolemy and Ptolemy to represent and predict much better than their predecessors had done; and it was probably at least as good a theory as their instruments and capabilities of observation required or deserved. And many readers will be surprised to hear that the modern astronomer to this day resolves the same motions into epicyclic ones. When the latter expresses a result by series of sines and cosines (especially when the angle is a mean motion or a multiple of it) he uses epicycles; and for one which Ptolemy scribbled on the heavens, to use Milton's phrase, he scrabbles twenty. The difference between the latter and the former is only in their convenience; the former used those which do not sufficiently represent actual phenomena, the latter knows how to choose better; the former taking the instruments to be the actual contrivances of nature, was obliged to make one set explain every thing, the latter will adapt one set to latitude, another to longitude, another to distance. Difference enough, no doubt; but not the sort of difference which the common notion supposes.

The fourth and fifth books are on the theory of the moon, and the sixth is on eclipses. As to the moon, Ptolemy explains the first inequality of the moon's motion, which answers to that of the sun, and by virtue of which (to use a mode of expression very common in astronomy, by which a word properly representative of a phenomenon is put for its cause) the motions of the sun and moon are below the average at their greatest distances from the earth, and above at their least. This inequality was well known, and also the motion of the lunar apogee, as it is called; that is, the gradual change of the position of the point in the heavens at which the moon appears when her distance is greatest. Ptolemy, probably more assisted by records of the observations of Hipparchus than by his own, detected that the single inequality above mentioned was not sufficient, but that the lunar motions, as then known, could not be explained without supposition of another inequality, which has since been named the precession. Its effect, at the new and full moon, is to make the effect of the preceding inequality appear different at different times; and it depends not only on the position of the sun and moon, but on that of the moon's apogee. The disentanglement of this inequality, the magnitude of which depends upon three angles, and the adaptation of an epicyclic hypothesis to its explanation, is the greatest triumph of ancient astronomy.

The seventh and eighth books are devoted to the stars. The celebrated catalogue (of which we have before spoken) gives the longitudes and latitudes of 1022 stars, described by their positions in the constellations. It seems not unlikely that in the main this catalogue is really that of Hipparchus, altered to Ptolemy's own time by assuming the value of the precession of the equinoxes given by Hipparchus as the least which could be; some changes having also been made by Ptolemy's own observations. This catalogue is pretty well shown by Delambre (who is mostly successful when he attacks Ptolemy as an observer) to represent the heaven of Hipparchus, altered by a wrong precession, better than the heaven of the time at which the catalogue was made. And it is observed that though Ptolemy observed at Alexandria, where certain stars are visible which are not visible at Rhodes (where Hipparchus observed), none of those stars are in Ptolemy's catalogue. But it may also be noticed, on the other hand, that one original mistake (in the equinox) would have the effect of making all the longitudes wrong by the same quantity; and this one mistake might have occurred, whether from observation or calculation, or both, in such a manner as to give the suspicious appearances.

The remainder of the thirteen books are devoted to the planets, on which Hipparchus could do little, except observe, for want of long series of observations. Whatever we may gather from scattered hints, as to something having been done by Hipparchus himself, by Apollonius, or by any others, towards an explanation of the great features of planetary motion, there can be no doubt that the theory presented by Ptolemy is his own.

These are the main points of the Almagest, so far as they are of general interest. Ptolemy appears in it a splendid mathematician, and an (at least) indifferent observer. It seems to us most likely that he knew his own deficiency, and that, as has often happened in similar cases, there was on his mind a consciousness of the superiority of Hipparchus which biassed him to interpret all his own results of observation into agreement with the predecessor from whom he feared, perhaps a great deal more than he knew of, to differ. But nothing can prevent his being placed as a fourth with Euclid, Apollonius, and Archimedes. Delambre has used him, perhaps, harshly; being, certainly in one sense, perhaps in two, an indifférent judge of the higher kinds of mathematical merit.

As a literary work, the Almagest is entitled to a praise which is rarely given; and its author has shown abundant proofs of his conscientious fairness and nice sense of honour. It is pretty clear that the writings of Hipparchus had never been public property: the astronomical works which intervene between Hipparchus and Ptolemy are so poor as to make it evident that the spirit of the former had not infused itself into such a number of men as would justify us in saying astronomy had a scientific school of followers. Under these circumstances, it was open to Ptolemy, had it pleased him, most materially to outdo the works, if not entirely to suppress, the labours of Hipparchus; and without the fear of detection. Instead of this, it is from the former alone that we now chiefly know the latter, who is constantly cited as the authority, and him who is called master. Such a spirit, shown by Ptolemy, entitles us to infer that he had really used the catalogue of Hipparchus in the manner hinted at by Delambre, he would have avowed what he had done; still, under the circumstances of agreement noted above, we are not at liberty to reject the suspicion. We imagine, then, that Ptolemy was strongly biased towards those methods both of observation and interpretation, which would place him in agreement, or what he took for agreement, with the authority whom in his own mind he could not disbelieve. ([Ha]ma and De-

THE GEOGRAPHICAL SYSTEM OF PTOLEMY.

The Ἱγεωγραφικὴ Ἰσφάγεια of Ptolemy, in eight books, may be regarded as an exhibition of the final state of geographical knowledge among the ancients, in so far as geography is the science of determining the positions of places on the earth’s surface; for of the other branch of the science, the description of the objects of interest connected with different countries and places, in which the work of Strabo is so rich, that of Ptolemy contains comparatively nothing. With the exception of the introductory matter in the first book, and the latter part of the work, it is a mere catalogue of the names of places, with their longitudes and latitudes, and with a few incidental references to objects of interest. It is clear that Ptolemy made a diligent use of all the information that he had access to; and the materials thus collected he arranged according to the principles of mathematical geography. His work was the last attempt made by the ancients to form a complete geographical system; it was accepted as the text-book of the science; and it maintained that position during the middle ages, and until the fifteenth century, when the rapid progress of maritime discovery caused it to be superseded.

The treatise of Ptolemy was based on an earlier work by Marinus of Tyre, of which we derive almost our whole knowledge from Ptolemy himself (i. 6, &c.). He tells us that Marinus was a diligent inquirer, and well acquainted with all the facts of the science, which had been collected before his time; but that his system required correction, both as to the method of delineating the sphere on a plane surface, and as to the comtputation of distances: he also informs us that the data followed by Marinus had been, in many cases, superseded by the more accurate accounts of recent travellers. It is, in fact, as the corrector of those points in the work of Marinus which were erroneous or defective, that Ptolemy introduces him-selv e to his readers; and his discussion of the necessary corrections occupies fifteen chapters of his first book (cc. 6—20). The most important of the errors which he ascribes to Marinus, is that he assigned to the known part of the world too small a length from east to west, and too small a breadth from north to south. He himself has fallen into the opposite error.

Before giving an account of the system of Ptolemy, it is necessary to notice the theory of Brehmer, in his Entdeckungen im Alterthum, that the work of Marinus of Tyre was based upon ancient charts and other records of the geographical researches of the Phoenicians. This theory finds now but few defenders. It rests almost entirely on the presumption that the widely extended commerce of the Phoenicians would give birth to various geographical documents, to which Marinus, living at Tyre, would have access. But against this may be set the still stronger presumption, that a scientific Greek writer, whether at Tyre or elsewhere, would avail himself of the rich materials collected by Greek investigators, especially from the time of Alexander; and this presumption is converted into a certainty by the information which Ptolemy gives us respecting the Greek itineraries and peripherals which Marinus had used as authorieties. The whole question is thoroughly discussed by Heeren, in his Commentatio de Fontibus Geo-graphicorum Ptolemaei, Tubularumque iis annexarum, Gotting, 1827, which is appended to the English translation of his Ideen (Asiatic Nations, vol. iii. Append. C). He shows that Brehmer has greatly overrated the geographical knowledge of the Phoenicians, and that his hypothesis is altogether groundless.

In examining the geographical system of Ptolemy, it is convenient to speak separately of its mathematical and historical portions; that is, of his notions respecting the figure of the earth, and the mode of determining positions on its surface, and his knowledge, derived from positive information, of the form and extent of the different countries, and the actual positions and distances of the various places in the then known world.

1. The Mathematical Geography of Ptolemy.—

Firstly, as to the figure of the earth. Ptolemy assumes, what in his mathematical works he undertakes to prove, that the earth is neither a plane surface, nor fan-shaped, nor quadrangular, nor pyramidal, but spherical. It does not belong to the present subject to follow him through the detail of his proofs.

The mode of laying down positions on the surface of this sphere, by imagining great circles passing through the poles, and called meridians, because it is mid-day at the same time to all places through which each of them passes; and other circles, one of which was the great circle equidistant from the poles (the equinoctial line or the equator), and the other small circles parallel to that one; and the method of fixing the positions of these several circles, by dividing each great circle of the sphere into 360 equal parts (now called degrees, but by the Greeks “parts of a great circle”), and imagining a meridian to be drawn through each division of the equator, and a parallel through each division of any meridian;—all this had been settled from the time of Eratosthenes. What we owe to Ptolemy or to Marinus (for it cannot be said with certainty to which) is the introduction of the terms longitude (μεγίστος) and latitude (ωδήστος), the former to describe the position of any place with reference to the length of the known world, that is, its distance, in degrees, from a fixed meridian, measured along an or other parallel; and the latter to describe the position of a place with reference to the breadth of the known world, that is, its distance, in degrees, from the equator, measured along its own meridian. Having introduced these terms, Marinus and Ptolemy designated the positions of the places they mentioned, by stating the numbers which represent the longitudes and latitudes of each. The subdivision of the degree adopted by Ptolemy is into twelfths.

Connected with these fixed lines, is the subject of climates, by which the ancients understood belts of the earth’s surface, divided by lines parallel to the equator, those lines being determined according to the different lengths of the day (the longest day was the standard) at different places, or, which is the same thing, by the different lengths, at different PTOLEMAEUS places, of the shadow cast by a gnomon of the same altitude at noon of the same day. This system of climates was, in fact, an imperfect development of the more complete system of parallels of latitude. It was, however, retained for convenience of reference. For a further explanation of it, and for an account of the climates of Ptolemy, see the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. China, 2nd ed.

Next, as to the size of the earth. Various attempts had been made, long before the time of Ptolemy, to calculate the circumference of a great circle of the earth by measuring the length of an arc of a meridian, containing a known number of degrees. Thus Eratosthenes, who was the first to attempt any complete computation of this sort from his own observations beginning from the parallel of Alexandria, to lie under the same meridian*, and to be 5000 stadia apart, and the arc between them to be 1-50th of the circumference of a great circle, obtained 250,000 stadia for the whole circumference, and 6943 stadia for the length of a degree; but, in order to make this a convenient whole number, he called it 700 stadia, and so got 252,000 stadia for the circumference of a great circle of the earth (Cleomed. Cyl. Theor. i. 8; Ukert, Geogr. d. Griech. u. Römer, vol. i. pt. 2, pp. 42-45). The most important of the other computations of this sort were those of Poseidionius, (for he made two) which were founded on different estimates of the distance between Rhodes and Alexandria: the one gave, like the computation of Eratosthenes, 252,000 stadia for the circumference of a great circle, and 700 stadia for the length of a degree; and the other gave 180,000 stadia for the circumference of a great circle, and 500 stadia for the length of a degree (Cleomed. i. 3; Strab. ii. pp. 86, 93, 95, 125; Ukert, l. c. p. 49). The truth lies just between the two; for, taking the Roman mile of 3 stadia as 1-75th of a degree, we have (75 x 3 =) 600 stadia for the length of a degree.†

Ptolemy followed the second computation of Poseidionius, namely, that which made the earth 180,000 stadia in circumference, and the degree 500 stadia in length; but it should be observed that he, as well as all the ancient geographers, speaks of his computation as confessedly only an approximation to the truth. He describes, in bk. i. c. 3, the method of finding, from the direct distance in stadia of two places, even though they be not under the same meridian, the circumference of the whole earth, and conversely. There having been found, by means of an astronomical instrument, two fixed stars distant one degree from each other, the places on the earth were sought to which those stars were in the zenith, and the distance between the latitudes ascertained, this distance was, of course (excluding errors), the length of a degree of the great circle passing through those places, whether that circle were a meridian or not. The next point to be determined was the mode of representing the surface of the earth with its meridians of longitude and parallels of latitude, on a sphere, and on a plane surface. This subject is discussed by Ptolemy in the last seven chapters of his first book (18-24), in which he points out the imperfections of the system of delineation adopted by Marinus, and expounds his own. Of the two kinds of delineation, he observes, that on a sphere is the easier to make, as it involves no method of projection, but is a direct representation; but, on the other hand, it is inconvenient to use, as only a small portion of the surface can be seen at once: while the converse is true of a map on a plane surface. The earliest geographers had no guide for their maps but reported distances and general notions of the figures of the masses of land and water. Eratosthenes, in his work on geography, had the aid of astronomy, but he did not attempt any complete projection of the sphere (see ERATOSTHENES, and Ukert, vol. i. pt. 2, pp. 192, 193, and plate ii., in which Ukert attempts a restoration of the map of Eratosthenes). Hipparchus, in his work on geography, insisted much more fully on the necessary connection between geography and astronomy, and was the first who attempted to lay down the exact positions of places according to their latitudes and longitudes. In the science of projection, however, he went no further than the method of representing the meridians and parallels by parallel straight lines, the one set intersecting the other at right angles. Other systems of projection were attempted, so that at the time of Marinus there were several methods in use, all of which he rejected, and devised a new system, which is described in the following manner by Ptolemy (i. 20, 24, 25). On account of the importance of the problem, Ptolemy was the first who entirely abandoned the use of the plane, and kept as his datum line the old standard line of Eratosthenes and his successors, namely the parallel through Rhodes, or the 36th degree of latitude. He then calculated, from the length of a degree on the equator, the length of a degree on this parallel; taking the former at 500 stadia, he reckoned the latter at 400. Having divided this parallel into degrees, he drew perpendiculars through the points of division for the meridians; and his parallels of latitude were straight lines parallel to that through Rhodes. The result, of course, was, as Ptolemy observes, that the parts of the earth north of the parallel of Rhodes were represented much too long, and those south of that line much too short; and further that, when Marinus came to lay down the positions of places according to their reported distances, those north of the line were too near, and those south of it too far apart, as compared with the surface of his map. Moreover, Ptolemy observes, that the representation was one that, inasmuch as the parallels of latitude ought to be circular arcs, and not straight lines. Ptolemy then proceeds to describe his own method, which does not admit of an abridged statement, and cannot be understood without a figure.

The reader is therefore referred for it to Ptolemy's own work (i. 24), and to the accounts given by Ukert (l. c. pp. 105, &c.), Mannert (vol. i. pp. 127, &c.), and other geographers. All that can be said of it here is that Ptolemy represents the parallels of latitude as arcs of concentric circles (their centre representing the North Pole), the chief of which are those passing through Thule, Rhodes, and Meroë, the Equator, and the one through Præsium. The meridians of longitude are represented by

* As we are not dealing here with the facts of geography, but only with the opinions of the ancient geographers, we do not stay to correct the errors in the data of these computations.
† It will be observed that we recognise no other stadium than the Olympic, of 600 Greek feet, or 1-sth of a Roman mile. The reasons for this are stated in the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Stad.
straight lines which converge, north of the equator, towards the common centre of the arcs which represents the parallels of latitude; and, south of it, towards a corresponding point, representing the South Pole. Having laid down these lines, he proceeds to show how to give to them a curved form, so as to make them a truer representation of the meridians on the globe itself. The portion of the earth thus delineated is, in length, a whole hemisphere, and, in breadth, the part which lies between $36^\circ$ of north latitude and $167^\circ$ of south latitude.

2. The Historical or Positive Geography of Ptolemy.—The limits just mentioned, as those within which Ptolemy’s projection of the sphere was contained, were also those which he assigned to the known world. His own account of its extent and divisions is given in the fifth chapter of his seventh book. The boundaries which he there mentions are, on the east, the unknown land adjacent to the eastern nations of Asia, namely, the Sinae and the people of Serica; on the south, the unknown land which encloses the Indian Sea, and that adjacent to the district of Aethiopia called Agelymba, on the south of Libya; on the west, the unknown land which surrounds the Aethiopic gulf of Libya, and the Western Ocean; and on the north, the continuation of the ocean, which surrounds the British islands and the northern parts of Europe, and the unknown land adjacent to the northern regions of Asia, namely Sarmatia, Scythia, and Serica.

He also defines the boundaries by meridians and parallels, as follows. The southern limit is the parallel of $16^\circ$ S. lat., which passes through a point as far south of the equator, as Meroë is north of it, and which he elsewhere describes as the parallel through Prasum, a promontory of Aethiopia; and the northern limit is the parallel of $65^\circ$ N. lat., which passes through the island of Thule: so that the whole extent from north to south is $79\frac{1}{2}^\circ$, or in round numbers, $80^\circ$; that is, as nearly as possible, 40,000 stadia. The eastern limit is the meridian which passes through the metropolis of the Sinae, which is $119^\circ$ east of Alexandria, or just about eight hours; and the western limit is the meridian drawn through the Insulae Fortunate (the Canaries) which is $60^\circ$, or four hours, west of Alexandria, and therefore $130^\circ$, or twelve hours, west of the easternmost meridian. The various lengths of the earth, in itinerary measure, he reckons at 90,000 stadia along the equator (500 stadia to a degree), 40,000 stadia along the northermost parallel (2223/4 stadia to a degree), and 72,000 stadia along the parallel through Rhodes (400 stadia to a degree), along which parallel most of the measurements had been reckoned.

In comparing these computations with the actual distances, it is not necessary to determine the true position of such doubtful localities as Thule and the metropolis of the Sinae; for there are many other indications in Ptolemy’s work, from which we can ascertain nearly enough what limits he intended. We cannot be far wrong in placing his northern boundary at about the parallel of the Zetland Isles, and his eastern boundary at about the eastern coast of Cochin China, in fact just at the meridian of $110^\circ$ E. long. (from Greenwich), or perhaps at the opposite side of the Chinese Sea, namely, at the Philippine Islands at the meridian of $120^\circ$. It will then be seen that he is not far wrong in his dimensions from north to south; a circumstance natural enough, since the methods of taking latitudes with tolerable precision had long been known, and he was very careful to avail himself of every recorded observation which he could discover. But his longitudes are very wide of the truth, his length of the known world, from east to west, being much too great. The westernmost of the Canaries is in a little more than $18^\circ$ W. long., so that Ptolemy’s easternmost meridian (which, as just stated, is in $110^\circ$ or $120^\circ$ E. long.) ought to have been that of $128$ or $138^\circ$, or in round numbers $130^\circ$ or $140^\circ$, instead of $180^\circ$; a difference of $50^\circ$ or $40^\circ$, that is, from 1-7th to 1-9th of the earth’s circumference.

It is well worthy, however, of remark in passing, that the modern world owes much to this error; for it tended to encourage that belief in the practicability of a western passage to the Indies, which occasioned the discovery of America by Columbus. There has been much speculation and discussion as to the cause of Ptolemy’s great error in this matter; but, after making due allowance for the uncertainties attending the computations of distance on which he proceeded, it seems to us that the chief cause of the error is to be found in the fact already stated, that he took the length of a degree exactly one sixth too small, namely, 500 stadia instead of 600. As we have already stated, on his own authority, he was extremely careful to make use of every trustworthy observation of latitude and longitude which he could find; but he himself complains of the pacity of such observations; and it is manifest that those of longitude must have been fewer and less accurate than those of latitude, both for other reasons, and chiefly on account of the greater difficulty of taking them. He had, therefore, to depend for his longitudes chiefly on the process of turning into degrees the distances computed in stadia; and hence, supposing the distances to be tolerably correct, his error as to the longitudes followed inevitably from the error in his scale. Taking Ptolemy’s own computation in stadia, and turning it into degrees of 600 stadia each, we get the following results. The length of the known world, measured along the equator, is 90,000 stadia; and hence its length in degrees is $90,000 = 150^\circ$; the error being thus reduced from $50^\circ$ or $40^\circ$ to $20^\circ$ or $10^\circ$. But a still fairer method is to take the measurement along the parallel of Rhodes, namely, 72,000 stadia. Now the true length of a degree of latitude in that parallel is about $47 = 43$ of a degree of a great circle $= \frac{43}{5} \times 600$ stadia $= 470$ stadia, instead of 400; and the 72,000 stadia give a little over 153 degrees, a result almost identical with the former. The remaining error of $20^\circ$ at the most, or $10^\circ$ at the least, is, we think, sufficiently accounted for by the errors in the itinerary measures, which experience shows to be almost always on the side of making distances too great, and which, in this case, would of course go on increasing, the further the process was continued eastward. Of this source of error Ptolemy was himself aware; and accordingly he tells us that, among the various computations of a distance, he always chose the least; but, for the reason just stated, that least one was probably still too great.

The method pursued by Ptolemy in laying down the actual positions of places has already been incidentally mentioned in the foregoing discussion. He fixed as many positions as possible by their longitudes and latitudes, and from these positions he determined the others by converting their distances in stadia into degrees. For further details the reader is referred to his own work.

His general ideas of the form of the known world were in some points more correct, in others less so, than those of Strabo. The elongation of the whole of course led to a corresponding distortion of the shapes of the several countries. He knew nothing about the southern tip of the Baltic, but was not aware of its being an inland sea. He makes the Palus Maeotis far too large and extends it far too much to the north. The Caspian he correctly makes an inland sea (instead of a gulf of the Northern Ocean), but he errs greatly as to its size and form, making its length from E. to W. more than twice that from N. to S. In the southern and south-eastern parts of Asia, he altogether fails to represent the projection of Hindostan, while, on the other hand, he gives to Ceylon (Taprobane) more than four times its proper dimensions, probably through confounding it with the mainland of India itself, and brings down the southern part of it below the equator. He shows an acquaintance with the Malayan peninsula (his Aurea Chersonesus) and the coast of Cochín China; but, probably through mistaking the eastern Archipelago for continuous land, he brings round the land which encloses his Sinae equum and the Gulf of Hainan either by the Gulf of Siam and the Chinese Sea, or both confounded together) so as to make it enclose the whole of the Indian Ocean on the south. At the opposite extremity of the known world, his idea of the western coast of Africa is very erroneous. He makes it trend almost due south from the pillars of Hercules to the Hesper Keras in 85° N. lat., where a slight bend to the eastward indicates the Gulf of Guinea; but almost immediately afterwards the coast turns again to the S.S.W.; and from the expression already quoted, which Ptolemy uses to describe the boundary of the known world on this side, it would seem as if he believed that the land of Africa extended here considerably to the west. Concerning the interior of Africa he knew considerably more than his predecessors. Several modern geographers have drawn maps to represent the views of Ptolemy: one of the latest and best of which is that of Ukert (Geogr. d. Griech. u. Römer, vol. i. pl. 3).

Such are the principal features of Ptolemy's geographical system. It only remains to give a brief outline of the contents of his work, and to mention the principal editions of it. Enough has already been said respecting the first, or introductory book. The next six books and a half (i.ii.—vii. 4) are occupied with the description of the known world, beginning with the West of Europe, the description of which is contained in book ii.; next comes the East of Europe, in book iii.; then Africa, in book iv.; then Western or Lesser Asia, in book v.; then the Greater Asia, in book vi.; then India, the Chersonesus Aurea, Serica, the Sinæ, and Taprobane, in book vii. cc. 1—4. The form in which the description is given is that of lists of places with their longitudes and latitudes, arranged under the heads, first, of the three continents, and then of the several countries and tribes. Prefixed to each section is a brief general description of the boundaries and divisions of the part about to be described; and remarks of a miscellaneous character are interspersed among the lists, to which, however, they bear but a small proportion.

The remaining part of the seventh, and the whole of the eighth book, are occupied with a description of a set of maps of the known world, which is introduced by a remark at the end of the 4th chapter of the 7th book, which clearly proves that Ptolemy's work had originally a set of maps appended to it. In c. 5 he describes the general map of the world. In cc. 6, 7, he takes up the subject of spherical delineation, and describes the armillary sphere, and its connection with the sphere of the earth. In the first two chapters of book viii., he explains the method of dividing the world into maps, and the mode of constructing each map; and he then proceeds (cc. 3—28) to the description of the maps themselves, in number twenty-six, namely, ten of Europe, four of Libya, and twelve of Asia. The 29th chapter contains a list of the maps, and the countries represented in each; and the 30th an account of the lengths and breadths of the portions of the earth contained in the respective maps. These maps are still extant, and an account of them is given under Agathodaimon, who was either the original designer of them, under Ptolemy's direction, or the constructor of a new edition of them.

Enough has been already said to show the great value of Ptolemy's work, but its perfect integrity is another question. It is impossible but that a work, which was for twelve or thirteen centuries the text-book in geography, should have suffered corruptions and interpolations; and one writer has contended that the changes made in it during the middle ages were so great, that we can no longer recognise in it the work of Ptolemy (Schliëzer, Nord. Gesch. in the Allgem. Welthistorie, vol. xxxi. pp. 148, 176). Mannert has successfully defended the genuineness of the work, and has shown to what an extent the eighth book may be made the means of detecting the corruptions in the body of the work. (vol. i. p. 174.)

The Geographia of Ptolemy was printed in Latin, with the Maps, at Rome, 1462, 1475, 1478, 1482, 1486, 1490, all in folio: of these editions, those of 1482 and 1490 are the best; numerous other Latin editions appeared during the sixteenth century, the most important of which is that by Michael Servetus, Lugd. 1541, folio. The Edition Princeps of the Greek text is that edited by Erasmus, Basil. 1533, 4to.; reprinted at Paris, 1546, 4to. The text of Erasmus was reprinted, but with a new Latin Version, Notes, and Indices, edited by Petrus Montanus, and with the Maps restored by Mercator, Amst. 1605, folio; and a still more valuable edition was brought out by Petrus Bertius, printed by Elsevir, with the maps coloured, and with the addition of the Peutingerian Tables, and other important illustrative matter. Lugd. Bat. 1619, folio; reprinted Antwerp, 1624, folio. The work also forms a part of the edition of Ptolemy's works, undertaken by the Abbé Halmer, but left unfinished at his death, Paris, 1813—1828, 4to.; this edition contains a French translation of the work. For an account of the less important editions, the editions of separate parts, the versions, and the works illustrating Ptolemy's Geography, see Waltenberger, Lex. Bibl. Graec. A useful little edition of the Greek text is contained in three volumes of the Tauchnitz classics, Lips. 1843, 32mo. [P. S.] PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαύος), king of Cyprus. was the younger brother of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, being like him an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus. Notwithstanding this defect of birth he appears to have been acknowledged as king of Cyprus at the same time that his brother Auletes obtained possession of the throne of Egypt, B.C. 30. But he unfortunately neglected the precaution of making interest at Rome to obtain the confirmation of his sovereignty, and had the farther imprudence to give personal offence to P. Clodius, by neglecting to ransom him when he had fallen into the hands of the Cilician pirates (Strab. xiv. p. 684; Appian, B. C. ii. 23). He paid dearly for his niggardliness on this occasion, for when Clodius betrayed the other persons concerned, he brought forward a law to deprive Ptolemy of his kingdom, and reduce Cyprus to a Roman province. Cato, who was entreated with the charge of carrying into execution this nefarious decree, sent to Ptolemy, advising him to submit, and offering him personal safety, with the office of high-priest at Paphos, and a liberal maintenance. But the unhappy king, though he was wholly unprepared for resistance to the Roman power, had the spirit to refuse these offers, and put an end to his own life, B.C. 57. (Strab. l.c.; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 30, xxxix. 22; Liv. Epit. civ.; Plut. Cat. Min. 34—36; Appian, B. C. ii. 23; Vell. Pat. ii. 45; Cic. pro Sest. 26—28; Val. Max. ix. 4, ext. § 1.)

We are told that Ptolemy had disgraced himself by every species of vice (Vell. Pat. l.c.), but it appears certain that it was the vast treasures that he possessed, which, by attracting the cupidity of the Romans, became the cause of his design, as well as of which his vices were afterwards made the pretext. [E. H. B.]

PTOLEMAEUS, king of CYRUS. [PTOLEMAEUS Apion.]

PTOLEMAEUS I. (Πτολεμαίος), king of Egypt, surnamed Soter (the Preserver), but perhaps more commonly known as the son of Lagus. His father was a Macedonian of ignoble birth [Λάγος], but his mother Arsinoë had been a concubine of Philip of Macedon, on which account it seems to have been generally believed that Ptolemy was in reality the offspring of that monarch (Curt. ix. 8. § 22; Paus. i. 6. § 2.) This could, indeed, hardly have been the case if Lu- cian’s statement be correct (Macrobi. 12), that Ptolemy was eighty-four years of age at the time of his death, as in that case he must have been born in B.C. 367, when Philip was not sixteen years old. But the accuracy of Lucian on this point can hardly outweigh the direct assertions of other authors as to the existence of such a belief, and we must therefore probably assign his birth to a later period. Whatever truth there may have been in this report, it is certain that Ptolemy early enjoyed a distinction at the Macedonian court to which his father’s obscurity would scarcely have entitled him, and we find him mentioned before the death of Philip among the friends and confidential advisers of the young Alexander. The part which he took in promoting the intrigue for the marriage of the prince with the daughter of Pixodarus, king of Caria, gave great offence to Philip, and Ptolemy was banished, together with all the other persons concerned. (Plut. Arrius 10; Arrian, Anab. iii. 6.) On the accession of Alex- ander, however, B.C. 336, he was immediately recalled from exile, and treated with the utmost distinction. It is remarkable that we do not find him holding any special command, or acting any important part during the first few years of the expedition to Asia, though it is clear that he accompanied the king throughout this period. Indeed, his name is only twice mentioned previous to the year B.C. 330, when he obtained the honourable post of Somatophylax in the place of Demetrius, who had been implicated in the conspiracy of Philotas. (Arr. ib. ii. 11, iii. 18, 27.) But from this period we find him continually employed on the most important occasions, and rendering the most valuable services.

In the following campaign (329), after the army had crossed the Iora, Ptolemy sent forward with a strong detachment, to apprehend the tiramor Bessus, whom he seized and brought before Alexander. Again, in the reduction of the revolted province of Sogdiana, and in the attack on the rock-fortress of Chorienes, he is mentioned as taking a conspicuous part, and commanding one of the chief divisions of the army. (Arr. Anab. iii. 29, 30, iv. 16, 21.) But it was especially during the campaigns in India that the services of Ptolemy shone the most conspicuous; and we find him displaying on numerous occasions all the qualities of an able and judicious general, in command of separate detachments, or of one of the divisions of the main army. In the conquest of the Aspasians and Assacencians, in the reduction of the fortress of Aornos, at the passage of the Hydaspes and the siege of Sangala, as well as in many minor operations, the name of Ptolemy is still among the most prominent. He was himself perhaps never less remarkable than his abilities as a general, and we find him on one occasion slaying with his own hand the chief of one of the Indian tribes in single combat. Some writers also ascribed to him a share in the glory of saving the life of Alexander among the Malli [Λεοννατας], but it appears from his own testimony, as reported by Arrian and Curtius, that he was absent at the time on a separate command. (Arr. Anab. iv. 24, 25, 29, v. 13, 23, 24, vi. 5, 11; Curt. viii. 10. § 21, 13. § 18—27, 14. § 15, ix. 5. § 21.)

Numerous evidences occur during the same period of the high favour and personal consideration with which he was regarded by Alexander: we find him constantly in close attendance upon the king’s person; and on occasion of the conspiracy of the pages it was he who, by discovering and revealing their treasonable designs, probably became the means of saving the life of his sovereign (Arr. iv. 3, 13; Curt. viii. 1. §§ 45, 48, 6. § 29, ix. 6; 15; Chares ap. Athen. iv. p. 171, c.). According to a marvellous tale related by several writers, Alexander was soon after able to return the obligation and save the life of his friend and follower when wounded by a poisoned arrow, by applying a remedy suggested to him in a dream. (Curt. ix. 8. § 22—27; Diod. xvii. 103; Strab. xv. p. 723; Justin. xii. 10; Cic. de Divin. ii. 66.) During the toilsome march through Gedrosia, Ptolemy once more commanded one of the three principal divisions of the army; and in the festivities at Susa he was honoured with a crown of gold, while he obtained in marriage Arriana, a daughter of Barseine. (Curt. ix. 10. § 6; Diod. xvii. 104; Arr. Anab. vii. 4; Plut. Eun. 1.) He is again mentioned as accompanying Alexander on his last military empire, the winter campaign against the Cos-ænaeans, n.c. 324. (Arr. ib. vii. 15.)

From all these facts it is clear that at the death of Alexander few among his friends and generals occupied so prominent a place as the son of Lagus, and Perdiccas appears to have looked upon him from the first as one of his most formidable rivals. But Ptolemy was too prudent to allow his ambition to lead him into any premature demonstrations of enmity. In the first assembly of the generals he had indeed proposed that the government should be administered by a council of officers; but this suggestion being rejected, he attached himself to the party of Perdiccas during the subsequent transactions. But he was far from losing sight of his own interests. It is said to have been by his advice that the different provinces and satrapies were portioned out among the generals, and he took care to secure for himself in the distribution the important government of Egypt, at once the most wealthy and the most secure from foreign invasion. (Curt. x. 6. §§ 13, 16, 7. § 16; Justin. xiii. 2, 4; Arrian, op. Phot. p. 69, a; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, a; Paus. i. 6. § 2.) Thither he appears to have hastened as speedily as possible: and one of his first acts on arriving in his new government was to put to death Cleomenes, who had administered the province under Alexander with the title of receiver-general of tributes, and had been expressly appointed by the council of generals to continue as hyparch under Ptolemy. Cleomenes had amassed vast treasures by extortion and rapine, and his execution thus tended to conciliate the minds of the Egyptians at the same time that it removed out of the way of Ptolemy a partisan of Perdiccas, and put him in possession of this accumulated treasure. (Paus. i. 6. § 3; Arrian, l. c.; Dexip- pus, l. c.)

All his efforts were now directed to strengthen himself in his new position: he attached his subjects by the mildness of his rule at the same time that he raised large forces, and concluded a secret league with Antipater against their common enemy, the regent Perdiccas. A still more overt act of dis-obedience was his persuading Arrhidaeus, who had been entrusted with the funeral of Alexander, to allow his body to be transported to Egypt, instead of conducting it, as originally agreed, to Aegae in Macedonia. (Diód. xviii. 14, 26, 28; Paus. i. 6. § 3; Arrian, op. Phot. p. 70, b.) About the same time (n. c. 322) he took advantage of the civil dissensions at Cyrene to annex that important city and province to his dominions. (Diód. xviii. 21; Arrian, op. Phot. p. 70, a.)

It was not till the beginning of the year n. c. 321 that hostilities actually commenced between Perdiccas and his adversaries. The regent, justly deeming Ptolemy the most formidable of his antag-onsists, determined to leave Eumenes to make head against his enemies in Asia, while he himself marched against Egypt. The result of his expedition has been already given under Per- diccas [p. 187]. The personal popularity of Ptolemy with the Macedonian army, which had contributed essentially to his success, secured him a welcome reception by the royal forces immediately after the death of Perdiccas, but he wisely declined the office of regent, which was bestowed, by his advice, on Arrhidaeus and Ptolemy. In the new arrangements at Tripæradæns, he naturally retained possession of Egypt and Cyrene; and it was probably at this period that he strengthened his union with the new regent Antipater, by marrying his daughter Eurydice. (Droysen, Hellenism, vol. i. p. 154.) But the very next year (n. c. 320) we find him venturing on a bold step, in direct contravention of the arrangements then made, by seizing on the important satrapy of Phœnicia and Coele-Syria, which had been assigned to Læonæon, whom he did not scruple to dispossess by force of arms. (Diód. xviii. 39, 43; Appian. Syr. 52; Arrian, op. Phot. p. 71, b.) It was probably during this expedition that he made himself master of Jerusalem, by attacking the city on the Sabbath day. (Josephus, Ant. xii. 1, adv. Apion. i. 22.)

The death of Antipater (n. c. 319) produced a great change in the relative situations of the different leaders, and Ptolemy was now induced to contract an alliance with Cassander and Antigonus against Polysperchon and Eumenes. He at first fitted out a fleet, with which he repaired to the coasts of Cilicia, and commenced operations against Eumenes, who in his turn threatened Phœnicia. (Diód. xviii. 62, 73;) but the war was eventually drawn off to the upper provinces of Asia, and Ptolemy remained a passive spectator of the contest. At length the decisive victory of Antigonus over Eumenes raised the former to a height of power which rendered him scarcely less formidable to his allies than his enemies, and his treatment of Pithon and Peucestes sufficiently betrayed his ambitious designs. Seleucus, who had himself with difficulty escaped from his hands, fled for refuge to Egypt, and by his representations of the character and projects of Antigonus awakened Ptolemy to a sense of the danger, and induced him to enter into an alliance with Cassander and Lysimachus against their common enemy, n. c. 316. (Id. xix. 56; Paus. i. 6. § 4.)

The next spring (315), after ineffectual attempts at negotiation, Antigonus commenced hostilities by the invasion of Syria, quickly recovered most of the cities in Phœnicia which had fallen under the yoke of Ptolemy, and laid siege to Tyre, the most important of all, and the strength of which for a long time defied all his efforts. While he was engaged in this siege, and in the equipment of a fleet, and his nephew Ptolemy was carrying on the war in Asia Minor with great success, the king of Egypt was undisputed master of the sea, of which he availed himself to establish a footing in Cyprus, where he either landed or subdued almost all the petty princes among whom the island was divided. At the same time he did not neglect the affairs of Greece, whither he despatched a strong fleet under his admiral Polycleitus, and endeavoured to gain over the Greek cities by idle proclamations of liberty. Polycleitus, on his return, defeated Theodotus, one of Antigonus's admirals, at Aphi- nissas in Cilicia, and took his whole fleet. But the next year (314) Tyre at length fell into the hands of Antigonus, who now found himself undisputed master of Syria and Phœnicia, and was, consequently, able to turn his own attention towards Asia Minor, leaving his son Demetrius to protect the newly-acquired provinces. The youth of De- metrius would have induced Ptolemy to attempt their recovery; but his attention was occupied during the year 313 by a revolt in Cyrene, and the defection of several of the princes of Cyprus. The former he succeeded in putting down through the agency of his general Agis, while he deemed it necessary to repair in person to Cyprus, with a large force, with which he quickly reduced the revolted cities, and placed the whole island under the command of Nicocles of Salamis, on whose fidelity he had full reliance. After this he laid waste with his fleet the adjoining coasts of the main land, took the towns of Posidemus in Syria, and Mallus in Cilicia, and withdrew again to Cyprus before Demetrius, who hastened to oppose him, could arrive on the spot. But the following spring (b. c. 312) he determined, at the instigation of Seleucus, to oppose Demetrius in the field, and invaded Palestine with a large army. He was met by the young general at Gaza, and a pitched battle ensued, in which Ptolemy and Seleucus were completely victorious, and Demetrius was compelled to evacuate Syria, leaving the whole country open to the Egyptian kings, who recovered almost without opposition all the cities of Phoenicia. After this he sent Seleucus at his own request with a small force upon Syria, but was himself arrested by establishing a permanent footing. [Seleucus.] Meanwhile, Demetrius partly recovered his disaster by defeating Ptolemy's general Cilles, and soon after Antigonus himself advanced into Syria, to support his son. Ptolemy gave way before them, and withdrew into Egypt, where he prepared for defence; but Antigonus did not attempt to follow him, and spent his time in operations in Asia. The next year (b. c. 311) hostilities were suspended by a general peace. (Diod. xix. 57—62; 64. 69. 79—86. 90. 93. 105.; Plut. Demetr. 5. 6; Paus. i. 6. § 5; Justin. xvi. 1; Appian. Syr. 54.) Of the motives which led to this treaty we have no information, but the probability is that all parties regarded it as little more than a truce. Ptolemy appears to have been the first to reconnoitre hostilities, and, under pretence that Antigonus had not, pursuant to the treaty, withdrawn his garrisons from the Greek cities in Asia, he sent a fleet to Cilicia under Leonidas, who reduced many towns on the coast, but was again compelled to withdraw by the arrival of Demetrius. The next year (b. c. 309) Ptolemy in person sailed with a large fleet to Lycia, took the important city of Xanthus, as well as Caunus and other places in Caria, and laid siege to Halicarnassus, which, however, was relieved by the sudden arrival of Demetrius. Ptolemy now withdrew to Myndus where he wintered, and the next spring (308) repaired in person to the Peloponnesus, where he announced himself as the liberator of Greece, but effected little, beyond the taking possession of the two strongholds of Corinth and Sicyon, which were yielded to him by Cratespis; and having placed garrisons in these he returned to Egypt. (Diod. xx. 19. 27. 37; Plut. Demetr. 7.) This year was, however, marked by a more important advantage in the recovery of Cyrene, which had for some years past shaken off the Egyptian yoke, but was now, after the death of Oppellas, restored once more under the subjection of Ptolemy by the arms of his brother Magas. [Magas.] The next season (b. c. 307) Demetrius succeeded in establishing his authority over great part of Greece, and drove Demetrius the Phalerenean cat of Athens, who took refuge at the court of Egypt. Ptolemy appears to have remained inactive during these events, but it is probable that his military and naval preparations at Cyprus gave unbrage to Antigonus, who in consequence recalled Demetrius from Greece, and determined to make a grand effort to wrest that important island from the hands of his rival. It was supplied by Ptolemy's brother Menelaus with a powerful fleet and army, but he was unable to resist the forces of Demetrius, was defeated, and besieged in the city of Salamis, the capital of the island. Ptolemy himself now hastened to his relief with a fleet of 140 ships, and a sea-fight ensued between him and Demetrius—one of the most memorable in ancient history—which terminated, after an obstinate contest, in the total defeat of the Egyptian fleet. Ptolemy was now compelled to withdraw to Egypt, while his brother Menelaus, with his fleet and army and the whole island of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the conqueror. Antigonus was so much elated by this victory as to assume the title of king, an example which Ptolemy, notwithstanding his defeat, immediately followed, b. c. 306. (Diod. xx. 45—53; Plut. Demetr. 15—16; Paus. i. 6. § 6; Appian. Syr. 54.) But the defeat at Salamis not only entailed upon the Egyptian king the loss of Cyprus, but left his rival for a time the undisputed master of the sea, an advantage of which Antigonus now determined to avail himself to strike a decisive blow against Egypt itself. For this purpose he himself advanced by land through Syria with a powerful army, while Demetrius supported him with his fleet. Ptolemy did not attempt to meet him in the field or oppose him on the frontiers of Egypt, but contented himself with fortifying and guarding the passages of the Nile, as he had done against Perdiccas: a manoeuvre which proved equally successful on the present occasion. The fleet of Demetrius suffered severely from storm, and his efforts to effect a landing in Lower Egypt were frustrated, while Antigonus himself was unable to force the passage of the river: his troops began to suffer from hunger: many of them deserted to Ptolemy, whose men were active with bribes and promises; and the old king at length found himself compelled to abandon the enterprise and retire into Syria. (Diod. xx. 73—76; Plut. Demetr. 19; Paus. i. 6. § 6.) Ptolemy was well contented to have escaped from so great a danger, and doubtless occupied in recruiting his forces, but we do not learn that he ventured to resume the offensive. The next year however (b. c. 305), Demetrius having turned his arms against the Rhodians, Ptolemy assisted the latter with repeated supplies both of troops and provisions. So important, indeed, were his succours on this occasion, that when Demetrius had been at length compelled to raise the siege (304), the Rhodians paid divine honours to the Egyptian monarch as their saviour and preserver. [Trip.] a title which appears to have been bestowed upon Ptolemy for the first time. (Diod. xx. 81—83. 96. 98—100; Paus. i. 6. § 6. 8. § 6; Athen. xv. p. 696, l.) During the next two years the king of Egypt seems to have been a nearly passive spectator of the contest in Greece, though in the course of it Corinth and Sicyon were wrested from his power by Demetrius: but at length in b. c. 302 the arrogant pretensions of Antigonus once more united Ptolemy and Seleucus with Cassander and Lysimachus in a league against their common foe. Still, however, Ptolemy took comparatively little part in the contest, which led to the decisive battle of Ipsus, and after advancing into Coele-Syria, and making himself master of part of that country and of Phoenicia, he was alarmed by a false report of the victory of Antigonus, and withdrew into Egypt. (Diod. xx. 106, 113; Justin.
xx. 2, 4.)
The defeat and death of Antigonus (b. c. 301) altogether altered the relations of the allied monarchs. Seleucus was now become almost as formidable as Antigonus had been, and the possession of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, which were claimed by Ptolemy as the price of his adhesion to the coalition, and by Seleucus as part of the allotted reward of his victory, was near producing an immediate breach between the two. Seleucus appears to have waived his pretensions for a time, but utimately obtained possession (in what manner we know not) of the disputed provinces. (Diod. xxi.
Exc. Vat. pp. 42, 43; Polyb. v. 67.) Meanwhile, their mutual jealousy led them to form new alliances with the Lacedaemonians ; and while Seleucus married Stratonicus, the daughter of Demetrius, Ptolemy sought to strengthen his connection with Lysimachus, by giving that monarch his daughter Arsinoë in marriage. At the same time he did not refuse to be reconciled, in appearance at least,
to Demetrius, to whom he even gave Ptolemais's, another of his daughters, for a wife. An alliance was at the same time concluded between them, and Pyrhus, the fugitive heir to the throne of Epirus, was placed at the Egyptian court by Demetrius,
as a hostage for his fidelity.
The young prince quickly rose to a high place in the favour of Ptolemy, who gave him his stepdughter Antigone in marriage, and conceived the design of raising him up as a rival to Demetrius.
His nominal alliance with the latter did not prevent him from furnishing all the support in his power to the Greek cities which were opposed to him, on occasion the expedition of Demetrius to Greece in
b. c. 297 : and the following year he took the opportunity to create a formidable diversion by sending Pyrhus, at the head of a small force, to Epirus, where the young prince quickly established himself upon the throne. (Plut. Demetr. 32, 33, Pyrrh. 4, 5; Paus. i. 6. § 8.)
The next year (b. c. 295) he took advantage of Demetrius being still engaged in the affairs of Greece, to recover the important island of Cyprus.
This he quickly reduced, with the exception of Salamin, where Phila, the wife of Demetrius, held out for a long time, but her husband's attention being now wholly engrossed by the prospects which had opened to him in Macedonia [DEMETRIUS], he was unable to render her any assistance, and she was ultimately compelled to surrender to Ptolemy. The whole island thus fell into the power of the king, and became from henceforth an integral portion of the Egyptian monarchy.
(Plut. Demetr. 35, 36.)
After the lapse of a considerable interval that we again find Ptolemy engaging actively in foreign war. But he could not remain an indifferent spectator of the events which placed his old enemy Demetrius on the throne of Macedonia : and in b. c. 297 we find him once more joining in a league with Lysimachus and Seleucus against the object of their common enmity. The part taken by Ptolemy in the war that followed was, however, limited to the sending a fleet to the Aegean : and the defeat and captivity of Demotrius soon removed all cause of apprehension.
(Plut. Demetr. 44, Pyrrh. 10, 11; Justin. xvi. 2.)
It is probable that the latter years of his reign were devoted almost entirely to the arts of peace, and to promoting the internal prosperity of his dominions. But his advancing age now warned him of the necessity of providing for the succession to his throne.
Ptolemy was at this time the father of three legitimate sons, of whom the two eldest, Ptolemy surnamed Ceraunus, and Meleager, were the offspring of Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, while the youngest, also named Ptolemy (afterwards surnamed Philadelphus) was the child of his latest and most beloved wife, Berenice. His attachment to Berenice, as well as the favourable opinion he had formed of the character of the young man himself, now led him to conceive the project of bestowing the crown upon the last of these three princes, to the exclusion of his elder brothers. Such a design met with vehement opposition from Demetrius the Phalerian, who now held a high place in the counsels and favour of Ptolemy : but the king, nevertheless, determined to carry it into execution, and even resolved to secure the throne to his favourite son by establishing him on it in his own lifetime. In the year
b. c. 285 accordingly, he himself announced to the assembled people of Alexandria that he had ceased to reign, and transferred the sovereign authority to his youngest son, whom he presented to them as their king. His choice was received, we are told, with the utmost favour, and the accession of the new monarch was celebrated with festivities and processions on a scale of unparalleled magnificence, during which the aged monarch himself appeared among the officers and attendants of his son.
(Justin. xvi. 2; Athen. v. p. 196, 203.) Nothing occurred to interrupt the harmony which subsisted between them from this time till the death of the elder Ptolemy, which took place about two years after, b. c. 283. His reign is variously estimated at thirty-eight or forty years, according as we include or not these two years which followed his abdication. (Porphyr. ap. Euseb. Arm. pp. 113, 114; Joseph. Ant. xii. 2.) He was not only honoured by his son with a splendid funeral; but his body was deposited in the magnificent edifice which had been erected as the mausoleum of Alexander ; and divine honours were paid to him in common with the great conqueror. (Theoc.
Idyll. xvii. 16—19; Strab. xvii. p. 794.)
The character of Ptolemy has been generally represented in a very favourable light by historians, and there is no doubt that if we compare him with his contemporary and rival potentates he appears to deserve the praises bestowed upon his mildness and moderation. But it is only with this important qualification that they can be admitted : for there are many evidences, such as the barbarous murder of Nicoles [Nicer], the execution of Ptolemy,
the nephew of Antigonus [see above, p. 565, No. 7], that he did not shrink from any measure that he deemed requisite in order to carry out the objects of his ambition. But the long-sighted prudence, by which he seems to have been pre-eminentiy distinguished among his contemporaries, led him to confine that ambition within more rational bounds than most of his rivals. He appears to have been the only one among the generals of Alexander who foresaw from the first that the empire of that conqueror must in-

(Plin. II. N. xxxv. 36; Lucian. de Calumn. 2.) But Ptolemy was not content with the praise of an enlightened patron and friend of literature; he sought for himself also the fame of an author, and composed an historical narrative of the wars of Alexander, which is frequently cited by later writers, and is one of the chief authorities which Arrian made the groundwork of his own history. That author repeatedly praises Ptolemy for the fidelity of his narrative and the absence of all fables and exaggerations, and justly pays the greatest deference to his authority, on account of his personal acquaintance with the events which he relates. No notice of his style has been preserved to us, from which we may probably infer that his work was not so much distinguished in this respect as for its historical value. Arrian expressly tells us that it was composed by him after he was established on the throne of Egypt, and probably during the latter years of his life. (Arr. Anab. i. proem. The other passages in which his authority is cited are collected, and all the information relating to his history brought together by Geier, de Ptolemaei Logidiae Vita et Scriptis, pp. 72—77; and in his Scriptores Historiae Alex. Magni, pp. 1—26. The fragments are also given in the edition of Arrian published by Didot, at Paris, 1846.) It appears also that the letters of Ptolemy to Seleucus were extant at a later period, and were collected by one Dionysodorus, of whom nothing more is known. (Lucian. Pro Lys. in Sait. 10.)

Ptolemy had been three times married: 1. to the Persian princess Artacama (see above, p. 531), by whom he appears to have had no children; 2. to Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, who had borne him three sons—Ptolemy Cæannus, Meleager, and one whose name is not mentioned (Paus. i. 7. § 1), and two daughters, Lysandra and Ptolemaia; 3. to Berenice, who became the mother of Ptolemy Philædophilus as well as of Arsinoé, the wife of Lysimachus. For further information concerning his children by these marriages, see the articles ARSINOÉ and BERENICE. But besides these, he became the father of a numerous progeny by various concubines, of whom

We also find him maintaining a correspondence with Menander, whom he in vain endeavoured to attract to his court, and sending overtures probably of a similar nature to Theophrastus. (Suid. s. v. Μακεδών; Diod. Laërt. v. 37.) Nor were the fine arts neglected: the rival painters Antiphilus and Apelles both exercised their talents at Alexandria, where some of their most celebrated pictures were produced. (Plin. II. N. xxxv. 36; Lucian. de Calumn. 2.) But Ptolemy was not content with the praise of an enlightened patron and friend of literature; he sought for himself also the fame of an author, and composed an historical narrative of the wars of Alexander, which is frequently cited by later writers, and is one of the chief authorities which Arrian made the groundwork of his own history. the most conspicuous was Thata, the celebrated Athenian hetaera. By her he had two sons, named Leontiscus and Lagus, and a daughter, Eirene, who was married to Eumostus, one of the petty princes of Cyprus. (Athen. xiii. p. 576, c.; Paus. i. 6. § 8.) Another son of Ptolemy, named Argaeus, is also mentioned, who was probably illegitimate, but his mother is unknown. (Paus. i. 7. § 1.)

PTOLEMAEUS II. (Πτολεμαίος), king of Egypt, surnamed Philadelphus, was the son of Ptolemy I. by his wife Berenice. He was born in the island of Cos, where his father had been driven by the Romans. During the period of his boyhood or youth, though we learn that he received a careful education; and Philetas, the elegiac poet of Cos, and Zenodotus the grammarian, are mentioned as his literary preceptors (Suid. s. v. Φιλάδεφας and Σεινοδοτος). But it is probable that he had his own promising character and disposition combined with the partiality of his father for Berenice, to induce the aged monarch to set aside the offspring of his former marriage in favour of Philadelphus. In order to carry this project into execution, and secure the succession to this his favourite son, the king at length resolved to abdicate the sovereign power, and establish Philadelphus (at this time 24 years of age) upon the throne during his own lifetime. The young prince appears to have been personally popular with the Alexandrians, as we are told, welcomed the announcement with the utmost joy, and the accession of the new monarch (Nov. b. c. 285) was celebrated with festivities and processions of the utmost magnificence. (Justin. xvi. 2; Athen. v. pp. 196—203; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 113.) It is probable that the virtual authority of king still remained in the hands of Ptolemy Soter, during the two years that he survived this event; but no attempt was made to disturb his arrangement of the succession. Ptolemy Cernnus and Melaeager quit Egypt, and Philadelphus found himself at his father's death (a. c. 263) the undisputed master of his wealthy and powerful kingdom. His long reign was marked by few events of a striking character, while his attention was mainly directed to the internal administration of his kingdom, and the patronage of literature and science; his foreign policy was uneventful and pacific, and the few external wars by which his reign was troubled were of a nature to affect deeply the prosperity of his dominions. Unfortunately, our historical information concerning his reign is so scanty, that we have the greatest difficulty in arranging and connecting the few notices that have been transmitted to us. Its tranquillity appears to have been first disturbed by hostilities with his half brother Magas, who had governed Cyrene as viceroy under Ptolemy Soter, but on the death of that monarch threw off the yoke, and asserted his independence. Not content with maintaining himself in the possession of the Cyrenaica, Magas even attempted to invade Egypt, and had advanced as far as Paroetanion, when he was recalled to his own dominions by a revolt of the Marmaridae. A formidable mutiny among his Gaulish mercenaries prevented Ptolemy from pursuing him (Paus. i. 7. §§ 1, 2; Schol. ad Callim. II. in Del. 170—190). Magas, however, subsequently induced Antiochus II., king of Syria, to make common cause with him against the Egyptian monarch, and himself undertook a second expedition against Egypt, in which he again advanced to the frontier, and took the fortress of Paroetanion; but the efforts of Antiochus were paralysed by the address of Ptolemy, and he was able to effect nothing on the side of Syria. At length the war was terminated by a treaty, which left Magas in undisputed possession of the Cyrenaica, while his infant daughter Berenice was betrothed to Ptolemy, the son of Philadelphus. (Paus. i. 7. § 3; Ptolemais. ii. 28; Justin. xxvii. 3; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. pp. 244—250.)

It was probably during the continuance of this war that we find Ptolemy also taking an active part in the affairs of Greece, by sending a fleet under Patroclus to the assistance of the Athenians against Antigonus Gonatas [Patoclus]. Nor was he inattentive to the events that were passing in more distant countries. After the defeat of Pyrrhus by the Romans, he had hastened to conclude a treaty with the rising republic, and during the subsequent war between Rome and Carthage, he continued faithful to his new allies, and refused to assist the Carthaginians. (Liv. Epit. xiv.; Dion Cass. fr. 146; Zonar. viii. 6; Justin. xviii. 2; Val. Max. iv. 3. § 9; Appian. Sic. 1.)

Of the subsequent relations between Egypt and Syria, we know only in general terms that hostilities between them were frequently interrupted or suspended, and the wars that appear to have been marked by no events of a striking character. It must have been towards the close of the reign of Philadelphus that the long protracted contest was terminated by a treaty of peace, by which Ptolemy gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus II. The other stipulations of the peace are unknown to us, but it is certain that Phoenicia and Coele-Syria—the never-failing cause of dispute between the two monarchies—remained in the hands of Ptolemy (Hieron. ad Daniel. xi. 6; Droysen, vol. ii. p. 316.)

In Greece Ptolemy appears to have continued throughout his reign on unfriendly if not directly hostile terms with Macedonia, and lost no opportunity of assisting the party opposed to that power; but it was not until a few years before his death that the successes of Aratus and the rise of the Achaean league opened out to his policy fresh prospects in that quarter. He hastened to support Aratus with considerable sums of money, which received him in the most friendly manner when he visited Alexandria in person. (Plut. Arat. 11, 12.)

But while Ptolemy was thus attentive to the events that were passing among the neighboring potentates, his chief care was directed to the internal administration of his kingdom, and to the encouragement and extension of its foreign commerce. One of the first measures of his reign was to take effectual steps for clearing Upper Egypt from the robbers and banditti by which it was infested (Theoc. Idyll. xv. 46—49, and Schol. ad loc.), and he afterwards carried his arms far into Ethiopia, and established friendly relations with the barbarian tribes of that country. He was also the first to derive from those regions a supply of elephants for war, which had been previously procured solely from India, and so important did he deem this resource that he founded a city or fortress named Ptolemais on the confines of Ethiopia, solely with a view to this object (Agrarchicides ap. Phot. p. 441, b, 453, a; Hieronym. ad Dam. xi. 5; Plin. H. N. vi. 34; Diod. iii. 36). With Ergamenes, the Greek king of Meroë, he appears to have maintained friendly relations. In order to command the important navigation and commerce of the Red Sea, he founded the city of Arsinöe at the head of the gulf (on the site of the modern Suez), and that of Berenice on the coast almost under the tropic. The former he connected with the Nile by renewing the canal opened by Necho, while he opened a high road from Berenice to Coptos on the Nile, which continued for ages to be the route by which all the merchandise of India, Arabia, and Ethiopia was conveyed to Alexandria. Not contented with this, we find him sending Satyrus on a voyage of discovery along the western coast of the Red Sea, and founding another city of Berenice as far south as the latitude of Meroë (Strab. xvii. pp. 770, 804, 813; Plin. H. N. vi. 34; Diod. i. 33; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 735—738; Letronne, Rec. des Insér. p. 180—188). It was doubtless also with a view to the extension of his commerce with India that we find him sending an ambassador of the name of Dionysius to the native princes of that country. (Plin. H. N. vi. 21.)

But it is more especially as the patron and promoter of literature and science that the name of Philadelphus is justly celebrated. The institutions of which the foundations were laid during his reign, were speedily removed by his father under his fostering care to the highest prosperity. The Museum of Alexandria became the resort and abode of all the most distinguished men of letters of the day, and in the library attached to it were accumulated all the treasures of ancient learning. The first person who filled the office of librarian appears to have been Zenodotus of Ephesus, who had previously been the preceptor of Ptolemy; his successor was the poet Callimachus. (Suid. s. v. Σενόδοτος; Parthey, Das Alex. Museum, p. 71; Ritschl, die Alex. Bibliotheke, p. 19.) Among the other illustrious names which adorned the court and reign of Ptolemy, may be mentioned those of the poets Philletus and Theocritus (the last of whom has left us a laboured panegyric upon the Egyptian monarch, which is of some importance in an historical point of view), the philosophers Hegesias and Theodorus, the mathematician Euclid, and the astronomers Timocharis, Aristarchus of Samos, and Aratus. It was not merely by his munificence, or the honours which he bestowed upon these eminent men that Ptolemy was able to attract them to his court: he had himself received a learned education, and appears to have possessed a genuine love of literature, while many anecdotes attest to us the friendly and familiar terms upon which he associated with the distinguished strangers whom he had gathered around him. Nor was his patronage confined to the ordinary cycle of Hellenic literature. By his interest in natural history he gave a stimulus to the pursuit of that science, which gave birth to so many important works, while he himself formed collections of rare animals within the precincts of the royal palace. It was during his reign also, and perhaps at his desire, that Mænetho gave to the world in a Greek form the historical records of the Egyptians; and according to a well-known tradition,—which, disguised as it has been by fables, may not be without an historical foundation,—it was by his express command that the Holy Scriptures of the Jews were translated into Greek (Joseph. xii. 2. For the fuller investigation of this subject, see Aristeas). Whatever truth there may be in this tale, it is certain that he treated the Jewish colonists, many of whom had already settled at Alexandria under Ptolemy Soter, with much favour, and not only allowed them perfect toleration for their religion, but appears to have placed them in many respects on a par with the natives. It is said that he erected a temple to the Virgin (Mark. viii. 56). The fine arts met with scarcely less encouragement under Ptolemy than literature and science, but his patronage does not appear to have given rise to any school of painting or sculpture of real merit; and we are told that Aratus gained his favour by presents of pictures of the Sicyonic school. (Plut. Arat. 12.) His architectural works, on the contrary, were of a superior order, and many of the most splendid buildings at Alexandria were erected or completed under his reign, especially the museum, the lighthouse on the island of Pharos, and the royal burial place or sepulchre, to which he removed the body of Alexander from Memphis, while he deposited there the remains of his father and mother (Paus. i. 7. § 1; Strab. xvii. p. 791). As a further proof of his filial piety he raised a temple to the memory of Ptolemy and Berenice, in which their statues were consecrated as tutelary deities of Egypt (Theocr. I. xvii. 123). The new cities or colonies founded by Philadelphus in different parts of his dominions were extremely numerous. On the Red Sea alone we find at least two bearing the name of Arsinöe, one called after another of his sisters Philotema, and two cities named in honour of his mother Berenice. The same names occur also in Cilicia and Syria: and in the latter country he founded the important fortress of Ptolemais in Palestine. (Concerning these various foundations, see Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. pp. 678, 699, 721, 731, &c.; Le- tronne, Recueil des Insér. pp. 180—188.) All authorities concur in attesting the great power and wealth, to which the Egyptian monarchy was raised under Philadelphus. We are told that he possessed at the close of his reign a standing army of 200,000 foot and 40,000 horse, besides war-chariots and elephants; a fleet of 1500 ships, among which were many vessels of stupendous size; and a sum of 740,000 talents in his treasury; while he derived from Egypt alone an annual revenue of 14,800 talents (Appian. p. 10; Hieronym. ad DAN. xi. 5). His dominions comprised, besides Egypt itself, and portions of Ethiopia, Arabia, and Libya, the important provinces of Phoenicia and Coele-Syria, together with Cyprus, Lysea, Caria, and the Cyclades; and during a great part at least of his reign, Cilicia and Pamphylia also (Theocr. Idyl. xvii. 86—90; Droysen, l.c. p. 316). Before his death Cyrene was reunited to the monarchy by the marriage of his son Ptolemy with Berenice, the daughter of Magas. The private life and relations of Philadelphus are far from displaying his character in as favourable a light as we might have inferred from the splendour of his administration. Almost immediately on his accession he had banished Demetrius Phalerus, the friend and counsellor of his father, who was believed to have advised the latter against altering the succession in favour of his younger son; and it was probably not long afterwards that he put to death his brother Argeus, who was accused of conspiring against his life. Another of his brothers, who had attempted to excite a revolt in Cyprus, subsequently shared the same fate; and his first wife Arsinoë, the daughter of Lysimachus, was banished to Coptos in Upper Egypt on a similar charge (Paus. i. 7. § 1; Dioch. Læôr. v. 70; Schol. ad Theocrit. id. xvii. 128). After her removal Ptolemy took the strange resolution of marrying his own sister Arsinoë, the widow of Lysimachus; a flagrant violation of the religious notions of the Greeks, and which gave rise to severe animadversions. Though she must have been many years older than himself, he appears to have continued tenderly attached to her throughout her life, and evinced his affection not only by bestowing her name upon many of his newly-founded colonies, but by assuming himself the surname of Philadelphus, a title which some writers referred in derision to his unnatural treatment of his two brothers. After her death he erected a temple to Arsinoë, and caused divine honours to be paid to her memory, (Paus. i. 7. §§ 1, 3; Theocrit. Idyll. xvii. 130, and Schol. ad loc.; Athen. xiv. p. 621.) By this second marriage Ptolemy had no issue; but his first wife had borne him two sons—Ptolemy, who succeeded him on the throne, and Lysimachus; and a daughter, Berenice, whose marriage to Antiochus I. S., king of Syria, he solemnly mentioned. Philadelphus died a natural death before the close of the year n. c. 247; having reigned thirty-eight years from his first accession, and thirty-six from the death of his father (Euseb. Arm. p. 114; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 379). He had been always of a feeble and sickly constitution, which prevented him from ever taking the command of his armies in person; and he led the life of a refined voluptuary, combining sensual and dissolute pleasures with the more elevated gratifications of the taste and understanding. (Strab. xvi. p. 789; Athen. xiii. p. 576.) The great defects of his character as an individual have been already adverted to, but there can be no doubt that his dominions enjoyed the utmost prosperity under his mild and pacific rule, and his skilful policy added as much to the greatness and strength of his empire as could the arms of a more warlike monarch. The coins of Ptolemy Philadelphus are only to be distinguished from those of his father by the character of the countermark, and in some instances by their dates; none of them bearing the epithet of Philadelphus.

was at length terminated, or rather suspended by a truce for ten years; but the contest between the two brothers soon broke out afresh, and continued until the total defeat of Antiochus compelled him to take refuge in Egypt. Here, however, he was received rather as a captive than an ally; probably because it did not suit Ptolemy to renew hostilities with Syria. (Justin. xxvii. 2, 3.)

In regard to the remainder of the reign of Euergetes we have scarcely any information. It appears, however, that in his foreign policy he followed the same line as his father. We find him generally unfriendly to Macedonia, and on one occasion at least in open hostility with that power, as we are told that he defeated Antigonus (Gonatas) in a great sea-fight off Andros (Trog. Pomp. Proxvii.); but the date and circumstances of this action are wholly uncertain. (See on this subject, Niebuhr, K. Schrift. p. 297; Droysen, vol. ii. p. 364.) With the same views he continued to support Aratus and the Achaeen league, until the sudden change of policy of the former, and his unnatural alliance with Macedonia, led to a corresponding change on the part of Ptolemy, who thenceforth threw all the weight of his influence in favour of Cleomenes, to whom he afforded an honourable retreat after his decisive defeat at Sellasia, b.c. 222. (Plut. Aref. 24, 41, Cleom. 32, 32; Paus. ii. 8, § 5.) We find him also maintaining the same friendly relations as his father with Rome, though he declined the offers of assistance made him by that powerful republic during his war with Syria. (Eutrop. iii. 1.) During the latter years of his reign Euergetes took advantage of the state of peace in which he found himself with his neighbours to turn his arms against the Ethiopian tribes on his southern frontier, whom he effectually reduced to submission, and advanced as far as Adula, a port on the Red Sea, where he established an emporium, and set up an inscription commemorating the exploits of his reign. To a copy of this, accidentally preserved to us by an Egyptian monk, Cosmas Indicopleustes, we are indebted for much of the scanty information we possess concerning his reign. (See Buttman's Museum f. Alterthumswissenschaft, vol. ii. pp. 105—116; the inscription itself is also given by Chishull, Antig. Alexandria, p. 76; and by Letronne in his Travels in Abyssinia (1814), p. 453, as well as by Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 362, note.)

Ptolemy Euergetes is scarcely less celebrated than his father for his patronage of literature and science: he added so largely to the library at Alexandria that he has been sometimes erroneously deemed its founder, and the well-known anecdote of the stratagem by which he possessed himself of the original manuscripts of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, sufficiently attests the zeal with which he pursued this object. (Galen, Com. ad Hippocr. lib. iii. Epidem. p. 411; Parthey, Des Alex. Mus. p. 88.) Among the distinguished men of letters who flourished at Alexandria during his reign, the names of Eratosthenes, Apollonius Rhodius, and Aristophanes, the grammarian, are alone sufficient to prove that the literature and learning of the Alexandrian school still retained their former eminence.

The reign of Euergetes may undoubtedly be looked upon as the most flourishing period of the Egyptian kingdom. (See Polyb. v. 34.) His brilliant military successes in the first years after his accession not only threw a lustre over his reign, but added some important and valuable acquisitions to his territories; while his subjects continued to enjoy the same internal tranquillity as under his predecessors. He appears also to have shown more favour than the two former monarchs towards the native-born Egyptians; and he evinced a desire to encourage their religious feelings, not only by bringing back the statues of their gods out of Asia, but by various architectural works. Thus we find him making large additions to the great temple at Thebes, erecting a new one at Eme, and dedicating a temple at Canopus to Osiris in the names of himself and his queen Berenice. (Wilkinson's Thebes, p. 425; Letronne, Recueil, pp. 2—6.) On the other hand, his foundations of new cities and colonies were much less numerous than those of his father, though that of Berenice in the Cyrenaica may in all probability be ascribed to him. (See Droysen, vol. ii. pp. 723—726.) Among the last events of his reign may be mentioned the magnificent presents with which he assisted the Rhodians after their city had been overthrown by an earthquake; the amount of which is in itself a sufficient proof of the wealth and power which he possessed. (Polyb. v. 89.)

The death of Euergetes must have taken place before the end of b.c. 222: it is clearly ascribed by Polybios (ii. 71) to natural causes; though a rumour followed by Justin (xxxi. 1) asserted that he was poisoned by his son, a suspicion to which the character and subsequent conduct of the young man lent sufficient countenance. He had reigned twenty-five years in uninterrupted prosperity. By his wife Berenice, who survived him, he left three children: 1. Ptolemy, his successor; 2. Magas; and 3. Arsinoë; afterwards married to her brother Ptolemy Philopator.

Trogus Pompeius twice designates Ptolemy Euergetes by the epithet of Tryphon (Proxvii. and xxx.), an appellation which is also found in Eusebius (p. 165, ed. Arm.). Neither this nor the title of Euergetes appears on his coins, which can only be distinguished from those of his two predecessors by the difference of physiognomy. [E.H.D.]

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS III., KING OF EGYPT.

PTOLEMAEUS IV. (PTOLEMAIOS), king of Egypt, surnamed PHILOPATOR, was the eldest son and successor of Ptolemy Euergetes. He was very far from inheriting the virtues or abilities of his father: and his reign was the commencement of the decline of the Egyptian kingdom, which had been raised to such a height of power and prosperity by his three predecessors. Its first beginning was stained with crimes of the darkest kind. Among his earliest acts, on assuming the sovereign power (n. c. 222), was to put to death his mother, Berenice, and his brother, Magas, of whose influence and popularity with the army he was jealous, as well as his uncle Lysimachus, the brother of Ptolemy Euergetes. In all these murders his minister Sosibius was his ready and dexterous instrument, and probably the first to advise their perpetration. Cleomenes, the exiled king of Sparta, of whose influence with the mercenary troops Sosibius had skilfully availed himself, soon became in his turn an object of suspicion, and was placed in confinement, from which he sought to escape by raising a revolt in Alexandria, and failing in this put an end to his own life. (Polyb. v. 34—39; Plut. Cleom. 33—37.) Having thus, as he conceived, secured himself from all danger from domestic enemies, Ptolemy gave himself up without restraint to a life of indolence and luxury, and to every kind of sensual indulgence, while he abandoned to his minister Sosibius the care of all political affairs. The latter seems to have been as incapable as his master: the discipline of the army was neglected, and the kingdom was allowed to fall into a state of the utmost disorder, of which Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, was not slow to avail himself. The defection of Theodotus, the governor of the Syrian provinces, afforded the first opening to the ambitious designs of the Syrian king, who turned his arms in the first instance against Seleucia in Pieria; and after reducing that important fortress (which had been held by the kings of Egypt since the invasion of Syria by Euergetes) advanced into Phoenicia, where the two strong fortresses of Tyre and Ptolemais were betrayed into his hands by Theodotus. These tidings at length aroused Ptolemy and his ministers from their apathy, and while they sought to amuse Antiochus with pretended negotiations they began to assemble Greek mercenaries, as well as to arm and train Egyptian troops after the Macedonian fashion. With the approach of spring (B. c. 218) they were able to oppose an army under Nicolaus and a fleet under Perigenes to the arms of Antiochus; but Nicolaus was defeated near Porphyrion, and the Syrian king made himself master, with little difficulty, of the great port of Coele-Syria and Palestine. But the next year (B. c. 217) Ptolemy in person took the command of his forces, and set out from Alexandria at the head of an army of 70,000 foot and 5000 horse. He was met by Antiochus with a nearly equal force at Raphia, on the borders of the desert, and a pitched battle ensued, in which the Egyptian army was completely victorious, and Antiochus lost more than 14,000 men. This decisive success was followed by the immediate submission of the whole of Coele-Syria; and Antiochus, apprehensive of further defections, hastened to sue for peace, which was readily granted by the indolent Ptolemy, who was anxious to return to his life of ease and luxury at home. (Polyb. v. 40, 56—71, 79—87; Justin. xxx. 1.)

It was on his return from this expedition that he visited Jerusalem; on which occasion the refusal of the high priest to admit him to the sanctuary of the temple, said to have excelled in his mind an implacable animosity against the Jewish nation, which led him on his return to Alexandria not only to withdraw from the Jews of that city the privileges they had enjoyed under his predecessors, but to subject them to the most cruel persecutions. (iii. Macc.) The tranquillity of Egypt was further disturbed at the same period by a revolt of the native Egyptians—the first that had occurred under their Greek rulers—which appears to have lasted a considerable time, and not to have been suppressed without much bloodshed. (Polyb. v. 107, xiv. 12.) Meanwhile, the king, after his return from his Syrian expedition, gave himself up more and more to every species of vice and debauchery. His mistress Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, became not only the abandoned ministers of his pleasures, but were admitted to a large share in the direction of affairs, and divided with Sosibius the patronage and distribution of all places of honour or profit. The latter minister, however, continued till near the close of the reign of Ptolemy to preside over the chief administration of the state; and as he had been the instrument of Ptolemy in the murders which disgraced the early part of his reign, so he again lent him his assistance in putting to death his queen Arsinoë, who had become obnoxious to her profligate husband. (Polyb. xiv. 11, 12, xv. 25, 33; Justin. xxx. 1. 2.) After her death Ptolemy gave himself up without restraint to the career of vice which probably contributed to shorten his life. He died in B. c. 206, after a reign of seventeen years, leaving only one son, a child of five years old. (Euseb. Arm. p. 114; Justin. xxx. 2.)

The character of Ptolemy Philopator—feeble, effeminate, and vicious—is sufficiently attested by ancient authorities; and from his reign may be dated the commencement of the decline of the kingdom of Egypt, which thenceforth proceeded by rapid strides. Externally, however, its decay was not yet visible: it still retained all its former possessions and commanded the respect of foreign powers. We find Ptolemy, during the earlier years of his reign, still following up the policy of his predecessors; in Greece, cultivating the friendship of the Athenians, and interposing his mediation to bring about a peace between Philip and the Aetolians. (Polyb. v. 109, 106.) He continued also steadfastly attached to the alliance of the Romans, to whom he furnished large supplies of corn during their struggle with Carthage. (Polyb. ix. 44; Liv. xxxvii. 4.) Philopator is also mentioned as striving to display his wealth and power by the construction of ships of the most gigantic and unwieldy size, one of which is said to have had forty banks of oars. (Athen. v. pp. 203—206.)

Plunged as he was in vice and debauchery, Philopator appears to have still inherited something of the love of letters for which his predecessors were so conspicuous. Not only did the literary schools and institutions of Alexandria continue to flourish under his reign, but we find him associating on familiar terms with philosophers and men of letters, and especially patronising the distinguished grammarian Aristarchus. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 177; Suid.
PTOLEMAEUS.

E. V. "Αρταγόρος, he even carried his admiration for Homer so far as to dedicate a temple to him as a divinity. (Aed. V. H. xii. 22.) [E. H. B.]

PTOLEMAEUS V. (Πτολεμαίος), king of Egypt, surnamed Epiphanes, was the son and successor of Ptolemy IV. He was a child of between four and five years old at the death of his father, B.C. 205; and the reins of government were immediately assumed in his name by the favourite and minister of the late monarch, Agathocles. The death of Philopator was even kept a secret for some time by the minister, in order that he and his sister Agathoclea might possess themselves of the treasures in the palace, and concert measures for defending their power. Tlepolemus, their chief adversary, was absent from Alexandria, but notwithstanding this advantage, they were unable to face the indignation of the populace, and a violent sedition arose, in which Agathocles, his mother and sister, and all their chief supporters, were put to death [Agathocla]. After this Sossibius (son of the late minister of that name) obtained possession of the young king's person and the custody of his signet ring: but he was soon after compelled to yield them both to Tlepolemus, who assumed the chief administration of affairs. The new minister, however, though popular with the Alexandrians, and having the qualities of a brave soldier, was wholly incompetent for the position in which he was thus placed, and the affairs of the kingdom fell into the utmost disorder (Polyb. xvi. 25-33, xvi. 21, 22; Justin. xxi. 2). Meanwhile the two monarchs, Philip king of Macedonia and Antiochus III. of Syria, had determined to take advantage of the minority of Ptolemy, and entered into a league to dispossess him of the crown, and divide his dominions between them. In pursuance of this arrangement Antiochus invaded Coele-Syria, while Philip reduced the Cy cladises and the cities in Thrace which had still remained subject to Egypt. In this emergency the Egyptian ministers had recourse to the powerful intervention of Rome, and sent an embassy to place the young king and his dominions under the protection of the republic. The senate readily accepted the overture, and sent ambassadors to Egypt, one of whom, M. Lepidus, appears to have even assumed the title of guardian of Ptolemy [Lepidus, No. 7], while they commanded both Philip and Antiochus to desist from aggression, and restore the cities they had already conquered. The successes of the Syrian king had, in the meantime, been rapid and important. He defeated Scopas, the general of Ptolemy, in a decisive action at Panium, and shut him up within the walls of Sidon, where he was at length compelled by famine to surrender; and this advantage was followed up by the reduction of Jerusalem and the conquest of all Coele-Syria, Phoenicia, and Judea. While Antiochus himself was thus wresting from the crown of Egypt the possessions it had so long held in Syria, his generals reduced all the cities in Cilicia and Lycia which had hitherto been subject to the Egyptian monarchy. But his career of conquest was not checked by the Roman embassy, which commanded him to refrain from further hostilities, and restore all the conquered cities. In order to evade this demand without openly opposing the power of Rome, he concluded a treaty with Egypt, by which it was agreed that the young king should marry Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus, and receive back the Syrian provinces as her dowry. (Polyb. iii. 2, xv. 20, xvi. 39, xvii. 33, 34, xxvii. 17; Justin. xxx. 2, 3, xxxxi. 1; Liv. xxxi. 2, 9; Appian, Syr. 1-3, Mac. 3; Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 14-17; Joseph. Ant. xii. 4. § 1.)

This treaty took place in B.C. 199, but the marriage was not actually solemnised until six years after. During this interval the peace between Egypt and Syria continued unbroken, while the administration of the former kingdom was placed in the hands of Aristomenes, a man who was every way worthy of the character of the man told that, under his wise and vigorous government, the taxes were reduced, order restored, and the country recovered, in great measure, from the disorders of the reign of Philopator. Yet the period of his administration was not unmarked by civil troubles: a formidable revolt broke out in Lower Egypt, and it was not till after a long and arduous siege that Lycolpos, where the rebels had established their head-quarters, was taken, and the insurrection suppressed (Inscr. Rosett. pp. 3, 23. ed. Le Monnier; Polyb. xv. 31; Diod. Exc. Vales. p. 574). At a subsequent period Scopas, the general who had opposed Antiochus, appears to have attempted to follow the example of Cleomenes, and excite a revolt in Alexandria itself, but his designs were discovered, and he was immediately put to death (Polyb. xvii. 36, 37). It was in consequence of this last attempt that the guardians or ministers of the young king determined to declare him of full age, and the ceremony of his Aneleteria, or coronation, was solemnised with great magnificence, B.C. 196. It was on this occasion that the decree was issued which has been preserved to us in the celebrated inscription known as the Rosetta stone, a monument of great interest in regard to the internal history of Egypt under the Ptolemies, independent of its importance as having afforded the key to the discovery of hieroglyphics. (Polyb. xviii. 38; Inscr. Rosett. ed. Le Monnier, Paris, 1841, published with the Fragmenta Historiorum Graecorum by Didot.)

Three years afterwards (in the winter of B.C. 193-192) the marriage of Ptolemy with the Syrian princess Cleopatra was solemnised at Raphia. (Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 17; Liv. xxxv. 13.) The war between Antiochus and the Romans was at this time on the eve of breaking out, and the former had doubtless hoped to attach the Egyptian king to his cause. But Cleopatra regarded the interests of her husband more than those of her father; and Ptolemy continued steadfast in his alliance with Rome. On the outbreak of the war he sent an embassy to the senate, with a large present of money and offers of assistance, both of which were, however, declined: and again in the following year (B.C. 190) we find him sending a fresh embassy to congratulate the Romans on their victory over Antiochus (Liv. xxxvi. 4, xxxvii. 3). But though the encroachments of the Syrian king upon his Egyptian neighbour had been one of the pretexts of the war, Ptolemy derived no advantage from the treaty which concluded it, and Antiochus, in defiance of its provisions, still retained possession of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia.

We knew very little of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes from the time that he himself assumed the government: but we are told that as long as he continued under the guidance and influence of Aristomenes, his administration was equitable and popular. Gradually, however, he became estranged from his able and virtuous minister, and threw himself more and more into the power of flatterers and vicious companions, until at length he was induced to rid himself of Aristomenes, who was compelled to take poison. Polycrates, who appears to have enjoyed great influence with the king after this period, shared in his vices and encouraged him in his effeminacy, studiously keeping him aloof from all part in military affairs. The only event which is recorded to us of this period is a second revolt in Lower Egypt, which was successfully put down by Polycrates, and the leaders of the insurrection (who from their names must have been native Egyptians) were barbarously put to death by Ptolemy himself, B.C. 185. (Diod. Exc. Vales, p. 574; Polyb. xxiii. 16; and see Letronne, ad Inscr. Rosell. p. 23.)

Towards the close of his reign Ptolemy appears to have conceived the project of recovering Coele-Syria from Seleucus, the successor of Antiochus, and had assembled a large mercenary force for that purpose: but having, by an unguarded expression excited the apprehensions of some of his friends, he was cut off by poison in the 24th year of his reign and the 29th of his age, n. c. 181. (Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi. 20; Diod. Exc. Vat. p. 71; Porphyry, ep. Eu- seb. Arm. p. 114; Joseph. Ant. xii. 4. § 11.)

He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, who subsequently ascended the throne, under the names of Ptolemy Philometor and Euergetes II., and a daughter, who bore her mother's name of Cleopatra. The auspicious beginning of his rule and his subsequent degeneracy have been already noticed. His reign was marked by the rapid decline of the Egyptian monarchy, for the provinces and cities wrested from it during his minority by Antiochus and Philip were never recovered, and at his death Cyprus and the Cyrenaics were almost the only foreign possessions still attached to the crown of Egypt. But he had not yet abandoned the part assumed by his predecessors in the affairs of Greece, and we find him still maintaining a close alliance with the Achaeans, and sending just before his death, to offer them the assistance of an Egyptian squadron. (Polyb. xxiii. 1, 7, xxv. 7.) [E. H. B.]
however, had the magnanimity to pardon him, and it was arranged by the Roman deputies that the two brothers should divide the monarchy; Euergetes obtaining Cyrene as a separate kingdom, while Philometor retained Egypt itself. The former, however, could not long remain contented: he repaired to Rome in person, and succeeded in persuading the senate, in contravention of their own arrangement, to add Cyprus to his share. Three Roman ambassadors accompanied Euergetes to enforce these new terms, but they prevented that monarch from asserting his claim to Cyprus by arms, and sent him to Cyrene to await the result of their negotiations with Philometor. The latter, however, contrived to amuse the deputies with fair words, and detained them at Alexandria a considerable time without making any concessions. Euergetes meanwhile had assembled an army, and advanced to the confines of Egypt, but an insurrection at Cyrene itself, which nearly cost him both his throne and his life, prevented him from prosecuting his cause by arms. The next year both brothers again sent ambassadors to Rome, but the Roman Senate unfavourably received and ordered them to quit the city without delay. Still no effective support was given to Euergetes, and his own efforts having failed to put him in possession of Cyprus, he again repaired to Rome in A.D. 154, to invoke the assistance of the senate. They now proceeded to send with him five legates charged to establish him in Cyprus, but without supporting him with any Roman force. Philometor meanwhile anticipated him, and occupied Cyprus in person with a powerful fleet and army, so that when his brother at length landed in the island at the head of a mercenary force, he was quickly defeated and shut up in the city of Lepathus, where he was soon compelled to surrender. Philometor not only a second time spared his life, but treated him with the utmost kindness, and sent him back to Cyrene on condition that he should therefore content himself with that kingdom. Nor did the Romans again interfere to disturb the arrangement thus made, and Euergetes was allowed to return to his own dominions. He had now lived 35 years from the period of his first accession, and 18 from his restoration by the Roman Senate. (Porphyry, op. Euseb. Arm. p. 115.)

During the reign of Philometor the number of Jews in Egypt received a large augmentation by the immigration of a numerous body who were driven out of Judaea by the opposite faction, and established themselves at Heliopolis with the permission and under the protection of the Egyptian king. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 3, B. J. i. 1 § 1.) We learn also that Philometor followed the example of his predecessors in dedicating new temples, or repairing and augmenting the old ones to the Egyptian divinities. (Letronne, Rec. des inscr. pp. 10, 24; Wilkinson's Thes. p. 82.)

Philometor is praised for the mildness and humanity of his disposition, qualities which distinguish him not only by comparison with his brother, but even beyond most of his predecessors. Polybius even tells us that not a single citizen of Alexandria was put to death by him for any political or private offence. In the earlier years of his reign he allowed himself to fall into weakness and indolence, but his subsequent conduct in the wars of Cyprus and Syria shows that he was by no means deficient in occasional energy. On the whole, if not one of the greatest, he was at least one of the best of the race of the Ptolemies. (Polyb. xl. 12; Dio. Exc. Vales. p. 594.)

He left three children: 1. A son, Ptolemy, who was proclaimed king after his father's death, under the name of Ptolemy Epipator, but was put to death almost immediately after by his uncle Euergetes. 2. A daughter, Cleopatra, married first to Alexander Balas, then to Demetrius II. king of Syria; and fusing to punish him, he justly alienated the mind of Ptolemy, who hastened to conclude a peace with Demetrius, and give him the support of the very forces which he had brought to oppose him. Having taken away his daughter Cleopatra from her faithless husband, he now bestowed her hand on his new ally Demetrius. The disinfection of the Syrians towards Alexander quickly enabled Ptolemy to subdue the whole country, and he entered Antioch without opposition; where he was himself declared, by the acclamations of the people, king of Syria as well as Egypt. But his natural moderation concurred with policy in leading him to decline the proffered honour, and establish Demetrius on the throne. Meanwhile Alexander, having assembled an army in Cilicia, again invaded Syria. He was met by the combined forces of Demetrius and Ptolemy, and totally defeated; but Philometor himself was thrown from his horse during the battle, and fractured his skull so severely, that he died a few days after, A.D. 146. (Polyb. xii. 12; Justin. xxxv. 1, 2; Joseph. xiii. 4; Liv. Epit. lli. 4; Appian. Syr. 67; Euseb. Arm. p. 166.) He had reigned 35 years from the period of his first accession, and 18 from his restoration by the Romans. (Porphyry, op. Euseb. Arm. p. 115.)

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS VI, KING OF EGYPT.
Another daughter, also named Cleopatra, who was afterwards married to her uncle Ptolemy Euergetes.

PTOLEMAEUS VII. (Πτολεμαῖος) king of Egypt, bore the surname of Euergetes, whence he is styled Euergetes II., to distinguish him from Ptolemy III., but he is more commonly known by the name of Physcon (Φύσκων), an appellation bestowed on him by the Alexandrians on account of his bloated and unwieldy appearance. He was the second son of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and continued in a private station during the regency of his mother Cleopatra and the first years of the reign of his brother Philometor. But when the latter had fallen into the hands of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Alexandrians declared the younger brother king, and he assumed the title of Euergetes, together with the royal diadem, B.C. 170. The subsequent events are too obscure to be related. (Justin. xxvii. 10.; Diod. Exc. Vales. xxxiii. pp. 593—595, 598, xxxiv. 602, Exc. Leg. p. 650; Liv. Epit. ix.; Oros. v. 10; Athen. xii. p. 549, d.)

At length, however, his vices and cruelties became too much for his subjects to bear. His palace was burnt by a popular tumult, and he deemed it expedient to give way to the fury of the people, and make his escape secretly to Cyprus, B.C. 130. On this the Alexandrians declared his sister Cleopatra queen. Irritated at this, but unable to assail her by open force, Euergetes had recourse to the barbarous expedient of putting to death Memphis, his son by Cleopatra, and sending his head and hands to Alexandria, where they were presented to his unhappy mother on her birthday. This atrocious act excited the most violent indignation among the Alexandrians, who took up arms for Cleopatra; but that princess had the indirection to apply for assistance to Demetrius II., king of Syria, and by so doing alienated the minds of her subjects to such a degree that she was soon after compelled in her turn to fly from Alexandria, and Ptolemy found himself unexpectedly reinstated on the Egyptian throne, B.C. 127. (Liv. Epit. ix.; Justin. xxxiii. 8, 9; Diod. xxxiv. Exc. Vales. pp. 602, 603; Val. Max. i. 2, ext. § 5.)

From this time he appears to have adopted a milder and more moderate system of government. His first act of Clemency was to pardon Marsyas, who had been the general of the revolted Alexandrians (Diod. Exc. Vales. p. 603); and though we have little information concerning the remaining events of his reign, we do not find that it was again disturbed by any civil disorders. His attention was principally directed to the affairs of Syria, where Demetrius had espoused the cause of Cleopatra, and advanced as far as Pelusium to her support, but was compelled, by the dissatisfaction of his own troops, to retire without effecting anything. In order to revenge himself for this attempt, Ptolemy now set up against him a new pretender in the person of a youth named Zabinas or Zebina, who assumed the title of Alexander II., and with the support given to him by the Egyptian king, was able to establish himself for a time on the throne of Syria. But inflamed with this success, the usurper forgot his obligations to Ptolemy, and behaved with such haughtiness to his benefactor, that the latter suddenly changed his policy, became reconciled to his sister Cleopatra, whom he permitted to return to Egypt, and gave his daughter Tryphaena in marriage to Antiochus Grypus, the son of Demetrius, whom he also supported with a large auxiliary force. Antiochus was thus enabled to recover possession of the throne of his forefathers, B.C. 123, and from this time the friendly relations between Syria and Egypt continued.
uninterrupted until the death of Ptolemy. (Justin, xxxix. 1, 2; Joseph, Ant. xiii. 9; Euseb. Arm. pp. 167, 168.) This took place in the year B.C. 117, ten years after his restoration to the throne, and twenty-nine after the death of his brother Philometer. But he himself reckoned the years of his reign from the date of his first assumption of the regal title at Alexandria, in B.C. 170, and according to this mode of computation, his death took place in the fifty-fourth year of his reign. (Porphyry, ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 115; Clinton. P. H. vol. iii. p. 336.)

The character of Ptolemy Physcon has sufficiently appeared from the foregoing narrative. But stained as he was at once by the most infamous and degrading vices, and by the most sanguinary and unsparing cruelty, he still retained in a great degree that love of letters which appears to have been hereditary in the whole race of the Ptolemies. He had in his youth been a pupil of Aristarchus, and not only courted the society of learned men, but was himself the author of a work called ὑπαρξία, or memoirs, which extended to twenty-four books. It is repeatedly cited by Athenaeus (i. p. 43, c. 71, b. i. pp. 367, x. p. 458, xiv. p. 654, &c.), but the quotations refer to minute and miscellaneous points from which it is impossible to judge of the general character of the work. It would seem, however, to have been a sort of general natural history, rather than an historical narration of events. But even in his patronage of literature Ptolemy displayed his capricious and tyrannical character: and during the first years of his sole reign his cruelties appear to have produced a general consternation among the philosophers and men of letters at Alexandria, many of whom fled from Egypt, and took refuge in other countries, where they opened schools, and thus introduced the learning and science of Alexandria (Athen. iv. p. 184). Ptolemy endeavoured in the later years of his reign to repair the mischief he had thus caused, and again draw together an extensive literary society in his capital. To him also is ascribed, with some probability, the prohibition of the export of papyrus, a measure which was dictated by jealousy of the growing literary riches of the kings of Pergamus, and led, as is well known, to the invention of parchment (Plin. H. N. xiii. 31). Some writers, however, refer this statement to Euergetes I. (See Panethy, Das Alex. Museum, p. 48.)

Euergetes II. left two sons; Ptolemy, afterwards known as Soter II., and Alexander, both of whom subsequently ascended the throne of Egypt; and three daughters: 1. Cleopatra, already married to her brother Ptolemy; 2. Tryphaena, the wife of Antiochus Grypus, king of Syria; and 3. Selene, who was still unmarried at her father's death. To his natural son Ptolemy surmounted Apion, he bequeathed by his will the separate kingdom of Cyrene [Ptolemaeus Apion]. [E.H.B.] Ptolemaeus VIII. (Πτολεμαίος), king of Egypt, surnamed Soter II., and also Philometer, both of which titles he bears on inscriptions, but more often distinguished by historians by the appellation of Lathyrus or Lathurus (Λάθυρος). He was the eldest son of Ptolemy Physcon, by his niece Cleopatra, and was already of full age at the time of his father's death, B.C. 117. Cleopatra, however, who had been appointed by the will of her late husband to succeed him on the throne, was disinclined to associate with herself her younger son, Ptolemy Alexander, to the exclusion of his brother. But the latter was popular with the Alexandrians, and the queen was obliged to give way. She accordingly sent Alexander to Cyprus, while she declared Lathyrus king, with the titles of Soter and Philometer. But, in order to retain her influence over him undivided, she compelled him to repudiate his sister Cleopatra, to whom he had been previously married and was tenderly attached, and marry his younger sister Selene in her stead (Justin, xxxix. 3; Paus. i. 9. § 1). This arrangement seems to have in some degree produced its intended effect; at least the mother and son were able to rule conjointly for near ten years before they came to any open rupture. But they were on many occasions opposed to one another, in their foreign as well as domestic policy, and we find Ptolemy sending assistance to Antiochus Cyzicenus in his wars against the Jews, in direct opposition to the will of his mother, who had uniformly favoured the latter, and had placed two officers of that nation at the head of her army. But Cleopatra could ill brook such resistance to her authority: and by accusing Ptolemy of a design against her life, she excited such an insurrection in Alexandria that the king was forced to seek safety in flight, B.C. 107. (Justin, xxxix. 4; Paus. i. 9. § 2; Joseph, Ant. xiii. 10. §§ 2, 4; Porphyry, ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 115.)

His brother Alexander now assumed the sovereignty of Egypt, in conjunction with his mother, while Lathyrus was able to establish himself in the possession of Cyprus. Cleopatra indeed attempted to dispose of him of that island also, but without success, and Ptolemy held it as an independent kingdom for the eighteen years during which Cleopatra and Alexander reigned in Egypt. His wars in Syria are the only events which have been recorded to us of this period. In B.C. 103 he landed in Syria with a large army, in order to support the citizens of Ptolemais and Gaza against Alexander Jannaeus, king of the Jews, defeated that monarch in a great battle on the banks of the Jordan, and made himself master of Ptolemais, Gaza, and other cities. Hereupon Cleopatra hastened with an army to oppose him, and reduced Phoenicia and Ptolemais, while Lathyrus, after an unsuccessful attempt to march upon Egypt itself, retired to Gaza, and the following spring withdrew to Cyprus, B.C. 101 (Joseph, Ant. xiii. 12, 13). In the subsequent disputes of the Syrian princes he and his brother, as was to be expected, took opposite sides, Ptolemy being in close alliance with Antiochus Cyzicenus, while Cleopatra supported his brother Antiochus Grypus (Justin. xxxix. 4). At a later period (in B.C. 94) we find Ptolemy again taking part in the civil wars which followed. the death of Antiochus Grypus, and setting up Demetrius Eunæus, the youngest son of that monarch, as a claimant to the throne. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13. § 4.)

After the death of Cleopatra and the expulsion of Alexander in B.c. 89 [Ptolemaeus IX.], Ptolemy Lathyrus was recalled by the Alexandrians and established a new on the throne of Egypt, which he occupied thenceforth without interruption till his death in b.c. 81 (Justin. xxxix. 5; Porphy. l. c. p. 116). The most important event of this period was the revolt of the once mighty city of Thebes, in Upper Egypt, which was still powerful enough to hold out for nearly three years against the arms of Ptolemy, but at the end of that time was taken and reduced to the state of ruin in which it has ever since remained (Paus. i. 9. § 2). With this exception the eight years of the second reign of Ptolemy Lathyrus appear to have been a period of internal tranquillity, while his prudent policy regained for him in some degree that consideration abroad which Egypt had nearly lost. We find the Athenians, in return for some benefits which he had conferred upon them, erecting statues to him and his daughter Berenice (Paus. l. c.) and, during the Mithridatic war, b.c. 87, Lucullus was sent by Sulla to request from him the assistance of the Egyptian fleet. But Lathyrus was desirous to remain neutral during that contest, and, while he received Lucullus with every demonstration of honour he declined to furnish the required assistance. (Plut. Lucull. 2, 3.)

The character of Lathyrus appears to have been mild and amiable, even to a degree bordering upon weakness: but it shows in a favourable light when contrasted with those of his mother and brother, and he appears to have been free from the vices which deformed so many of the Egyptian kings. He reigned in all thirty-five years and a half; ten in conjunction with his mother (b.c. 117—107), eighteen in Cyprus (107—89), and seven and a half as sole ruler of Egypt (Porphy. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 116). After his restoration in b.c. 89 he appears to have assumed the additional title of Philadæus, whence he is sometimes distinguished as Ptolemy Philædæus II. (Letronne, Rec. des Inscr. pp. 64—66; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 393.) He left only one daughter Berenice, called also Cleopatra, who succeeded him on the throne: and two sons, both named Ptolemy, who, though illegitimate, became several kings of Egypt and Cyprus.

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS VIII., KING OF EGYPT.

PTOLEMAEUS IX. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, surnamed Alexander, whence he is generally distinguished as Alexander I., was the youngest son of Ptolemy VII. by his niece Cleopatra. His mother's partiality led her to desire to place him on the throne in conjunction with her self, on the death of Euergetes, b.c. 117, in preference to his elder brother. But the will of the Alexandrians having compelled her to assume Lathyrus as her colleague, she sent Alexander to Cyprus with the title of general or governor of that island. Three years later, however (b.c. 114), he assumed the title of king, on what pretext we know not, and reckoned the years of his reign from this date (Porphy. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 116). But he appears to have remained content with the possession of Cyprus till b.c. 107, when Cleopatra, having expelled Ptolemy Lathyrus, recalled her favourite son to occupy the vacant throne of Egypt. Alexander reigned conjointly with his mother from this time till b.c. 90: but it is probable that her haughty and imperious character left him little real part in the administration of affairs. The only occasion on which we meet with his name in this interval is in b.c. 102, when he commanded the Egyptian fleet which attacked Phoenicia by sea, while Cleopatra with the army marched against Palestine (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13. § 1). But at length the violence and cruelties of his mother terrified Alexander to such a degree that he determined to free himself from her power, and made his escape secretly from Alexandria. Hereupon Cleopatra, fearing lest her sons should make common cause against her, sent an embassy to Alexander to entreat his return. With this request he was induced to comply; but soon found reason to suspect that she was forming designs against his life, and immediately determined to anticipate them by causing her to be assassinated, b.c. 90. But he did not long enjoy the fruits of this crime. Cleopatra had been popular with the army, and the soldiers in consequence hated Alexander, who had not reigned alone a year, when he was compelled by a general sedition of the populace and military to quit Alexandrin. He however raised fresh troops, and attempted to overcome the insurgent soldiery, but was totally defeated in a sea-fight by the rebels under TyrBUS, and fled for refuge to Myra in Lycia, b.c. 89. His brother Lathyrus was now recalled by the Alexandrians to Egypt, a circumstance which led Alexander to hope that he might make himself master of Cyprus, and he accordingly assembled some forces, and invaded that island, but was defeated in a naval action by Chaereas, and fell in the battle. (Justin. xxxix. 4, 5; Porphy. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 116.)

He left two children: a son, Alexander, who afterwards ascended the throne of Egypt, and a daughter, of whom nothing more is known. (Porphy. l. c.)

[E. H. B.]

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS IX., KING OF EGYPT.

PTOLEMAEUS X. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, son of the preceding, bore his father's name of Alexander, whence he is styled Ptolemaeus Alexander II. When a mere child, he was sent by his grandmother Cleopatra for safety to the island of Cos, probably as early as B.C. 102 (see Joseph. Ant. xii. 13, § 1), where he remained till the year B.C. 66, when that island was taken by Mithridates the Great. On this occasion Alexander fell into the hands of the conqueror, who treated him with unusual distinction, and retained him at his own court. But the young prince soon after found an opportunity to escape, and took refuge with Sulla, whom he accompanied on his return to Rome. Here he remained till B.C. 81, when the death of Ptolemy Lathyrus without male issue having left the throne of Egypt vacant, Sulla, who was then dictator, nominated the young Alexander (who had obtained a high place in his favour) king of Egypt, and sent him to take possession of the crown. It was, however, agreed, in deference to the claims of Cleopatra Berenice, the daughter of Lathyrus, whom the Alexandrians had already placed on the throne, that Alexander should marry her, and admit her to share the sovereign power. He complied with the letter of this treaty by marrying Cleopatra immediately on his arrival in Egypt, but only nineteen days afterwards caused her to be assassinated: an act of cruelty which aroused the indignation of the Romans, who in consequence rose against their new monarch, dragged him to the gymnasium, and there put him to death, B.C. 80. (Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 117; Appian. Mithr. 25, B.C. i. 102; Cie. Frag. Or. de rege Alexandr. p. 332, ed. Orell.; Trog. Pomp. Prolog. xxxix.)

Much difficulty and perplexity have arisen in regard to an Alexander king of Egypt, who is alluded to in more than one passage by Cicero, as having bequeathed his dominions by will to the Roman people (Cic. de Leg. agrar. i. 1, ii. 16, 17; Fr. de reg. Alexandrino, p. 350). It appears that the fact of this bequest was by no means very certain, and that it never was acted upon by the Roman senate. But authors are not at all agreed which of the two Alexanders is here meant; and some writers have even deemed it necessary to admit the existence of a third king of the name of Alexander, who died about B.C. 65. The silence of the chronographers seems, however, conclusive against this hypothesis. The name agrees connectively with Ptolemy Alexander I, to have lived on in exile till the year 65, and to have been the author of this testament: but this is opposed to the direct testimony of Porphyry as to his death. Other writers suppose Alexander II. to be the person designed, and adopt the statement of Trogus Pompeius that he was only expelled by the Alex-andrians, in opposition to the authority of Porphry and Appian, confirmed as they are by a passage in Cicero, in regard to his death. (See on this subject Clinton, F. II. vol. iii. p. 392; Champolion-Figens, Annales des Lagides, vol. ii. p. 247; Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, vol. iii. p. 231; Niebuhr, KL. Schriften, p. 302; Orelli, Onomast. Tullian. p. 90.) The fragmentary and imperfect nature of our authorities for this period of Egyptian history renders it scarcely possible to arrive at a satisfactory solution of this question.

PtolEmaeus XI. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, assumed the surnames or titles of NEK DOYNYUS (Νέος Δούνυμος), but is more commonly known by the appellation of AULETES (the flute-player). He was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, and, on account of his spurious birth, his pretensions to the throne appear to have been altogether passed over at his father's death; but when the assassination of Berenice and the death of Alexander II. had completed the extinction of the legitimate race of the Lagidae (B.C. 80), Ptolemly was proclaimed king by the Alexandrians (Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 117). So imperfect is our history of this period that we know nothing concerning the first twenty years of his reign. But of his character in general we are told that he was given up to every kind of vice and debauchery, and his name is associated with those of Philopator and Physon, as one of the worst rulers of the whole race of the Ptolemies (Strab. xvii. p. 796). He appears to have assumed the name of Dionysus as a sort of authority for his orgies, and is said to have been on the point of putting to death the Platonic philosopher Demetrius, for refusing to join in his drunken revels (Lucian, de Calamn. 16). His passion for playing on the flute, to which he owed his popular appellation, led him to institute musical contests, in which he himself condescended to appear as a competitor. (Strab. l. c.; Plut. de Adul. et Amic. 12.)

But it was not his vices alone which served to disgust and alienate the minds of his subjects. It had been a natural object of his policy to produce the counter-revolution and proscription of the Roman senate; but, for some reason or other, it was long before he could obtain their ratification of his title to the crown, and it was not till the consulship of Caesar that he was able to purchase by vast bribes the desired privileges (Suet. Caes. 54). But he had expended immense sums in the pursuit of this object, which he was compelled to raise by the imposition of fresh taxes, and the discontent thus excited combining with the contempt entertained for his character, led to his expulsion by the Alexand-rians, in B.C. 58. On this he determined to pro-cede in person to Rome to procure from the senate his restoration. On his way thither he had an interview at Rhodes with Cato, who endeavoured, but in vain, to dissuade him from his purpose (Plut. Cat. Min. 35). His first reception was promising, and by a lavish distribution of bribes, combined with the influential support of Cicero, who produced a decree in his name (Pro Rgpe Alexandrino), he procured a decree from the senate, commanding his restoration, and entrusting the charge of effecting it to P. Lentulus Spinther, then proconsul of Cilicia. Meanwhile, the Alexandrians sent an embassy of a hundred of their leading citizens to plead their cause with the Roman senate: but Ptolemy had the audacity to cause the deputies, on their arrival in Italy, to be waylaid, and the greater part of them murdered, while the rest were prevented, either by threats or bribes, from coming forward against him. The indignation excited at Rome by this proceeding, however, produced a reaction: the tribesmen took up the matter against the nobility, while a party in the senate strove to get the commission transferred from Lentulus to Pompey, and an ordinance was produced from the Sibylline books, forbidding the restoration of the king by an armed force. The intrigues and disputes thus raised were protracted throughout the year 56, and at length Ptolemy, despairing of a favourable result, quitted Rome in disgust, and withdrew to Ephesus. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 12-16; Cie. ad Fam. i. 1-7, ad Q. Fr. ii. 2, 3, pro Rabir. 2, 3, pro Caec. 10; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. pp. 117, 118; Plut. Pomp. 49.)
Some years afterwards, however, he obtained from private individuals what he had failed in inducing the senate to accomplish: and in b. c. 55 A. Gabinius, who was proconsul in Syria, was induced, by the influence of Pompey, aided by the enormous bribe of ten thousand talents from Ptolemy himself, to undertake his restoration. The Alexandrians had in the meantime placed on the throne of Egypt, Berenice, the eldest daughter of Ptolemy, who had married Archelaus, the son of the general of Mithridates [Archelaus, No. 2]; and they opposed Gabinius with an army on the confines of the kingdom. They were, however, defeated in three successive battles, Archelaus slain, and Ptolemy once more established on the throne, b. c. 55. One of his first acts was to put to death his daughter Berenice, and many of the leading citizens of Alexandria. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 55—58; Liv. Epit. cv.; Plut. Ant. 3; Strab. xvii. p. 796; Cic. in Pison. 21, pro Rubir. Post. 6; Porphyr. l.c.)

He survived his restoration only three years and a half (Porphyr. l.c.), of the events of which period we have no information; but as Ptolemy was now supported by a large body of Roman soldiers who had been left behind by Gabinius for his protection, he was safe from any outbreak of popular discontent. On the other hand seditions and tumults of the soldiery themselves became frequent, and the king was repeatedly compelled to give way to their demands (Caes. B. C. iii. 103, 110; Dion Cass. xiii. 5). The immense sum exacted from him by Gabinius had also involved him in pecuniary embarrassments, and he was compelled to surrender the whole finances of his kingdom into the hands of Habrius Postumus. (Cic. pro Rubir. 10.)

His death took place in May b. c. 51 (see Cic. ad Fam. viii. 4), after a reign of twenty-nine years from the date of his first accession. He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, and two daughters, Cleopatra and Arsinoe. Two other daughters, Tryphena and Berenice, had died before him (Porphyr. l. c. p. 119). Besides the titles already mentioned, Ptolemy Anites bears, in inscriptions, both Greek and hieroglyphic, those of Philopator and Philadelphus. None of these, however, appear on his coins.

PTOLEMAEUS.

PTOLEMAEUS XIII. (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Egypt, was the youngest son of Ptolemy Auletes. He was declared king by Caesar in conjunction with Cleopatra, after the death of his elder brother Ptolemy XII., b. c. 47: and although he was a mere boy, it was decreed that he should marry his sister, with whom he was thus to share the power. Both his marriage and regal title were, of course, purely nominal: in b. c. 45, Cleopatra took him with her to Rome, but shortly after the death of Caesar she put the poor boy to death, after he had enjoyed his titular sovereignty a little more than three years, b. c. 43. (Porphyry, ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 118; Hirt. B. Alex. 33; Dion Cass. xiii. 44, xiii. 27; Strab. xvii. p. 797; Suec. Cass. 35.)

Concerning the history of the Ptolemies in general, see Vaillant, Historia Ptolemaeorum Regum Aegypti, fol. Amstel. 1701; Champollion-Figeac, Annales des Laqides, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1815; Le Bon, Recherches pour servir à l'Histoire d'Egypte, 8vo. Paris, 1823, and Recueil des Inscriptions Grecques en Egypte, 4to. Paris, 1842; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. Appendix, ch. 5. Much light has been thrown upon the history of the earlier Ptolemies by Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, pp. 179—305, and by Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii., but a good history of this dynasty is still a desideratum.

Of the coins of the Ptolemies it may be observed, that most of them can only be assigned to the several monarchs of the name by conjecture; very few of them bearing any title but those of ΠΤΟΛΕΜΑΙΟΥ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ. Hence they are of little or no historical value. (See on this subject Eckhel, vol. iv. pp. 4—25; Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, vol. iii. chap. 18.)

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Epirus, was the second son of Alexander II., king of Epirus, and Olympias, and grandson of the great Pyrrhus. He succeeded to the throne on the death of his elder brother, Pyrrhus II., but reigned only a very short time, having set out on a military expedition, during the course of which he fell sick and died. (Justin. xxvii. 1, 3; Paus. iv. 33. § 3.) The date of his reign cannot be fixed with certainty, but as he was contemporary with Demetrius II. king of Macedonia, it may be placed between 239—229, b. c.

PTOLEMAEUS, kings of Macedonia. [PTOLEMAEUS OF ALORUS, and PTOLEMAEUS CEREA-NUS.]

PTOLEMAEUS (Πτολεμαῖος), king of Mauritania, was the son and successor of Juba II. By his mother Cleopatra he was descended from the kings of Egypt, whose name he bore. The period of his accession and the death of his father cannot be determined with certainty, but we know that Ptolemy was already on the throne when Strabo wrote, about 18 or 19, A. D. (Strab. xvii. pp. 828, 810; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. p. 203.) He was at this time very young, and the administration of affairs fell in consequence, in great measure, into the hands of his freedmen. Great disorders ensued, and many of the Mauritanians joined the standard of the Numidian Tafcharinas, who carried on a predatory warfare against the Romans. But in a. d. 24 Tafcharinas himself was defeated and killed by P. Dolabella, and Ptolemy himself rendered such efficient assistance to the Roman general in his campaign, that an embassy was sent to reward him, after the ancient fashion, with the presents of a toga picta and sceptre, as a sign of the friendship of the Roman people. (Tac. Ann. iv. 23—26.) He continued to reign without interruption till a. d. 40, when he was summoned to Rome by Caligula, and shortly after put to death, his great riches having excited the cupidity of the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxx. 25; Suet. Cal. 26; Senec. de Tranq. 11.) We learn nothing from history of his character; but from the circumstance that a statue was erected in his honour by the Athenians (Stuart's Antiq. of Athens, vol. iii. p. 55; Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, vol. iii. p. 275), we may probably infer that he inherited something of his father's taste for literature. The annexed coin belongs to this Ptolemy; the curule chair and sceptre, on the reverse, probably refer to the honours decreed him by the Roman senate, as already mentioned.

COIN OF PTOLEMAEUS, KING OF MAURITANIA.

PTOLEMAEUS, son of Mennaeus. [PTOLEMAEUS, surnamed of Chalcis.]

PTOLICHUS (Πτόλιχος), statuaries. 1. Of Aegina, the son and pupil of Symnōn, flourished from about Ol. 75 to about Ol. 82, b. c. 480—448. [ARISTOCLES]. The only works of his, which are mentioned, are the statues of two Olympic victors, Theognetus of Aegina, and Epicradius of Mantinea (Paus. vi. 9. § 1, 10. § 2).

2. Of Corycrus, the pupil of Critios of Athens (Paus. vi. 3. § 2. a. 5). Pausnias does not mention any work of his, but merely gives his name as one of the following artistic genealogy of teachers and pupils: Critios of Athens, Ptolichus, Amphion, Pison of Calauria, Damocritus of Sicyon. As Critios flourished chiefly about Ol. 75, b. c. 477, we may place Ptolichus about Ol. 83, b. c. 448. He was therefore a contemporary of Phidias. [P. S.]

PTOUS (Πτοῦς), a son of Athamas and The- miste, from whom mounted Pton and the sanctuary of Apollo, which was situated upon it, were believed to have derived their name. (Paus. ii. 23. § 3; Apollod. i. 9. § 2.) Pitous also occurs as a surname of Apollo. (Paus. iv. 32. § 5, ix. 23. § 3.)

PUBLICIA. 1. The wife of L. Postumius Albinus, consul b. c. 154, was accused of murdering her husband. She gave bail to the praeitor for her appearance, but was put to death by order of her relations, consequently by a judicium domesti- cum. (Val. Max. vi. 3. § 8; Liv. Epit. 48; Reu, q q 4 PUBLICIUS.

2. The wife of Lentulus, the slane Martialis.

(Macrob. Sat. ii. 9.)

PUBLICIA GENS, plebeian. The ancient form of the name was Publicius, which we find on coins and in the Fasti Capitolini. This gens rose into importance in the time between the first and second Punic Wars, and the first member of it who obtained the consulship was M. Publicius Malleolus, in B.C. 292. During the republic it was divided into two families, that of Malleolus, which was the most important, and that of Bibulus, which has been accidentally omitted under that head, and is therefore given below. Besides these names, there are a few cognomina of freedmen and of persons in the imperial period, which are likewise given below.

The cognomen Malleolus is the only one that appears on coins of this gens, and there are also other coins which bear no surname. Of the latter we subjoin a specimen. The ovverse represents a female head covered with a helmet, the reverse Hercules strangling a lion, with the legend c. Publici c. p. It is not known who this C. Publicius was.

(Eckhel, vol. v. p. 279.)

PUBLICIUS. 1. Publicius, an Italian seer, is mentioned twice by Cicero along with the Marci. (Cic. de Div. i. 50, ii. 53.) [See Vol. II. p. 544, b.]

2. L. Publicius Bibulus, tribune militum of the second legion, B.C. 216. (Liv. xxii. 53.)

3. C. Publicius Bibulus, tribune of the plebs B.C. 209, distinguished himself by his hostility to M. Claudius Marcellus, whom he endeavoured to deprive of his imperium; but Marcellus made such a triumphant reply to the accusations of Publicius, that not only was the bill for taking away his imperium rejected, but he was elected consul on the next day. (Liv. xxvii. 20, 21.)

4. C. Publicius, whose saying respecting P. Mummius is mentioned by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 67), on the authority of Cato. He may have been the same person as No. 3, as Glandor has conjectured.

5. L. Publicius, an intimate friend of Sex. Naevius, and a slave-dealer, mentioned by Cicero in B.C. 61. (Cic. pro Quinct. 6.)

6. Publicius, a Roman eques, celebrated for conducting bribery at the elections at Rome, about B.C. 70. (Pseudo-Ascon. in Verr. II. 135.)

7. Q. Publicius, praetor B.C. 69, before whom Cicero defended D. M. Catulus. (Cic. pro Cluent. 45.)

8. Publicius, one of Catiline's crew, B.C. 63. (Cic. in Cat. ii. 2.)

9. Publicius, a tribune of the plebes, of uncertain date, brought forward a law that presents of wax-candles (cerei) at the Saturnalia should be made to the patrons only by those clients who were in good circumstances, as the making of these presents had become a very burdensome obligation to many clients. (Macrob. Sat. i. 7.)

PUBLICOLA.

PUBLICIUS CELUS. [Celsus.]

PUBLICIUS CERTUS, was the accuser of the younger Helvidius, who was slain by Domitian. As a reward for this service he was nominated praefectus aerarii and was promised the consulship; but after the death of the tyrant, he was accused by the younger Pliny in the senate, A.D. 96, of the part he had taken in the condemnation of Helvidius. The emperor Nerva did not allow the senate to proceed to the trial of Publicius; but Pliny obtained the object he had in view, for Publicius was deprived of his office of praefectus aerarii, and thus lost all hope of the consulship. The account of his impeachment, which was afterwards published, is related by Pliny in a letter to Quadratus (Ep. ix. 13). Publicius died a few days after the proceedings in the senate, and it was supposed by some that his death was hastened by fear.

PUBLICIUS GELLIIUS. [Gellius.]

CN. PUBLICIUS MENANDER, a freedman mentioned by Cicero, in his oration for Balbus (c. 11).

PUBLICOLA, or POPLIOLA, or POPLICOLA, a Roman cognomen, signified "one who courts the people" (from populus and colo), and thus "a friend of the people." The form Poplicola or Poplicola was the most ancient. Poplicola generally occurs in inscriptions, but we also find Poplicola (Orelli, Inscri. No. 547). Publicola was the more modern form, and seems to have been the one usually employed by the Romans in later times. We find it in the best manuscripts of Livy, and in the palimpsest manuscript of Cicero's De Republica.

PUBLICOLA, GELLIIUS. 1. L. Gellius Publicola, was the contubernalis of the consul C. Papirius Carbo, B.C. 120 (Cic. Brut. 27). None of his family had held any of the higher offices of the state before him, and we do not know how he rose into distinction. He must at all events, have been far advanced in years when he attained the consulship. The year of his praetorship is not mentioned; but after his praetorship he received the province of Achaia, with the title of proconsul; and during his government he offered, in mockery, his mediation to the rival philosophers of Athens, to reconcile their disputes (Cic. de Leg. i. 20). In B.C. 74 he defended the cause of M. Octavius Ligur, whose adversary was unjustly favoured by the praetor Verres (Cic. Verr. i. 48). In B.C. 72 Gellius was consul with Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Claudianus. The two consuls carried on war against Spartacus. Gellius at first defeated Crixus, one of the principal generals of Spartacus, near mount Garganus in Apulia, and Crixus lost his life in the battle. The two consuls then marched against Spartacus, who was attempting to escape across the Alps into Gaul. But they were no match for the leader of the gladiators. Spartacus attacked each of them separately in the Apenines, and conquered them in succession. The two consuls then united their forces, but were again defeated in Piscenum, by their indefatigable adversary. It was about this time that Pompey had brought the war in Spain to a conclusion; and as he had conferred the Roman citizenship upon many persons in that country, the consuls brought forward a law to ratify his acts (Cic. pro Balb. 8, 14). The consuls also proposed in the senate, that no one in the provinces should be accused of capital crimes in their absence. This was directed against Verres. (Cic. Verr. ii. 39.)
PUBLICOLA.

Two years afterwards, n. c. 70, Gellius was censor with Lentulus, his former colleague in the consulship. They exercised their office with great severity, and expelled many persons from the senate, among whom was C. Antonius. It was during their censorship that Pompey, who was then consul, appeared as an ordinary eques at the solemn muster of the equites, and, amid the applause of the spectators, led his horse by the curule chair of the censors, and answered the ordinary questions. In n. c. 67 and 66 Gellius served as one of Pompey's legates in the war against the pirates, and had the charge of the Tuscan sea. In the first conspiracy of Catiline an attempt was made to obtain possession of his fleet, and, though the mutiny was put down, Gellius had a narrow escape of his life. In consequence of the latter, he had previously incurred, he was one of the warmest supporters of Cicero in his suppression of the second conspiracy, and accordingly proposed that Cicero should be rewarded with a civic crown.

From this time he appears as a steady friend of Cicero and the aristocratic party. In n. c. 59 he opposed the agrarian law of Caesar, and in n. c. 57 he spoke in favour of Cicero's recall from exile. He was alive in n. c. 55, when Cicero delivered his speech against Piso, but probably died soon afterwards. He was married twice. (Appian, B. C. i. 117; Plut. Crass. 9; Oros. v. 24; Flor. ill. 20. § 10; Enatrop. v. 7; Liv. Epit. 96, 98; Plut. Pompei. 22; Cic. pro Client. 42; Ascon. in Top. Can. p. 64, ed. Orelli; Appian, Mithr. 93; Flor. iii. 6. § 8; Cic. post Red. ad Quir. 7; Gell. v. 6; Cic. ad Att. xii. 21; Plut. Cic. 26; Cic. in Pis. 3; Val. Max. v. 9. § 1.)—Orelli, in his Onomast. Roman. (vol. ii. p. 265) makes the L. Gellius, the consul of 43, who was conscripted in Africa during Cicero's consulship. He is therefore a different person from the consul of n. c. 72; but this is clearly an error, for Cicero speaks of the conscriptus of Carbo as his friend (Brut. 27), and that he reached a great age is evident from many passages. (Cic. Brut. 47; Plut. Cic. 26.)

2. L. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, the son of the preceding by his first wife. He was accused of committing incest with his step-mother, and of conspiring against his father's life; but although the latter was nearly convinced of his guilt, he allowed him to plead his cause before a large number of senators, and, in consequence of their opinion, declared him innocent (Val. Max. v. 9. § 1). After the death of Caesar in n. c. 44, Gellius espoused the republican party, and went with M. Brutus to Asia. Here he was detected in plotting against the life of Brutus but was pardoned at the intercession of his brother, M. Valerius Messalla. Shortly afterwards he was chosen a conscript, to take away the life of Cassius, but again escaped unpunished, through the intercession of his mother Pola. It would hence appear that Pola had been divorced from her first husband Gellius, and had subsequently married Messalla. Gellius, however, showed no gratitude for the leniency which had been shown him, but deserted to the triumvirs, Octavian and Antony; and while in their service he had coins struck, on which he appears with the title of Q. P., that is, Quaestor Propraetore (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 223). He was rewarded for his treachery by the consulship in n. c. 36. In the war between Octavian and Antony, he espoused the side of the latter, and commanded the right wing of Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium. As he is not mentioned again, he probably perished in the action. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24; Liv. Epit. 122; Dion Cass. xlix. 24; Plut. Ant. 65, 66; Vell. Pat. ii. 83.)

3. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, probably a brother of No. 1, is called a step-son of L. Marcius Philippus, consul n. c. 91, and a brother of L. Marcus Philippus, consul n. c. 56. According to Cicero's account he was a profligate and a spendthrift, and having dissipated his property, united himself to P. Clodius. As an intimate friend of the latter, he of course incurs the bitterest enmity of Cicero, whose statements with respect to him must, therefore, he received with caution. (Cic. pro Sect. 51, 52, in Vatin. 2, de Horat. Resp. 27, ad Att. iv. 3. § 2, ad Q. Fr. ii. 1. § 1; Schol. Dob. pro Sect. p. 304, ed. Orelli.)

4. L. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, had been the quasestor of Junius Silanus in Asia, in the reign of Tiberius, and was subsequently one of his accusers in A. D. 22. (Tac. Ann. iii. 67.)

5. L. GELLIIUS PUBLICOLA, one of the consules suffecti in the reign of Caligula, A. D. 40 (Fasti). (For an account of the Gellii see Drummam, Geschichtete Rome, vol. ii. pp. 64—67.)

PUBLICOLA, VALENIUS. 1. P. VALENIUS VOLUSI P. PUBLICOLA, the colleague of Brutus in the consulship in the first year of the republic. The account given of him in Livy, Plutarch, and Dionysius cannot be regarded as a real history. The history of the expulsion of the Tarquins and of the infancy of the republic has evidently received so many poetical embellishments, and has been so altered by successive traditions, that probably we are not warranted in asserting anything more respecting Publicola than that he took a prominent part in the government of the state during the first few years of the republic. The common story, however, runs as follows. P. Valerius, the son of Volusius, belonged to one of the noblest Roman houses, and was a descendant of the Sabine Volusius, who settled at Rome with Tatius, the king of the Sabines. [VALERIA GENS.] When Lucretia summoned her father from the camp, after Sextius Tarquinius had wrought the deed of shame, P. Valerius accompanied Lucretius to his daughter, and was by her side when she disclosed the villany of Sextius and stabbed herself to the heart. Valerius, in common with all the others who were present, swore to avenge her death, which they forthwith accomplished by expelling the Tarquins from the city. Junius Brutus and Tarquinius Collatinius were first elected consuls, n. c. 509; but as the very name of Tarquinius made Collatinius an object of suspicion to the people, he was obliged to resign his office and leave the city, and Valerius was chosen in his stead. Shortly afterwards the people of Veii and Tarquinii espoused the cause of the Tarquins, and marched with them against Rome, at the head of a large army. The two consuls advanced to meet them with the Roman forces. A bloody battle was fought, in which Brutus fell; and both parties claimed the victory, till a voice was heard in the dead of the night proclaiming that the Romans had conquered, as the Etruscan had lost one man more. Alarmed at this, the Etruscan fled, and Valerius entered Rome in triumph. Valerius was now left without a colleague; and as he began at the same time to build a house on the top of the hill Velia, which looked down upon the forum, the people feared that he was aiming at kingly power. As soon as Valerius became aware of these suspicions, he stopped the building; and the people, ashamed of their conduct, granted him a piece of ground at the foot of the Velia, with the privilege of having the door of his house open back into the street. When Valerius appeared before the people he ordered the lictors to lower the fasces before them, as an acknowledgment that their power was superior to his. Not content with this mark of submission, he brought forward laws in defence of the republic and in support of the liberties of the people. One law enacted that whoever attempted to make himself a king should be devoted to the gods, and that any one who liked might kill him; and another law declared, that every citizen who was condemned by a magistrate should have the right of appeal to the people. Now as the patriots possessed this right under the kings, it is probable that the law of Valerius conferred the same privilege upon the plebeians. By these laws, as well as by the lowering of his fasces before the people, Valerius became so great a favourite, that he received the surname of Publicola, or "the people's friend," by which name he is more usually known. As soon as these laws had been passed, Publicola held the comitia for the election of a successor to Brutus; and Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus was appointed as his colleague. Lucretius, however, did not live many days, and accordingly M. Horatius Pulvillus was elected consul in his place. Each of the consuls was anxious to dedicate the temple on the Capitol, which Tarquin had left unfinished when he was driven from the throne; but the later gave the temple to Horatius, to the great mortification of Publicola and his friends. [PULVILLUS.] Some writers, however, place the dedication of the temple two years later, b. c. 507, in the third consulship of Publicola, and the second of Horatius Pulvillus. (Dionys. v. 21; Tac. Hist. iii. 72.)

Next year, which was the second year of the republic, b. c. 508, Publicola was elected consul again with T. Lucretius Tricipitinus. In this year most of the annalists placed the expedition of Porsena against Rome, of which an account has been given elsewhere [PORSENA]. In the following year, b. c. 507, Publicola was elected consul a third time with M. Horatius Pulvillus, who had been his colleague in his first consulship, or according to other accounts, with P. Lucretius; but no event of importance is recorded under this year. He was again consul a fourth time in b. c. 504 with T. Lucretius Tricipitinus, his colleague in his second consulship. In this year he defeated the Sabines at Cremona, a second time in triumph. His death is placed in the following year (b. c. 503) by the annalists (Liv. ii. 16), probably, as Niebuhr has remarked, simply because his name does not occur again in the Fasti. Niebuhr supposes that the ancient lays made him perish at the lake Regillus, at which two of his sons were said to have been killed (Dionys. vi. 12), and at which so many heroes of the infant commonwealth met their death. He was buried at the public expense, and the matrons mourned for him ten months, as they had done for Brutus. (Liv. i. 58, 59, ii. 2, 6—8, 11, 15, 16; Dionys. iv. 67, v. 12, &c. 29, 21, 40, &c.; Plut. Public. passim; Cie. de Rep. ii. 31; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 498, &c. 523, 529, &c. 538, 559.)

2. P. VALERIUS P. F. VOLUSI N. PUBLICOLA, son of the preceding, was consul for the first time b. c. 476, with C. Nautius Rutilius, conquered the Veientines and Sabines, and obtained a triumph in consequence. He was interrex in b. c. 462, and consul a second time in 460, with C. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis. In the latter year Publicola was killed in recovering the Capitol, which had been seized by Herdonius. The history of this event is related under HERDONIUS. (Liv. ii. 52, 15, 19—19; Dionys. ix. 28, x. 14—17.)

3. P. VALERIUS PUBLICOLA POTITUS, consul b. c. 449, is represented by many writers as the son of the preceding, and the grandson of No. 2. The improbability of this account is pointed out under POTITUS, No. 2, to which family he probably belongs.

4. L. VALERIUS PUBLICOLA, was consular tribune five times, namely, in b. c. 394, 389, 337, 383, 380. (Liv. v. 26, vi. 1, 5, 21, 27.)

5. P. VALERIUS POTITUS PUBLICOLA, who was consular tribune six times, belongs to the family of the Potiti. [POTITUS, No. 5.]

6. M. VALERIUS PUBLICOLA, magister equitum to the dictator C. Sulpicius Peteius in b. c. 353, and twice consul, namely, in b. c. 355, with C. Sulpicius Peteius, and in 353, with the same colleague. On the history of the three years above-mentioned see PETICUS. (Liv. vii. 12, 17—19.)

7. P. VALERIUS PUBLICOLA, consul b. c. 352, with C. Marcus Rutilius, and prætor two years afterwards, b. c. 350, in which year he had the command of the army of reserve in the war against the Gauls. In b. c. 344 he was appointed dictator, for the purpose of celebrating games in consequence of the appearance of prodigies. (Liv. vii. 21, 23, 28.)

8. P. VALERIUS PUBLICOLA, magister equitum to the dictator M. Papirius Crassus, in b. c. 332. (Liv. viii. 17.)

PUBLICIUS, the second wife of M. Tullius Cicero, whom he married in b. c. 46. As Cicero was then sixty years of age, and Publiciia quite young, the marriage occasioned great scandal. It appears that Cicero was at the time in great pecuniary embarrassments; and after the divorce of Terentia, he was anxious to contract a new marriage for the purpose of obtaining money to pay his debts. Publiciia had a large fortune, which had been left her by her father, but, in order to evade the Voconia lex, which limited the amount that a woman could receive by will, the property had been left to Cicero in trust for her. The marriage proved an unhappy one, as might have been expected; and after the death of his daughter Tullia in b. c. 45, Cicero was able to plead his sorrow as an excuse for going into the country alone. While there he writes to Atticus that Publiciia had sent him a letter, requesting to be allowed to visit him, and that he had written back to her that he wished to remain alone; but he begged Atticus to let him know how long he might remain without being surprised by a visit from her. At length Cicero became so tired of his young wife, and so annoyed by her mother and brother, that he was glad to divorce her in the course of the year 45. It was said by some that she had expressed joy at the death of Tullia; this may have served Cicero as an excuse for his conduct. Cicero had now to repay the dowry, and consequently had incurred all the reproach and inconvenience of such a marriage without reaping from it any advantage. He found no small difficulty in raising the money to pay this dowry; and his letters to Atticus frequently allude to his negotiations on this subject with Publilius, the brother of his late wife. (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 14, ad Att. xii. 32, xiii. 34, 47, xiv. 19, xv. 2, 6; Dion Cass. xvi. 10; Plut. Cic. 41; Quintil. vi. 3. § 75.) Dion Cassius states (viii. 15) that Vibius Rufus, in the reign of Tiberius, married Cicero's sister, by whom he was probably to understand Publilius, and not Terentia, as many have done. (Dion Cass., Geschichtle Romae, vol. vi. pp. 694—696.)

PUBLILIA GENS, plebeian. The ancient form of the name was Publiliius, which we find in the Capitoline Fasti. In many manuscripts and editions of the ancient writers we find the name of Publilius corrupted into Publius; and Glandorp, in his Omomarticon, has fallen into the mistake of giving most of the Publilii under the head of Publius (pp. 727, 728). The Publilii were first brought into notice as early as B.C. 472, by the celebrated tribune Volero Publiliius, and they subsequently obtained the highest dignities of the state. The only family of this gens that bore a separate cognomen was that of Philo; and it was one of this family, Q. Publiliius Philo, who obtained the consulship in B.C. 309. The greatness of the gens became extinct with this Philo; and after his death we do not read of any persons of the name who attained importance in the state. Volero was an agnomen of the Philones. [Philol. No. 1.]

PUBLILIUS. 1. VOLERO PUBLILIIUS, the author of an important change in the Roman constitution. He had served with distinction as a first centurion, and, accordingly, when he was called upon to enlist as a common soldier at the levy in B.C. 473, he refused to obey. The consuls ordered the lictors to seize him and scourge him. He appealed to the tribunes, but as they took no notice of the outrage, he resisted the lictors, and was supported by the people. The lictors were driven out of the forum, and the senate was obliged to bow before the storm. Publilius had acquired so much popularity by his courageous conduct, that he was elected tribune of the plebs for the following year, B.C. 472. He did not, however, bring the comitia of the previous year to trial, as had been expected, but, sacrificing his private wrongs to the public welfare, he brought forward a measure to secure the plebeians greater freedom in the election of the tribunes. They had been previously elected in the comitia centuriata, where the patricians had a great number of votes; and Publilius accordingly proposed that they should be elected in future by the comitia tributa. This measure was undoubtedly proposed to the comitia tributa, but the patricians, by their violent opposition, prevented the tribes from coming to any vote respecting it this year. In the following year, B.C. 471, Publilius was re-elected tribune, and together with him C. Laetorius, a man of still greater resolution. He now brought forward fresh measures. He proposed that the acediales, as well as the tribunes, should be elected by the tribes, and, what was still more important, that the tribes should have the power of delibrating and determining in all matters affecting the whole nation, and not such only as might concern the plebs. These measures were still more violently resisted by the patricians; but though the consil Ap. Claudius had recourse to force he could not prevent the tribes from passing them. Some said that the number of the tribunes was now for the first time raised to five, having been only two previously. (Liv. ii. 55—58; Dionys. ix. 41, &c.; Zonar. vii. 17; Niebuh. Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 211, &c.)

2. Q. PUBLILIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 354, in which year, in conjunction with his colleague, M. Memmius or Menenius, he accused Manlius. (Liv. iv. 30.)

3. Q. PUBLILIUS, was appointed one of the triumviri mensarii in B.C. 352. (Liv. vii. 21.)

4. C. PUBLILIUS, a youth who had given himself up to slavery (as a neovis), in order to pay the debts of his father, and whose cruel treatment by the usurer, L. Papirius, so roused the indignation of the people, as to lead to the enactment, in B.C. 326, of the Lex Poetelia Papiria, which abolished imprisonment for debt in the case of the nexti (Liv. viii. 28). Valerius Maximus (vi. 1. § 9) calls this youth T. Veturius.

5. T. PUBLILIUS, one of the first plebeian augurs created on the passing of the Oogalies lex, in B.C. 300. (Liv. x. 9.)

6. PUBLILIUS, the brother of Cicero's second wife, with whom Cicero had considerable negotiation respecting the repayment of Publilius' dowry, after he had divorced her in B.C. 45. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 36, 47, xiv. 19, xvi. 2, 6.)

7. PUBLILIUS, a Roman comic poet, only known by the quotation of a single line by Nonius (s. v. laitoboule), from one of his comedies entitled Putatares. As he is not mentioned elsewhere, it has been supposed that we ought to read Publius (that is, Publius Syrus) in this passage of Nonius.

PUBLILIUS, a Roman praenomen, is found in many manuscripts and editions instead of Publilius. [PUBLIIA GENES.]

PUBLIIUS, is placed in the lists of artists as a Roman painter of animals, on the strength of an epigram of Martial (i. 109), in which the poet celebrates the beauty of an Iassian bitch, and of its portrait; but whether Publius was the owner or the painter of the animal, or both, is not perfectly clear. [P. S.]

PUBLIIUS, a physician who is quoted by Andromachus (ap. Galen. De Compos. Medicam, sec. Gen. vol. ii. p. 233; Liv. x. 13, vol. xiii. pp. 381, 533, 843), and who must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He is by some persons supposed to have been one of Galen's tutors, but this is undoubtedly a mistake; as, besides the chronological difficulty, it is probable that in the passage which has given rise to this opinion (De Compos. Medicam, sec. Gen. vol. iv. 14, vol. xii. p. 852) Galen is quoting the words of Asclepiades Pharmacian, and not speaking in his own person; and also that the term δαύηγητας is used merely as a sort of honorary title [comp. Lucius, p. 827]. He is quoted also by Marcellus Empiricus, De Medicam. c. 29, p. 376. [W. A. G.]

PUBLIIUS SYRUS. [SYRUS.]

PUDENS, L. ARIJUS, consul a. d. 165, with M. Gavius Orfitus (Fasti).

PUDENS, MAEVIVS, was employed by Otho, to corrupt the soldiers of Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 24.)

PUDENS, Q. SERVILIIUS, consul a. d. 166, with L. Fulviius Pollio. (Lamprid. Commod. 11; Fasti.)

PUDICITIA (Aitâs), a personification of modesty, was worshipped both in Greece and at of it devolved upon him. Pulcheria brought about the marriage between her brother and the beautiful and virtuous Athenais (Eudoxia), and she performed her task in so charming a manner that many a modern chaperone would do well to take her for a model (A. d. 421). Theodosius died in 450, and, leaving only a daughter, was succeeded by her husband Valentinian III., who also was unfit for the throne. Pulcheria consequently remained at the head of affairs, and began her second reign by inflicting the punishment of death upon the dangerous and rapacious eunuch Chrysaphius. Fearful lest the ambition of that haughty intriguer should be imitated by others, she resolved to marry, and of course was released from her vows of chastity. The object of her choice was the excellent Marcian, with whom she continued to reign in common till her death, which took place on the 18th of February, 453, at the age of 54 years and one month. She was lamented by every body, and was afterwards canonised; her feast is still celebrated in the Greek church. There is a story told by Suidas that Pulcheria had a lover, Paulinus, and that she had lived in incestuous intercourse with her brother; but we doubt the first, and do not believe the second, because it is not to be reconciled with the well-known character and principles of both Pulcheria and Theodosius. (For authorities see those quoted in the lives of Marcian; Theodosius II.; and Valentinianus III.) [W. P.]

COIN OF PULCERIA.

PLECHS, a surname of M. Servilius Geminus. [Gemnius, Serviilus, No. 3.]

T. Pul/Lio, a centurion in Caesar's army in Gaul, distinguished himself, along with L. Vorenus, by a daring act of bravery, when the camp of Q. Cicero was besieged by the Nervii in B. C. 54. In the civil war he deserted his old commander, betrayed the army of C. Antonius, one of Caesar's legates, and fought on the side of the Pompeians. (Caes. B. G. v. 44, D. C. iii. 67.)

PULLVS, L. JU'NIUS, C. P. C. N., consul B. C. 249, with F. Claudius Pulcher, in the first Punic war. His fleet was entirely destroyed by a storm, on account, as it was said, of his neglecting the auspices, and in despair he put an end to his own life. (Polyb. i. 52-53; Dind. Fragment. xxiv. 1; Eutrop. ii. 15. s. 26, Oros. iv. 10; Val. Max. i. 4. § 3; Cic. de Div. i. 16, ii. 8, 33, de Nat. Deor. ii. 3; Censorin. de Die Nat. 17.)

PULLVS, NUMITORIUS. [Numitorius, No. 3.]

PULLVILLVS, the name of a distinguished family of the Horatii gens.

1. M. Horatius M. f. Pullvillus, according to Dionysius, played a distinguished part in the expulsion of the Tarquins, and according to all authorities was one of the consuls elected in the first year of the republic, B. C. 509. Most ancient writers state that Horatius was appointed consul in the place of Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, who suc-
was elected emperor with Balbinus, in A.D. 238 when the senate received intelligence of the death of the two Gordians in Africa. For particulars, see BAlBINUS.

COIN OF CLODIIUS PUPENIUS MAXIMUS.

PUPILUS, ORBILIUS. [ORBILIUS] PUPILUS. 1. P. PUPILUS, was one of the first plebeian quaestors, elected b.c. 409. (Liv. iv. 54.) 2. CN. PUPILUS, and K. Quintius Flamininus, were appointed duumviri in b.c. 216, for building the temple of Concord. (Liv. xxii. 33.) 3. L. PUPILUS, sedile b.c. 185, and praetor b.c. 153, when he obtained by lot the charge of Apulia. (Liv. xxxix. 39, 45.) 4. M. PUPILUS, was an old man when he adopted Piso [No. 5]. (Cic. pro Dom. 13.) 5. M. PUPILUS PISO, consul b.c. 61, is spoken of under Piso [No. 18]. 6. CN. PUPILUS, an agent of the company that farmed the Bithynian revenue, is recommended by Cicero to Crassipes (ad Fam. xiii. 9). 7. L. PUPILUS, a centurio primi pilae, fell into Caesar's hands, when he entered Italy at the beginning of b.c. 49, but was dismissed by him uninjured. (Caes. B. C. i. 13.)

PUPILUS, a Roman dramatist, whose compositions are characterised by Horace, whether ironically or not we cannot tell, as the "lacrymosa poemaet Pupil." The sum total of our information regarding this personage is derived from the scholiast on the passage in question (Ep. i. 167): "Pupilus, Tragediographus, its affects spectantium movit ut eos flere compelleret. Inde istum versum fecit: "

PURPURÉO, L. FURÍUS, was tribune of the soldiers b.c. 210 under the consul Marcellus, and praetor b.c. 200, in which year he obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province. He gained a brilliant victory over the Gauls, who had laid siege to Cremona under the command of the Carthaginian Hamilcar. More than 35,000 Gauls were killed or taken prisoners, and Hamilcar and three noble Gallic chiefs also fell in the battle. The senate voted a thanksgiving of three days in consequence of the victory, and the honour of a triumph was granted to Purpureo, though not without some opposition. He was consul b.c. 196 with M. Claudius Marcellus, and with his colleague defeated the Boii. Purpureo vowed three temples to Jupiter, two in the Gallie war during his praetorship, and the other during his consulship: one of these was consecrated in b.c. 194, and the other two in b.c. 192. After the conquest of Antiochus by Scipio, Purpureo was one of the ten commissioners sent by the senate to settle the affairs of Asia. He is mentioned again in b.c. 187, as one of the vehement opponents of the triumph of Cn. Manlius Vulsus [Vulus]. He was one of the candidates for the censorship in B.C. 184, when L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato were elected. In the following year, B.C. 183, he was sent, with two other senators, as ambassador to Transalpine Gaul; and this is the last time that his name occurs. (Liv. xxvii. 2. xxxii. 4, 6, 10, 21, 47—49, xxxii. 24. 37, 37. xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 41, xxxvii, 55, xxxviii. 44, 45, 54, xxxix.
40, 54.)

PUS'IO, C. FLAV'VIIUS, is mentioned by Cicero (pro Client. 56) as one of the Roman equites, who opposed the tribune M. Drusus.

PUTON. [PllTlon.]

PYGMAEUS (Πυγμαίος), a being whose length is a πυγμαῖον, that is, from the elbow to the hand. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 372.) The Pygmæi, in the plural, is the name of a fabulous nation of dwarfs, the Liliputians of antiquity, who, according to Homer, had every spring to sustain a war against the cranes on the banks of Oceanus. (Hom.
H. iii. 5, &c.) They were believed to have been descended from Pygmaeus, a son of Dorus and grandson of Epaphus. (Steph. Byz. s. a. Πυγμαίος.) Later writers usually place them near the sources of the Nile, whither the parsley grew, in order to have much material every year to take possession of the fields of the pygmæi. (Eustath. p. 372; Aristot. Hist.
Animal. viii. 12; Strab. i. p. 42, xvii. p. 821.)

The reports of them have been embellished in a variety of ways by the ancients. Hecataeus, for example, related that they cut down every corn ear with an axe, for they were conceived to be an cultural people. When Hercules came into their country, they climbed with ladders to the edge of his goblet to drink from it; and when they attacked the hero, a whole army of them made an assault upon his left hand, while two others made the attack on his right hand. (Philostr. Iom.
i. 21.) Aristotle did not believe that the accounts of the Pygmies were altogether fabulous, but thought that they were a tribe in Upper Egypt, who had exceedingly small horses, and lived in caves. (Hist. Animal. viii. 14.) In later times we also hear of northern Pygmies, who lived in the neighbourhood of Thule; they are described as very short, emaciated, and armed with spears like needles. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 372.) Lastly, we also have mention of Indian pygmies, who lived der the earth on the coast of the river Ganges, (Ctesias, Ind. ii. pp. 250, 294; Philostr. Vit.
Apollon. iii. 47; Plin. H. N. vi. 22.) Various ttempts have been made to account for the singular belief in the existence of such a dwarfish nation, but it seems to have its origin in the love of the marvellous, and the desire to imagine human beings, in different climes and in different ages, to be either much greater or much smaller than ourselves. (Comp. Ov. Fast. vi. 176, Met.

vi. 90; Aelian, Hist. An. xiv. 29.) [L. S.]

PYGMA'ΛION (Πυγμαλίων). 1. A king of Cyprus and father of Metharme. (Apololl. iii. 14.
§ 3.) He is said to have fallen in love with the ivory image of a maiden which he himself had made, and therefore to have prayed to Aphrodite to breathe life into it. When the request was granted, Pygmalion married his beloved, and be-game by her the father of Paphus. (Ov. Met.
x. 243, &c.)

2. A son of Belus and brother of Dido. (Verg.
Aen. i. 347; Ov. Fast. iii. 574.) [L. S.]

PYGMON (Πυγμών), the engraver of a gem in the Florentine Museum, the inscription on which has variously read ΠΗΓΜΟ, ΠΕΡΓΜΟ, and ΠΥΓΜΟΝ, but the latter appears to be the true form. There is another of his name, the Peraymon is found distinctly inscribed.
(R. Rochette, Lettres à M. Schors, p. 149, 2d ed.; comp. Pergamum.) [P. S.]

PYLADES (Πυλάδης), a son of Strophius and Anaxibia, Cydnagora or Astyochea. (Paus. ii.
29. § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 33, 753; Hygin.
Fab. 117.) He was a friend of Orestes, who was received by him in Phocias in a brotherly manner. (Pind. Pyth. xi. 23.) He afterwards married Electra, the sister of Orestes, and became by her the father of Helenius, Medon, and Strophius.
(Paus. ii. 16. § 5; Orestes, Electra.) [L. S.]

PYLADES, the pantomime dancer in the reign of Augustus, is spoken of under BATHYLLUS.
He was banished on one occasion by Augustus,
but afterwards restored to the city (Dion Cass. liv.
17; Suet. Aug. 45.)

PYLADES (Πυλάδης), the engraver of a beautiful gem in the Museum of the King of the Netherlands, representing an eagle, carrying a rowan in his beak. It is described: (Catalog.
Mus. Batan, p. 167, n. 4), and more 21), who, without assigning any reason for his opinion, supposes the inscription ΠΥΛΑΔΟΣ ought to denote the owner rather than the artist.
It has been engraved by Venuti (Collectan. Antiq.
Rom. tab. xxxiv. Rom. 1736, folio), and in the work of the Count de Thoms, pl. xiii. n. 5. (Compare R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schors, p. 150, 2nd ed.)

PYLAEMENES (Πυλαέμην), a king of the Paphlagonians and an ally of Priam in the Trojan war. (Hom. II. ii. 851; Strab. xii. pp. 541, 543.) [L. S.]

PYLAEMENES (Πυλαέμην), appears to have been the name of many kings of Paphgonia, so as to have become a kind of hereditary appellation, like that of Potomy in Egypt, and Arcases in Parthia. The only ones concerning whom we have any definite information are the following:

1. A king of Paphlagonia, who in B.C. 131 assisted the Romans in the war against Aristonicus, the pretender to the throne of Pergamum.
(Entrop. iv. 20.) At his death the race of the ancient kings of Paphlagonia appears to have have become extinct, and it was asserted that he had by his testament bequeathed his kingdom to Mithridates V., king of Pontus. (Justin. xxxviii. 5.)

2. A son of Nicomedes II., king of Bithynia, who was placed by his father on the throne of Paphlagonia, and made to assume the name of Pylaemenes, in order that he might appear to belong to the rightful line of the kings of that country. (Justin. xxxvii. 4.) He was afterwards expelled by Mithridates the Great, in B.C. 90 (Entrop. v. 5), and it does not appear that he ever recovered his throne: but after the final crown of Mithridates, the sons of Pylae-menes were reinstated by Pompey in the possession of some part of their father's dominions with the title of king. (Strab. xii. p. 541.)

There are extant coins bearing the titles BA-ΣΙΑΕΣΩΣ ΠΥΛΑΕΜΕΝΟΤ ΒΥΠΡΕΠΤΟΥ, which may probably be ascribed to one of the two pro-PYREICUS.

PYLAS (Πυλας), a son of Cteson, and king of Megara, who, after having slain Bais, his own father's brother, founded the town of Pylos in Peloponnesus, and gave Megara to Pandion who had married his daughter Pylin, and accordingly was his son-in-law. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 5; Paus. iii. 39. § 6, where he is called Pylos, and vi. 22. § 3, where he is called Pylon.)

PYRAECHMIS (Πυραεχμης), an ally of the Trojans and commander of the Paeonians, was slain by Patroclus. (Hom. I. ii. 616, xvi. 287 ; Dict. Crut. iii. 4 ; comp. Paus. v. 4. § 2 ; Strab. viii. p. 357.)

PYRAMUS. [Thisbe.]

PYRANDE (Πυρανδης), wrote a work on the history of the Peloponnesus. (Plat. Parall. Min. c. 37; Schol. ad Lycocptr. 1439.)

PYREICUS, a Greek painter, who probably lived about or soon after the time of Alexander the Great, since Pliny mentions him immediately after the great painters of that age, but as an artist of a totally different style. He devoted himself entirely to the production of small pictures of low and mean subjects; “nonstrinae subchainsque pinxit et asello et obsonia et similia,” says Pliny; where we take the first two words to mean, not that he decorated the walls of the barbers’ and shoemakers’ shops with his pictures, but that he made pictures of them. It may also be taken for granted that these were treated in a quaint, or even a grotesque manner. His paintings were a source of great delight (consummatae voluptatis), and commanded higher prices than the greatest works of many painters. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. § 37.)

The ancient gave a name to this kind of painting, respecting the true form of which there is a difference of opinion. Pliny says that Pyreicus was called, on account of the subjects of his pictures, Rhyparographos (the reading of all the MSS.), instead of which Salmasius proposed to read Rhophaphodos, as better suited to the sense, and Weleker adopts the correction (ad Philostr. 396), while Siliig and others are satisfied with the former reading. The difference is hardly important enough to be discussed here. (See Siliig, Cat. Artif. s. v.; Doderlein, Lat. Synon. vol. ii. p. 38; and the Greek Lexicons, s. v.)

There is a line of Propertius (iii. 9. 12. s. 7. 12, Burmann) in which Burmann reads, on the authority of two MSS.,—

\[ \text{Pyreicus para vindicat arte locum,} \]

where the great majority of the MSS. have Parrhiasios, a reading which would easily be inserted by a transcriber ignorant of the less known name of Pyreicus. In connection with Pyreicus the phrase para artes has a clear meaning; whereas it is difficult to explain it as referring to Parrhaisios. It is, however, uncertain which is right. Hertzberg keeps to the common reading. (See Siliig, Cat. Artif. s. v.; and Hertzberg, Comment. ad loc.) [P. S.]

PYRES (Πυρης), of Miletus, a writer of that lascivious species of poetry denominated Ionic, and in which Sotades, who lived after Pyres, was principally conspicuous. As Sotades lived in the time of Ptolemy Philadephus, Pyres must have lived previous to B.C. 265. (Athen. xiv. p. 620, e.) Suidas (s. v. Σωταδης) erroneously calls him Πυρας.

PYRGON (Πυργον), wrote a work on the laws and institutions of the Cretans, of which the third book is quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 143, e.).

PYRGOTELES (Πυργοτηλες), one of the most celebrated gem-engravers of ancient Greece, lived in the latter half of the fourth century BC. The esteem in which he was held may be inferred from that edict of Alexander, which placed him on a level with Apelles and Lyaius, by naming him as the only artist who was permitted to engrave seal-rings for the king. (Plin. H. N. vii. 37, s. 38, xxviii. 1. s. 4.) Unfortunately, however, beyond this one fact, everything else respecting the artist is involved in that obscurity, to which the neglect of ancient writers and the impudence of ancient as well as modern forgers have conspired to doom one of the most interesting branches of Greek art.

Several works are extant under the name of Pyrgoteles, but of these the best known have been demonstrated by Winckelmann to be forgeries, and very few of the others have any pretensions to authenticity. For the full discussion of the genuineness or spuriousness of the several gems ascribed to Pyrgoteles, the reader is referred to Winckelmann (Herzs. vol. vi. pp. 107, &c.), and Raoul-Huillet (Lettre et M. Schorr, pp. 150—152, 24 ed.).

PYRRHONES (Πυρρόνος), a statuary of Messene, of whom nothing more is known than that he was the maker of the statues of three Olympic victors, namely, Pyrrhalpes of Ephesus, Xenon of Lepremon, and Asamon. (Paus. vi. 3. § 5. 12. § 1. § 1. § 5. 4. s. 5.)

PYRILAMPES (Πυριλαμπης), a statuary of Messene, of whom nothing more is known than that he was the maker of the statues of some of the greatest artists. (Paus. vi. 3. § 5. 12. § 1. § 1. § 5. 4. s. 5.)

PYRIPHEGOTHON (Πυριπηγοθον), flaming with fire, is the name of one of the rivers in the lower world. (Hom. Od. x. 513 ; Strab. v. p. 244.)

PYRROMACHUS, artists. This name has been the occasion of much confusion, owing to its occurring in four different forms, namely, Phyrromachus, Phylomachus, Philomachus, and Pyromachus, and owing also to the fact that there were two artists, who bore one or other of these three names.

1. We have already noticed the Athenian sculptor, who executed the bas-reliefs on the frieze of the temple of Athene Polias, about Ol. 91, B.C. 415, and the true form of whose name was Phyrromachus. [PHYROMACHUS.] This artist is evidently the same whom Pliny mentions, in his list of statuaries, as the maker of a group representing...
The Pyrrhonians, a school of ancient philosophers, were known for their skepticism and method of inquiry. They were led by Pyrrho, who is said to have practiced the philosophy of Zen, which emphasizes the suspension of judgment. The Pyrrhonians advocated for a neutral point of view, avoiding both belief and disbelief in the various claims that come to us from history and tradition. They sought to free the mind from the bonds of philosophical disputes and to attain a state of tranquility and freedom from the passions. This approach was seen as a wise middle way between the extremes of dogmatism and skepticism. The Pyrrhonians were often associated with the practice of Stoicism, and their methods of inquiry were seen as a complement to the Stoic life of virtue and self-control. In this way, the Pyrrhonians sought to contribute to the broader goal of moral and intellectual improvement.
PYRRHON.

have attached himself closely to Anaxarchus, a disciple of the Democritean Metrodorus, and with him to have joined the expedition of Alexander the Great (Diog. Laërt. l.c. ix. 63; Suid. s. v. Aristocles describes Anaxarchus as his teacher, l.c.), and on the expedition to have become acquainted with the Magians and the Indian gymnosophists. That his sceptical theories originated in his intercourse with them was asserted by Asenius of Abdera (a writer, with whom we are otherwise unacquainted), probably without any reason. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 61.) It is more likely that he derived from them his endeavours after imperturbable equanimity, and entire independence of all external circumstances, and the resistance of that mobility which is said to have been natural to him (ib. 62, 63, comp. 66, 68; Timon, 'ibid. c. 65). It is manifest, however, that his biographer Antigonus had already invented fables about him. (Diog. Laërt. l.c.; Aristoc. ap. Euseb. p. 763; Plut. de Prof. in Vitr. c. 9.) A half insane man, such as he depicts him, the Eleans assuredly would never have chosen as high priest (Diog. Laërt. ix. 64; comp. Hezych. Miles. p. 50, ed. Orelli); and Aenesidemus, to confute such stories, had already maintained that Pyrrhon had indeed in philosophy refined from decision, but that in action he by no means blindly abandoned himself to be the sport of an accidental chance. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 64.) The young Nausiphanes (probably a later contemporary of Epicurus) Pyrrhon won over, not indeed to his doctrine, but to his disposition (οἰκείωσις), to which Epicurus also could not refuse a lively recognition. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 64.) Pyrrhon's disciple Timon, who, in his Python, had detailed long conversations which he had with Pyrrhon (Aristoc. l.c. p. 761; comp. Diog. Laërt. ix. 67), extolled with admiration his divine reposes of soul, his independence of all the shackles of external relations, and of all deception and sophistical obscurity. He compared him to the imperturbable sun-god, who hangs aloft over the earth (ib. 65, comp. 67; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 305; Aristoc. ap. Euseb. l.c. p. 761, &c.). What progress he had made in laying a scientific foundation for his sceptics cannot be determined with accuracy, but it is probable that Timon, who, as it appears, was more a poet than a philosopher [TIMON], was indebted to him for the essential features of the reasons for doubt which were developed by him. Just as later sceptics saw the beginnings of their doctrines in the expressions of the poets and most ancient philosophers on the insufficiency of human knowledge and the uncertainty of life, so Pyrrhon also interpreted lines of his favourite poet Homer in the sceptical sense. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 67; comp. Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 272, 281.) That dogmatic convictions lay at the foundation of the scepticism of Pyrrhon, was maintained only by Numenius. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 68.) Still more groundless, without doubt, is the statement of the Abderite Asenius, that Pyrrhon would recognise neither Beautiful nor Ugly, Right nor Wrong, and maintained that as nothing is according to truth, so the actions of men are determined only by law and custom. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 61; comp. Aristoc. ap. Euseb. l.c. p. 761.) That, on the contrary, he left the validity of moral requirements unassailed, and directed his endeavours to the production of a moral state of disposition, is attested not only by individual, well-authenticated traits of character (Diog. Laërt. ix. 66, after Eun-
PYRRHUS.

3. Agathobulus F. L. Pyrrhus, a Greek freedman of the Roman era, whose name occurs in an inscription found at Pesaro, as Ficus Sigillator, that is, a maker of the small terra-cotta images called sigilla. (Orelli, Inscr. Lat. Select. No 4191; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 397, 398, 2d ed.)

PYRRHUS (Nópos), king of Epeirus, born about the year B.C. 318, was the son of Aeacides and Phthia, the daughter of Menon of Pharsalus, a distinguished leader in the struggle between Macedonia and Greece after the death of Alexander, usually called the Lamanian war. The ancestors of Pyrrhus claimed descent from Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, who was said to have settled in Epeirus after the Trojan war, and to have become the founder of the race of Molossian kings. His father had ascended to the throne on the death of his cousin Alexander, who was slain in Italy in B.C. 326. Alexander was the brother of Olympias, the wife of Philip and the mother of Alexander the Great; and it was this connection with the royal family of Macedonia, which brought misfortune upon the early years of Pyrrhus. His father Aeacides had taken part with his relative Olympias, and had marched into Macedonia to support her against Cassander; but when the latter proved victorious, and Aeacides and Olympias were obliged to take to flight, the Epeirots, who disliked their king and were unwilling to be any longer involved in war with Cassander, met in a general assembly, and deprived Aeacides of the throne. Aeacides himself was out of the way; but many of his friends were put to death, and Pyrrhus, who was then a child of only two years old, was with difficulty saved from destruction by the faithful adherents of the king. They escaped with the child to Glaucias, the king of the Tauritians, an Illyrian people, who afforded him protection, and nobly refused to surrender him to Cassander. Aeacides died soon afterwards in battle, and Pyrrhus was brought up by Glaucias along with his own children. About ten years afterwards, when Demetrius had shaken the power of Cassander in Greece, Glaucias restored Pyrrhus to the throne; but as he was then only twelve years old, the kingdom was governed by guardians. But Pyrrhus did not long remain in possession of his hereditary dominions. Demetrius was obliged to abandon Greece, in order to cross over to Asia to the assistance of his father, Antigonus, who was menaced by the united forces of Cassander, Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Lysimachus; and as Cassander had now regained his supremacy in Greece, he prevailed upon the Epeirots to expel their young king a second time. Pyrrhus, who was still only seventeen years of age, joined Demetrius, who had married his sister Deidameia, accompanied him to Asia, and was present at the battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301, in which he gained great renown for his valour. Though so young, he bore down for a time every thing before him with that impetuous courage, which always distinguished him in his subsequent engagements. But his efforts could not restore the day, and he was obliged to fly from the field. Antigonus fell in the battle, and Demetrius became a fugitive; but Pyrrhus did not desert his brother-in-law in his misfortunes, and shortly afterwards went for him as a hostage into Egypt, when Demetrius had recovered the throne of Ptolemy. Here Pyrrhus was fortunate enough to win the affections of Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy, and received in marriage Antigone, his daughter by her first husband. Ptolemy now supplied him with a fleet and men, and he was thus once more able to return to Epeirus. Neoptolemus, probably the son of Alexander who died in Italy, had reigned from the time that Pyrrhus had been driven from the kingdom; but as he had made himself unpopular by his harsh and tyrannical rule, Pyrrhus found many partisans. The two rivals consented to a compromise and agreed to share the sovereignty between them. But such an arrangement could not last long; and Pyrrhus anticipated his own destruction by putting his rival to death. This appears to have happened in B.C. 295, in which year Pyrrhus is said to have begun to reign (Vell. Pat. i. 14. § 9); and as Cassander did not die till the end of B.C. 297, the joint sovereignty of Pyrrhus and Neoptolemus could have lasted only a short time, as it is improbable that Pyrrhus ventured to return to his native country during the lifetime of his great enemy Cassander.

Pyrrhus was twenty-three years of age when he was firmly established on the throne of Epeirus (B.C. 295), and he soon became one of the most popular princes of his age. His daring courage made him a favourite with his troops, and his affability and generosity secured the love of his people. His character resembled in many respects that of his great kinsman, the conqueror of Persia; and he seems at an early age to have made Alexander his model, and to have been fired with the ambition of imitating his exploits and treading in his footsteps. His eyes were first directed to the conquest of Macedonia. Master of that country, he might hope to obtain the sovereignty of Greece; and with the whole of Greece under his sway, there was a boundless prospect for his ambition, terminating on the one hand with the conquest of Italy, Sicily, and Carthage, and on the other with the dominions of the Greek monarchs in the East. The unsettled state of Macedonia after the death of Cassander soon placed the first object of his ambition within his grasp. Antipater and Alexander, the sons of Cassander, quarrelled for the inheritance of their father; and Alexander, unable to maintain his ground, applied to Pyrrhus for assistance. This was granted on condition of Alexander’s ceding to Pyrrhus the whole of the Macedonian dominions on the western side of Greece. These were Aetolia, Amphilocheia, and Ambracia, and likewise the districts of Tyrrhenea and Parmaceae, which formed part of Macedonia itself. (Plut. Pyrrh. 6, with the emendation of Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. note 411, Parmaceae instead of Parmaceae.) Pyrrhus fulfilled his engagements to Alexander and drove his brother Antipater out of Macedonia, n. c. 294, though it appears that the latter was subsequently allowed to retain a small portion of the country. (Thirlwall’s Greece, vol. viii. p. 16.)

Pyrrhus had greatly increased his power by the large accession of territory which he had thus gained, and he still further strengthened himself by forming an alliance with the Aetolians; but the rest of Macedonia unexpectedly fell into the hands of a powerful neighbour. Alexander had applied to Demetrius for assistance at the same time as he sent to Pyrrhus for the same purpose; but as the latter was the nearest at hand, he had restored Alexander to his kingdom before Demetrius could arrive at the scene of action. Demetrius, however, was unwilling to lose such an opportunity of aggrandizement; he accordingly left Athens, and reached Macedonia towards the end of the year n. c. 294. He had not been there many days before he put Alexander to death, and thus became king of Macedonia. Between two such powerful neighbours and such restless spirits, as Demetrius and Pyrrhus, jealousies and contentions were sure to arise. Each was anxious for the dominions of the other, and the two former friends soon became the most deadly enemies. Deidameia, who might have acted as a mediator between her husband and her brother, was now dead. The jealousies between the two rivals at length broke out into open war in n. c. 291. It was during this year that Thebes revolted a second time against Demetrius, probably at the instigation of Pyrrhus; and while the Macedonian monarch proceeded in person to chastise the rebellious inhabitants, Pyrrhus effected a diversion in their favour by invading Thessaly, but was compelled to retire into Epeirus before the superior forces of Demetrius. In n. c. 290 Thebes surrendered, and Demetrius was thus at liberty to take vengeance on Pyrrhus and his Aetolian allies. Accordingly, he invaded Aetolia in the spring of n. c. 289, and after overrunning and ravaging the country almost without opposition, he marched into Epeirus, leaving Pantauchus with a strong body of his troops to keep the Aetolians in subjection. Pyrrhus advanced to meet him; but as the two armies took different roads, Demetrius entered Epeirus and Pyrrhus Aetolia almost at the same time. Pantauchus immediately offered him battle, in the midst of which he challenged the king to single combat. This was immediately accepted by the youthful monarch; and in the conflict which ensued, Pyrrhus bore his enemy to the ground, and would have killed him on the spot, had he not been rescued by his friends. The Macedonians, dismayed by the fall of their leader, took to flight and left Pyrrhus master of the field. This victory, however, was attended with more important advantages than its immediate fruits. The impetuous movements and daring valor of the Epeirot king reminded the veterans in the Macedonian army of the great Alexander, and thus paved for Pyrrhus his accession to the Macedonian throne. Demetrius meantime had found no one to resist him in Epeirus, and during his expedition into this country he also obtained possession of Corcyra. After the death of Antigone, Pyrrhus, in accordance with the custom of the monarchs of his age, had married three wives, in order to strengthen his power by a close connection with foreign princes. Of these wives one was a Paeonian princess, another an Illyrian, and a third Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles of Syracuse.

who brought him the island of Corcyra as a dowry. But Lanassa, offended with the attention which Pyrrhus paid to his barbarian wives, had withdrawn to her principality of Corcyra, which she now bestowed upon Demetrius together with her hand. Pyrrhus accordingly returned to Epeirus more incensed than ever against Demetrius. The latter had previously withdrawn into Macedonia.

At the beginning of the following year, n. c. 288, Pyrrhus took advantage of a dangerous illness of Demetrius to invade Macedonia. He advanced as far as Edessa without meeting with any opposition; but when Demetrius was able to put himself at the head of his troops, he drove his rival out of the country without difficulty. But as he had now formed the vast design of recovering the whole of his father’s dominions in Asia, he hastened to conclude a peace with Pyrrhus, in order to continue his preparations undisturbed. His old enemies, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus, once more entered into a league against him, and resolved to crush him in Europe before he had time to cross over into Asia. They easily persuaded Pyrrhus to break his recent treaty with Demetrius, and join the coalition against him. Accordingly, in the spring of n. c. 287, while Ptolemy appeared with a powerful fleet off the coasts of Greece, Lysimachus invaded the upper and Pyrrhus the lower provinces of Macedonia at the same time. Demetrius marched against Lysimachus, but alarmed at the growing disaffection of his troops, and fearing that they might go over to Lysimachus, who had been one of the veteran generals and companions of Alexander, he suddenly retraced his steps and proceeded against Pyrrhus, who had already advanced as far as Beroea and had taken up his quarters in that city. But Pyrrhus proved a rival as formidable as Lysimachus. The kindness with which he had treated his prisoners, and his condescension and affability to the inhabitants of Beroea, had won all hearts; and accordingly, when Demetrius drew near, his troops deserted him in a body and transferred their allegiance to Pyrrhus. Demetrius was obliged to fly in disguise, and leave the kingdom to his rival. Pyrrhus, however, was unable to obtain possession of the whole of Macedonia: Lysimachus claimed his share of the spoil, and the kingdom was divided between them. But Pyrrhus did not long retain his portion; the Macedonians preferred the rule of their old general Lysimachus; and Pyrrhus was accordingly driven out of his newly acquired kingdom; thus leaving Lysimachus master of the entire country. It is doubtful how long Pyrrhus reigned in Macedonia. Dexippos and Porphyry (apud Euseb. Arm. p. 329, ed. Anchor; apud Syneccl. p. 266, a.) state that it was only seven months, which would place the expulsion of Pyrrhus at the end of n. c. 267, or the beginning of 266; but as other writers relate (Plut. Pyrrh. 12; Paus. i. 10. § 2) that this happened after the defeat of Demetrius in Syria, which did not take place till the middle of 286, the reign of Pyrrhus in Macedonia is probably somewhat longer. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. note 813.)

For the next few years Pyrrhus appears to have reigned quietly in Epeirus without embarking in any new enterprise. But a life of inactivity was insupportable to him, and he pined for fresh scenes of action in which he might gain glory and acquire dominion. At length, in n. c. 281, the long... wished for opportunity presented itself. The Tarentines, against whom the Romans had declared war, sent an embassy to Pyrrhus in the summer of this year, begging him in the name of all the Italian Greeks to cross over to Italy in order to conduct the war against the Romans. They told him that they only wanted a general, and that they would supply him with an army of 350,000 foot, and 20,000 horse, as all the nations of southern Italy would flock to his standard. This was too tempting an offer to be resisted. It realized one of the earliest dreams of his ambition. The conquest of Rome would naturally lead to the sovereignty of Sicily and Africa; and he would then be able to return to Greece with the united forces of Italy, Sicily, and Carthage, to destroy his rivals in Greece, and reign as master of the world. He therefore eagerly promised the Tarentines to come to their assistance, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his wise and faithful counsellor Cines; but as he would not trust the success of his enterprise to the valour and fidelity of Italian troops, he began to make preparations to carry over a powerful army with him. These preparations occupied him during the remainder of this year and the beginning of the next. The Greek princes did everything to favour his views, as they were glad to get rid of so powerful and dangerous a neighbour. Antigonus supplied him with ships, Antiochus with money, and Poteloemus Ceraunus with troops. He left as guardian of his kingdom his son Potemny by his first wife Antigone, who was then only a youth of fifteen years of age. (Justin. xvii. 2, xviii. 1.)

Pyrrhus crossed over to Italy early in n. c. 280, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. He took with him 20,000 foot, 3000 horse, 2000 archers, 500 slingers, and either 50 or 20 elephants, having previously sent Milo, one of his generals, with a detachment of 3000 men. (Plut. Pyrrh. 15; Justin. xvii. 2.) Such was his impatience to arrive at Tarentum in time to enter upon military operations early in the spring, that he set sail before the stormy season of the year had passed; and he had scarcely put out to sea before a violent tempest arose, which dispersed his fleet. He himself hardly escaped with his life, and arrived at Tarentum with only a small part of his army. After a time the scattered ships gradually made their appearance; and after collecting his troops, he began to make preparations to carry on the war with activity. The inhabitants of Tarentum were a giddy and licentious people, unaccustomed to the toils of war, and unwilling to endure its hardships. They accordingly attempted to evade entering the ranks of the army, and began to make complaints in the public assemblies respecting the demands of Pyrrhus and the conduct of his troops; but Pyrrhus forthwith treated them as their master rather than as their ally, shut up the theatre and all other public places, and compelled their young men to serve in his ranks. Notwithstanding all the activity of Pyrrhus the Romans were the first in the field. The consul M. Valerius Laevinus marched into Lucania; but as the army of Pyrrhus was inferior to that of the Romans, he attempted to gain time by negotiation, in order that he might be joined by his Italian allies. He accordingly wrote to the consul, offering to arbitrate between Rome and his Italian allies; but Laevinus bluntly told him to mind his own business and retire to Epirus. Fearing to remain inactive any longer, although he was not yet joined by his allies, Pyrrhus marched out against the Romans with his own troops and the Tarentines. He took up his position between the towns of Pandosia and Hermelia, on the left or northern bank of the river Siris. The Romans were encamped on the southern bank of the river, and they were the first to begin the battle. They crossed the river and were immediately attacked by the cavalry of Pyrrhus, who led them to the charge in person, and distinguished himself as usual by the most daring acts of valour. The Romans, however, bravely sustained the attack; and Pyrrhus, finding that he could not carry the day, ordered his infantry to advance. The battle was still contested most furiously; seven times did both armies advance and retreat; and it was not till Pyrrhus brought forward his elephants, which bore down every thing before them, that the Romans took to flight. The Thessalian cavalry completed the rout. The Romans fled in the utmost confusion across the river Siris, leaving their camp to the conqueror. The battle had lasted all day, and it was probably the fall of night alone which saved the Roman army from complete destruction. Those who escaped took refuge in an Apulian town, which Niebuhr conjectures to have been Venusia. The number of the slain in either army is differently stated; but the loss of Pyrrhus, though inferior to that of the Romans, was still very considerable, and a large proportion of his officers and best troops had fallen. He is reported to have said, as he viewed the field of battle, "Another such victory, and I must return to Epirus alone." He acted with generosity after the battle, burying the dead bodies of the Romans like those of his own troops, and treating his prisoners with kindness. This victory was followed by important results. The allies of Pyrrhus, who had hitherto kept aloof, joined him now; and even many of the subjects of Rome espoused his cause. But Pyrrhus had bought his victory dearly, and must have learnt by the experience of the late battle the difficulty he would have to encounter in conquering Rome. He therefore sent his minister Cines to Rome with proposals of peace, while he himself collected the forces of the allies and marched slowly towards Central Italy. The terms which he offered were those of a conqueror. He proposed that the Romans should recognize the independence of the Greeks in Italy, should restore to the Samnites, Lucanians, Apulians, and Bruttians, all the possessions which they had lost in war, and should make peace with himself and the Tarentines. As soon as this was concluded on these terms, he promised to return all the Roman prisoners without ransom. Cines, whose persuasive eloquence was said to have won more towns for Pyrrhus than his arms, neglected no means to secure the favour of the Romans for his master, and to induce them to accept the peace. The prospects of the republic seemed so dark and threatening that many members of the senate thought that it would be more prudent to comply with his demands; and this party would probably have carried the day, had it not been for the patriotic speech of the aged Ap. Claudius Caecus, who denounced the idea of a peace with a victorious foe with such effect, that the senate resolved to decline the proposals of PYRRHUS.

Pyrrhus, and commanded Cineas to quit Rome on the same day.

Cineas returned to Pyrrhus, and told him he must hope for nothing from negotiation. The king accordingly resolved to prosecute the war with vigour. He advanced by rapid marches towards Rome, plundering the country of the Roman allies as he went along. He was followed by the consul Laevinus, whose army had been reinforced by two legions, which had been levied in the city while the senate was considering the king's proposals of peace. Laevinus, however, did not venture to attack the superior forces of the enemy, but contented himself with harassing their march and delaying their advance by petty skirmishes. Pyrrhus, therefore, continued to advance steadily without meeting with any serious opposition, and at length arrived at Praeneste, which fell into his hands. He was now only twenty-four miles from Rome, and his outposts advanced six miles further.
Another march would have brought him under the walls of the city; but here his progress was stopped. At this moment he was informed that peace was concluded with the Etruscans, and that the other consul, Ti. Cornucanius, had returned with his army to Rome. All hope was now gone of compelling the Romans to accept the peace, and he therefore resolved to retreat. He retired slowly into Campania, and from thence withdrew into winter-quarters to Tarentum. No other battle was fought this year.

As soon as the armies were quartered for the winter, the Romans sent an embassy to Pyrrhus, to endeavour to obtain the ransom of the Roman prisoners or their exchange for an equal number of the Tarentines or their allies. The ambassades were received by Pyrrhus in the most distinguished manner; and his interviews with C. Fabricius Lucineus, who was at the head of the embassy, form one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history, and have been briefly related elsewhere.
[Vol. II. p. 842, a.] He refused, however, to comply with the request of the Romans; but at the same time to show them his trust in their honour, and his admiration of their character, he allowed them to go to Rome in order to celebrate the Saturnalia, stipulating that they were to return to Tarentum if the senate would not accept the terms which he had previously offered them through Cineas. The senate remained firm in their resolve, and all the prisoners returned to Pyrrhus, the punishment of death having been denounced against those who should remain in the city. This is the account in Appian (Sax. x. 4, 5), and Plutarch (Pyrh. 20); but other writers state with less probability that the prisoners were set free by Pyrrhus unconditionally and without ransom. (Liv.
Epit. 13; Zonar. viii. 4; Flor. i. 18; Eutrop. ii.
7; Aurel. Vict. de vir. Ill. 35.)

Of the campaign of the following year, b.c. 279,
we know but little. The consuls were P. Decius Maus and P. Sulpicius Saverrio. Apulia was the field of operations, and the great battle of the campaign was fought near Asculum. The first encounter took place near the banks of a river, where the uneven ground of the field was ill adapted for the movements of the phalanx, and the Romans unevenly gained the advantage. But Pyrrhus manoeuvred so as to bring the enemy into the open plain, where the Romans were defeated, and fled to their camp. This was so near to the field of battle, that not more than 6000 of the Romans fell, while Pyrrhus, according to his own statement in his commentaries, lost 3503 men. This was the account of Hieronymus, which is preserved by Plutarch, and is doubtless correct in the main. The Roman annalists, on the contrary, either represented it as a drawn battle, or claimed the victory for their own nation (Liv. Epit. 13; Zonar. viii. 5; Eutrop. ii. 13; Oros. iv. 1; Flor. i.
8 § 9; comp. Mus. Decius. No. 3.) The victory however yielded Pyrrhus no advantage, and he was obliged to retire to Tarentum for the winter without effecting any thing more during the campaign. In the last battle, as well as in the first,
the brunt of the action had fallen almost exclusively on the Greek troops of the king; and the state of Greece, which was overrun by the Gauls in this year, made it hopeless for him to obtain any reinforcements from Epirus. He was therefore unwilling to hazard his surviving Greeks by another campaign with the Romans, and accordingly lent a ready ear to the invitations of the Greeks in Sicily, who begged him to come to their assistance against the Carthaginians. This seemed an easier enterprise than the one he was already engaged in,
and it had moreover the charm of novelty, which always had great attractions for Pyrrhus. It was necessary, however, first to suspend hostilities with the Romans, who were likewise anxious to get rid of so formidable an opponent that they might complete the subjugation of southern Italy without further interruption. When both parties had the same wishes, it was not difficult to find a fair protest for bringing the war to a conclusion. This was afforded at the beginning of the following year, 278, by one of the servants of Pyrrhus deserting to the Romans and propounding to the consuls to poison his master. The consuls Fa-briucius and Aemilius sent back the deserter to the king, stating that they abhorred a victory gained by treason. Thereupon Pyrrhus, to show his gratitude, sent Cineas to Rome with all the Roman prisoners without ransom and without conditions;
and the Romans appear to have granted him a truce, though not a formal peace, as he had not consented to evacuate Italy.

Pyrrhus was now at liberty to cross over into Sicily, which he did immediately afterwards, leaving Milo with part of his troops in possession of Tarentum, and his son Alexander with another garrison at Locri (Justin, xviii. 2; Zonar. viii. 5.)
The Tarentines had demanded that his troops should be withdrawn, if he would not assist them in the field; but Pyrrhus paid no heed to their remonstrances, and retained possession of their town, as well as of Locri, in hopes of being soon able to return to Italy at the head of the Greeks of Sicily, of which island his warm imagination had already pictured him as the sovereign.

Pyrrhus remained in Sicily upwards of two years, namely from the middle of b.c. 478, to the latter end of b.c. 476. At first he met with brilliant success in Sicily. He drove the Carthaginians before him, and took the strongly fortified city of Eryx, in the assault of which he was the first to mount the scaling ladders, and distinguished himself as usual by his daring and impetuous conduct. The Carthaginians became so alarmed at his success, that they continually sent ships and money on condition of his forming an alliance with them, although they had only a short time before made a treaty with the Romans. Pyrrhus was foolish enough to reject this offer, which would have afforded him immense advantages for the prosecution of the war with Rome; and at the instigation of the Sicilian Greeks he refused to come to any terms with the Carthaginians unless they would evacuate Sicily altogether. Shortly after Pyrrhus received a severe repulse in an attempt which he made upon the impregnable town of Lilybaeum. The prestige of success was now gone. The Greeks, who had invited him to the island, were desirous to see him depart, and began to form cabals and plots against him. This led to retaliation on the part of Pyrrhus, and to acts which were deemed both cruel and tyrannical by the Greeks. He was involved in plots and insurrections of all kinds, and soon became as anxious to abandon the island as he had been before to leave Italy. Accordingly, when his Italian allies again begged him to come to their assistance, he readily consented. For, as the Romans were now in much the same state of affairs as they had been in Italy, he had a double motive for returning to the country. He must therefore rejoin his fellow-pleasants, which had crossed over from Sicily to dispute his passage. He defeated them after a sharp struggle, and eventually reached Tarentum in safety. His troops were now almost the same in number as when he first landed in Italy, but very different in quality. His faithful Epeirots had for the most part fallen, and his present soldiers consisted chiefly of mercenaries, whom he had levied in Italy, and on whose fidelity he could only rely so long as he led them to victory, and supplied them with pay and plunder. Pyrrhus did not remain inactive at Tarentum, but forthwith commenced operations, although the season seemed to have been far advanced. He recovered Locri, which had revolted to the Romans, and then, finding himself in great difficulties for want of money to pay his troops, and could obtain none from his allies, he was induced at the advice of some Epicureans to take possession of the treasures of the temple of Proserpine in that town. The ships in which the money was to be embarked to be carried to Tarentum, were driven back by a storm to Locri. This circumstance deeply affected the mind of Pyrrhus; he ordered the treasures to be restored to the temple, and put to death the unfortunate men who had advised him to commit the sacrilegious act; and from this time he became haunted by the idea, as he himself related in his memoirs, that the wrath of Proserpine was pursuing him and dragging him down to ruin. (Dionys. xix. 9, 10; Appian, Samn. xii.)

The following year, B.c. 274, closed the career of Pyrrhus in Italy. The consuls were Curius Dentatus and Servilius Messala; of whom the former commanded at Surrentum and the latter into Lucania. Pyrrhus advanced against Curius, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Beneventum, and resolved to attack him before he was joined by his colleague. As Curius, however, did not wish to risk a battle with his own army alone, Pyrrhus planned an attack upon his camp by night. But he miscalculated the time and the distance; the torches burnt out, the men missed their way, and it was already broad day-light when he reached the heights above the Roman camp. Still their arrival was quite unexpected; but as a battle was now inevitable, Curius led out his men. The troops of Pyrrhus, exhausted by fatigue, were easily put to the rout; two elephants were killed and eight more taken. Encouraged by this success, Curius no longer hesitated to meet the king in the open plain. One wing of the Romans was victorious. The other was driven back by the phalanx and the elephants to their camp, but their retreat was covered by a shower of missiles from the ramparts of the camp, which so annoyed the elephants that they turned round and trod down all before them. The Romans now returned to the charge, and easily drove back the enemy which had been thus thrown into disorder. The rout was complete, and Pyrrhus arrived at Tarentum with only a few horsemen. It was now impossible to continue the war any longer without a fresh supply of troops, and he therefore applied to the kings of Macedonia and Syria for assistance; but as they turned as deaf ear to his requests, he had no alternative but to quit Italy. He crossed over to Greece towards the end of the year, leaving Milo with a garrison at Tarentum, as if he still clung to the idea of returning to Italy at some future time.

Pyrrhus arrived in Epirus at the end of B.c. 274, after an absence of six years. He brought back with him only 8000 foot and 500 horse, and had not money to maintain even these without undertaking new wars. Accordingly, at the beginning of the following year, B.c. 273, he invaded Macedonia, of which Antigonus Gonatas, the son of Demetrius, was at that time king. His army had been reinforced by a body of Gallic mercenaries, and his only object at first seems to have been plunder. But his success far exceeded his expectations. He obtained possession of several towns without resistance; and when at length Antigonus advanced to meet him, the Macedonian monarch was deserted by his own troops, who welcomed Pyrrhus as their king. Pyrrhus thus became king of Macedonia, second time, but had scarcely obtained possession of the kingdom before his restless spirit drove him into new enterprises. Cleonymus had many years before been excluded from the Spartan throne; and he had recently received a new insult from the family which was reigning in his place. Acratus, the son of the Spartan king Areus, had seduced Cleidelion, the young wife of Cleonymus, and the latter, now burning for revenge, repaired to the court of Pyrrrhus, and persuaded him to make war upon Sparta. This invitation was readily complied with: and Pyrrhus accordingly marched into Laconia in the following year, B.c. 272, with an army of 25,000 foot, 2000 horse, and 24 elephants. Such a force seemed irresistible; no preparations had been made for defence, and king Areus himself was absent in Crete. As soon as Pyrrhus arrived, Cleonymus urged him to attack the city forthwith. But as the day was far spent, Pyrrhus resolved to defer the attack until the next day; and, by this soldiers would pillage the city, if it were taken in the night. But during the night the Spartans were not idle. All the inhabitants, old and young, men and women, laboured incessantly in digg ing a deep ditch opposite the enemy's camp, and at the end of each ditch formed a strong barricade of waggons. The next day Pyrrhus advanced to the assault, but was repulsed by the Spartans, who fought under their youthful leader Acratus in a manner worthy of their ancient courage. The assault was again renewed on the next day, but with no better success; and the arrival of Areus with 2000 Cretans, as well as of other auxiliary forces, at length compelled Pyrrhus to abandon all hopes of taking the city. He did not, however, relinquish his enterprise altogether, but resolved to winter in Peloponnesus, that he might be ready to renew operations at the commencement of the spring. But while making preparations for this object, he received an invitation from Ariston, one of the leading citizens at Argos, to assist him against his rival Aristippus, whose cause was espoused by Antigonus. Pyrrhus forthwith commenced his march from the neighborhood of Sparta, but did not reach Argos without some delay, for, as the Spartans under Areus both molested his march and occupied some of the passes through which his road lay. In one of these encounters his eldest son Ptolemy fell, greatly to the grief of his father, who avenged his death by killing with his own hand the leader of the Lacedaemonian detachment which had destroyed his son. On arriving in the neighborhood of Argos, he found Antigonus encamped on one of the heights near the city, but he could not induce him to risk a battle. There was a party at Argos, which did not belong to either of the contending factions, and which was anxious to get rid both of Pyrrhus and Antigonus. They accordingly sent an embassy to the two kings, begging them to withdraw from the city. Antigonus promised compliance, and sent his son as a hostage; but though Pyrrhus did not refuse, he would not give any hostage. In the night-time Ariston admitted Pyrrhus into the city, who marched into the market-place with part of his troops, leaving his son Helenus with the main body of his army on the outside. But the alarm having been given, the citadel was seized by the Argives of the opposite faction. Areus with his Spartans, who had followed close upon Pyrrhus, was admitted within the walls, and Antigonus also sent a portion of his troops into the city, under the command of his son Halcyonus, while he himself remained without with the bulk of his forces. On the dawn of day Pyrrhus saw that all the strong places were in the possession of the enemy, and that it would be necessary for him to retreat. He accordingly sent orders to his son Helenus to break down part of the walls, in order that his troops might retire with more ease; but in consequence of some mistake in the delivery of the message, Helenus attempted to enter the city by the same gateway through which Pyrrhus was retreating. The two sides encountered one another, and to add to the confusion one of the elephants fell down in the narrow gateway, while another becoming wild and ungovernable, tread down every one before him. Pyrrhus was in the rear, in a more open part of the city, attempting to keep off the enemy. While thus engaged, he was slightly wounded through the breast-plate with a javelin; and, as he turned to take vengeance on the Argive who had attacked him, the mother of the man, seeing the danger of her son, hurled down from the house- roof where she was standing a ponderous tile, which struck Pyrrhus on the back of his neck. He fell from his horse stunned with the blow, and being recognized by some of the soldiers of Antigonus, was quickly despatched. His head was cut off and given to Halcyonus, who carried the bloody trophy with exultation to his father Antigonus. But the latter turned away from the sight, and ordered the body to be interred with becoming honours. His remains were deposited by the Argives in the temple of Demeter. (Paus. i. 13, § 8.) Pyrrhus perished in n. c. 272, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and in the twenty-third of his reign. He was the greatest warrior and one of the best princes of his time. If judged by a righteous standard of public morality, he will appear as a monarch intent only upon his personal aggrandisement, and ready to sacrifice the rights of other nations to the advancement of his glory and the gratification of his ambition. But if judged by the moral standard of the day, in which he lived, when every Greek prince thought he had a right to whatever dominions his sword could win, we shall see more to admire than to censure in his conduct. His government of his native dominions seems to have been just and lenient, for his Epeirots always remained faithful to him even during his long absence in Italy and Sicily. His foreign wars were carried on with no unnecessary cruelty and oppression, and he is accused of fewer crimes than any of his contemporaries. The greatest testimony to the excellence of his private life is, that in an age of treachery and corruption he ever retained the affection of his personal attendants; and hence, with the solitary exception of the physician who offered to poison him, we read of no instance in which he was deserted or betrayed by any of his officers or friends. With his daring courage, his military skill, his affable deportment, and his kingly bearing, he might have become the most powerful monarch of his day, if he had steadily and perseveringly pursued the immediate object before him. But he never rested satisfied with any acquisition, and was ever grasping at some fresh object: hence Antigonus compared him to a gambler, who made many good throws with the dice, but was unable to make the proper use of the game. Pyrrhus was regarded in subsequent times as one of the greatest generals that had ever lived. Procles, the Carthaginian, thought him superior even to Alexander in the military art (Paus. iv. 35. § 4); and Hannibal said that of all generals Pyrrhus was the first, Scipio the second, and himself the third (Plut. Pyrrh. 8), or, according to another version of the story, Alexander was the first, Pyrrhus the second, and himself the third (Plut. Flamin. 21). Pyrrhus wrote a work on the art of war, which was read in the time of Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 25, comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 443) and his commentaries are quoted both by Dionysius and Plutarch.

PYTHAGORAS.

PYTHAE'NETUS (Πυθαϊνέτος), wrote a work on Aegina. (Athen. xiii. p. 589, f; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iv. 1712; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 107, ad Nem. v. 81, vi. 53; Schol. ad Lycophr. 175.)

PYTHA'GORAS (Πυθαγόρας). The authentic facts in the history of Pythagoras are so few, and the sources from which the greater part of our information respecting him is derived are of so late a date, and so untrustworthy, that it is impossible to lay down more than an outline of his personal history with any approximation to certainty. The total absence of written memorials proceeding from Pythagoras himself, and the paucity of the notices of him by contemporaries, coupled with the secrecy which was thrown around the constitution and actions of the Pythagorean brotherhood, held out strong temptations for invention to supply the place of facts, and the stories which thus originated were eagerly caught up by the Neo-Platonic writers who furnish most of the details respecting Pythagoras, and with whom it was a recognised canon, that nothing should be accounted incredible which related to the gods or what was divine. (Iamb. Adhort., ad Philos. p. 324, ed. Kiessling.) In this way a multitude of the most absurd fictions took their rise — such as that Apollo was his father; that his person gleamed with a supernatural brightness; that he exhibited a golden thigh; that Alleus came flying to him on a golden arrow; that he was seen in different places at one and the same time. (Comp. Herod. iv. 94, &c.) With the exception of some scanty notices by Xenophanes, Heracleitus, Herodotus, Plato, Aristotle, and Isocrates, we are mainly dependent on Diogenes Laëritius, Porphyrus, and Iamblichus for the materials out of which to form a biography of Pythagoras. Aristotle had written a separate work on the Pythagoreans, which is unfortunately not extant. (He alludes to it himself, Met. i. 5, p. 936. 12, ed. Bekker.) His disciples Diacritarchus, Aristoxenus, and Heraclideus Ponticus had written on the same subject. These writers, late as they are, are among the best from whom Porphyrus and Iamblichus drew: their chief sources besides being legends and their own invention. Hence we are reduced to admit or reject their statements mainly from a consideration of their inherent probability, and even in that point of view it is not enough to look at each separately, for if all the separately credible narratives respecting Pythagoras were supposed true, they would extend the sphere and amount of his activity to an utterly impossible extent. (Krische, de Societatis a Pythagora conditae Scopo politico. Prael.; Brandis, Geschichte des Griech. Nom. Philosophie, p. 440; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 540.)

That Pythagoras was the son of Mnemosinus, who was either a merchant, or, according to others, an engraver of siglots (Diog. Laërit. vii. 1), may be safely affirmed on the authority of Herodotus (iv. 93); that Samos was his birth-place, on that of Isocrates (Basil. p. 227, ed. Steph.). Others called him a Tyrrhenian or Phliasian, and gave Marmocus, or Demaratus, as the name of his father (Diog. Laërit. l. c.; Porph. Vit. Pyth. 1, 2; Justin, xx. 4; Paus. ii. 13.) It is quite possible that though born in Samos, he may have been connected in race with those Tyrrhenian Pelasgians who were scattered over various parts of the Aegaean Sea. There are but few chronological data, and those for the most part indistinct, for fixing the date of the birth of Pythagoras. Antiochus (ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 309) reckoned 312 years from the ηζολεα of Pythagoras to B.C. 270. This would place the date of his birth at the close of the seventh century B.C. (B.C. 608.) Nearly the same date results from the account of Emathenies (ap. Diog. Laërit. vii. 47), and this is the date adopted by Bentley among others. On the other hand, according to Aristoxenus (Porph. l. c. 9), Pythagoras quitted Samos in the reign of Polykrates, at the age of 40. According to Iamblichus he was 57 years of age in B.C. 513. This would give B.C. 570 as the date of his birth, and this date coincides better with other statements. All authorities agree that he flourished in the times of Polykrates and Tarquinius Superbus (B.C. 540—510). See Clinton, Fasti Helen., s. a. B.C. 559, 533, 531, 510). The war between Sybaris and Crotona might furnish some data bearing upon the point, if the connection of Pythagoras with it were matter of certainty.

It was natural that men should be eager to know, or ready to conjecture the sources whence Pythagoras derived the materials which were worked up into his remarkable system. And as, in such cases, in the absence of authentic information, the conjectures of one become the belief of another, the result is, that it would be difficult to find a philosopher to whom such a variety of teachers is assigned as to Pythagoras. Some make his training almost entirely Grecian, others exclusively Egyptian and Oriental. We find mentioned as his instructors Crepheilus (Iamb. Vit. Pyth. 9), Hermodamos (Porph. 2., Diog. Laërit. vii. 2), Bias (Iambi. c. 36), Thales (Iambi. 4), Anaximander (Iambi. Porph. 2.), and family of Syros (Aristoxenus and others in Diog. Laërit. i. 118, 119; Cic. de Div. i. 49). The Egyptians are said to have taught him geometry, the Phoenicians arithmetic, the Chaldeans astronomy, the Magians the formulae of religion and practical maxims for the conduct of life (Porph. l. c. 6). Of the statements regarding his Greek instructors, that about Pherecydes comes to us with the most respectable amount of attestation.

It was the current belief in antiquity, that Pythagoras had undertaken extensive travels, and had visited not only Egypt, but Arabia, Phoenicia,
Neither as to the kind and amount of knowledge which Pythagoras acquired, nor as to his definite philosophical views, have we so much trustworthy direct evidence. Every thing of the kind mentioned by Plato and Aristotle is attributed not only to Pythagoras, but to the Pythagoreans. We have, however, the testimony of Heraclitus (Diog. Laërt. viii. 6, ix. 1, comp. Herod. i. 29, ii. 49, iv. 93), that he was a man of extensive acquirements; and that of Xenophanes, who believed in the transmigration of souls. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 36, comp. Arist. de Anima, i. 3; Herod. ii. 123. Xenophanes mentions the story of his interceding on behalf of a dog that was being beaten, professing to recognise in its cries the voice of a departed friend, comp. Grote, l.c. vol. iv. p. 528, note.) Pythagoras is said to have pretended that he had been Euphorbus, the son of Phthius, in the Trojan war, as well as various other characters, a traderman, a courtezan, &c. (Porphy. de Fin. v. 27; Strabo, xiv. p. 638.) The passages in Herodotus, i. 81, 123, which have been thought to assert or imply the visit of Pythagoras to Egypt, do not, on a more accurate examination, appear to involve any such inference. (Krische, l. c. p. 5; Ritter, Gesch. der Pythagorischen Philosophie, p. 27.) According to one account, of no great authority, and mixed up with much that is absurd and incredible, Polycrates gave Pythagoras a letter of introduction to Amasis. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 3.) Still it is not easy to determine how far Pythagoras was indebted to the Egyptian priests, or, indeed, whether he learnt any thing at all from them. That he was initiated into their profoundest mysteries is in the highest degree improbable. Geometry in Egypt seems to have been chiefly of a practical kind, and the propositions which Pythagoras is said to have discovered are such as to show that the science of geometry was still in its infancy. There was nothing in the symbolical mode of representation which the Pythagoreans adopted, which bore the distinct traces of an Egyptian origin. The secret religious usages of the Pythagoreans exhibited nothing (so far as can be traced with any degree of probability) but what might have been adopted, quite in the spirit of the Greek religion, by those who knew nothing of Egyptian mysteries; and what was peculiar to Pythagoras in this respect admits of being referred with greater likelihood to the cultus of the Tyrrhenian Pelasgians, with whom Pythagoras is said to have been connected. (Ritter, Gesch. der Philos. vol. i. p. 363.) Even the doctrine of metempsychosis involves nothing which compels us to look to Egypt or the East for its origin. It is rather one of the most obvious sensualistic modes in which the continued existence of the soul could be conceived. Pythagoras might have derived it quite as easily from Pherecydes as from the Egyptians. Greater stress might be laid upon some external observances, such as the refraining from eating beans and fish, which it is supposed might have acquired a religious significance from the statements of these (Aristoxenus denied the fact of the interdiction of beans; see Gellius, N. A. iv. 11.) Nor, in any case, would initiation by the Egyptian priests be necessary to account for it. In short, no foreign influence can be traced, which in any way illustrates or accounts for either the philosophy or the institutions of Pythagoras. These exhibit only what might easily have been developed by a Greek mind exposed to the ordinary influences of the age. Even the ancient authorities point to a similar result in connecting the religious and ascetic peculiarities of Pythagoras with the Orphic or Cretan mysteries (Iamb. c. 23 5; Porphy. c. 17; Diog. Laërt. viii. 3.), or the Delphic oracle (Ariston. ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 8, 21; Porph. 41).
PYTHAGORAS.

with the Hyperborean Apollo. (Porph. l. c. 29; Iamb. l. c. 31, 140; Aelian, V. H. ii. 26; Diog. Laërt. viii. 36.) And without viewing him as an impostor, we may easily believe that he himself to some extent shared the same views. He is said to have pretended to divination and prophecy. (Cic. de Divini. i. 3, 46; Porph. l. c. 29.) "In his prominent vocation, analogous to that of Ephemerides, Orpheus, or Melampus, he appears as the revealer of a mode of life calculated to raise his disciples above the level of mankind, and to recommend them to the favour of the gods." (Grote, vol. iv. p. 529.)

No certainty can be arrived at as to the length of time spent by Pythagoras in Egypt or the East, or as to his residence and efforts in Samos or other Grecian cities, before his removal to Italy. Ritter is inclined to believe from the expressions of Herodotus that the secret cultus or orgies of Pythagoras had gained some footing in Greece or Ionia, even before Crotona became the focus of his influence (Gesch. der Phil., vol. i. p. 364, Gesch. der Pyth. Phil. p. 31). In the visits to various places in Greece—Delos, Sparta, Phlius, Crete, &c. which are ascribed to him, he appears commonly either in his religious or priestly character, or else as a lawgiver (Iamb. l. c. 25; Porph. l. c. 17; Diog. Laërt. viii. 3, 13; Cic. Tusc. Qu. v. 3). It is in the highest degree probable that the reason why Pythagoras removed to Crotonae is to be found in his having reached the age of his native country, while under the tyranny of Polykrates, for the realisation of his schemes. Later admirers were content to believe that, from the high estimation in which he was held by his fellow-citizens, he was so overburdened with public duties, as to have no time to bestow upon philosophy, and so withdrew from Samos (Iamb. 28; Porph. 9). The reason why he selected Crotonae as the sphere of his operations, it is impossible to ascertain from any existing evidence. All that is adduced on this head by K. O. Müller (Dorians, iii. 9, § 17, vol. ii. p. 189, &c.) is mere conjecture, and is of the most unsatisfactory kind. Grote (vol. iv. p. 538) supposes that the celebrity of Crotona for the cultivation of the art of medicine may possibly have had some influence with him. That on his arrival there he speedily attained extensive influence, and gained over great numbers to enter into his views, is all that can safely be affirmed in the midst of the marvellous stories told by later biographers of the effects of his eloquent discourses in leading the Crotoniates to abandon their luxurious and corrupting manner of life and devote themselves to that purer system which he came to introduce. (Porph. 18; Iamb. 37, &c.) His adherents were chiefly of the noble and wealthy classes. Three hundred of these were formed into a select brotherhood or club, bound by a sort of vow to Pythagoras and each other, for the purpose of cultivating the religious and ascetic observances enjoined by their master, and of studying his religious and philosophical theories. The statement that they threw all their property into a common stock has not sufficient evidence to support it, and was perhaps in the first instance only an inference from certain Pythagorean maxims and practices (coup. Cic. de Leg. i. 12, de Off. i. 7; Diog. Laërt. viii. 10; Krische, l. c. p. 27, &c.; Ritter, l. c. p. 39). Thence there were several women among the adherents of Pythagoras is pretty certain. That any were members of the club of 300 is not so probable. Krische (l. c. p. 45) considers that these female Pythagoreans were only the wives and relations of members of the fraternity, who were instructed in some of the Pythagorean doctrines. These would doubtless be mainly those connected with the religious part of his system. (Comp. Menage, Hist. de Mul. Philos.)

With respect to the internal arrangements and discipline of this fraternity, only a few leading features seem to rest upon a basis of such probability sufficient to warrant our bestowing any attention upon them. All accounts agree that what was done and taught among the members was kept a profound secret towards all without its pale. But we are also told that there were gradations among the members themselves. It was an old Pythagorean maxim, that every thing was not to be told to every body (Diog. Laërt. viii. 15; Arist. ap. Iamb. 31, εν τοις παν ἀπορρητοιοι. The division of classes is usually described as one into ἐσωτερικοι and ἐξωτερικοι, though these terms themselves are probably of later origin. Other names given to corresponding divisions are, Πυθαγορειοι and Πυθαγορισται (Iamb. 60). Other accounts, again, speak of a division into three classes, Πυθαγορικοι, Πυθαγορειοι, and Πυθαγορισται, according to the degree of intimacy which they enjoyed with Pythagoras; the first class being those who held the closest communion with him; or into εξωτερικοι, ἐσωτερικοι, and μητραπατικοι, according to the subject of their studies mainly related to religion, to politics, or to mathematical and physical science (Phot. Cod. 249). Other authorities speak of οἰκουματικοι and μαθηματικοι (Iamb. l. c.), or Acustici, Mathematici, and Physici (Gell. N. A. i. 9). Most of these divisions, however, presuppose a more marked separation between the different branches of human knowledge, or between philosophical training and political activity, than existed at that time. In the admission of candidates Pythagoras is said to have placed great reliance on his physiognomical discernment (Gell. l. c.). If admitted, they had to pass through a period of probation, in which their powers of maintaining silence (ἐκευθύνεια) were especially tested, as well as their general temper, disposition, and mental capacity (Ariston. ap. Iamb. 94). That they had to maintain silence for five years, and during the whole of that period were never allowed to behold the face of Pythagoras, while they were from time to time exposed to various severe ordeals (Iamb. 68), are doubtless the exaggerations of a later age. There is more probability in the statement (Taurus, ap. Gell. l. c.) that the period of noviciate varied according to the aptitude which the candidates manifested for the Pythagorean discipline. As regards the nature of the esoteric instruction to which only the most approved members of the fraternity were admitted, some (e. g. Meiners, Gesch. der Wissenschaften) have supposed that it had reference to the political views of Pythagoras. Ritter (l. c. p. 47, &c.), with greater probability, holds that it had reference mainly to the oryges, or secret religious doctrines and usages, which undoubtedly formed a prominent feature in the Pythagorean system, and were peculiarly connected with the worship of Apollo (Aelian, V. H. ii. 26; Diog. Laërt. viii. 13; Iamb. 91, 141; comp. Krische, l. c. p. 37; Brundia, l. c. p. 432; Müller, Dorians, iii. 9, § 17). The admission of women to a knowledge of these (if indeed they were members of the club) is far more intelligible than their initiation into political secrets. And the ayōrīs ϕασ of the master connects itself most easily with the priestly character of Pythagorans, and the belief which his disciples, and probably he himself also, entertained, that he enjoyed a closer and more direct intercourse with the gods than other men. It is possible enough, however, that some of the more recondite speculations of the philosopher were connected with these religious views, while the ordinary scientific studies—mathematics, music, astronomy, &c.—were open to all the disciples. That there were some outward peculiarities of an ascetic kind (many of which had, perhaps, a symbolical meaning) in the mode of life to which the members of the brotherhood were subjected, seems pretty certain (comp. Porph. 32; Iamb. 56, &c.). Some represent him as forbidding all animal food (as Empedocles did afterwards, Arist. Rhet. i. 14. § 2; Sext. Emp. ix. 197. This was also one of the Orphic precepts, Aristoph. Ran. 1032). This, if to any extent the case, may have had reference to the doctrine of metempsychosis (comp. Plut. de Esu Cara. pp. 993, 996, 997). It is, however, pointed out by Grote (vol. iv. p. 533), that all the members cannot have been subjected to this prohibition; Milo, for instance, could not possibly have dispensed with animal food. The best authorities contradict the statement. According to Ariston (ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 20) he allowed the use of all kinds of animal food except the flesh of oxen used for ploughing, and rams (comp. Porph. 7; Iamb. 85, 100). There is a similar discrepancy as to the prohibition of fish and beans (Diog. Laërt. viii. 19, 34; Gell. iv. 11; Porph. 34, de Abst. i. 26; Iamb. 98). But temperance of all kinds seems to have been strictly enjoined. It is also stated that they had common meals, resembling the Spartan syssitia, at which they met in companies of ten (Iamb. 98; Strabo, vi. p. 263). Considerable importance seems to have been attached to music and gymnastics in the daily exercises of the disciples. Their whole discipline is represented as tending to produce a lively sobriety and self-possession, regarding the exhibition of which various anecdotes were current in antiquity (Athen. xiv. p. 623; Aelian, V. H. xiv. 18; Iamb. 197; comp. Krische, l. c. p. 42). Iamblichus (96—101, apparently on the authority of Aristoxenus) gives a long description of the daily routine of the members, which suggests many points of comparison with the ordinary life of Spartan citizens. It is not unlikely that many of the regulations of Pythagorans were suggested by what he saw in Crete and Sparta. Among the best uncertain features of the members to each other, and their sovereign contempt for those who did not belong to their ranks (Ariston. ap. Iambl. 94, 101, &c., 229, &c.; comp. the story of Damon and Phintias; Porph. 60; Iamb. 233, &c.). It appears that they had some secret conventional symbols, by which members of the fraternity could recognise each other, even if they had never met before (Scho1. ad Arist. Nub. 611; Iamb. 237, 239; Krische, pp. 43, 44). Clubs similar to that at Crotona were established at Sybaris, Metapontum, Tarentum, and other cities of Magna Graecia.

The institutions of Pythagorans were certainly not intended to withdraw those who adopted them from active exertion and social and political connecions, that they might devote themselves exclusively to religious and philosophical contemplations. Rather he aimed at the production of a calm bearing and elevated tone of character, through which those trained in the discipline of the Pythagorean life should exhibit in their personal and social capacities a reflection of the order and harmony of the universe. But the question whether he had any distinct political designs in the foundation of his brotherhood, has been variously answered. It was perfectly natural, even without any express design on his part, that a club such as the Three Hundred of Crotona should gradually come to mingle political with other objects, and by the facilities afforded by their secret and compact organisation should speedily gain extensive political influence, which, moreover, the political condition of Crotona, where the aristocracy was with difficulty holding its ground, rendered more than usually easy. That this influence should be decisively on the side of aristocracy or oligarchy, resulted naturally both from the nature of the Pythagorean institutions, and from the rank and social position of the members of the brotherhood. Through them, of course, Pythagorians himself exercised a large amount of indirect influence over the affairs both of Crotona and of other Italian cities. It does not appear however that he ever held any official rank, though we are told that the senate urged him to accept the office of Prytanis. But we have no evidence that the objects of Pythagorians were (as Kriische, Müller, and others believe) from the first predominantly political, or even that he had any definite political designs at all in the formation of his club. That he intended to exhibit in Crotona the model of a pure Dorian aristocracy (Müller, Dori. hist. ii. 9. § 18), is a mere fancy (comp. Grote, vol. iv. p. 545, note). It is true that the club was in practice at once "a philosophical school, a religious brotherhood, and a political association" (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 148), but there is nothing to show that "all these characters appear to have been inseparably united in the founder's mind." Mr. Grote, more in accordance with the earliest and best authority on the subject (Plato, de Rep. x. p. 600, comp. de Leg. vi. p. 782, who contrasts Pythagorians, as the institution of a peculiar mode of private life, with those who exercised a direct influence upon public life), remarks, "We cannot construe the scheme of Pythagorions as going farther than the formation of a private, select order of brethren, embracing his religious fancies, ethical tone, and germs of scientific idea, and manifesting adhesion by those observances which Hierodotus and Plato call the Pythagorean orgies and the brotherhood of friendship, and his power, as political power because he was skilful or fortunate enough to enlist a sufficient number of wealthy Crotoniates, possessing individual influence, which they strengthened immensely by thus regimenting themselves in intimate union" (Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 544). The notion of Müller and Niebuhr, that the 300 Pythagoreans constituted a kind of smaller senate at Crotona, is totally without foundation. On the other hand, it seems quite as unfounded to infer from the account that Pythagorians was the first to apply to himself the epithet φιλοσοφός (Cic. Tusc. v. 3; Diog. Laërt. i. 12), that philosophical contemplation was the sole end that he had in view. Respecting the Pythagorean life, and its analogy

PYTHAGORAS.

For a considerable time after the breaking up of the clubs at Crotona and elsewhere great obscurity hangs over the history of the Pythagoreans. No reliance can be placed on the lists of them which later writers have given, as they have been amplified, partly through mere invention, partly through a confusion between Pythagoreans and Italian philosophers generally. The writings, or fragments of writings, which have come down to us under the names of Archytas, Timaeus, Ocelius, Brontinus, &c., have been shown to be spurious.

Pythagorism seems to have established itself by degrees more and more in different parts of Greece. About the time of Socrates, and a little later, we get some trustworthy notices of Philolaus, Lysis, Cleinias, Eurytus, and Archytas. These men, and others who applied themselves to the development of the Pythagorean philosophy, were widely different from the so-called Pythagoreans of a later age (from the time of Cicero onwards), who were characterised by little except an exaggeration of the religious and ascetic fanaticism of the Pythagorean system [APOLLONIUS OF TYANA]. This Neo-Pythagoreanism was discouraged in the kindred mysticism of the Neo-Platonists.

When we come to inquire what were the philosophical or religious opinions held by Pythagoras himself, we are met at the outset by the difficulty that even the authors from whom we have to draw possessed no authentic records bearing upon the subject of the age of Pythagoras himself. If Pythagoras ever wrote any thing, his writings perished with him, or not long after. The probability is that he wrote nothing. (Comp. Plat. de Alc. fort. p. 329; Porph. l. c. 57; Galen, de Hipp. et Plat. Plac. v. 6.) The statements to the contrary prove worthless on examination. Every thing current under his name in antiquity was spurious. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 779—803; Ritter, Gesch. der Pyth. Phil. p. 56.)

It is all but certain that Philolaus was the first who published the Pythagorean doctrines, at any rate in a written form. Plutarch, who lived so near the time when they were so marked a peculiarity running through the Pythagorean philosophy, by whomsoever of its adherents it was developed, and so much of uniformity can be traced at the basis even of the diversities which present themselves here and there in the views expressed by different Pythagoreans, as they have come down to us from authentic sources, that there can be little question as to the gerns of the system at any rate having been derived from Pythagoras himself. (Brandis, l. c. p. 442.) The Pythagoreans seem to have striven in the main to keep their doctrine uncorrupted. We even hear of members being expelled from the brotherhood for philosophical or other heterodoxy; and a distinction was already drawn in antiquity between genuine and spurious Pythagorism (Iamb. 81; Viliol. Anecd. ii. p. 316; Syrian. in Arist. Met. xii. fol. 71, b., 85, b.; Simplex. in Arist. Phys. fol. 104, b., Stob. Ecl. Phys. pp. 503, 445, 496). Aristotle manifestly regarded the Pythagorean philosophy as something which in its leading features characterised the school generally. He found it, however, after it had passed through a considerable period of development, in the hands of adherents of varying tendencies. It was to be expected therefore that varieties should make their appearance (comp. Arist. de Caelo, iii. 1, at the end, with Met. i. 6.

Nearly every thing that can be in any degree de-
 PYTHAGORAS.

Pythagoras resembled greatly the philosophers of what is termed the Ionic school, who undertook to solve by means of a single primordial principle the vague problem of the origin and constitution of the universe as a whole. But, like Anaximander, he abandoned the physical hypotheses of Thales and passed from the province of physics to that of metaphysics, and his predilection for mathematical studies led him to trace the origin of all things to numbers, this theory being suggested, or at all events confirmed, by the observation of various numerical relations, or analogies to them, in the phenomena of the universe.

"Since all things numbers are by nature the first, in numbers they (the Pythagoreans) thought they perceived many analogies to things that exist and are produced, more than in fire, and earth, and water; so that a certain affection of numbers was justice; a certain other affection, soul and intellect; another, opportunity; and of the rest, so to say, each in like manner; and moreover, seeing the affections and ratios of what pertains to harmony to consist in numbers, since other things seemed in their entire nature to be formed in the likeness of numbers, and in all nature numbers are the first, they supposed the elements of numbers to be the elements of all things" (Arist. Met. i. 5, comp. especially Met. xiii. 3). Brandis, who traces in the notices that remain more than one system, developed by different Pythagoreans, according as they recognised in numbers the inherent basis of things, or only the patterns of them, considers that all started from the common conviction that it was in numbers and their relations that they were to find the absolutely certain principles of knowledge (comp. Philolaus, ap. Stob. Ecl. Phys. i. p. 458; Böckh, Philolaos, p. 62; Stob. l. c. i. p. 10; Böckh, l. c. p. 143, φεβος οδηγός καὶ αριθμός εὐτευχής = δὲ ἦλθαν οἰκεῖοι καὶ σύμφωνοι ταῦτα ἅγια γενεῖς), and of the objects of it, and accordingly regarded the principles of numbers as the absolute principles of things; keeping true to the common maxim of the ancient philosophers, that like takes cognisance of like (καθάπεπλεξεν καὶ ὁ Φιλό-

 "PYTHAGORAS.

Med. i. 5), the even and the odd, and a third, resulting from the mixture of the two, the even-odd (ἀριστερότατον, Philol. l. c.). This third species is one itself, for it is both even and odd (Arist. l. c. Another explanation of the ἀριστερότατον, which accords better with other notices, is that it was an even number composed of two uneven numbers. Brandis, l. c. p. 455, 456, &c.). One, or unity, is the essence of number, or absolute number, and so comprises these two opposite species. As absolute number it is the origin of all numbers, and so of all things. (Arist. Met. xiii. 4. ἐν ἀριθμοῖς πάντων; Philol. ap. Böckh, § 19. According to Aristotle, the other number, or a second series of numbers, was regarded as the origin of physical sciences. (Arist. Met. i. 6. p. 1080, b. 7. number is produced ἐκ τοίων ἐν παραβαλλόμενον καὶ ἄλλω τινα). This original unity they also termed God (Ritter, Gesell. der Philol. vol. i. p. 389). These propositions, however, would, taken alone, give but a very partial idea of the Pythagorean system. A most important part is played in it by the ideas of limit, and the unlimited. They are, in fact, the fundamental ideas of the whole. One of the first declarations in the work of Philolaus [PHILOLAUS] was, that all things in the universe result from a combination of the unlimited and the limiting (φύσις δὲ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἀριθμὸν ἐξ ἀπερίοτου τῆς καὶ περαιτέρων, καὶ δόλος κόσμος καὶ τὰ ἐν ἀπερίοτῃ πάσα. Diog. Laërt. viii. 83; Böckh, p. 453; for if all things had been unlimited, nothing could have been the object of cognizance (Phil. l. c.; Böckh, p. 49). From the unlimited were deduced immediately time, space, and motion (Stob. Æcl. Phys. p. 359; Simpl. in Arist. Phys. i. 96, b.; Brandis, l. c. p. 451). Then again, in some extraordinary manner they connected the ideas of odd and even with the contracted notions of the limited and the unlimited, the odd being limited, the even unlimited (Arist. Met. i. 5, p. 986, a. 18, Bekker, comp. Phys. Aeus. iii. 4, p. 203. 10, Bekker). They called the even unlimited, because in itself it is divisible into equal halves ad infinitum, and is only limited by the odd, which, when added to the even, prevents the division (Simpl. ad Arist. Phys. Aeus. iii. 4, f. 105; Brandis, p. 450, note). Limit, or the limiting elements, they considered as more akin to the primary unity (Syrian. in Arist. Met. xiii. i). In place of the plural expression of Philolaus (τὰ περαιτέρων Aristotele sometimes uses the singular πέρα, which, in like manner, he connects with the unlimited (τὸ ἀπερίοτων. Met. i. 8, p. 930, l. 18, xiii. 3. p. 1091, l. 16, ed. Bekker). But musical principles played almost as important a part in the Pythagorean system as mathematical or numerical ideas. The opposite principia of the unlimited and the limiting are, as Philolaus expresses it (Stob. l. c. p. 458; Böckh, l. c. 62), " neither alike, nor of the same race, and so it would have been impossible for them to unite, had not harmony stepped in." This harmony, again, was, in the conception of Philolaus, neither more nor less than the octave (Brandis, l. c. p. 456). On the investigation of the various harmonical relations of the octave, and their connection with weight, as the measure of tension, Philolaus bestowed considerable attention, and some important fragments of his on the subject have been preserved, which Böckh has carefully edited (Stob. l. c. 65—89, comp. Brandis, l. c. p. 457, &c.). We find running through the entire Pythagorean system the idea that order, or harmony of relation, is the regulating principle of the whole universe. Some of the Pythagoreans (but by no means all, as it appears) drew out a list of ten pairs of opposites, which they termed the elements of the universe. (Arist. Met. i. 5. Elsewhere he speaks as if the Pythagoreans generally did the same, Eth. Nic. i. 4, ii. 5.) These pairs were —

Limit and the Unlimited.
Odd and Even.
One and Multitude.
Right and Left.
Male and Female.
Stationary and Moved.
Straight and Curved.
Light and Darkness.
Good and Bad.
Square and Oblong.

The first column was that of the good elements (Arist. Eth. Nic. i. 4); the second, the row of the bad. Those in the second series were also regarded as having the character of negation (Arist. Phys. iii. 2). These, however, are hardly to be looked upon as ten pairs of distinct principles. They are rather various modes of conceiving one and the same opposition. One, Limit and the Odd, are spoken of as though they were synonymous (comp. Arist. Met. i. 5, 7, xiii. 4, Phys. iii. 5).

To explain the production of material objects out of the union of the unlimited and the limiting, Ritter (Gesch. der Pyth. Phil. and Gesch. der Phil. vol. i. p. 403, &c.) has propounded a theory which has great plausibility, and is undoubtably much the same as the view held by later Pythagorizing mathematicians; namely, that the ἀρχήν is neither more nor less than void space, and the παραλλοκάρτα points in space which bound or define it (which points he affirms the Pythagoreans called monads or units, appealing to Arist. de Caelo, iii. 1; comp. Alexander Aphrod. quoted below), the point being the ἄξον or principle of the line, the line of the surface, the surface of the solid. Points, or monads, therefore are the source of material existence; and as points are monads, and monads numbers, it follows that numbers are at the base of material existence. (This is the view of the matter set forth by Alexander Aphrodisiensis in Arist. de prim. Phil. i. fol. 10, b.; Ritter, l.c. p. 404, note 3.) Ephantus of Syracuse was the first who made the Pythagorean monads to be corporeal, and set down indivisible particles and void space as the principle of material existence. (See Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 308.) Two geometrical points in themselves would have no magnitude; it is only when they are combined with the intervening space that a line can be produced. The union of space and lines makes surfaces; the union of surfaces and space makes solids. Of course this does not explain very well how corporeal substance is formed, and Ritter thinks that the Pythagoreans perceived that this was the weak point of their system, and so spoke of the ἀρχήν, as mere void space, as little as they could help, and strove to represent it as something positive, or almost substantial.

But however plausible this view of the matter may be, we cannot understand how any one who compares the very numerous passages in which Aristotle speaks of the Pythagoreans, can suppose that his notices have reference to any such system. The theory which Ritter sets down as that of the Pythagoreans is one which Aristotle mentions several times, and shows to be inadequate to account for the physical existence of the world, but he nowhere speaks of it as the doctrine of the Pythagoreans. Some of the passages, where Ritter tries to make this out to be the case, go to prove the very reverse. For instance, in De Caelo, iii. 1, after an elaborate discourse of the theory in question, Aristotle concludes by remarking that the number-theory of the Pythagoreans will no more account for the production of corporeal magnitude, than the point-line-and-space-theory which he has just described, for no addition of units can produce either body or weight (comp. Met. xiii. 3). Aristotle nowhere identifies the Pythagorean monads with mathematical points; on the contrary, he affirms that in the Pythagorean system, the monads, in some way or other which they could not explain, get magnitude and extension (Met. xii. 6, p. 1080, ed. Bekker). The κενὸν again, which Aristotle mentions as recognised by the Pythagoreans, is never spoken of as synonymous with their ἀρχήν; on the contrary we find (Stob. Ecl. Phys. i. p. 380) that from the ἀρχήν they deduced time, breath, and void space. The frequent use of the term τέχνη, too, by Aristotle, instead of παραλλοκάρτα, hardly comports with Ritter's theory. There can be little doubt that the Pythagorean system should be viewed in connection with that of Anaximander, with whose doctrines Pythagoras was doubtless conversant. Anaximander, in his attempt to solve the problem of the universe, passed from the region of physics to that of metaphysics. He supposed a "primaevale principle without any its determining qualities whatever; but including all qualities potentially, and manifesting them in an infinite variety from its continually self-changing nature; a principle which was nothing in itself, yet had the capacity of producing any and all manifestations, however contrary to each other—a primaevale something, whose essence it was to be eternally productive of different phenomenon" (Grote, l.c. p. 518; comp. Brandis, l.c. p. 123, &c.). This he termed the ἀρχήν; and he was also the first to introduce the term ἄξον (Simplic. in Arist. Phys. fol. 6, 32). Both these terms hold a prominent position in the Pythagorean system, and we think there can be but little doubt as to their parentage. The Pythagorean ἀρχήν seems to have been very nearly the same as that of Anaximander, an undefined and infinite something. Only instead of investing it with the property of spontaneously developing itself in the various forms of actual material existence, they regarded all its definite manifestations as the diminution of its indefiniteness by the definiteness of number, which thus became the cause of all actual and positive existence (τοῦ ἄξονος αἰτίας ἐνα τοῦ ἐλάτου τῆς ὀρθίας, Arist. Met. i. 6). It is by numbers alone, in their view, that the objective becomes cogniscible to the subject; by numbers that extension is originated, and attains to that definiteness by which it becomes a concrete body. As the ground of all quantitative and qualitative definiteness in existing things, therefore, number is represented as their inherent element, or even as the matter (ἐλάτο), as well as the passive and active condition of things (Arist. Met. i. 5). But both the παραλλοκάρτα and the ἀρχήν are referred to a higher unity, the absolute or divine unity. And in this aspect of the matter Aristotle speaks of unity as the principium and essence and element of all things (Met. xii. 6, i. 6, p. 987, b. 22); the divine unity being the first principle and cause, and one, as the first of the limiting numbers and the element of all, being the basis of positive existence, and when itself becomes possessed of extension (Met. xii. 3, p. 1091, a. 15) the element of all that possesses extension (comp. Brandis, l. c. p. 511, &c.). In its development, however, the Pythagorean system seems to have taken a twofold direction, one school of Pythagoreans regarding numbers as the inherent, fundamental elements of things (Arist. de Caelo, iii. 1); another section, of which Hippasus seems to have been the head, regarding numbers as the patterns merely, but not as entering into the essence of things (Arist. Met. i. 6. Though Aristotle speaks of the Pythagoreans generally here, there can be no doubt that the assertion, in which the Greek commentators found a difficulty, should be restricted to a section of the Pythagoreans. Comp. Iamb. in Nicom. Arithm. p. 11; Syrian. in Arist. Met. xii. 1089, b. 18; Simplic. in Phys. f. 104, b.; Iamb. Pyth. 81; Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 302; Brandis, l. c. p. 444.

As in the octave and its different harmonical relations, the Pythagoreans found the ground of connection between the opposed primary elements, and the mutual relations of existing things, as well in the properties of particular numbers, and their relation to the principia, did they attempt to find the explanation of the particular properties of different things, and therefore addressed themselves to the investigation of the properties of numbers, dividing them into various species. Thus they had three kinds of even, according as the number was a power of two (δυνας δυτων), or a multiple of two, or of some power of two, not itself a power of two (περισσωτων), or the sum of an odd and an even number (δετοςετων— a word which seems to have been used in more than one sense. Nicom. Arithm. i. 7, 6). In like manner they had three kinds of odd. It was probably the use of the decimal system of notation which led to the number ten being supposed to be possessed of extraordinary powers. 'One must contemplate the works and essential nature of number according to the power which is in the number ten, for it is great, and perfect, and all-working, and the first principle (ἀρχα) and guide of divine and heavenly and human life.' (Philoalus ap. Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 8; Boëckh, p. 130.) This, doubtless, had to do with the formation of the list of ten pairs of opposite principles, which was drawn out by some Pythagoreans (Arist. Met. i. 5). In like manner the tetractys (possibly the sum of the first four numbers, or 10) was described as containing the source and root of ever-flowing nature (Carm. Aur. l. 48). The number three was spoken of as defining or limiting the universe and all things, having end, middle, and beginning, and so being the number of the whole (Arist. de Caelo, i. 1). This part of their system they seem to have helped out by considerations as to the connection of numbers with lines, surfaces, and solids, especially the regular geometrical figures (Theol. Arithm. 10, p. 61, &c.), and to have connected the relations of things with various geometrical relations, among which angles played an important part. Thus, according to Philolaus, the angle of a triangle was conse-
PYTHAGORAS.

The intervals between the heavenly bodies were supposed to be determined according to the laws and relations of musical harmony (Nicom. Harm. i. p. 6, ii. 33; Plin. H. N. ii. 20; Simp. in Arist. de Caelo Schol. p. 496, b. 9, 497,11). Hence arose the celebrated doctrine of the harmony of the spheres; for the heavenly bodies in their motion could not but occasion a certain sound or note, depending on their distances and velocities; and as these were determined by the laws of harmonic intervals, the notes altogether formed a regular musical scale or harmony. This harmony, however, we do not hear, 'ther because we have been accustomed to it from the first, and have never had an opportunity of contrasting it with stillness, or because the sound is so powerful as to exceed our capacities for hearing (Arist. de Caelo, ii. 9; Porph. in Harm, Plot. 4. p. 257). With all this fanciful hypothesis, however, they do not seem to have neglected the observation of astronomical phenomena (Brandis, l. c. p. 481).

Perfection they seemed to have considered to exist in direct ratio to the distance from the central fire. Thus the moon was supposed to be inhabited by more perfect and beautiful beings than the earth (Plut. de Plac. Phil. ii. 30; Stob. l. c. i. p. 562; Böckh, l. c. p. 131). Similarly imperfect virtue belongs to the region of the earth, perfect wisdom to the heaven (ὦρσας; the bond or symbol of connection again being certain numerical relations (comp. Arist. Met. i. 8; Alex. Aphrod. in Arist. Met. i. 7, fol. 14, a.). The light and heat of the central fire are received by us mediatly through the sun (which, according to Philolaus, is of a glassy nature, acting as a kind of lens, or sieve, as he terms it, Böckh, l. c. p. 124; Stob. L. c. i. 20; Euseb. Praep. Evang. xx. 23), and the other heavenly bodies. All things partake of the life, of which Philolaus distinguished four grades, united in man and connected with successive parts of the body,—the life of the seeds only, the vegetable life, the animal life, and intellectual or reason (Theol. Arithm. 4. p. 22; Böckh, p. 159.) It was only in reference to the principia, and not absolutely in point of time, that the universe is a production; the development of its existence, which was perhaps regarded as an uninterrupting process, commencing from the centre (Phil. ap. Stob. L. c. p. 360; Böckh, p. 90, &c.; Brandis, p. 463); for the universe is *imperishable and unwearyed; it subsists for ever; from eternity did it exist and to eternity does it last, one, controlled by one akin to it, the mightiest and the highest." (Phil. ap. Stob. Ed. Philol. p. 418, &c.; Böckh, p. 468; Deit. Philol. l. c. 148, where also speaks of as eternal, abiding, unmove', like himself (Böckh, p. 151). He is described as having established both limit and the infinite, and was'often spoken of as the absolute unity; always represented as pervading, though distinct from, and presiding over the universe; not therefore a mere germ of vital development, or a principium of which the universe was itself a manifestation or development; sometimes termed the absolute good (Arist. Met. xiii. 4, p. 1091, b. 13, Bekker), while, according to others, good could be long only to concrete existences (Met. xi. 7, p. 1073, b. 51). The origin of evil was to be looked for not in the deity, but in matter, which prevented the deity from conducting every thing to the best end (Theophr. Met. 9. p. 322, 14). With the popular superstition they do not seem to have interfered, except in so far as they may have reduced the objects of it, as well as all other existing beings, to numerical elements. (Plut. de Is. et Os. 10; Arist. Met. xiii. 5.) It is not clear whether the all-pervading soul of the universe, which they spoke of, was regarded as identical with the Deity or not (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 11). It was perhaps nothing more than the ever-working energy of the Deity (Stob. p. 422; Brandis, p. 467, note n). It was from it that human souls were derived (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 11, de Sen. 21). The soul was also frequently described as a number or harmony (Plut. de Plac. iv. 2; Stob. Ed. Phil. p. 802; Arist. de An. i. 2, 4); hardly, however, in the same sense as that unfolded by Simmias, who had heard Philolaus, in the Phaedo of Plato (p. 85, &c.), with which the doctrine of metempsychosis would have been totally inconsistent. Some held the curious idea, that the particles floating as motes in the sunbeams were souls (Arist. de An. i. 2). In so far as the soul was a principle of life, it was supposed to partake of the nature of the central fire (Diog. Laërt. viii. 27, &c.). There is, however, some want of uniformity in separating or identifying the soul and the principle of life, as also in the division of the faculties of the soul itself. Philolaus distinguished soul (ψυχα) from spirit or reason (νοὸς, Theol. Arith. p. 22); Böckh, p. 149; Diog. Laërt. viii. 30, where ψυχα is the term applied to that which distinguishes men from animals, νοὸς and ψυχα residing in the latter likewise). The division of the soul into two elements, a rational and an irrational one (Cic. Tusc. iv. 3), comes to much the same point. Even animals, however, have a share of reason, only the defective organisation of their body, and their want of language, prevents its development (Plut. de Plac. v. 20). The Pythagoreans connected the five senses with their five elements (Theol. Arith. p. 27; Stob. l. c. p. 1104). In the senses the soul found the necessary instruments for its activity; though the certainty of knowledge was derived exclusively from number and its relations. (Stob. p. 8; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 92.)

The ethics of the Pythagoreans consisted more in ascetic practice, and maxims for the restraint of the passions, especially of anger, and the cultivation of the power of endurance, than in scientific theory. What of the latter they had was, as might be expected, intimately connected with their number-theory (Arist. Eth. Magn. i. 1, Eth. Nic. i. 4, ii. 5). The contemplation of what belonged to the pure and elevated region termed ἀνωτάτα, was soon discovered by the Pythagoreans, especially the latter having to do only with the inferior, sublunary region (Philo. ap. Stob. Ed. Philol. pp. 490, 488). Happiness consisted in the science of the perfection of the virtues of the soul, or in the perfect science of numbers (Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 417; Theodoret. Serm. xii. p. 165). Likeness to the Deity was to be the object of all our endeavours (Stob. Ed. Eth. p. 64), man becoming better as he approaches the gods, who are the guardians and guides of men (Plut. de Def. Or. p. 413; Plut. Phaed. p. 62, with Heindorf's note), exercising a direct influence upon them, guiding the mind or reason, as well as influencing external circumstances (γενέσθαι γὰρ ἐπιπνοοῦν τινα παρὰ τοῦ διαμνίου, PYTHAGORAS.

Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 206 ; ὡς τα καὶ διάνιστα τινὲς καὶ τάδε ὑπὸ ὧν ὁ θεὸς ἤτοι ἐκάθε. Arist. Eth. End. ii. 8 ; man's soul being a possession of the gods, confirmed at present, by way of chiasmus, in the body, as a species of prison, from which he has no right to free himself by suicide (Plut. Phaedr. p. 61 ; Cic. de Sen. 20). With the idea of divine influence was closely connected that of the influence of daemons and heroes (Diog. Laërt. viii. 32). Great importance was attached to the influence of music in controlling the force of the passions (Plut. de Is. et Os. p. 384 ; Porph. Vit. Pyth. 30 ; Iamb. 64). Self-examination was strongly insisted on (Cic. de Sen. 11). Virtue was regarded as a kind of harmony or health of the soul (Diog. Laërt. viii. 33). Precepts for the practice of virtue were expressed in various obscure, symbolical forms, many of which, though with the admixture of much that is of later origin, have come down to us in the so-called Ἠττη χρυσᾶ and elsewhere (Brandis, l. c. p. 493, note 9). The transmission of souls was viewed apparently in the light of a process of purification. Souls under the dominion of sensuality either passed into the bodies of animals, or, if incurable, were thrust down into Tartarus, to meet with expiation, or condign punishment. The pure were exalted to higher modes of life, and at last attained to incorporeal existence (Arist. de An. i. 2, 3 ; Herod. ii. 123 ; Diog. Laërt. viii. 31 ; Loebck. Aglaoph. p. 893. What we find in Plato, Phaedr. p. 246, b, and in Pindar, Thren. fr. 4, Olymp. ii. 68, is probably in the main Pythagorean). As regards the fruits of this system of training or belief, it is interesting to remark, that wherever we have notices of distinguished Pythagoreans, we usually hear of them as men of great uprightness, conscientiousness, and self-restraint, and as capable of devoted and enduring friendship. TAS ; CLINIAS ; DAMON ; PRINTIAS.]

For some account of the very extensive literature connected with Pythagoras, &c., the reader is referred to Fabrice, Éd. Græc. vol. 1, pp. 750—804. The best of the modern authorities have been already repeatedly referred to.

Besides a Samian pupil of the name of Pythagoras, who gained a victory in Ol. 48, and who has been frequently identified with the philosopher Fabricius (l. c. p. 776, &c.) enumerates about twenty more individuals of the same name, who are, however, not worth inserting. [C. P. M.]

PYTHAGORAΣ (Πυθαγόρας), artists. 1. Of Rhegium, one of the most celebrated statuaries of Greece. Pausanias, who calls him "excellent in the plastic art, if any other was so," gives the following as his artistic genealogy (vi. 4. § 2. s. 4)—

Syradas and Charitas of Sparta.

| Eucheirus of Corinth.

| Clearchus of Rhegium.

Pythagoras of Rhegium. His precise date is difficult to fix. In Pliny's list he is placed at Ol. 87 (n. c. 432) with Aegeladas, Callon, Polycleitus, Myron, Seopas, and others. (H.N.xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) How little dependence is to be placed on Pliny's chronological groups of artists, we have had occasion more than once to notice, and the very names now mentioned furnish a sufficient proof. It is indeed possible, as Sillig proposes, to apply the statement of Pliny to Pythagoras of Samos; but, as Pliny does not say which of the two artists he refers to, it is natural to suppose that he means the more distinguished one. We are inclined to believe that Pliny's reason for placing Pythagoras at this date was the circumstance which Silvius has mentioned (l. c. § 4), that Pythagoras was in part contemporary with Myron, whose true date was Ol. 87. The genealogy quoted above from Pausanias affords us no assistance, as the dates of the other artists in it depend on that of Pythagoras.

Most of the modern writers on ancient art attempt to determine the date of Pythagoras by his statues of Olympic victors. This test is, however, not a certain one; for there are several instances of such statues not having been made until a considerable time after the victory. Still, at a period when art was flourishing, and when the making of these statues formed one of its most important branches, the presumption is that an Olympic victor would not be allowed to remain long without the honour of a statue; and therefore the date of the victory may be taken as a guide to that of the artist, where there is no decisive evidence to the contrary. Now, in the case of Pythagoras, one of his most celebrated works was the statue of the Olympic victor Astylus of Croton, who conquered in the single and double foot-race in three successive Olympiads, and on the last two of these occasions he caused himself to be proclaimed as a Symcusan, in order to gratify Hiero. (Paus. vi. 13. § 1.) Now, supposing (as is natural) that this was during the time that Hiero was king (n. c. 478—467, Ol. 75. 3—78. 2), the last victory of Astylus must have been either in Ol. 77, or Ol. 78; or, even if we admit that Hiero was not yet king, and place the last victory of Astylus in Ol. 75 (Müller, Dorier, Chron. tab.), the earliest date at which we should be compelled to place Pythagoras would be about n. c. 460, and, comparing this with Pliny's date, we should have n. c. 460—430 as the time during which he flourished. This result agrees very well with the indications furnished by his other statues of Olympic victors, by his contest with Myron, and by the statements respecting the character of his art.

According to Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 47), Pythagoras was the first who paid special attention to order and proportion in his art; and Pliny states that he was the first who expressed with care and accuracy the muscles and veins and hair (Plin. l. c. § 4). Hence it would seem that he was the chief representative of that school of improved development in statuary, which preceded the schools of perfect art which were established at Athens and at Argos respectively by Phidias and Polycleitus; and that, while Ageladas was preparing the way for this perfection of art in Greece Proper, another school was growing up in Magna Graecia, which ultimately identified itself with the highest forms in Pythagoras; who, in his statues of athletes, practised those very principles of art, as applied to the human figure, which Polycleitus brought to perfection; and who lived long enough to gain a victory over one of the most celebrated masters of the new Attic school, namely Myron.

The most important works of Pythagoras, as has just been intimated, appear to have been his statues of athletes. Unfortunately, the passage in PYTHANGELUS.

which Pliny describes his works is extremely corrupt, but it can be pretty well corrected by the help of Pausanias. (Respecting the correction of the text, see Sillig, Cat. Art. s. v., and edition of Pliny, with Janus's supplement; and Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 216, 217). Besides the statue of Aristylus already mentioned, and the pantocratist
Delphi by which he gained his victory over Myron, he also made the statues of Leoniscus of Messenia, an Olympic victor in wrestling (Paus. vi.
4. § 2), of Protolus of Mantinea (vi. 6. § 1), of Euthymus, a very beautiful work of art (ib. § 2.
6), of Dromens of Stymphalus (vi. 7. § 3. s. 10), of Musaeas of Cyrene, who was known by the surname of Libys, was very prosperous (Pliny, was represented in a chariot, with a Victory by his side (vi. 13. § 4. s. 7, 18. § 1). His other works, mentioned by Pliny, are, a naked figure carrying apples, perhaps Hercules with the golden apples of the Hesperides; a lame figure, at Syracuse, called Claudicius, "the pain of whose wound even the spectator seems to feel," a description which almost certainly indicates a Philoctetes;
• two statues of Apollo, the one slaying the serpent Python with his arrows, the other playing the harp, of which two statues the latter was known by the surname of Diceus, from a story that, when Thebes was taken by Alexander, a fugitive hid his money in the bosom of the statue, and found it afterwards in safety. There are still other works of Pythagoras, mentioned by other authors, namely,
a winged Persaeus (Dion Chrysost. Orat. 37, vol. ii.
p. 106, ed. Reiske); Europa sitting on the bull (Tatian, adv. Graec. 51., p. 116, ed. Wurst; Varro, l. c. § 3); Eteocles and Polynices dying by their mutual fratricide (ibid. 54. p. 118); and
• a statue of Dionysus, mentioned in an epigram
by Proclus, in which, though the name of Pythagoras does not occur, we can hardly be wrong in applying to him the epithet Parjovun (Brunck, Anal.
vol. ii. p. 446, No. 5); Jacobs, Append. Anth. Pal.
vol. ii. p. 782, No. 69).

There are still extant various medals, gems, and bas-reliefs, on which there is a figure of Philocetes, which some antiquaries believe to be the same as the statue by Pythagoras, but the matter is quite uncertain.

Pliny tells us that Pythagoras had for a pupil his sister's son, Sostratus (L. c. § 5).

2. Of Samos, a statuary, whom Pliny (L. c. § 5) expressly distinguishes from the former, to whom, however, he says, the Samian bore a remarkable personal likeness. He was at first a painter, and was celebrated as the maker of seven naked statues, and one of an old man, which, in Pliny's time, stood near the temple of Fortune, which Catulus had erected out of the spoils of the Cimbri. (This is the meaning of Pliny's expression, Cumus die.) There is no indication of his date, unless we were to accept the opinion of Sillig, already noticed, that Pliny's date of Ol. 87 ought to be referred to this artist rather than to Pythagoras of Rhegium.

PYTHIAS.

PYTHIAS (Πυθαίας), an Athenian tragic poet at the close of the fifth century
B.C., who is only known by one passage in Aristophanes (Istn. 87), which is, however, quite enough to show the sort of estimation in which he was held. Aristophanes places him at the very foot of the anti-climax of tragedians who were still living, and the question of Heracles, whether he is likely to supply the void left by the death of Euripides, does not even obtain an answer, except by a jest of Xanthias. [P. S.]

PYTHIAS (Πυθαίας), historical. 1. The son of Lampon, of Aegina, was a conqueror in the Nemean games, and his victory is celebrated in one of Pindar's odes (Nem. v). He is in all probability the same as the Pythias who distinguished himself in the Persian wars [No. 2], since we know that the latter had a son of the name of Lampon.

2. Or Pythias, the son of Isonchon, of Aegina, was in one of the three Greek guard-ships stationed off the island of Scathus, which were taken by the Persians shortly before the battle of Ther-myndae, and was distinguished for his bravery in the engagement, and was in consequent honor by the Persians with distinguished honour. At the battle of Salamis the Sidonian ship, in which he was kept as a prisoner, was taken by an Aeginetan vessel, and he thus recovered his liberty. Lampon, the son of this Pythias, was present at the battle of Plataea, and urged Pausanias, after the engagement, to avenge
the death of Leonidas by insulting and mutilating
the corpse of Mardonius. (Herod. vii. 181, viii. 92,
x. 78; Paus. iii. 4. § 10).

3. Or Pythias, of Abdera, the father of Nymphодорус (Herod. vii. 137). [Nymphodorus.]

4. An Athenian orator, distinguished by his unceasing animosity against Demosthenes. He was self-educated, and, on account of the harshness and inegality of his style, was not reckoned among the Attic orators by the grammarians.
(Suidas, s. v.; Syrinx, ad Herod. 16; comp.
Phil. Phoc. 21.) His private character was harsh, and he had no political principles, but changed sides as often as suited his convenience or his interest. He made no pretensions to honesty.
On being reproached on one occasion as a rascal, he frankly admitted the charge, but urged that he had been so for a shorter time than any of his contemporaries who took part in public affairs.
(Aelian, V. H. xiv. 28.) Suidas relates (s. v.) that having been imprisoned on account of a debt, probably a fine incurred in a law-suit (δια δραμάς), he made his escape from prison and fled to Macedonia, and that after remaining there for a time, he returned to Athens. The statement that he was unable to pay his debts is confirmed by the account of the author of the Letters which go under the name of Demostenes (Ep. 3. p. 1481, ed. Reiske), where it is related that Pythias had acquired such a large fortune by dishonest means that he could at that time pay five talents with more ease than five drachmas formerly. We learn from the same authority that he obtained the highest honours at Athens, and was in particular entrusted with the distinguished duty of offering the sacrifices at Delphi for the Athenians.
He was accused by Deinarchus of ἕξωσι (Dionys.
Deinarch.; Harpocrat. s. v. διωσαν γραφή; Steph.
Byz. s. v. Αἰγυπτ.,) probably on account of his long residence at Macedonia. Of the part that he took in political affairs only two or three facts are recorded. He opposed the honours which the Athenians proposed to confer upon Alexander (Plut.
784, c), but he afterwards espoused the interests of the Macedonian party. He accused Demosthenes of having received bribes from Harpalus. (Dem.
Bibl. Cod. 263; Dionys. Insecus, 4.) In the Lamiun PYTHEAS.

war, n. c. 322, he joined Antipater (Plut. Dem. 27), and had thus the satisfaction of surviving his great enemy Demosthenes. His hostility to Demosthenes is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers, who have preserved many of his jests against the great orator. He is said to have been the author of the well-known saying, that the orations of Demosthenes smelt of the lamp. (Aelian, V. H. vii. 7; Plut. Dem. 8; comp. Athen. ii. p. 44, f.) The titles of two of the orations of Pytheas are preserved by Harpocration, Πρὸς τὴν ἑβδομίδα ἀντολογία (s. v. ἀγαρσόω), and Κατ' Ἀδελίατος (s. v. ἀξαυτίως). Two short extracts from his orations are given in Latin by Rutilius Lupus (i. 11, 14). (Comp. Ruhnken, ad Rutil. Lyp. i. 11; Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 84.)

5. Boeotarch of Thebes, was, next to Criotlanus, the chief instigator of the Achaenists to undertake the fatal war against the Romans, which destroyed for ever the liberties of Greece. He was put to death by Metellus at the beginning of n. c. 146. (Polyb. x. i. 3; Pans. viii. 14. § 6, vii. 15. § 10.)

PYTHEAS (Πυθέας), of Massilia, in Gaul, a celebrated Greek navigator, who sailed to the western and northern parts of Europe, and wrote a work containing the results of his discoveries. We know nothing of his personal history, with the exception of the statement of Polybius that he was a poor man (ap. Strab. ii. p. 104). The time at which he lived cannot be determined with accuracy. Bougainville (Mém. de l'Acad. des Insocr. vol. xix. p. 143) maintained that he lived before Aristotle, but the passage on which he relied (Arist. Met. ii. 5.) is not sufficient to warrant this conclusion. Vossius (de Historiae Graeciae, p. 125, ed. Westermann) places him in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, but this is certainly too late a date. As he is quoted by Diæarchus, a pupil of Aristotle (Strab. ii. p. 104) and by Timaeus (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 11), he probably lived in the time of Alexander the Great, or shortly afterwards.

The works of Pytheas are frequently referred to by the ancient writers. One appears to have borne the title Περὶ τοῦ Ὀκεανοῦ (ἐν τοῖς περὶ τοῦ Ὀκεανοῦ, Geminus, Elem. Astron. in Petav. Ursa. vol. p. 22), and the other to have been called Περὶ πόλης (Marcianus, in Geogr. Mös. vol. i. p. 63, ed. Husdon), or as it is termed by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodi (iv. 761), Τῆς περιοδος. That he gave an account of the north-western coasts of Europe is evident from Strabo, who refers to his statements respecting Iberia, Gaul, and other countries (Strab. i. p. 64, ii. p. 75, iii. p. 158, iv. p. 195). It would appear from Pytheas' own statement, as related by Polybius (ap. Strab. ii. p. 104), that he undertook two voyages, one in which he visited Britain and Thule, and of which he probably gave an account in his work On the Ocean; and a second, undertaken after his return from his first voyage, in which he coasted along the whole of Europe from Gadeirn (Cadiz) to the Tanais, and the description of which probably formed the subject of his Periplus. Some modern writers, however, maintain that the passage in Strabo may be interpreted to mean that Pytheas undertook only one voyage; but we think that the words are scarcely susceptible of such an interpretation.

The following are the principal particulars which ancient writers have preserved from the works of Pytheas. 1. He related that at the extreme west of the inhabited world was a promontory of the Ostodiumi, called Caliban, and that islands lay to the west of it, the furthest of which named Uxismasa was a three days' sail (Strab. i. p. 64). Strabo treats all this as the pure invention of Pytheas. 2. He further related that he visited Britain, and travelled over the whole of the island as far as it was accessible; and he said that it was 40,000 stadia in circumference. As to Thule and those distant parts he stated that there was neither earth, sea, nor air, but a sort of mixture of all these, like to the mollusca, in which the earth and the sea and every thing else are suspended, and which could not be penetrated either by land or by sea. The substance like the mollusca Pytheas had seen himself, but the other part of the account he gave from hearsay (Polyb. ap. Strab. ii. p. 104). Pytheas made Thule a six days' sail from Britain; he said that the day and the night were each six months long in Thule (Strab. i. p. 63; Plin. H. N. ii. 77). 3. He spoke of a people called Guttones, bordering upon Germany, and dwelling upon a shelf of the sea called Ventum, in a space of 6000 stadia. He added that at the distance of a day's sail there was an island named Alabas, to which amber was brought by the waves in spring; that the inhabitants used it instead of firewood, and sold it to the neighbouring Teutoni. Timaeus gave credit to this account, but called the island Basilia. (Plln. H. N. xxxvii. 11.)

The credibility of the statements of Pytheas was differently estimated by the ancient writers. Empedotnes and Hipparchus refer to them as worthy of belief; but other writers, especially Polybius and Strabo, regard them as of no value at all. Polybius says that it is incredible that a private man, and one who was also poor, could have undertaken such long voyages and journeys (ap. Strab. ii. p. 104); and Strabo, on more than one occasion, calls him a great liar, and regards his statements as mere fables, only deserving to be classed with those of Ephemerides and Antiphonnes. (Strab. i. p. 63, ii. p. 102, iii. p. 148, 157, 158.) Most modern writers, however, have been disposed to set more value upon the narrative of Pytheas. In reply to the objection of Polybius it has been urged that he may have been sent on a voyage of discovery by the Massilians, at the public expense, in order to become acquainted with the country from which the Carthaginians procured amber. There seems no reason to doubt that he did go on a voyage to the northern parts of Europe; but the reasons for his undertaking it must be left in uncertainty. It would appear from the extracts which have been preserved from his works, that he did not give simply the results of his own observations, but added all the reports which reached him respecting different countries, without always drawing a distinction between what he saw himself and what was told him by others. His statements, therefore, must be received with caution and some mistrust. It is equally uncertain how far he penetrated. Some modern writers have regarded it as certain that he must have reached Iceland in consequence of his remark that the day was six months long at Thule, while others have supposed that he advanced as far as the Shetland Islands. But either supposition is very improbable, and neither is necessary; for reports of the great length of the day and night in the northern parts of Europe had already reached the Greeks, before the time of Pytheas. There has been likewise much dispute as to what river we are to understand by the Tanais. Without stating the various opinions which have been advanced, we may remark that the supposition of Ukert appears to us the most probable, namely, that the country which Pytheas describes as the one from which amber came may have been the Cimbrian peninsula (Denmark, &c.), and that when he reached the Elbe, he concluded that he had arrived at the Tanais, which separated Europe from Asia.

Pytheas cultivated science. He appears to have been the first person who determined the latitude of a place from the shadow of the sun; and it is expressly stated that he determined the position of Miletus by observing the shadow of the sun by the gnomon (Strab. ii. pp. 71, 115). He also paid considerable attention to the phaenomena of the tides, and was well aware of the influence of the moon upon them. (Fuhr, De Pythea, p. 19.)

The voyages of Pytheas have been discussed by a large number of modern writers: we can only refer to the most important works on the subject:— Bougainville, Sur l'Origue et sur les Voyages de Pytheas, in Mem. de l'Acad. des Insir. vol. xix. pp. 146—165 ; D'Anville, Sur la Navigation de Pytheas á Thule, ibid. vol. xxxvii. pp. 436—442; Ukert, Beamerungen über Pytheas, in his Geographie der Griechen und Römer, vol. i. part i. pp. 298—309; Arvedson, Pythae Massiliensis Fragmenta, Upsalae, 1824; Fuhr, De Pythea Massiliensis, Darmstäd, 1835; Straszwicck, Pythées de Marseille et la Geographie de son Temps, Paris, 1836, translated into German by Hoffmann, Leippzig, 1838.

PYTHEAS, artista. 1. A silver-chaser, who flourished at Rome in the age immediately following that of Pompey, and whose productions commanded a remarkably high price. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 55: Pliny states the precise value of every two ounces of silver plate engraved by him, but the number is differently given in the MSS. as 10,000 or 20,000 aterces, see Sillig's edition.) A very celebrated work by him was a cup, on which Ulisses and Diomedes were represented carrying off the Palladum, in that sort of chasing which was called emblema. According to the opinion of Thiersch, the greatest gem engravers of that and the succeeding age did not disdain to copy from the design of Pytheas, whose figure of Diomed is still to be seen on gems by Dioscurides, Gneuses, Calpurnius Severus, and Solon: the grounds of this opinion, however, are not stated by the author. (Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 296—299.)

The suggestion of Meyer appears more probable, that the designs of both the vase of Pytheas and the gems referred to were copied from some more ancient work of art. (Meyer, Gesch. d. bild. Kunst, vol. iii. pp. 172, 173; comp. Levezow, Uber den Raub des Palladium.)

Pytheas also chased small drinking vessels with grotesque subjects, of the most elaborate and delicate workmanship, which are thus described by Pliny:— Fecit idem et cocos magisricia appallatos, parcella potorius, sed e quibus ne exemplaria qui dem licet exprimere, tam opportuna injuria subtilias erat.

2. A painter, of Bura in Achaia, whose painting on a wall at Pergamum, representing an elephant, is mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus (c. u. Boipta).

PYTHIAS. [P. S.]

PYTHEN (Πυθέν), a Corinthian general, who commanded the detachment of ships sent with Gyllippus for the relief of Syracuse. His name occurs now and then in the account of the operations which followed. (Thuc. vi. 104, vii. 1, 70.) [C. P. M.]

PYTHERMON and PYTHERUS are two rather obscure names in the history of Greek music. Pythermus of Mileus is a person to whom some ancient writers ascribed the invention of the Ionian mode (Heronclid. op. Ath. xiv. p. 625, c. d.; Bockh, de Metr. Pind. p. 233); and Pythermon is mentioned as the author of a scolion. (Paracrinigr. f. t. iii. 118.) [P. S.]

PYTHEAS, [PYTHEAS and PYTHIUS.]

PYTHEUS, architect. [PHILEUS.]

PYTHIAS (Πύθιας). 1. The sister or adopted daughter of Hermias, became the wife of Aristotle. [ARISTOTELES, p. 318.]

2. Daughter of Aristotle and Pythias. She was married three times: her first husband was Nicander of Stagira, a relative of Aristotle; her second Prodes, a descendant of Demasatus, king of Sparta; and her third Metrodorus, the physician (Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 12, p. 657, ed. Bekker).

3. A slave of Octavias Augusta, the wife of Nero. She became noted for the constancy with which she endured the torments to which she was put by Tigellinus, without informing against her mistress (Dion Cass. lxxii. 13). [C. P. M.]

PYTHIAS is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), according to the common reading, as one of the staturies who flourished about the time of the revival of the art. The MSS. vary much as to the form of the name; and, taking also into account the very loose way in which some of these names are inserted by Pliny (comp. POLYCLES), it is by no means impossible that he may be one and the same person with the silver-chaser PYTHEAS. (See Sillig, edition of Pliny, ad loc.) [P. S.]

PYTHIONICE. [HARPALUS, No. 1.]

PYTHIS, a sculptor, who made the marble quadriga, by which the celebrated Mausoleum was surmounted. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 9.) Considering the close resemblance of this sculptor's name, in Pliny, to some of the readings of the name of the architect of the Mausoleum, in Vitruvius, it seems not improbable that they may have been the same person. [PHILEUS.]

PYTHIUS (Πυθιός), the Pythian, from Pytho, the ancient name of Delphi, often occurs as a surname of Apollo, whose oracle was at Delphi. (Hom. Hymn. in Apollo. 573; Aesych. Agam. 521; Horat. Carm. i. 11. 6; Tac. Hist. iv. 83.) [L. S.]

PYTHIUS (Πυθίος: called Πυθίον by Plutarch, vol. ii. p. 262. d., and some others), a Lydian, the son of Atya, who lived in the time of the Persian invasion of Greece. He was a man of enormous wealth, which he derived from his gold mines in the neighbourhood of Celaenae in Phrygia, of which place he seems to have made himself governor. So eagerly did he prosecute his search for gold, that his subjects were almost all withdrawn from agriculture. Plutarch (l.c.) tells an amusing story of the device adopted by his wife to point out to him the absurdity of the course he was pursuing. She had a quantity of gold wrought into representations of various kinds of food, and set nothing but these before him one day for dinner. When Xerxes arrived at Celaenae, Pythius PYTHODAMUS. He had previously sent a golden plane tree and vine as a present to Dareius. He informed Xerxes that, intending to offer him a quantity of money to defray the expenses of his expedition, he had reckoned up his wealth and found it to consist of 2000 talents of silver coin and 4,000,000, all but 7000, drachms of gold coin. The whole of this he offered to Xerxes, who however did not accept it; but made him a present of the odd 7000 drachms, and granted him the rights of hospitality. His five sons accompanied Xerxes. Pythius, alarmed by an eclipse of the sun which happened, came to Xerxes, and begged that the eldest might be left behind. This request so enraged the king that he had the young man immediately killed and cut in two, and the two portions of his body placed on either side of the road, and then ordered the army to march between them. His other sons perished in different battles. Pythius, overwhelmed with grief, passed the rest of his days in solitude (Herod. vii. 27—29, 39, 39; Plin. H. N. xxiii. 10; Plut. L. e. [C. P. M.])

PYTHIUSIUS, architect. [PHIL.]

PYTHOCLEIDES (Πυθόκληδης), a celebrated musician of the time of Pericles, was a native of Ceos (Plut. Protag. 316, e.), and flourished at Athens, under the patronage of Pericles, whom he instructed in his art. (Plut. Per. 4; Pseudo-Plat. Alcib. i. p. 116, c.) The Scholiast on the passage last cited states that Pythocleides was also a Pythagorean philosopher, and that Agathocles was his disciple. Pythocleides was one of those musicians to whom some writers ascribed the invention of the Mixolydian mode of music. (Plut. de Mus. 16, p. 1136, d.)

PYTHOCLES (Πυθόκλης). 1. An Athenian orator, who belonged to the Macedonian party, and was put to death with Phocion in b. c. 317. (Dem. de Cor. p. 320; Plut. Phoc. 33.)

PYTHOCLES, a statuary, of whom nothing is known, beyond the mention of his name by Pliny among those artists whom he places at the revival of the art in ol. 156, and whom he characterizes as longe guidem infra praedictos, probati tamen. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.)

PYTHOCRITUS (Πυθόκριτος), of Sycon, a flute-player, exceedingly distinguished for his victories in the musical contests which were instituted by the Amphictyons at the Pythian games (b. c. 590). Pausanias tells us that the first victor in these contests was the Argive Sacadas, after whom Pythocritus carried off the prize at six Pythian festivals in succession, and that he had also the honour of acting six times as musician during the pentathlon at Olympia. In reward of these services a pillar was erected as a monument to him at Olympia, with the following inscription, Πυθόκριτος του Καλλικρίνου μναμά τάυνητα τόδε. (Paus. vi. 14. § 4. s. 9, 10.)

PYTHOCRITUS, a statuary, who is mentioned by Pliny as one of those who made αθλητας et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque, but of whom nothing more is known. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34.)

PYTHODAMUS, a medallist, whose name occurs on a coin of Aptera in Crete. (Nagler. Allgem. Künstler-Lexicon, s. c.) [P. S.]

PYTHODICUS, one of the statuaries, who are mentioned by Pliny as aequalitate celebrati sed nullis operum suorum praecipui. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 25.)

PYTHODORIS (Πυθόδωρης), queen of Pontus. She was the daughter of Pythodorus of Tralles, the friend of Pompey; and became the wife of Polemon I. king of Pontus, and the Bosporus. After the death of Polemon she retained possession of Colchis as well as of Pontus itself, though the kingdom of Bosporus was wrested from her power. She subsequently married Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, but after his death (a. d. 17) returned to her own kingdom, of which she continued to administer the affairs herself until her decease, which probably did not take place until a. n. 33. She is said by her contemporary Strabo to have been a woman of virtuous character, and of great capacity for business, so that her dominions flourished much under her rule. Of her two sons, the one, Zenon, became king of Armenia, while the other, Polemon II., after assisting her in the administration of her kingdom during her life, succeeded her on the throne of Pontus. (Strab. xi. p. 499, xii. pp. 555, 556, 557, 560, v. xiv. p. 649; Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 370.) [E. H. B.]

PYTHODORUS (Πυθόδωρος), artists. 1. A Theban sculptor, of the archaic period, who made the statue of Hera (Ἁγιαλιά ἱεραίων) in her temple at Coroneia. The goddess was represented as holding the Sirens in her hand. (Paus. ix. 34. § 2. s. 3; comp. Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 332, n. 4.)

2. 3. Two sculptors, who flourished under the early Roman emperors, and are mentioned by Pliny among those who “filled the palace of the Caesars on the Palatine with most approved works.” (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4, § 11; comp. Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 300, 325, foll.) [P. S.]

PYTHION (Πυθών), the famous dragon whom guarded the oracle of Delphi, is described as a son of Gaia. He lived in the caves of mount Parnassus, but was killed by Apollo, who then took possession of the oracle. (Apollod. i. 4. § 1; Strab. ix. p. 422.) [L. S.]

PYTHON (Πυθών), historical. Concerning the frequent confusion between this name and those of Peithon and Pithon, see PITHON.

1. Son of Agenor. [PITHON.]

2. Son of Cretans. [PITHON.]

3. One of the leading citizens of Abdera, who betrayed that city into the hands of Eumenes II., king of Pergamus; an act of treachery which afterwards caused him so much remorse, as to be the occasion of his death. (Diod. xxx. Exc. Vales. p. 578.)

4. The chief of the embassy sent by Prusias, king of Bithynia, to Rome, in b. c. 164, to lay before the senate his complaints against Eumenes, king of Pergamus. (Polyb. xxxi. 6.)

5. A citizen of Enna, in Sicily, who was put to death by Eunus (whose master he had been), in the great servile insurrection in b. c. 130. [EUNUS.]

PYTHION (Πυθών), literary. 1. Of Catana, a dramatic poet of the time of Alexander, whom he accompanied into Asia, and whose army he entertained with a satyrical drama, when they were celebrating the Dionysia on the banks of the Hy-QUADRATUS. QUADRATUS.
daspes. The drama was in ridicule of Harpalus and the Athenians. It is twice mentioned by Athenaeus, who has preserved nearly twenty lines of it. (Athen. xiii. p. 586, d., p. 592, e. f., p. 596, a.) In the second of these passages, Athenaeus mentions the poet as either of Catana or of Byzantium; and it seems very doubtful whether he was confounded with the Byzantine rhapsodist of the same name, who makes some figure in the history of Philip and Alexander, or whether he was really the same person. Some writers ascribed the drama to Alexander, but no doubt erroneously. Respect-

2. Of Aenus, in Thrace, a Periaptic philosopher, who, with his brother Hermeludeis, put to discard the tyrant Cotys. [COTYS, HIRACLEDIES.]

3. A Periaptic philosopher, mentioned in the will of Lycon. (Diog. Laert. v. 70.) [P. S.]

PYTHON, artist. This name occurs twice on painted vases; in the first instance, on a cylind-

r shaped vase, of the best style of the art, found at

Vulci, with the inscription ΠΥΘΩΝ ΕΠΙΟΙΕΙΝ, and with the name of Epictetus as the painter; in the other case, on a Lucinian vase, of the period of the decline of the art, with the inscription ΠΥΘΩΝ ΕΡΑΦΕ. On comparing these vases, and the inscriptions on them, although there are examples of the same person being both a maker and painter of vases, it can hardly be doubted that, in this case, the artists were two different persons, at different periods, and probably living in different parts of Italy. (R. Hocquart, Lettres à M. Scorn., pp. 58, 59, 2d ed.) [P. S.

PYTHONIUS (Ευόθωνος), of Athens, a writer mentioned by Athenaeus (v. p. 226, f.) among those who wrote systematically on allu-rations to love.

[W. M. G.]

Q. QUADRATILLA, UMMIDIA, a wealthy

Roman lady, who died in the reign of Trajan within a little of eighty years of age, leaving two-thirds (ex esse) of her fortune to her grandson and the other third to her granddaughter (Plin. Ep. vii.

24). Her grandson was an intimate friend of

Piny. [QUADRATUS, No. 2.] Quadratilla was probably a sister of Ummidius Quadratus, the governor of Syria, who died in A.D. 60, and appears to be the same as the Quadratilla mentioned in the following inscription, discovered at Casinum in Campania:— Ummidia C. F. Quadratilla amphitheatrum et templum Casinatius suae pecunia fecit. (Orelli, Inscri. No. 781.) It seems that the Ummidii came originally from Casinum. [UM-

MIDIA GENVS.]

QUADRATUS (Κοσάρος, Euseb. H. E., Syncellus, and the Greek Menoaeas; or Κοσάρος, Euseb. Chron. p. 211, ed. Scaliger, 1658), one of the Apostolic Fathers and an early apologist for the Christian religion. The name of Quadratus occurs repeatedly in Eusebius (H. E. iii. 37, iv. 3, 23, v. 17, Chron. lib. ii.), but it is questioned whether that father speaks of one person or of two. Valesius, and others (including Tillemont) after him, contend for the existence of two Quadrati, one the disciple of the Apostles and the Apologist, the other, bishop of Athens and contemporary with Dionysius of Corinth [DIONYSIUS, literary, No. 22], who was of somewhat later date than the Apologist. But Jerome, among the ancients, and Cave, Grab, Le Clerc, and Fabricius, among the moderns, refer the different notices, and we think correctly, to one person.

Quadratus is said by Eusebius (Chron. l. c.), Jerome (De Viris Ilust. c. 19, and Ad Magn.

nuw, c. 4, Epistol. 84, edit. vet. 83, ed. Bene-dictin., 70, ed. Vallurs.), and Orosius (Hist. vii.

13) to have been a hearer or disciple "of the Apostles," an expression which Cave would limit by referring the term "Apostles" to the Apostle John alone, or by understanding it of men of the apostolic age, who had been bishops of the Church of Athens. But we see no reason for so limiting or explaining the term. Quadratus himself, in his Apology (apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 3), speaks of those who had been cured or raised from the dead by Jesus Christ, as having lived to his own days (εἰς τοὺς μετεώρους γενέσεις, "ad tempora nostrae"), thus carrying back his own recollections to the apostolic age. And as Eusebius, in a passage in which he ascribes to him the gift of prophecy, seems to connect him with the daughters of the Apostle Philip, we may rather suppose him to have been a disciple of that Apostle than of John. Cave con-jectures that he was an Athenian by birth; but the manner in which an anonymous writer cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 17) mentions him, in connection with Ammillus of Philadelphia and with the daughters of Philip, would lead us to place him in early life in the central districts of Asia Minor. He afterwards (assuming that Eusebius speaks of one Quadratus, who had been bishop of the Church of Athens, but at what time we have no means of ascertaining. We learn that he succeeded the martyr Publius; but, as the time of Publius' martyrdom is unknown, that circumstance throws no light on the chronology of his life. Quadratus present his Apology to Hadrian, in the tenth year of his reign (A. D. 126), according to the Chronicon of Eusebius, but we know not whether he had yet attained the episcopate. As Eusebius does not give him in this place the title of bishop, the probable inference is that he had not; but, as the passage seems to intimate that he and the Athenian Aristides presented their respective Apologies simultaneously, it is likely that Quadratus was already connected with the Athenian Church. The Menoaeas of the Greeks (a. d. Sept. 21) commemorate the martyrdom under the emperor Hadrian of the "ancient and learned" Quadratus, who had preached the gospel in Magnesia and Athens, and being driven away from his flock at Athens, obtained at length the martyr's crown; and the Monologium of the emperor Basil commemorates (a. d.

21 Sept.) the martyrdom of a Quadratus, bishop of Magnesia, in the persecution under Decius. That our Quadratus was a martyr is, we think, from the silence of Eusebius and Jerome to such a circumstance, very questionable; and that he was mar-

tyre under Hadrian, is inconsistent with the statement of those writers (Euseb. Chron.; Hieronym. Ad Magn., c. 4), that the Apologies of Quadrat-us and Magnesius led that emperor to put a stop to the persecution. We think it not an improbable conjecture that Publius fell a victim during the brief persecution thus stopped, and that Quadratus having been appointed to succeed him, made those exertions which Dionysius of Corinth, in his letter to the Athenians (apud Euseb. iv. 23), commemorates, to rally the dispersed members of the Church, and to revive their faith. Many of the Athenians, however, had apostatized; and the Church continued in a feeble state till the time when Dionysius wrote. Nothing further is known of Quadratus: the few and doubtful particulars recorded of him have, however, been expanded by Halloix (Illustr. Eccles. Oriental. Scriptor. Vitae) into a biography of seven chapters. (Comp. Acta Santorum, Mai, a.d. xxvi. vol. vi. p. 357.)

The Apology of Quadratus is described by Eusebius as generally read in his time, and as affording clear evidence of the soundness of the writer's judgment and the orthodoxy of his belief. It has been long lost, with the exception of a brief fragment preserved by Eusebius (Hist. iv. 3), and given by Grabe, in his Spicilegium SS. Patrum, Socio-

[J. C. M.]

QUADRATUS, C. ANTIUS AULIUS JULIUS, consul a. d. 105, with Ti. Julius Candidus, in the reign of Trajan (Fasti). Spartanus (Haedr. 3) mentions these consuls under the names of Candidus and Quadratus.

QUADRATUS, ASINIUS, the author of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology (Brunce. Anth. vol. ii. p. 299; Jacobs, Anth. Grac. vol. iii. p. 13), which is described in the Planudes Anthology (p. 203, Steph., p. 206, Wechel,) as of uncertain authorship, but in the Palatine MS, is headed 'Ασινίου Κομηδάρου, with the further superscription, εἰς τοὺς ἀναιρεθέντας ὑπὸ τοῦ τῶν Ρωμαίων ὑπάκου Σώλα, according to which it would be inferred that the writer of the epigram was contemporary with Sulla. (Anth. Pal. vii. 312.) But this lemma can scarcely be regarded as anything more than the conjecture of a grammarian, on the truth of which the epigram itself does not furnish sufficient evidence to decide. It is the epitaph of some enemies of the Romans (apparently foreign enemies), who had fallen by a secret and treacherous death, after fighting most bravery. There is nothing in it to support the conjecture of Salmantius, that it refers to the death of Catiline and his associates. Jacobs, following the lemma of the Palatine MS, suggests that it may refer to the slaughter of many of the Athenians, after the taking of Athens by Sulla. (Ani-uelvo, in Anth. Grac. vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 366.) To these another conjecture might be added, namely, that the epigram refers to some event which occurred in the later wars of Rome, and that its author is no other than the Roman historian of the time of Philippos. See below. [P. S.]

QUADRATUS, ASINIUS, lived in the times of Philippos I. and II., emperors of Rome (A. D. 244—249), and wrote two historical works in the Greek language. 1. A history of Rome, in fifteen books, in the Ionic dialect, called Χαλεπτρίς, because it related the history of the city, from its foundation to the thousandth year of its nativity (A. D. 248), when the Ludi Saeuulares were performed with extraordinary pomp. It probably passed over with brevity the times of the republic, and dwelt at greater length upon the imperial period. Suidas says that the work came down to Alexander, the son of Mammea; but this is a mistake, as Alexander died fifteen years before the thousandth year of Rome. (Suidas, s. v. Κοβράπος; Steph. Byz.
v. Ατλινος, Ταίνινος, Ταίνινος, Δοξιάς; Dion Cass. lxx. 3; Zosim. v. 27; Vulp. Gall. Avid. Cass. 1; Agathias, i. p. 17, c.) 2. A history of Parthia, which is frequently quoted by Stephanus Byzanti-

Theodore, as Torqueb. or Torqueb. (Quadratii belii Parthicis scriptor, Captio. Ver. 3; Steph. Byz. s. e. Παρθι, Τορκ, et alibi; comp. Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 284, ed. Westtermann; Clinton, Fasti Rom. p. 265.)

QUADRATUS, FANNIUS, a contemporary of Horace, who speaks of him with contempt as a parasite of Tegillus Hermogenes. He was one of those envious Roman poets who tried to deprecate Horace, because his writings threw their own into the shade. (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 21, i. 10. 80, with the Schol.; Weichert, Poetarum Latin. Retiquiae, p. 290, &c.)

QUADRATUS, L. NUNNIUS, tribune of the plebs b. c. 58, distinguished himself by his opposition to the measures of his colleague P. Clodius against Cicero. After Cicero had withdrawn from the city, he proposed that the senate and the people should put on mourning for the orator, and as early as the first of June he brought forward a motion in the senate for his recall from banishment. In the course of the same year he dedicated the property of Clodius to Ceres (D. Cass. with Cass. xxvi. 18. 30; Cic. pro Sest. 31, post Red. in Sen. 2, pro Dom. 48). Two years afterwards Quadratus is mentioned along with Faunios, as one of the opponents of the Lex Trebonia, which prolonged the government of the provinces to Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus (Dion Cass. xxxix. 35). The last time that his name occurs is in b. c. 49, when he was in Cicero's neighbourbou وزارة in Campania (Cic. ad Att. x. 16. § 4). In many editions of Cicero, as also in the Annales of Pighius, he is erroneously called Muminus. Glandorp, in his Onomasticon, calls him Numius.

QUADRATUS, NUMIUS. [QUADRA-
tus, UMIDIUS.]

QUADRATUS, L. STATIUS, consul a. d. 142, with C. Cupioius Rufinus (Fasti).

QUADRATUS, UMIDIUS, the name of several persons under the early Roman emperors. There is considerable discrepancy in the orthography of the name. Josephus writes it Numidius, which is the form that Glandorp (Onomast. p. 631) has adopted; while in the different editions of Tactus, Pliny, and the Scriptores Historiae Augustae, we find it written variously Numidius, Vinidius, and Umidius. The latter, which occurs in some of the best manuscripts, is supported by the authority of inscriptions, and is evidently the correct form. In the passage of Horace (Sat. i. 1. 95) where the present reading is Umidius, there is the same variation in the manuscripts, but Bentley has shown that the true reading is Umidius.

1. UMIDIUS QUADRATUS, was governor of Syria during the latter end of the reign of Claudius, and the commencement of the reign of Nero. He succeeded Cassius Longinus in the province QUADRATUS. QUADRIGARIUS.

about A. D. 51, and continued to govern it till his death in A. D. 60. Only three circumstances are mentioned in connection with his administration. In A. D. 52 he allowed Rhadamistus to dethrone and put to death Mithridates, the king of Armenia, whom Tiberius had placed upon the throne, and whom the Romans had hitherto supported. In the same year he marched into Judaea, and put down the disturbances which prevailed in that country. He is said to have condemned, or, according to other accounts, to have sent to the emperor Claudius for trial, Ventidius Cumanus, one of the procurators, but to have protected Antonius Felix, the other procurator. [Comp. FELIX, p. 143, a.] The other circumstance is his disagreement with Domitius Corbulo, who had been sent into the East to conduct the war against the Parthians. His name occurs on one of the coins of Antioch. (Joseph. Ant. xx. 5. § 2, B. J. ii. 12. §§ 5, 6; Tac. Ann. xii. 43, 45, xiii. 8, 9, xiv. 26; Eckhel, vol. iii. p. 200.) In the editions of Tacitus the praenomen of Quadratus is Titus, but it appears from an inscription that this is a mistake, and that his real praenomen was Caius. (Orelli, Inscrip. 3663.) We learn from the same inscription that his full name was C. Ummidius Quadratus, Domitianus, that he had been previously the legatus of Caligula in Lusitania. The Ummidia Quadratilla, whose death in the reign of Trajan is mentioned by Pliny [QUADRATILLA], was in all probability a sister of the above. She could hardly have been a daughter, as some modern writers have supposed, since she had a grandson of the age of twenty-four and upwards at the time of her death [see below, No. 2], and it is not probable that Ummidia, who died in A. D. 60, could have had a great-grandson of that age about A. D. 100.

2. UMMIDIUS QUADRATUS, a friend and admiral of the younger Pliny, whom he took as his model in ordnance. Pliny speaks of him in the highest terms, and praises both his abilities and his excellent moral character. He was the grandson of the wealthy Ummidia Quadratilla, and inherited two-thirds of her property. [QUADRATILLA.] In the estate thus bequeathed to him was the house formerly inhabited by the celebrated jurist Caius Longinus. He married at the age of twenty-four, in the life-time of his grandmother, but lost his wife soon after their marriage. (Plin. Ep. vi. 11, vii. 24.) Two of Pliny's letters are addressed to him (Ep. vii. 29, ix. 13), in the latter of which Pliny gives an account of the celebrated attack which he made upon Publicius Certus in the senate, in the reign of Nerva, A. D. 96.

3. UMMIDIUS QUADRATUS, is mentioned as one of the persons whom Hadrian persecuted. (Spartian. Hadr. 15.) He may have been a son of No. 2, who probably married again after the time that Pliny's letter was written. It seems to have been this Quadratus who married the sister of Antoninus Pius.

4. M. UMMIDIUS QUADRATUS, the son of No. 3, was the nephew of Antoninus Pius, being his sister's son. Antoninus Pius gave his maternal property to this Quadratus (Capit. M. Aurel. 7, where he is in some editions erroneously called Mumnius Quadratus.) He was consul in A.D. 167, with M. Aurelius Vetus.

5. UMMIDIUS QUADRATUS, the son of No. 4, was induced by Lucilla to enter into a conspiracy against her brother Commodus, by whom he was put to death, A. D. 183. (Herodian. i. 8; Lamprid. Commod. 4; Dion Cass. lxxix. 4.)

QUADRATUS, C. VOLUMENUS, a tribune of the soldiers in Caesar's army in Gaul, is described as "vir honori magni et virtutis." He held the rank of Praefectus equitum under his old commander in the campaign against Pompey in Greece, in B. C. 48. (Caes. B. G. iii. 5, viii. 23, B. C. i. 60.) He was a tribune of the plebs, b.c. 43, and one of the supporters of Antony. (Cic. Phil. iv. 7, § 21, where the correct reading is idem Ventidium, cum alii praetorem, tribunum Volumnum, ego semper hostem.)

QUADRIFRONES, a surname of Janus. It is said that after the conquest of the Faliscans an image of Janus was found with four foreheads. Hence afterwards a temple of Janus quadrifrons was built in the Forum transitorium, which had four gates. The fact of the god being represented with four heads is considered by the ancients to be an indication of his being the divinity presiding over the year with its four seasons. (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 607; Isid. Orig. vii. 11; August. De Civ. Dei, vii. 4.)

QUADRIGARIUS, Q. CLAUDIUS, a Roman historian who flourished about B. C. 100 (Vell. Pat. ii. 9). His work, which is generally quoted under the title Annales (Gell. ix. 13. § 6), sometimes as Historiae (Priscian. p. 697, ed. Putsch.) and sometimes as Rerum Romanarum Libri (Non. s. e. pristis), commenced immediately after the destruction of Rome by the Gauls, and must in all probability have extended down to the death of Sulla, since there were at least twenty-three books (Gell. x. 13), and the seventh consulship of Marius was commemorated in the nineteenth.

The first book embraced the events comprised in the period from B. C. 390 down to the subjugation of the Samnites. The struggle with Pyrrhus was the chief subject of the second and third; the first Punic war commenced in the third, and was continued through the fourth; the second Punic war commenced in the fifth, which contained the battle of Cannae; the siege of Capua was included in the sixth; the hostilities with the Achaean league and Numantia in the eighth, and the seventh consulship of Marius in the nineteenth, as was remarked above.

By Livy he is uniformly referred to simply as Claudius or Claudius, and is thus distinguished from Claudius Licinius (Liv. xxxix. 22), and from "Clau- dius qui Annales Aelianos ex Graeco in Latinum sermonem vertit." (Liv. xxxv. 39. Comp. xxxv. 14.) By other authors he is cited as Quintus (Priscian. p. 960, ed. Putsch.), as Claudius (Non. Marcell. s. e. Reticulum), as Q. Claudius (Gell. ix. 13. § 6; Priscian. p. 797, ed. Putsch.), as Claudius Quadriga- rius (Non. Marcell. s. e. Torquem; Gell. ii. 19. § 7), or as Quadrigarius (Non. Marcell. s. e. Posse- tur; Gell. i. 25. § 6).

The fragments still extant enable us to conclude that he was very minute in many of his details, for several particulars recorded by him were omitted by Livy (Cist. Liv. vii. 17; Macrobr. Sat. 1. 16; comp. Liv. vii. 18, xxi. 41.) while from the caution evinced by the latter in making use of him as an authority (Liv. vii. 42, viii. 19, ix. 5, x. 37, xxi. 10, 30, 36, xxxviii. 23, 41, xiv. 15; comp. Oros. iv. 20), especially in matters relating to numbers, it would appear that he was disposed to indulge, although in a less degree, in those exag-gerations which disfigured the productions of his contemporary Valerius Antias. It is somewhat remarkable that he is nowhere noticed by Cicero. By A. Gellius, on the other hand, he is quoted repeatedly, and praised in the warmest terms (ix. 13. § 14. xiiii. 28. § 2. xv. 4. § 4. xvii. 2; Krause, Vitae et Fragmenta Historica. Rom. p. 243; Giese- brecht, Uebcr Claudius Quadrigarius, attached to a programme of the Gymnasium of Prenzlau, 4to, 1831; Lachmann, De Fontibus Historiarum T. Livii, Commentat. i. § 19, p. 34, 4to, Gotting. 1822, Commentat. ii. § 12, p. 22, 4to, Gotting. 1823.) [W. R.]

QUARTYNUS, a friend of the emperor Alexander Severus, who, after the murder of that prince, was dismissed from the camp by his successor, and having been encountered by some soldiers of Osrhoene deeply attached to the memory of their late sovereign, was forced by them to place himself at their head, and reluctantly assumed the purple. Soon after, while sleeping in his tent, he was assassinated by a certain Macedo, who had formerly commanded this body of foreign troops, and had been the chief instigator of the insurrection, but who now sought to ingratiate himself with Maximinus by presenting him with the head of his rival. He received the reward which he merited. Maximinus accepted the offering with joy, and then issued a command that the double traitor should himself be put to death, as the original author of the revolts. (Herodian. viii. 3, 4.) This Quartinus seems to be the same person with the Tucus mentioned by Capitologus (Maxim. c. 11), and with the Tirus of Trebellius Pollio (Triq. Tyrann. xxxix.). [W. R.]

QUERQUETULA/NABE, or Querquetulaeae virræe, nymphs presiding over the green oak forests, near the porta querquetularia, or querquetulana, were believed to be possessed of prophetic powers. (Festus, p. 261, ed. Müller; Plin. H. N. xvi. 10, 15. § 37.) It should be observed that the word eira is the ancient feminine of vir, and signifies women. Hence virago or virgo. [L. S.]

QUIES, the personification of tranquillity, was worshipped as a divinity by the Romans. A chapel dedicated to her stood on the via Laviniana, probably a pleasant resting-place for the weary traveller; another sanctuary of her was outside the porta Collina. (Liv. iv. 41; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 16, 21.) [L. S.]

QUIETUS, AVIDIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, had been a friend of Paetus Thrasea, and used to relate to Pliny many things that distinguished him. He supported Pliny when the latter accused Publicius Cestus in the senate, in a. d. 96, on account of the share he had had in the condemnation of Helvidius by Domitian. (Plin. Ep. vi. 29, 11. § 15.)

QUIETUS, CLUVIDIUS/NUS, was implicated in Piso's conspiracy against Nero, and was banished to one of the islands in the Aegean Sea. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71.)

QUIETUS, C. FULVIVUS, included in the list of thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [see AUREOLUS], was one of the two sons of that Marianus who assumed the purple after the capture of Valerian. Having been associated with his father and brother in the empire, he was entrusted with the government of the East when they marched upon Italy. Upon receiving intelligence of their defeat and death, he took refuge in Emesa where he was besieged, captured and slain by Odenathus in a. d. 262 (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann.). He is called Quintus by Zonaras (xii. 24). [W. R.]

COIN OF QUIETUS.

QUIETUS, Q. LU'SIUS, was an independent Moorish chief, not belonging to the Roman province of Mauritania. He served, however, with a body of Moorish cavalry in the Roman army, but in consequence of some offence which he had committed, he was dismissed from the service with disgrace. At a later time, a. d. 101, when Trajan was going to carry on war against the Parthians, and was in want of Moorish cavalry, Quietus offered his services again of his own accord, and was received with welcome by the emperor. In this war, and still more in the Parthian war, which began in a. d. 114, Quietus gained great distinction, and became one of the favourite generals of Trajan. He took the towns of Nisibis and Edessa, and subdued the Jews, against whom he had been sent. Trajan made him governor of Judea, and rewarded him still further by raising him to the consulship in a. d. 116 or 117. His name does not appear in the Fasti, and he must, therefore, have been only one of the consules suffecti for the year. The honours conferred upon him by Trajan excited much envy; but so great a favourite was he with the emperor, that there was a report, if we may believe Theodius, that Trajan destined him as his successor. Quietus is represented on Trajan's column at the head of his Moors. After Trajan's death he returned to his native country, but he was suspected by Hadrian of fomenting the disturbances which then prevailed in Mauritania. He was first deprived of the tribes whom he governed, and was then sumoned to Rome. There he was accused of entering into a conspiracy against Hadrian's life, and was murdered on a journey, probably while travelling from Mauritania to Rome. (Dion Cass. lxviii. 8, 22, 30, 32, lxix. 2; Theodius, Orat. xvi. p. 205, ed. Petavius, Paris, 1684; Euseb. H. E. iv. 2, with the note of Valesius; Spartan. Hadr. 5, 7; Amm. Marc. xxix. 5.)

QUINTIA GENES, originally patrician, but subsequently plebeian also. The ancient and more correct form of the name is Quinetius, which occurs on coins and the Fasti Capitolini. The Quintia gens was one of the Alban houses removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilinus, and enrolled by him among the patricians (Liv. i. 30). It was consequently one of the minores gentes. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. pp. 291, 292.) Its members often held throughout the whole history of the republic the highest offices of the state, and it produced some men of importance even during the imperial period. For nearly the first forty years after the expulsion of the kings the Quintii are not mentioned, and the first of the gens, who obtained the consulship, was T. Quintius Capitolinus.
Barbatus in B.C. 471; but from that year their name constantly appears in the Fasti. The three great patrician families of the Quintia Gens were those of Capitolineus, Cincinnatus, and Flamininus. Besides these we find Quintii with the following surnames: Atta, Claudius, Crispinus, Hirpinus, Scapula, Trogus. A few persons, who bear no cognomina, are given under Quintius. The only surname that occurs on coins is that of Crispinus Sulpicianus, which is found on coins struck in the time of Augustus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 291.) It is related that it was the custom in the Quintia gens for even the women not to wear any ornaments of gold. (Plin. H. N. xxxii. 1. s. 6.)

COIN OF QUINTIA GENS.

QUINTILIANUS, AFRA\'NIUS, a senator of dissolute life, had been ridiculed by Nero in a poem, and in revenge took part in Piso's conspiracy against that emperor. On the detection of the emperor he had to put an end to his life, which he did, says Tacitus, "non ex priore vitae mollitia." (Tac. Ann. xv. 49, 56, 70.)

QUINTILIA, or QUINTILIA GENS, patrician. This name occurs in the earliest legends of Roman history, for the followers of Romulus among the shepherds are said to have been called Quintilii, just as those of his brother Remus were named Fabii. The Luperci, who were among the most ancient priests of Rome, were divided into two classes, one called Quintilii or Quintiliani, and the other Fabii or Fabiani. (Festus s. v. Quintiliani Luperci, and Fabiani; Ovid. Fast. ii. 373.) Hence it has been conjectured with much probability that this priesthood was originally confined to these gentes. (Comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Luperci.) But although the gens was so ancient, it never attained any historical importance, and its name is best known from the unfortunate Quintilius Varus, who was destroyed with his whole army by the Germans in the reign of Augustus. The Quintilii obtained only one consulship and one dictatorship during the whole of the republican period, the former in B.C. 453, and the latter in B.C. 331. During the republic Varus is the only family-name that occurs in the gens; but in the times of the empire we find one or two other cognomina, which are given below.

QUINTILIANUS, M. FABI\'IUS, the most celebrated of Roman rhetoricians, was a native of Calagurris (Calahorra), in the upper valley of the Ebro. He was born about A.D. 40, and if not reared at Rome, must at least have completed his education there, for he himself informs us (v. 7, § 7) that, while yet a very young man, he attended the lectures of Domitius Afer, at that time far advanced in life, and that he witnessed the decline of his powers (v. 7, § 7, x. 1. §§ 11, 24, 36, xii. 11, § 3). Now we know from other sources that Domitius Afer died in A.D. 59 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 19; Frontin. de Aequid. 102). Having revisited Spain, he returned from thence (A.D. 63) in the train of Galba, and forthwith began to practice at the bar (vii. 2), where he acquired considerable reputation. But he was chiefly distinguished as a teacher of eloquence, bearing away the palm in this department from all his rivals, and associating his name even to a proverb, with pre-eminence in the art. Among his pupils were numbered Pliny the younger (Plin. Ep. ii. 14, vi. 6) and the two grand-nephews of Domitian. By this prince he was invested with the insignia and title of consual (consularia ornamentos), and is, moreover, celebrated as the first public instructor, who, in virtue of the endowment by Vespasian (Suet. Vesp. 18), received a regular salary from the imperial exchequer. After having devoted twenty years, commencing probably with A.D. 69, to the laborious duties of his profession, he retired into private life, and is supposed to have died about A.D. 118. Martial, himself from the neighbourhood of Calagurris (Ep. i. 62), and fond of commemorating the literary glories of his own land, although he pays a tribute to the fame of Quintilian (xi. 90).

"Quintiliane, vagae moderator summata juventae, Gloria Romanae, Quintiliane, toge,"—nowhere claims him as a countryman, and hence it has been concluded that he was not, by birth a Spaniard, but this negative evidence cannot be allowed to outweigh the direct testimony of Ausonius (Prof. i. 7), confirmed by Hieronymus (Chron. Euseb. Olymp. ccxxi. ccxxvi.), and Cassiodorus (Chron. sub Domitian. ann. viii.). It is frequently affirmed in histories of Roman literature that the father of Quintilian was a pleader, and that his grandfather was Quintilian the declamer spoken of by Seneca, but the passages referred to in proof of these assertions will be found not to warrant any such inferences (ix. 3. § 73; Senec. Controv. v. prof. and 33).

Doubts have been expressed with regard to the emperor to whom Quintilian was indebted for the honours alluded to above, and it has been confidently maintained that Hadrian, not Domitian, was his patron. In the proemium to the fourth book of the Institutions the author records with grateful pride that Domitians Augustus had committed to his care the grandsons of his sister,—that is, the sons of Flavius Clemens and Domitilla the younger (see Sueton. Dom. 15; Dion Cass. p. 1112, ed. Reimar). Again, Ausonius, in his Gratianum Actio ad Gratianum, remarks "Quintilianus consularia per Clementem ornamenta sortitus honestamenta nominis potius videtur quam insignia potestatis habuisse." It would be false scepticism to doubt that the Clemens here named is the Flavius Clemens to whose children Quintilian acted as preceptor, and if this be admitted, the question seems to be set at rest. To this distinction doubtless the satirist alludes, when he sarcastically declares

"Si Fortuna valet fines de rhetore consul."
HOE inter sumus sestertia Quintiliano
Ut multurn duo sufficient; res nulla minoris Constabat patri quam filius. Unde igitur tot Quintilianus habet saltus," and then proceeds to ascribe his singular prosperity to the influence of good luck. On the other hand, Pliny, in a letter inscribed "Quintiliano sono" (vi. 32, comp. 6), makes him a present of 50,000 sesterces, about 400L sterling, as a contribution towards the outfit of a daughter about to be married, assigning as a reason for his liberality "Te porro, animo beatissimum, medium facultatibus, scis." Passing over the untenable supposition that Pliny may have been addressing some Quintilian different from the rhetorician, or that the estates indicated above may have been acquired at a later period, we must observe that Juvenal here employs a tone of declamatory exaggeration, and that he speaks with evident, though suppressed bitterness of the good fortune of Quintilian, probably in consequence of the flattery lavished by the latter on the hated Domitian (e. g. proem. lib. iv.); we must bear in mind also, that although the means of Quintilian may not have been so ample as to render an act of generosity on the part of a rich and powerful pupil in any way unacceptable, still the handsome income which he enjoyed (100,000 sesterces = 600L, Stat. Vesp. 18) must have appeared boundless wealth when compared with the indigence of the troops of half-starved grammarians who thronged the metropolis, and whose miseries are so forcibly depicted in the piece where the above lines are found.

The epistle of Pliny has suggested another difficulty. Quintilian, in the preface to his sixth book, laments in very touching language the death of his only son, whose improvement had been one of his chief inducements to undertake the work. He is thus led on to enter into details regarding his family bereavements: first of all he lost his wife, at the age of nineteen, who left behind her two boys; the younger died when five years old, the elder at ten; but there is no allusion to a daughter, and indeed his words clearly imply that two children only had been born to him, both of whom he had lost. Hence we are driven to the supposition that he must have married a second time, that the lady was the daughter of a certain Tutilius (Plin. L. c.), and that the offspring of this union was the girl whose approaching marriage with Nonius Celer called forth the gift of Pliny. It will be seen too that Quintilian, at the lowest computation, must have been nearly fifty when he was left childless, consequently he must have been so far advanced in life when his daughter became marriageable, that it is impossible to believe that he amassed a fortune subsequent to that event.

The great work of Quintilian is a complete system of rhetoric in twelve books, entitled De Institutione Oratoria Libri XII., or sometimes, Institutiones Oratoire, dedicated to his friend Marcellus Victorius, himself a celebrated orator, and a favorite of Caesar (Stat. Vite. iv. 4.). It was written during the reign of Domitian, while the author was discharging his duties as preceptor to the sons of the emperor's niece (Proem. lib. iv. x. 1. § 9). In a short preface to his bookseller Trypho, he acquaints us that he commenced this undertaking after he had retired from his labours as a public instructor (probably in A.D. 89), and that he finished his task in little more than two years. This period appears, at first sight, short for the completion of a performance so comprehensive and so elaborate, but we may reasonably believe that his professional career had rendered him so familiar with the subject, and that in his capacity as a lecturer he must have so frequently enlarged upon all its different branches, that little would be necessary except to digest and arrange the materials already accumulated. Indeed, it appears that two books upon rhetoric had been already published under his name, but without his sanction; being, in fact, notes taken down by some of his pupils, of conversations which he had held with them.

In an introductory chapter addressed to Marcellus, he briefly indicates the plan which he had followed, and the distribution of the different parts. The first book contains a dissertation on the preliminary training requisite before a youth can enter directly upon the studies necessary to mould an accomplished orator (ea quae sunt ante officium rhetoris), and presents us with a carefully sketched outline of the method to be pursued in educating children, from the time they leave the cradle until they pass from the hands of the grammarian. In the second book we find an exposition of the first principles of rhetoric, together with an investigation into the nature and essence of the art (prima apud rhetorem elementa et quae de ipso rhetoricae substantia quaeruntur). The five following are devoted to invention and arrangement (inventio, dispositio); the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh to composition (including the proper use of the figures of speech) and delivery, comprised under the general term elocutio, and the last is occupied with what the author considers by far the most important portion of his project (partem operis destinati longe gravissimam), an inquiry, namely, into various circumstances not included in a course of scholastic discipline, but essential to the formation of a perfect public speaker; such as his manners—his moral character,—the principles by which he must be guided in undertaking, in preparing, and in conducting causes,—the peculiar style of eloquence which he may adopt with greatest advantage,—the collateral studies to be pursued— the age at which it is most suitable to commence pleading — the necessity of retiring before the powers begin to fail—and various other kindred topics.

This production bears throughout the impress of a clear, sound judgment, keen discrimination, and pure taste, improved by extensive reading, deep reflection, and long practice. The diction is highly polished, and very graceful. The fastidious critic may, indeed, detect here and there an obscure, affected phrase, or a word employed in a sense not authorised by the purest models of Latinity, but these blemishes, although significant of the age to which the treatise belongs, are by no means so numerous or so glaring as seriously to injure its general beauty. In copiousness of style, vividness, and felicity, it is unquestionably superior to the essay on the same subject ascribed to Cicero, although each possesses its peculiar merits, which are fully expounded in the laborious comparison instituted by Campanus. The sections which possess the greatest interest for general readers are those chapters in the first book which relate to elementary education, and the commencement of the tenth book, which furnishes us with a compressed but spirited history of Greek and Roman literature, in which the merits and defects of the great masters, in so far as they bear upon the object in view, are seized upon, and exhibited with great precision, force and truth.

One hundred and sixty-four declarations are extant under the name of Quintilian, nineteen of considerable length; the remaining one hundred and forty-five, which form the concluding portion only of a collection which originally extended to three hundred and eighty-eight pieces, are mere skeletons or fragments. No one believes these to be the genuine productions of Quintilian, although some of them were unquestionably received as such by Lactantius and Jerome, and few suppose that they proceeded from any one individual. They apparently belong not only to different persons, but to different periods, and neither in style nor in substance do they offer any thing which is either attractive or useful. The conjecture, founded on a sentence in Trebellius Pollio (Trig. Tyrann. iv.), that they ought to be ascribed to the younger Postumus, does not admit of proof or refutation.

At the end of the eighth book of the Institutions, we read “Sed de hoc satis, quia eundem locum plenius in eo libro quo causas corruptae eloquentiae reddedamus, tractavimus.” These words have very naturally led some scholars to conclude that the well-known anonymous Dialoga de Auctoribus, written in the sixth year of Vespasian (see c. 17), and which often, although upon no good authority, bears the second title Sive de Causis Corruptae Eloquentiae, ought to be assigned to Quintilian. This hypothesis, for many reasons, cannot be maintained, but the tract may with greater propriety be discussed under Tacitus, among whose works it is now generally printed.

The first MS. of Quintilian was discovered in the monastery of St. Gall by Poggio the Florentine, when he was attending the council of Constance, and is probably the same with the Codex Laurentians, now preserved at Florence.

The Edition Princes of the Institutions was printed at Rome by Phil. de Lignamine, fol. 1470, with a letter prefixed from J. A. Campanus to Cardinal F. Piccolomini, and a second edition was printed at the same place in the same year, by Sweyheim and Pannartz, with an address from Andrew Bishop of Aleria to Pope Paul the Second. These were followed by the edition of Jenson, fol. Venet. 1471, and at least eight more appeared before the end of the fifteenth century. The nineteen larger Declaimations, and The Institutions were first published together at Treviso, fol. 1492.

One hundred and thirty-six of the shorter declamations were first published at Parmo by Tadeus Ugoletus in 1494, were reprinted at Paris in 1509, and again at the same place with the notes and emendations of Petrus Aerodium in 1563. The remaining nine were added from an ancient MS. by Petrus Pithecus (Paris, 8vo. 1580), who appended to them fifty-one pieces of a similar description bearing the title “Ex Calpurnio Flacco Excerptae X. Rhetorum Minorum.”

The most important editions of Quintilian are, that of Burmann, 2 vols. 4to., Lug. Bat. 1720; that of Gesner, 4to. Gott. 1738; and best of all, that begun by Spalding and finished by Zumpt, 6 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1796—1829. The first of the above contains both the Institutions and the whole of the Declamations, the two others the Institutions only.

The Declamations have been translated into English by Warr, 8vo. Lond. 1686 (published anonymously); into French by Du Tail, 4to. Paris, 1658 (the larger declamations only); into Italian by Orazio Toscanella, 4to. Venez. 1586; and into German by J. H. Steffens, 8vo. Zelle, 1767 (a selection only). [W. R.]

QUINTILIANUS, NOCTIUS. 1. SEXTUS NOCTIUS L. F. L. N. QUINTILIANUS, was consul A. D. 8 with M. Furius Camillus (Fasti Capit.; Dion Cass. lv. 33). It appears from coins that he was also triumvir of the mint under Augustus (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 262).

2. SEXTUS QUINTIUS QUINTILIANUS, probably a son of the preceding, was consul suffectus in the reign of Caligula, A. D. 40 (Fasti).

QUINTILIANUS CONDITUS. [Conditus.]

QUINTILIUS MAXIMUS. [Conditus.]

QUINTIUS, a gem-engraver, of unknown time. Two of his works are extant; the one representing Neptune drawn by two sea-horses, cut in beryl (Stosch, No. 57; Bracci, pl. 100); the other a naked Mercury (Spilbury Gems, No. 27). [P. S.]

QUINTILIANUS, M. AURELIUS, the brother of the emperor M. Aurelius Claudius Gothicus, was elevated to the throne by the troops whom he commanded at Aquileia, in A. D. 270. But as the army at Sirmium, where Claudius died, had proclaimed Aurelian emperor, Quintillus put an end to his own life, seeing himself deserted by his own soldiers, to whom the rigour of his discipline had given offence. Most of the ancient writers say that he reigned only seventeen days; but since we find a great number of his coins, it is probable that he enjoyed the imperial dignity for a few months, as Zosimus states. He had two children. His character is said to have been unblushing, and his praises are sounded in the same lofty strain as those of his brother. [See Vol. I. p. 777.] (Trebell. Poll. Claud. 10, 12, 13; Eutrop. ix. 12; Vict. Epit. 34; Zosim. l. 47; Eckhel, vol. vii. pp. 477, 478.)

COIN OF QUINTILIANUS.

QUINTILLUS, PLAUTIUS. 1. Consul in A. D. 159 with Statius Priscus (Fasti).
QUINTUS. 2. M., consul with Commodus in a. d. 177 (Fasti). QUINTUS. 1. D. QUINTUS, a man of obscure birth, but of great military reputation, commanded the Roman fleet at Tarentum in b. c. 210, and was slain in a naval engagement in that year. (Liv. xxvi. 39.)

2. P. QUINTUS, the person whom Cicero defended in b. c. 81. The oration in his behalf is still extant.

3. L. QUINTUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 74, is characterised by Cicero as a man well fitted to speak in public assemblies (Cic. Brut. 62). He distinguished himself by his violent opposition to the constitution of Sulla, and endeavoured to regain for the tribunes the power of which they had been deprived. The unpopularity excited against the judges by the general belief that they had been bribed by Quintius to condemn Opippianus, was of service to Quintus in attacking another of Sulla's measures, by which the judges were taken exclusively from the senatorial order. Quintius warmly espoused the cause of Opippianus, constantly asserted his innocence, and raised the flame of popular indignation to such a height, that Junius, who had presided at the trial, was obliged to retire from public life. L. Quintius, however, was not strong enough to obtain the repeal of any of Sulla's laws. The consul Lucullus opposed him vigorously in public, and induced him, by persuasion in private, says Plutarch, to abandon his attempts. It is not improbable that the aristocracy made use of the powerful persuasion of money to keep him quiet. (Plut. Lucull. 5; Sallus. Hist. p. 173, ed. Orelli; Pseudo-Ascon. in Dion. in Coecel. p. 103, in Act. i. in Verr. pp. 127, 141, ed. Orelli; Cic. pro Client. 27—29, 37, 39.)

In b. c. 67 Quintus was praetor, in which year he took his revenge upon his old enemy Lucullus, by inducing the senate to send him a successor in his province, although he had, according to a statement of Sallust, received money from Lucullus to prevent the appointment of a successor. (Plut. Lucull. 53, where he erroneously called L. Quintus; Sall. ap. Schol. in Cic. de Leg. Man. p. 441, ed. Orelli.)

QUINTUS, an eminent physician at Rome, in the former half of the second century after Christ. He was a pupil of Marinos (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Hom.” ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136), and not his tutor, as some modern writers assert. He was tutor to Lycur (id. libid.) and Satyrus (id. libit., De Anatome. Anim. i. 1, 2, vol. ii. pp. 217, 225, De Antidi. i. 14, vol. xiv. p. 71), and Hippianus (id. Comment. in Hippocr. “Epip. III.” i. 29, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 575). Some persons say he was also one of the tutors of Galen himself, but this is probably an error. He was so much superior to his medical colleagues that they grew jealous of his eminence, and formed a sort of coalition against him, and forced him to quit the city by charging him with killing his patients (id. De Praenad. ad Epip. c. 1, vol. iv. p. 197). He died about the year 148 (id. De Anat. Anim. i. 2, vol. ii. p. 225). He was particularly celebrated for his knowledge of anatomy (id. De Libris Propriis, c. 2, vol. xix. p. 22), but wrote nothing himself, either on this or any other medical subject (id. Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Hom.” i. 25, ii. 6, vol. xv. pp. 68, 136); his pupil Lycur professing to deliver his master's opinions (id. Comment. in Hippocr. “Aphor.” iii. praef. vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 562). He appears to have commented on the “Aphorisms” and the “Epitomae” of Hippocrates, but Galen says that his explanations were not always sound (Comment. in Hippocr. “Epip. I.” i. praef. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 6, De Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 57). Several of his sayings have been preserved, which show more rudeness than wit, and (as Galen says) are more suitable to a jester than to a physician (De Sanit. Tu. iii. 13, vol. vi. p. 228, Comment. in Hippocr. “Epip. VI.” iv. 9, vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 151; Pallad. Comment. in Hippocr. “Epip. VI.” ap. Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 113). He is mentioned in several other passages of Galen's writings, and also by Aetius (i. 1, p. 39); and he is probably the physician quoted by Oribasius (Synop. ad Eustath. iii. p. 56). [W. A. G.]

QUINTUS, a gem-engraver, and his brother Aulus, flourished probably in the time of Augustus. There are several works of Aulus extant, but only a fragment of one by Quintus. From the manner in which their names appear on their works, ΑΥΛΟΣ ΑΛΕΞΩ ΕΠΙ, ΚΟΙΝΤΟΣ ΑΛΕΞΕΙΟΠΙΕΙ, Winckelmann and Sillici conclude that their father's name was Alexander; but Osann endeavoured to prove that the genitive, of ΑΛΕΞΕΙΟΠΙΕΙ, but of ΑΛΕΞΩ, appears (Bracci, fol. 8; Sillici, Cat. Art. s. v.; Osann, in the Kunstblatt, 1830, p. 336.) [P. S.]

QUINTUS CURTIUS. [CURTIUS.]

QUINTUS SYMRNAEUS (Κύωνος Συμώναος), commonly called QUINTUS CALABER, from the circumstance that the first copy through which his poem became known was found in a convent at Otranto in Calabria, was the author of a poem in 14 books, entitled τα μετ' Ομηρου, ο παραληπόμενα Ωμηρο(ν). Scarcely any thing is known of his personal history; but from the metrical and poetic characteristics of his poem, as compared with the school of Neomus, it appears most probable that he lived towards the end of the fourth century after Christ. From a passage in his poem (xii. 306—513), it would seem that even in early youth he made trial of his poetic powers, while engaged in the ordinary employment of a temple of Artemis in the territory of Smyrna. The matters treated of in his poem are the events of the Trojan war from the death of Hector to the return of the Greeks. It begins rather abruptly with a description of the grief and consternation at the death of Hector which reigned among the Trojans, and then introduces Penthesileia, queen of the Amazons, who comes to their aid. In the second book we have the arrival, exploits, and death of Memnon; in the third, the death of Achilles. The fourth and fifth books describe the funeral games in honour of Achilles, the contest about his arms, and the death of Ajax. In the sixth book, Neoptolemus is sent for by the Greeks, and Euryalus comes to the help of the Trojans. The seventh and eighth books describe the arrival and exploits of Neoptolemus; the ninth contains the exploits of Deiphobus, and the sending for Philoctetes by the Greeks. The tenth, the death of Paris and the suicide of Oenone, who had refused to heal him. The eleventh book narrates the last unsuccessful attempt of the Greeks to carry Ilion by storm; the twelfth and thirteenth describe the capture of the city by means of the wooden horse; the fourteenth, the rejoicing of the Greeks,—the reconciliation of Menelaois and Helena, — the sacrifice of Polyxena at the tomb of Achilles, — the embarkation of the Greeks, — the scattering of their ships, and the death of Ajax.

In phraseology, similes, and other technicalities, Quintus closely copied Homer. The materials for his poem he found in the works of the earlier poets of the epic cycle. But not a single poetical idea of his own seems ever to have inspired him. He was incapable of understanding or appropriating any thing except the majestic flow of the language of the ancient epic. His gods and heroes are alike devoid of individuality; every word, like every other, in his work was made copious use. With respect to chronology his poem is as punctual as a diary. But his style is clear, and marked on the whole by purity and good taste, without any bombast or exaggeration. There can be little doubt that the work of Quintus Smyrnaeus is nothing more than an amplification or remodelling of the poems of Arctinus and Lesches. It is clear that he had access to the same sources as Virgil, though there is nothing from which it would appear that he had the Roman poet before his eyes. He appears, however, to have made diligent use of Apollonius.

The first edition of Quintus was published by Aldus Manutius in 1504 or 1505, from a very faulty MS. Laur. Rhodomanus, who spent thirty years upon the correction and explanation of the text of Quintus, published an improved edition in 1601. But the standard edition, founded like all the extant manuscripts, is that of Tychsen, Strasburg, 1807. It is also printed along with Hesiod, Apollonius, &c., in Didot's edition, Paris, 1840. A smaller poem on the Twelve Labours of Hercules, ascribed to Quintus Smyrnaeus, is extant in MS. (Bernhardt, Grundriss der Griech. Literatur, vol. ii. p. 246, &c.; Tychsen, Comment. de Quinti Smyrnaei Paralip., Göttingen, 1783; the materials of which are also contained in his edition.)

QUIRINUS: CLODIUS, praefectus of the rowers at Ravenna, anticipated his condemnation by taking poison. A. D. 56. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 30.)

QUIRINUS, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (ii. 48), a Sabine word, and perhaps to be derived from quiris, a lance or spear. It occurs first of all as the name of Romulus, after he had been raised to the rank of a divinity, and the festival celebrated in his honour bore the name of Quirina. (Verg. Aen. i. 292; Cic. De Nat. Doctr. ii. 24; Ov. Am. iii. 5. 51, Fast. iv. 56, 808, vi. 375, Met. xv. 862.) Owing to the probable meaning of the word it is also used as a surname of Mars, Janus, and even of Augustus. (Ov. Fast. ii. 477; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 610; Sueton. Aug. 22; Macrobi. Sat. i. 9; Verg. Georg. iii. 27; Lydus, De Mens. p. 144; comp. Romulus.)

QUIRINUS, P. SULPICIUS. 1. Censor b. c. 42 with L. Antonius Pieta, and consul successively b. c. 36 in the place of M. Cocceius Nerva (Fasti).

2. Consul b. c. 12 with M. Valerius Messalla. It would appear from his name that he was the son of the preceding; but the language of Tacitus (Ann. iii. 48) implies that he was of obscure origin. This historian relates that he was a native of Lanuvium, and had no connection with the ancient Sulpiicia gens; and that it was owing to his military abilities and active services that he gained the consulship under Augustus. He was subsequently sent into Cilicia, where he subdued the Imonodenses, a fierce people dwelling in Mount Taurus; and in consequence of this success, he received the honour of the triumphal ornaments. In b. c. 1, or a year or two afterwards, Augustus appointed him to direct the counsels of his grandson C. Caesar, then in Armenia; and on his way to the East he paid a visit to Tiberius, who was at that time living at Rhodes. Some years afterwards, but not before A. D. 5, he was appointed governor of Syria, but in this office he took a census of the Jewish people. This is the statement of Josephus, and appears to be at variance with that of Luke, who speaks as if the census or enrolment of Cyrenius was made at the time of the birth of Christ. This discrepancy has given rise to much discussion and various explanations, of which the reader will find an able account in Winer's Bibliothek Realwörterbuch, s. v. Quirinus.

Quirinus had been married to Aemilia Lepida, whom he divorced; but in A. D. 20, twenty years after the divorce, he brought an accusation against her, because she pretended to have had a son by him. She was at the same time accused of other crimes; but the conduct of Quirinus met with general disapprobation as harsh and revengeful. Tiberius, notwithstanding his dissimulation, was evidently in favour of the prosecution, as he was anxious to conciliate Quirinus, who had no children, and might therefore be expected to leave his property to the emperor. Quirinus died in A. D. 21, and was honoured with a public funeral, which Tiberius requested of the senate. (Dion Cass. liv. 28; Tac. Ann. ii. 30, iii. 22, 48; Suet. Tib. 49; Strab. xii. p. 569; Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 1. § 1; St. Luke, ii. 1; comp. Acts of Apost. v. 37.)
vived the old accusation of perduellio, which had been discontinued for some centuries, since persons found guilty of the latter crime were given over to the public executioner and hanged on the accursed tree. In accusations of perduellio, the criminal was brought to trial before the duumviri perduellionis, who were specially appointed for the occasion, and who had in former times been nominated by the comitia, first of the curiae and afterwards of the centuries. On the present occasion, however, but on what ground we are not told, the duumviri were appointed by the praetor. They were C. Caesar himself and his relative L. Caesar. With such judges the result could not be doubtful; Rabi-rius was forthwith condemned; and the sentence of death would have been carried into effect, had he not availed himself of his right of appeal to the people in the comitia of the centuries. The case excited the greatest interest; since it was not simply the life or death of Rabi-rius, but the power and authority of the senate, which were at stake. The aristocracy made every effort to save the accused; while the popular leaders, on the other hand, used every means to excite the multitude against him, and thus secure his condemnation. On the day of the trial Labienus placed the bust of Saturninus in the Campus Martius, which thus appeared, as it were, to call for vengeance on his murderers. Cicero and Hortensius appeared on behalf of Rab-rius; but that they might not have much opportu-nity for moving the people by their eloquence, Labienus limited the defence to half an hour. Cicero did all he could for his client. He admitted that Rabi-rius had taken up arms against Saturninus; but denied that he had killed the tribune, who had perished by the hands of a slave of the name of Sceva. The former act he justified by the example of Marcus, the great hero of the people, as well as of all the other distinguished men of the time. But the eloquence of the advocate was all in vain; the people demanded vengeance for the fallen tribune. They were on the point of voting, and would in-fallibly have ratified the decision of the duumvirs, had not the meeting been broken up by the praetor, Q. Metellus Celer, who removed the military flag which floated on the Janiculum. This was in ac-cordance with an ancient custom, which was in-tended to prevent the Campus Martius from being surprised by an enemy, when the territory of Rome scarcely extended beyond the boundaries of the city; and the practice was still maintained, though it had lost all its significance, from that love of preserving the form at least of all ancient institu-tions, which so particularly distinguishes the Ro-mans. Rabi-rius thus escaped, and was not brought to trial again; since Caesar could have had no wish to take the old man's life, and he had already taught the senate an important lesson. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 26—28; Suet. Jul. 12; Cic. pro C. Rubri. passim, in Pls. 2, Orat. 29.)

The previous account has been taken from Dion Cassius, who relates the whole affair with great minuosity of detail. This is true in his prefatory Cicero's oration for Rabi-rius, has questioned the accuracy of the account in Dion Cassius; urging that Cicero speaks (c. 3) of the infliction of a fine by Labienus, which could have nothing to do with a trial of perduellio; and also that Labienus complained of Cicero's having done away with the trial for perduellio ("nam de perduellionis judicio, quod a me subtulat eas criminari soles, meum crimen est, non Rabi-rii," c. 3). Niebuhr, therefore, thinks that the decision of the duumviri was quashed by the consul and the senate, on the ground that the duumviri were appointed by the praetor, contrary to law; and that the speech of Cicero, which is extant, was delivered before the people, not in de-fence of Rabi-rius on an accusation of perduellio, but to save him from the payment of a heavy fine, in which Labienus attempted to condemn him, despairing of a more severe punishment. But in the first place, the strong language which Cicero employs throughout this speech would be almost ridiculous, if the question only related to the in-position of a fine; and in the second place the ob-jections which Niebuhr makes to the account of Dion Cassius, from the language of Cicero, can hardly be sustained. With respect to the former of the two objections, it will be seen by a reference to the oration (c. 3), that Labienus proposed to in-flict two punishments on Rabi-rius, a fine on account of the offences he had committed in his private life, and death on account of the crime of perduellio in murdering Saturninus; to render the vengeance more complete, he wished to confiscate his property as well as take away his life. Cicero most clearly distinguishes between the two. As to the latter objection, that Labienus said that Cicero had done away with trials for perduellio, it is probable that these words only refer to the resolution of Cicero to defend Rabi-rius, and to certain assertions in which he may have made in the senate respecting the il-legality or inexpediency of renewing such an anti-quated form of accusation. (Comp. Drumm, Geschichte Roms, vol. iii. p. 163; Merimee, Etudes sur l'Histoire Romane, vol. ii. p. 99, &c.)

C. Rabi-rius had no children of his own, and adopted the son of his sister, who accordingly took his name. As the latter was born after the death of his father, he is called C. Rabi-rius Postumus. This Rabi-rius, whom Cicero also defended, in b. c. 54, is spoken of under Postumus.

RABI-RIUS. Velleius Paterculus, after enu-merating the distinguished literary characters who lived in the last years of the republic, in passing on to those who approached more nearly to his own age, uses the words "interque (sc. ingenius) proxiimi nostri sed et eminenter princeps carminum Virgilii, Rabi-riusque," where some critics have unjustifiably sought to substitute "Varissiue" or "Horatiusque" for "Rabi-riusque." Ovid also pays a tribute to the genius of the same individual when he terms him "magnum Rabi-rius oris" (Ep. ex Pont. iv. 16. 5), but Quintilian speaks more coolly, "Rabi-rius ac pedo non indigni cogni-tione, si vacet" (x. i. § 90). From Seneca (De Benef. vi. 3), who quotes with praise an expression placed in the mouth of Antonius, *Hoc habeo quad-cunque deti! we are led to conclude that the work of Rabi-rius belonged to the epic class, and that the subject was connected with the Civil Wars.

No portion of this piece was known to exist until among the charred rolls found at Hercu-lea in Gaul a manuscript was discovered which many believe to be a part of the poem of Rabi-rius. It was first printed in the Volumina Herculeanenses (vol. ii. p. 13, fol. Neap. 1809), and subsequently, in a separate form, in a volume edited by Kreyssig under the title "Carminis Latinis de bello Actico s. Alexandriro fragmenta," 4to. Schneeburg, 1814. A translation into Italian appeared at Forlì, 4to. 1830, styled "Frammenti di Rabirio poeta tra-
RACILIUS.

... and in 1835 Kreyssig published "Commentatio de C. Sallustii Crispi Historiarum Libr. III. fragmentis, &c. atque Carminis Latini de Bello Actico sive Alexandrino fragmenta" (8vo. Misen. 1835), which contains a condensed view of the discussions to which these morsels have given rise.

Fulgentius Planciades in his exposition of the word Alstebius quotes a line from "Rabirius in Satyra," where some MSS. give Rabius, a name entirely unknown. Admitting that the common reading is correct, it is impossible, in the absence of all further information, to determine whether the Rabirius referred to is the same Rabirius who is noticed by Velleius, Ovid, Sexen., and Quintil., or a different person, and there seems to be scarcely standing-room for controversy. A good deal, notwithstanding, has been written upon the question, as may be seen by consulting Casabon, de Lyc. Pan. ii. 3.; Besnier, Poude a J. vennel.; Wernsdorf, Port. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. 19; Weichert, de Licio Vario Poeta, Excurs. iv., de Pedone et Rabirii Poeta; Haupt, Rhet. Mus. Folge, vol. iii. 2, p. 308. [W.R.]

RABILEIUS. 1. C. Rabileiis, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 456, attempted to mediate between the consuls in the disputes occasioned between them by the panic of 456. (Cic. de Trop. ii. 3.) by the e. a. ad Juv. vennel.; Müller, Archäologie der Kunst, § 190, n. 3.) [P.S.]

L. RABO'NIUS, was one of the sufferers from the unrighteous decisions of Verres, in his praetorship, b.c. 74. (Cic. Verr. i. 50, 51.)

RABULEIUS. 1. C. Rabuleiis, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 456, attempted to mediate between the consuls in the disputes occasioned between them by the panic of 456. (Cic. de Trop. ii. 3.) by the e. a. ad Juv. vennel.; Müller, Archäologie der Kunst, § 190, n. 3.) [P.S.]

L. RACILIA, the wife of L. Quintius Cicinnaetus. (Liv. iii. 26.)

L. RACILIUS, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 56, was a warm friend of Cicero and of Lentulus Spinther. Cicero had returned from exile in the preceding year, and Racilius had then distinguished himself by his exertions to obtain the recall of the orator. In his tribunitia he attacked Clodius in the senate, with the utmost severity; and he allowed Cicero to publish, under his name, an edict against his great enemy. This document, which is cited by an ancient scholar under the name of Evidentium L. Rocioei Tribuni Plebe, is now lost (Cic. pro Planc. 32, ad Q. Fr. ii. 1, § 2, ii. 6, § 5, ad Fam. i. 7, § 2; Schol. Bok. pro Planc. p. 268, ed. Orelli). In the civil war Racilius espoused Caesar's party, and was with his army in Spain in b.c. 48. There he entered into the conspiracy formed against the life of Q. Cassius Longinus, the governor of that province, and was put to death with the other conspirators, by Longinus. [LONGINUS, No. 15.] (Hirt. B. Alex. 52, 55.)

RA/CLIIUS CONSTANS, governor of Sardinia, under Septimius Severus, by whom he was put to death. (Dion Cass. ixxx. 16.)

RADA/GAUSIUS (Pocoryciers, according to Zosimus), invaded Italy at the head of a formidable host of barbarians, in the reign of the emperor Honorius. The swarm of barbarians collected by him beyond the Rhine and the Danube amounted to 200,000, or perhaps to 400,000 men, but it matters little how many there were. This formidable host was composed of Germanic tribes, as Suevians, Burgundians, and Vandals, and also of Celtic tribes. Jornandes calls Radagaisus a Scythian; whence we may infer that he belonged to one of those Germanic tribes which, at the beginning of the fifth century, arrived in Germany from their original dwellings north of the Euxine, especially as he is sometimes called a king of the Goths. In a.d. 406 Radagaisus invaded Italy, destroyed Pompeiian bounds, was not paid regards to Florence, then a young but flourishing city. The safety of Italy had been entrusted to Stilicho, who had been observing his movements with a small army, consisting of picked soldiers, and reinforced by a contingent of Huns and Goths, commanded by their chiefs Huldin and Sarus. Stilicho now approached to save Florence if possible, and to do his utmost for the preservation of Rome. The barbarians were entrenched on the hills of Faesulae in a strong position, but Stilicho succeeded in surrounding those barren rocks by an extensive line of circumvallation, till Radagaisus was compelled, by the failure of food, to issue forth and offer battle. He was driven back within his own lines, and at last capitulated, on condition that his own and his people's lives should be saved. But Stilicho violated the agreement; Radagaisus was put to death, and his warriors were sold as slaves. This miserable end of the barbarians and the fortunate issue of the events was not laid down to a Florence. (Zosim. v. p. 391, ed. Oxon. 1679; Jornund. De Regn. Success. p. 56, ed. Lindenborg; Oros. vii. 37; Augustin. de Civ. Dei, v. 23; Marcellinus, and Prosper, Chronic.) [W.P.]

M. RAECIUS. 1. Was sent as ambassador into Gaul, with Sex. Antonius, in b.c. 208, to make inquiries respecting the apprehended march of Hasdrubal into Italy. (Liv. xxvii. 36.)

2. Praetor b.c. 170. (Liv. xliii. 11.)

RAGONIUS. 1. Ragonius Celsius, governed the Gauls under the emperor Severus, who addressed a letter to him, which is preserved by Spartianus. (Spart. Pesc. Niger, 3.)

2. Ragonius Clarus, praefectus of Illyricum and the Gauls under the emperor Valerian, who addressed a letter to him, which is likewise preserved. (Trebell. Poll. Triag. Tyr. 19.)

3. L. Ragonius Quintianus, consul with M. Marcus Bassus, in the reign of Diocletianus, a.d. 289 (Fasti).

RALLA, the name of a plebian family of the Marcia gens.

1. M. Marcus Ralla, praetor urbanus b.c. 204. He accompanied Scipio to Africa, and was one of the legates whom Scipio sent to Rome in b.c. 202, with the Carthaginian ambassadors, when the latter sued for peace. (Liv. xxix. 11, 13, xxx. 38.)

2. Q. Marcus Ralla, was created duumvir in b.c. 194, for dedicating a temple, and again in b.c. 192, for the same purpose. (Liv. xxxiv. 57, xxxv. 41.)
REBBUS.

L. RA'MMIUS, a leading man at Brundusium, was accustomed to enter into the Roman general's employ as ambassador. It was said that Persius, king of Macedonia, endeavoured to persuade him to poison such Roman generals as he might indicate, but that Rannius disclosed the treacherous offer first to the legate C. Valerius, and then to the Roman senate. Persius, however, in an embassy which he sent to the senate, strongly denied the truth of the charge, which he maintained was a pure invention of Rannius. (Liv. xii. 17, 41; Appian, Mac. 9, § 4, who calls him Erennius.)

RAMNUS, a freedman of M. Antonius, whom he accompanied in the Parthian war. (Plut. Anton. 46.)

RAMSES, the name of many kings of Egypt of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. It was during this era that most of the great monuments of Egypt were erected, and the name is consequently of frequent occurrence on these monuments, where it appears under the form of Ramesses, in Julius Africanus and Eusebius it is written Rameses, Ramses, or Ramesses. The most celebrated of the kings of this name is, however, usually called Sesostris by the Greek writers. [Sesostris.]

RA'NIUS, a name of rare occurrence. Cicero (ad Att. xii. 21) speaks of a Ranius, who may have been a slave or a freedman of Brutus. There was a L. Ranius Aontius Optatus, who was consul in the reign of Constantine, A. D. 334 (Fasti).

RAVILLA, an agnomen of L. Cassius Longinus, consul B. C. 127. [Longinus, No. 4.]

RE'BILUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Caesonia gens.

1. C. CANINIUS REBILUS, praetor B. C. 171, obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xii. 30, 31.)

2. M. CANINIUS REBILUS, probably a brother of the preceding, was sent by the senate into Macedonia, in B. C. 170, along with M. Fulvius Flaccus, in order to investigate the reason of the want of success of the Roman arms in the war against Persia. In B. C. 167 he was one of the three ambassadors appointed by the senate to conduct the Thracian hostages back to Cotys. (Liv. xiii. 11, xlv. 42.)

3. C. CANINIUS REBILUS, was one of Caesar's legates in Gaul in B. C. 52 and 51, and accompanied him in his march into Italy in B. C. 49. Caesar sent him, together with Scribonius Libo, with overtures of peace to Pompey, when the latter was on the point of leaving Italy. In the same year he crossed over to Africa with C. Curio, and was one of the few who escaped with their lives when Curio was defeated and slain by Juba. In B. C. 48 he again fought in Africa, but with more success, for he was now under the command of Caesar himself. After the defeat of Scipio he took the town of Thapsus, on which occasion Hirtius calls him proconsul. In the following year, B. C. 45, during the war in Spain, there was a report that he had perished in a shipwreck (Cic. ad Att. xii. 37, § 4, 44, § 4); but this was false, for he was then in command of the garrison at Hispalis. On the last day of December in this year, on the sudden death of the consul Q. Fabius Maximus, Caesar made Rebilus consul for the few remaining hours of the day. Cicero made himself merry at this appointment, remarking that no one had died in this consulship; that the consul was so wonderfully vigilant that he had never slept during his term of office; and that it might be asked under what consul he had been consul. (Caes. B. G. vii. 83, 90, viii. 24, &c., B. C. i. 36, ii. 24; Hirt, B. Afr. 86, 93, B. Hisp. 35; Dion. Tam. xliii. 46; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 30; Suet. Caes. 76, Ner. 15; Plin. H. N. vii. 53, 54; Tac. Hist. iii. 37; Plut. Caes. 58; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 3.)

4. (Canius) REBILUS, probably a brother of No. 3, was proscribed by the trimmings in B. C. 48, but escaped to Sea. Pompey in Sicily. (Appian, B. C. iv. 48.)

5. C. CANINIUS REBILUS, probably a son of No. 3, was consul suffectus in B. C. 12 (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 10, § 20). In the Fasti Capitolini he is said to have died in his year of office, and could not therefore have been the man of consular rank mentioned by Seneca (de Benef. ii. 21), according to the supposition of Drumm.

6. (Canius) REBILUS, a man of consular rank, and of great wealth but bad character, sent a large sum of money as a present to Julius Gracchi, who refused to accept it on account of the character of the donor (Sen. de Benef. ii. 21). The name of this Rebilus does not occur in the Fasti, and he must, therefore, have been one of the consules suffecti. As Julius Gracchus was put to death in the reign of Caligula, it is very probable that the Rebilus mentioned above is the same as the C. Aminius Rebilus, who put an end to his own life in the reign of Nero. Tacitus describes him as a person of great wealth and bad character, and also states that he was then an old man (Ann. xiii. 30). As the name of C. Aminius Rebilus is evidently corrupt, there can be little doubt that we should change it, as Lipsius proposed, into Caninus Rebillus. (Respecting the Canini Rebil in general, see Drumm, Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 107-109.)

REBIUS, C. AM'INIUS. [Rebilus, No. 6.]

RECARANUS, also called Garanus, a fabulous Italian shepherd of gigantic bodily strength and courage. It is related of him that Cacus, a wicked robber, once stole eight oxen of the herd of Recaranus, which had strayed in the valley of the Circus Maximus, and which the robber carried into his den in Mount Aventine. He dragged the animals along by their tails, and Recaranus would not have discovered them, had not their hiding-place been betrayed by their lowing. Recaranus accordingly entered the cave and slew the robber, notwithstanding his great strength. Hereupon he dedicated to Jupiter the ara maxima, at the foot of the Aventine, and sacrificed to the god the tenth part of the booty. The name Recaranus seems to be connected with gevere or creare, and to signify "the recoverer." The fact of his being a gigantic shepherd was therefore noted by the poets, who, when he led the Romans at an early time to consider him as identical with the Greek Hercules, who was said to have made an expedition to the west of Europe; but the whole story of Recaranus is a genuine Italian legend, without any connection with that about Hercules, although the belief in the identity of the two heroes was so general among the later Romans, that Recaranus was entirely thrown into the back ground. (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 203, 275; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 12; Aurel. Vict. Orig. Gent. Rom. 6; comp. Hartung, Die Relig. der Römer, vol. ii. p. 21, &c.) [L. S.]

RECTOR, NUNIUS. [Nuntius, No. 9.]

RECTUS, AE'MILIUS, governor of Egypt during the reign of Tiberius, sent to the emperor, upon one occasion a larger sum of money than was ordered, whereupon Tiberius wrote back to him that he wished him to shear, not shave his sheep. ( Dion Cass. lvi. 10; comp. Suet. Tib. 10; Oros. vii. 4.)

REDICULUS, a Roman divinity, who had a temple near the Porta Capena, and who was believed to have received his name from having induced Hannibal, when he was near the gates of the city, to return (redire) southward (Fest. p. 282, ed. Müller). A place on the Appian road, near the second mile-stone from the city, was called Campus Rediculi (Plin. II. N. xiii. 60. § 122; Propert. iii. 3, 11). This divinity was probably one of the Lares of the city of Rome, for, in a fragment of Varro (ap. Non. p. 47), he calls himself Catusius, i.e., the god who keeps safe. [L.S.]

REDUX, i.e., "the divinity who leads the traveller back to his own home in safety," occurs as a surname of Fortuna. (Martial. viii. 63; Claudian, de Consol. Hon. vi. 1.) [L.S.]

REGALIA/NUS, P. C., as the name appears on medals; REGALLIANUS, as he is called by Victor (de Caes.); or REGILLIANUS, according to Victor, in his Epitome, and Trebellius Pollio, who ranks him among the thirty tyrants [see Aurelius Victor, De Caesaribus, 263, 3], who was a Decian, allied, it is said, to Decebalus, distinguished himself by his military achievements on the Illyrian frontier, was commended in the warmest terms by Claudius, at that time in a private station, and promoted to a high command by Valerian. The Moeians, terrified by the cruelties inflicted by Gallienus on those who had taken part in the rebellion of Ingenius, suddenly proclaimed Regalianus emperor, and quickly, with the consent of the soldiers, in a new fit of alarm, put him to death. These events took place a.d. 263. (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxxiii. Epit. xxxiii.; Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrran. ix.) [W. R.]

REGILLA, the wife of Herodes Atticus. (Philos. Vit. Soph. ii. 1. §§ 5, 8.) [ATTICUS, HERODES.]

REGILLENSIS, an agnomen of the Claudii [Claudius], and of the Albini, a family of the Postumia gens [Albinus].

REGILLUS, the name of a family of the patrician order, Regillus.

1. M. AEMILIUS REGILLUS, had been declared consul, with T. Oticilus, for b.c. 214, by the centuriae praenotivata, and would undoubtedly have been elected, had not Q. Fabius Maximus, who presided at the comitia, pointed out that there was need of generals of more experience to cope with Hannibal, and urged in addition, that Regillus, in consequence of his being Flamen Quirinalis, ought not to leave the city. Regillus and Oticilius were therefore disappointed in their expectations, and Fabius Maximus himself was elected, with M. Claudius Marcellus, in their stead. Regillus died in b.c. 205, at which time he is spoken of as Flamen Martialis. (Liv. xxiv. 7, 8, 9, xxi. 11.)

2. L. AEMILIUS REGILLUS, probably son of the preceding, was praetor b.c. 190, in the war against Antiochus. He received as his province the command of the fleet, and carried on the naval operations with vigour and success. Supported by the Rhodians, he defeated the fleet of Antiochus, commanded by Polyxenidas, near Myonnesus, a small island off the Ionian coast, and afterwards took the town of Phocaea [POLYXENIDAS]. He obtained a triumph on his return to Rome in the following year. (Liv. xxxvi. 43, xxxvii. 2, 4, 14—32, 58; Appian, Syn. 26, 27.)

3. M. AEMILIUS REGILLUS, a brother of No. 2, whom he accompanied in the war against Antiochus: he died at Samos in the course of the year, b.c. 190. (Liv. xxxvii. 22.)

It would appear that this family became extinct soon afterwards. We learn from a letter of Cicero (ad Att. xii. 24. § 2) that Lepidus, probably M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul b.c. 78, had a son named Regillus, who was dead at the time that Cicero wrote. It is probable that Lepidus wished to revive the cognomen of Regillus in the Aemilia gens, just as he did that of Paulus, which he gave as a surname to his eldest son. [See Vol. II. p. 765, b.]

L. REGILLUS, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 95, is cited by Valerius Maximus (iv. 7. § 3) as a striking instance of a true friend. He was not only content with liberating from prison his friend Q. Servilius Caepio, who had been condemned in that year on account of the destruction of his army by the Cimbri, but he also accompanied him in his exile.

REGYNNUS, C. ANTI STIUS, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul (Caes. B. G. vii. 1, vii. 83, 90). This Regiunnus appears to be the same person as the one whom Cicero mentions as his friend in b.c. 49 (ad Att. x. 12), and who had then the command of the coast of the Lower Sea. He is also in all the probability the same as the C. Antiatus Regius, whose name appears as a triumvir of the mint on the coins of Augustus. On the coin annexed the obverse represents the head of Augustus, and the reverse various instruments used by the pontiffs. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 137.)

COIN OF C. ANTI STIUS REGINUS.

REGYNNUS, T. POMPEIUS, lived in Further Gaul, and was passed over by his brother in his testament. (Val. Max. vii. 8. § 4; Varr. R. R. iii. 12.)

REGULUS, M. AQUILIUS, was one of the delatores or informers in the time of Nero, and thus rose from poverty to great wealth. He was accused in the senate at the commencement of the reign of Vespasian, on which occasion he was defended by L. Vipstanus Messalla, who is described as his frater, whether his brother or cousin is uncertain (Tac. Hist. iv. 42). Under Domitian he resumed his old trade, and became one of the instruments of that tyrant's cruelty. He survived Domitian, and is frequently spoken of by Pliny with the greatest detestation and contempt (Ep. i. 5, ii. 10, iv. 2, vi. 2). Martial, on the contrary, who flattered all the creatures of Domitian, can scarcely find language strong enough to celebrate the virtues, the wisdom, and the eloquence of Regulus. (Ep. i. 13, 83, 112, iv. 16.)

REGULUS, ATTILIUS. 1. M. ATTILIUS REGULUS, consul b.c. 335, with M. Valerius Corpus, marched with his colleague against the Sidicini. (Liv. viii. 16.)

sent the consuls to Sicily with an army of four legions and two hundred ships. Regulus and his colleagues, Atilius and Cn. Cornelius Blasio, were the most important possession of the Carthaginians in Sicily; but they were foiled in their attempts to carry the place by storm, and after losing a great number of men, were obliged to turn the siege into a blockade. (Polyb. i. 39, 41—48; Zonar.
viii. 15; Oros. iv. 10; Diod. Fragm. xxiv.)
This Regulus is the first Atilius who bears the surname Serranus, which afterwards became the name of a distinct family in the gens. The origin of this name is spoken of under Serranus.
5. M. Atilius M. f. M. N. REGULUS, son of the Regulus who perished in Africa [No. 3], was consul for the first time in B.C. 227, with P. Vaerius Flaccus, in which year no event of importance is recorded (Fasti; Gell. iv. 3). He was elected consul a second time in B.C. 217, to supply the place of C. Flaminius, who had fallen in the battle of the Tunisian lake. He carried on the war against Hannibal together with his colleague Serutilus Geminus, on the principles of the dictator Fabius. At the end of their year of office their imperium was prolonged, as the new consuls had not yet been elected; but when Aemilius Paulus and Terentius Varro were at length appointed, and took the field, Regulus was allowed to return to Rome on account of his age, and his colleague Serutilus remained with the army (Liv. xxiii. 25, 32, 34, 40). Polybius, on the contrary, says (iii. 114, 116) that Regulus remained with the new consuls, and fell at the battle of Cannae, where he commanded, with Servilius, the centre of the line. This statement, however, is erroneous, and we must for once follow Livy in preference to Polybius, since it is certain that the same Regulus was censor two years after the battle of Cannae. (Comp. Perizonius, Animad. Hist. c. i, sub fin.; and Schweig-hauser, ad Polyb. iii. 114.)
After the battle of Cannae, B.C. 216, Regulus was one of the triumviri mensarum, who were appointed on account of the scarcity of money. In B.C. 214 he was censor with P. Furius Philus.
These censors punished with severity all persons who had failed in their duty to the state during the great calamities which Rome had lately experienced. All those who had formed the project of leaving Italy after the battle of Cannae, and all those who had been taken prisoners by Hannibal, and when sent as ambassadors to Rome on the promise of returning to the Carthaginian camp, had not redeemed their word, were reduced to the condition of aerrarians. The same punishment was inflicted on all the citizens who had neglected to serve in the army for four years without having a solid ground of excuse. Towards the end of the year, when the new tribunes of the people entered upon their duties, one of their number, Metellus, who had been reduced to the condition of an aerrarian by the censors, attempted to bring these magistrates to trial before the people, but was prevented by the other tribunes from prosecuting such an unprecedented course [Metellus, No. 2]. As Furius Philus died at the beginning of the following year, before the solemn purification (lustrum) of the people had been performed, Regulus, as was usual in such cases, resigned his office. (Liv. xxiii.
21, xxiv. 11, 18, 43; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 8.)
6. C. Atilius M. F. M. N. REGULUS, probably a brother of No. 5, consul B.C. 225, with L.
REGULUS.

Aemilius Papus, was sent against the inhabitants of Sardinia, who had revolted, and whom he quickly brought to submission again. On his return to Italy he fought against the Gauls who were returning from Etruria, and fell in the battle. (Polyb. ii. 23, 27, 28; Zonar. viii. 20; Oros. iv. 13; Eutrop. iii. 5; Plin. H. N. iii. 20.)

REGULUS, LICINIUS, was one of the senators who did not obtain a place in the senate when that body was reorganised by Augustus. (Dion Cass. liv. 14.)

REGULUS, LIVINIEUS. 1, 2, M. LIVINIEUS REGULUS and L. LIVINIEUS REGULUS, two brothers, who were friends of Cicero, and displayed their zeal in his cause when he was banished, B.C. 58. Cicero does not mention their gentle name; but as he speaks of Livineius as a freedman of M. Regulus, and L. Livineius Trypho as a freedman of L. Regulus, there can be no doubt that their gentle name was Livineius ( Cic. ad Att. iii. 17, ad Fam. xiii. 60). One of these brothers, probably Lucius, fought under Caesar in the African war, B.C. 46 (Hirt. B. Afr. 83), and he is apparently the same as the L. LIVINIEUS REGULUS, whose name occurs on a great number of coins struck in the time of Julius Caesar and Augustus. Specimens of the most important of these are given below. The head on the obverse of the first four is the same, and is probably intended to represent some ancestor of the Reguli. On the obverse of the first we have the legend L. REGVLVS PR., and on the reverse REGVLVS F. PRAEF. (v.). The PR. on the obverse signifies praetor, and REGVLVS F. on the reverse signifies REGULUS PIA LIUS. It would, therefore, appear that the coins were struck by Regulus, the son of L. Regulus the prae tor; and from the addition of PRAEF. VR., that is, Praefectus Urbi, it would further seem that he was one of the praefecti urbi, who were left by Caesar in charge of the city, when he marched against the sons of Pompey in Spain in B.C. 45. (Dion Cass. xliii. 28.) These praefecti had the right of the fasces and the sella curulias, as appears from the reverse of the first two coins. The combats of wild beasts on the reverse of the third coin probably refer to the splendid games exhibited by Julius Caesar. The fifth coin was struck at a later time by Regulus, when he was triumvir of the mint under Augustus. On the obverse is the head of Augustus with C. CAESAR III. VIR. R. P. C. (i.e. triumvir rei publicae constituendiæ), and on the reverse a figure of Victory. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 235, 237.)

REGENIUS.

3. LIVINIEUS REGULUS, a senator in the reign of Tiberius, who defended Cn. Piso in A.D. 20, when many of his other friends declined the unpopular office. [PISO, No. 23.] He was afterwards expelled from the senate, though on what occasion is not mentioned; and at a still later time, in the reign of Nero, A.D. 59, he was banished on account of certain disturbances which took place at a show of gladiators which he gave. (Tac. Ann. iii. 11, xiv. 17.)

RE'GULUS, ME'MMIUS. [MEMMIUS, Nos. 11 and 12.]

REGULUS, M. MET'ILIUS, consul A.D. 157, with M. Cibica Barbarus (Fasti).

REGULUS, RO'SCIUS, was consul suffectus in the place of Caesar, for a single day in A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. iii. 37.)

REMMIUS PALAEMON. [Palaemon.]

REMUS, the twin brother of Romulus. [See ROMULUS.]

RE'NIA GEN'S, known to us only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of Pallas, and on the reverse a chariot drawn by two goats, with C. RENI, and underneath ROMA. To what circumstance these goats allude, it is quite impossible to say. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 291, 292.)

COINS OF C. LIVINIEUS REGULUS.

COIN OF RENIA GEN'S.

REPENTI'NUS, CALPURNIUS, a centurion in the army in Germany, was put to death on account of his fidelity to the emperor Galba, A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 56, 59.)

REPENTI'NUS, FAbIUS, praefectus praetorii, with Cornelius Victorinus, under the emperor Antoninus Pius. (Capitol, Anton. Pius, 8.)
REPOSIA'NUS, the name prefixed to a poem, first published by Burmann, extending to 182 hexameter lines, and entitled, "Consenbitus Martis et Veneris." With regard to the author nothing is known. Unless we attribute some inaccuracies in metre and some peculiarities in phraseology to a corrupt text, we must conclude that he belongs to a late epoch, but the piece is throughout replete with grace and spirit, and presents a series of brilliant pictures. Wernsdorf imagines, that for Reposianus we ought to read Nepotianus, merely because the former designation does not elsewhere occur; but this conjecture being altogether unsupported by evidence, will be received with favour but few. The verses are to be found in Burmann, Anthol. Lat. i. 72, or No. 559, ed. Meyer; see also Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min. vol. iv. par. i. pp. 32, 319, vol. v. par. iii. pp. 1470, 1477. [W. R.]

RESTITO, A'NTIUS. 1. The author of a sumptuary law, which, besides limiting the expense of entertainments, enacted that no magistrate or magistrate elect should dine abroad anywhere except at the houses of certain persons. This law, however, was little observed; and we are told that Antius never dined out afterwards, that he might not see his own law violated. We do not know in what year this law was passed; but it was subsequent to the sumptuary law of the consul Aemilius Lepidus, n. c. 78, and before the one of Caesar (Gell. ii. 24; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 13).

2. Probably a son of the preceding, was prescribed by the triumvirs in n. c. 43, but was preserved by the fidelity of a slave, and by his means escaped to Sex. Pompeius in Sicily. (Val. Max. vi. 8. § 7; Appian, B. C. iv. 43; Macrobr. Sat. i. 11.)

The name of C. Antius Restio occurs on several coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of a man, and on the reverse Hercules, holding in one hand a club, and in the other a trophy, with the skin of a lion thrown across his arm. It is conjectured that the head on the obverse is that of the proposer of the sumptuary law mentioned above [No. 1], and that the coin was struck by his son [No. 2]. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 139.)

COIN OF C. ANTIUS RESTIO.

RESTITU'TUS, CLA'UDIUS, an orator of considerable reputation in the reign of Trajan, was a friend of the younger Pliny, and is likewise celebrated 'by Martial in an epigram on the anniversary of his birth-day. (Plin. Ep. iii. 9. § 16, vi. 17, vii. 1; Martial, x. 87.)

REX, MA'RCIUS. 1. Q. MARCIUS REX, tribune of the plebs b. c. 196, proposed to the people to make peace with Philip. (Liv. xxxiii. 25.)

2. P. MARCIUS REX, was sent by the senate with two colleagues on a mission to the consul C. Cassius Longinus, in b. c. 171. (Liv. xliii. 1.)

RHAMNU'SIA.

3. Q. MARCIUS REX, praetor b. c. 144, was commissioned by the senate to build an aqueduct, and in order that he might complete it, his imperium was prolonged for another year. This aqueduct, known by the name of Agua Marcia, was one of the most important, and is spoken of at length in the Dictionary of Antiquities (p. 110, 2d ed.). (Frontin. de Aqaed. 12; Plin. H. N. xxxi. 3. s. 24; Plut. Coriol. 1.)

4. Q. MARCIUS Q. P. Q. N. REX, consul b. c. 118, with M. Porcius Cato. The colony of Narbo Martius in Gaul was founded in this year. Marcus carried on war against the Stoemi, a Ligurian people at the foot of the Alps, and obtained a triumph in the following year on account of his victories over them. Marcus lost during his consulship his only son, a youth of great promise, but had such mastery over his feelings as to meet the senate on the day of his son's burial, and perform his regular duties (Plin. H. N. xxxi. 19; Liv. Epit. 62; Oros. v. 14; Fasti Capit.; Val. Max. v. 10. § 3). The sister of this Marcus Rex married C. Julius Caesar, the grandfather of the dictator. [MARCIUS, No. 2.]

5. Q. MARCIUS Q. F. REX, probably a grandson of No. 4, was consul b. c. 68, with L. Ceccilius Metellus. His colleague died at the commencement of his year of office, and as no consul was elected in his place, we find the name of Marcus Rex in the Fasti with the remark, solus consulatum gessit. He was proconsul in Cilicia in the following year, and there refused assistance to Lucullus, at the instigation of his brother-in-law, the celebrated P. Clodius, whom Lucullus had offended. In b. c. 66, Marcus had to surrender his province and army to Pompeius in compliance with the Lex Manilia. On his return to Rome he sued for a triumph, but as obstacles were thrown in the way by certain parties, he remained outside the city to prosecute his claims, and was still in sight of the Catilinarian conspiracy broke out in b. c. 63. The senate sent him to Faesulae, to watch the movements of C. Mallius or Manlius, Catiline's general. Mallius sent proposals of peace to Marcus, but the latter refused to listen to his terms unless he consented first to lay down his arms (Dion Cass. xxxv. 4, 14, 15, 17, xxxvi. 26, 31; Cic. in Pison. 4; Sall. Hist. 5, Cat. 30, 32—34). Marcus Rex married the eldest sister of P. Clodius [CLAUDIA, No. 7]. He died before b. c. 61, without leaving his brother-in-law the inheritance he had expected (Cic. ad Att. i. 16. § 10).

REX, RU'BRIUS, probably a false reading in Appian (B. C. ii. 113) for Rubrius Rusa. [RUGA.]

RHADAMANTHUS ('PaZdfiavQos'), a son of Zeus and Europa, and brother of king Minos of Crete (Hom. H. xiv. 322), or, according to others, a son of Haphæstus (Paus. viii. 53. § 2). From fear of his brother he fled to Ocale, in Boeotia, and there married Alcmeone. In consequence of his justice throughout life, he became, after his death, one of the judges in the lower world, and took up his abode in Elusium. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2, ii. 4. § 11; Hom. Od. iv. 564, vii. 323; Pind. Od. ii. 137; comp. Gortys.) [L. S.]

RHADAMISTUS. [Arsacidae, p. 362, b.]

RHAMNU'SIA ('PaNouovia'), a surname of Nemesis, who had a celebrated temple at Rhamnus in Attica. (Paus. i. 33. § 2, vii. 5. § 3; Strab. i. p. 396; &c.; Stephen. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]
RHASCUPORIS.

RHÆMPHIS, a Lacedaemonian, father of Clearchus (Thuc. viii. 8, 39; Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 35), was one of the three ambassadors who were sent to Athens in B. C. 432, with the final demand of Sparta for the independence of all the Greek states. The demand was refused, and the Peloponnesian war ensued. (Thuc. i. 139, &c.) In B. C. 422 Rhampis, with two colleagues, commanded a force of 900 men, intended for the strengthening of Brasidas in Thrace; but their passage through Thessaly was opposed by the Thessalians, and, hearing also of the attack of Amphipolis and the death of Brasidas, they returned to Sparta. (Thuc. v. 12, 13.) [E. E.]

RHAMPISNITUS (Ῥαμπίσνιτος), called Rhem-pis by Diodorus, one of the ancient kings of Egypt, is said to have succeeded Proteus, and to have been himself succeeded by Cheops. This king is said to have possessed immense wealth, and in order to keep it safe he had a treasury built of stone, respecting the robbery of which Herodotus relates a romantic story, which bears a great resemblance to the one told by Pausanias (ix. 37, § 4) respecting the treasury built by the two brothers Agamedes and Trophonius of Orchomenus [Agamedes]. Rhampisnitus is said to have built the western propylaea of the temple of Hephæstus, and to have placed in front of it two large statues, each of the size of twenty-five cubits, which the Egyptians called Summer and Winter. It is further stated that this king descended to Hades and played a game at dice with Demeter, and on his return to the earth a festival was instituted in honour of the goddess (Herod. ii. 121, 122; Diod. i. 62). Rhampisnitus belongs to the twentieth dynasty according to Bunsen, and is known on inscriptions by the name of Rhamnus Nētor-bex-pen (Bunsen, Ägyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 119, 120).

RHÄMSE, another form of the name Ramses.

RHARIA ('Ραρία), a surname of Demeter, which she derived from the Rharian plain in the neighbourhood of Eleusis, the principal seat of her worship. (Paus. i. 38. § 6; Steph. Byz. and Suid. s. v.) [L. S.]

RHARUS ('Ραρός), the father of Triptolemus at Eleusis (Paus. i. 14. § 2). It is worthy of remark, that according to the scholiast (on Íl. i. 56), the P in this name had the spiritus lenis. [L. S.]

RHASCTPORIS ('Ρασκυπόρις). 1. Brother of Rhasius, and with him chieftan of a Thracian clan, whose territories extended from the northern shores of the Propontis to the Hebrus and the neighbourhood of Philippi. Whether the clan were that of the Sapaei or the Korappi, or comprised both races, is uncertain. But it occupied both the mountain ridge that skirts the Propontis and the southern plains which lie between the base of Mount Rhodope and the sea (comp. Appian, B. C. iv. 87, 105; Tac. Ann. ii. 64; Plin. H. N. iv. 11 (18)). We can only thus explain the seeming inconsistency in Appian's account of these chieftains; for he describes their territory as a lofty, cold, and woody region, and yet assigns to them a powerful body of cavalry. In the civil war, B. C. 49—48, Rhascus orized Ca. Pompey, with 200 horse, and in the war which followed, which ended with Caesar's death, he sided with Cassius, 3000, while his brother Rhasius, at the head of an equal number of cavalry, embraced the cause of the triumvir. According to Appian this was a politic and provident device for mutual security; and it was agreed beforehand that the brother whose party was triumphant, should obtain the pardon of the brother whose party was vanquished. And so, after the victory at Philippi, Rhascus orized his life to the intercession of Rhascus. Each brother rendered good service to his respective party. When the road from Asia into Macedonia, by Aenos and Maroneia, had been preoccupied by the triunviral legions, Rhascusiris, in whose dominions the passes were, led the armies of Brutus and Cassius by a road through the forest, known only to himself and Rhascus. And Rhascus, on the other hand, by his local knowledge, detected the march of the enemy, and saved his allies from being cut off in the rear. (Caes. B. G. iii. 4; App. B. C. iv. 87, 103—106, 136; Lucan. Pharsal. v. 55; Dion Cass. xlvii. 25.) For the varieties in the orthography of Rhascusiris, e.g., Rhas- polys, Rascypolis, Thrasycylos, &c., see Fabricius, ad Dion Cass. xlvii. 25; Adrian, Tertull. Advers. xiv. 17. On the coins we meet with Βαζίλειος Ρασκυπόρδος (Cary, Hist. des Rois de Thrace, pl. 2), and Ρασκυπόρδος (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 59). Lucan (l. c., ed. Oudendorp) calls him "gelidae dominum Rhascuopolin one."

2. Brother of Rhometaleis, king of Thrace, and jointly with him defeated, a. d. 6, the Dalmatians and Breucians in Macedonia [Bart., No. 2]. On the death of Rhometaleis, Rhascusiris received from Augustus a portion of his dominions, the remainder being awarded to his nephew Cotys, son of the deceased [Cotys, No. 5]. Rhascusiris was, however, alleged to have share of Thrace the barren mountainous district assigned him,—or with divided power; but so long as Augustus lived he did not dare to disturb the apportionment. On the emperor's decease, however, he invaded his nephew's kingdom, and hardly desisted at Tiberius' command. Next, on pretence of an amicable adjustment, Rhascusiris invited his nephew to a conference, seized his person, and threw him into prison; and finally, thinking a completed crime safer than an imperfect one, put him to death. To Tiberius Rhascusiris alleged the excuse of self-defence, and that the arrest and murder of his nephew merely prevented his own assassination. The emperor, however, summoned the usurper to Rome, that the matter might be investigated, and Rhascusiris, on pretext of war with the Scythian Bastarnae, began to collect an army. But he was enticed into the Roman camp by Pomponius Flaccus [No. 2], propraetor of My sia, sent to Rome, condemned, and relegated to Alexandria, where an excuse was presently found for putting him to death, a. d. 19. He left a son, Rhometaleis, who succeeded to his father's moiety of Thrace. (Tac. Ann. ii. 64—67, iii. 30; Veit. Pat. i. 129; Suet. Tib. 37; Dion Cass. iv. 30.)

3. Son of Cotys (probably No. 4), was defeated and slain in battle by Vologases, chief of the Thracian Bessi, and leader of the general revolt of Thrace against the Romans in B. C. 15. (Dion Cass. liv. 54; comp. Veit. Pat. ii. 90.) [W. B. D.]

RHASCUS ('Ραςκός), was one of the two chieftains of a Thracian clan. In the civil wars of Rome, B. C. 43, he espoused the party of Augustus and M. Antony, while his brother Rhas- curus orized that of Brutus and Cassius. After the victory of the triumvir at Philippi, Rhascusirs — 4 obtained from the conquerors his brother's pardon. (Appian, B. C. iv. 87, 104, 136.) [W. B. D.]

RHATHINES (Ραθήνες), a Persian, was one of the commanders sent by Pharnabazus to aid the Bithynians in opposing the passage of the Cyrean Greeks under Xenophon through Bithynia, b. c. 400. The satrap's forces were completely defeated (Xen. Anab. vi. 5, §§ 7, &c.). When the news of Rhaizes's victory reached Samos, 306, as one of the commanders of Pharnabazus of a body of cavalry, which worsted that of Agesilaus, in a skirmish near Dascylium. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. § 13; Plut. Ages. 9.)

[Ε. Ε.]

RAZAEZ (Ραζαι), the author of a Greek medical treatise Περί Αυτοκτών, which was published at the end of Alexander Trallianus, 1546, fol. Lucet. Paris, ex offic. Rob. Stephani. His real name is

'Abi Bekr Muhammad bin Zikri l'Arabi,

Abō Boer Mohammed Ibn Zorqurlād Ar-Razi, who was born (as his name implies) at Rai, a town in the north of /Irāk 'Ajemī, near Chorásan, probably about the middle of the ninth century after Christ; and died either a. h. 311 (A. D. 923, 924), or perhaps, more probably a. h. 320 (A. D. 932). The treatise in question is in fact no other than his well known work,

Fi Jadari zul-Hasbāl, "On the Small Pox and Measles," which was translated from the original Arabic into Syriac, and from that language into Greek. Neither the date nor the author of either of these versions is known; but the Greek translation (as we learn from the prefect) was made at the command of one of the emperors of Constantinople, perhaps, as Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 692, ed. vet.) conjectures, Constantine Ducas, who reigned from 1059 to 1067. In one of the Greek MSS. at Paris, however (§ 2228, Catal. vol. ii. p. 465), it is attributed to Ioannes Actuaruis [Ac- tuarius]; and, if this be correct, the emperor alluded to will most probably be Andronicus II. Palaeologus, a. D. 1281—1328. It was from this Greek translation (which appears to have been executed either very carelessly, or from an imperfect MS.), and from Latin versions made from it, that the work was first known in Europe, the earliest Latin translation made directly from the original Arabic being that which was published by Dr. Mendel, in 1747, 8vo. Lond., at the end of his work "De Variolis et Morbilis." The Arabic text was published for the first time by John Channing, in 1766, 8vo. Lond., together with a new Latin version by himself, which has been reprinted separately, and which continues to be the best up to the present time. Altogether the work has been published, in various languages, about five and thirty times, in about three hundred and fifty years,—a greater number of editions than has fallen to the lot of almost any other ancient medical treatise. The only English translation made directly from the original Arabic is that by Dr. Greenhill, 1847, 8vo. London, printed for the Sydenham Society; from which work the preceding account is taken. It may be added that the particular interest which the work has excited, arises from the fact of its being the earliest extant medical treatise in which the Small Pox is certainly mentioned; and accordingly the Greek translator has used the word Αυτοκτών to express this disease, there being in the old Greek language no word that bears this significance. [W. A. G.]

RHEA. (Ῥεᾶ, 'Ρεά, 'Ρεά, or 'Ρέη). The name as well as the nature of this divinity is one of the most difficult points in ancient mythology. Some consider 'Ρέη to be merely another form of δία, the earth, while others connect it with ρέω, I flow (Plat. Cratyl. p. 401, &c.) but; thus much seems undeniable, that Rhea, like Demeter, was a goddess of the earth. According to the Hesiodic Theogony (133; comp. Apollod. i. § 3), Rhea was a daughter of Uranus and Ge, and accordingly a sister of Oceanus, Coeus, Hyperion, Crius, Iapetus, Theia, Themis, and Mnemosyne. She became by Cronos the mother of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Aides, Poseidon, and Zeus. According to some accounts Cronos and Rhea were preceded in their sovereignty over the world by Ophion and Eurynome; but Ophion was overpowered by Cronos, and Rhea cast Eurynome into Tartarus. Cronos is said to have devoured all his children by Rhea, but when she was on the point of giving birth to Zeus, she, by the advice of her parents, went to LyCUS in Crete. When Zeus was born she gave to Cronos a stone wrapped up like an infant, and the god swallowed it as he had swallowed his other children. (Hes. Theog. 446, &c.; Apollod. i. § 5, &c.; Diod. v. 70.) Homer (II. xv. 187) makes only a passing allusion to Rhea, and the passage of Hesiod, which accordingly must be regarded as the most ancient Greek legend about Rhea, seems to suggest that the mystic priests of Crete had already formed connections with the more northern parts of Greece. In this manner, it would seem, the mother of Zeus became known to the Thracians, with whom she became a divinity of far greater importance than she had been before in the south (Orph. Hymn. 13, 25, 26), for she was connected with the Thracian goddess Bendis or COTYS (He- cate), and identified with Demeter. (Strab. x. p. 470.)

The Thracians, in the mean time, conceived the chief divinity of the Samothracian and Lemnian mysteries as RHEA-HECATE, while some of them who had settled in Asia Minor, became there acquainted with still stranger beings, and one especially who was worshipped with wild and enthusiastic solemnities, was found to resemble Rhea. In like manner the Greeks who afterwards settled in Asia identified the Asiatic goddess with Rhea, whose worship they had long been familiar (Strab. x. p. 471; Hom. Hymn. 13, 31). In Phrygia, where Rhea became identified with Cybele, she is said to have purified Dionysus, and to have taught him the mysteries (Apollod. iii. 5, § 1), and thus a Dionysiac element became amalgamated with the worship of Rhea. Demeter, moreover, the daughter of Rhea, is sometimes mentioned with all the attributes belonging to Rhea. (Eurip. Helen. 1304.) The confusion then became so great that the worship of the Cretan Rhea was confounded with that of the Phrygian mother of the gods, and that the orgies of Dionysus became interwoven with those of Cybele. Strangers from Asia, who must be looked upon as jugglers, introduced a variety of novel rites, which were fondly received, especially by the populace (Strab. l. c.; Athen. xii. p. 553; Demosth. de Coron. p. 313). Both the name and the connection of Rhea with Demeter suggest that she was in early times revered as goddess of the earth.
RHEA.

Cretan was undoubtedly the earliest seat of the worship of Rhea; Diodorus (v. 66) saw the site where her temple had once stood, in the neighbourhood of Cnossus, and it would seem that at one time she was worshiped in that island even under the name of Cybele ([Euseb. Chron. p. 56; Synecell. Chronogr. p. 125]. The common tradition, further, was that Zeus was born in Creta, either on Mount Dicte or Mount Ida. At Delphi there was a stone of not very large dimensions, which was every day anointed with oil, and on solemn occasions was wrapped up in white wool; this stone was believed to have been the one which Cronos swallowed when he thought he was devouring Zeus (Paus. x. 24, § 5). Such local traditions implying that Rhea gave birth to Zeus in this or that place of Greece itself occur in various other localities. Some expressly stated that he was born at Thebes (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1194). The temple of the Dindymenean goddess had been built by Pindaros (Paus. ix. 25, § 3; Philostr. Ion. ii. 12). Another legend stated that Rhea gave birth at Chersones in Boeotia (Paus. ix. 41, § 3), and in a temple of Zeus at Plataea Rhea was represented in the act of handing the stone covered in cloth to Cronos (Paus. ix. 2, § 5). At Athens there was a temple of Rhea in the peribolos of the Olympieium (Paus. i. 18, § 7), and the Athenians are even said to have been the first among the Greeks who adopted the worship of the mother of the gods (Julian, Orat. 5). Her temple there was called the Metron. The Arcadians also related that Zeus was born in their country, on Mount Lyconon, the principal seat of Arcadian religion (Paus. viii. 36, § 2, 41, § 2; comp. Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 10, 16, &c.). Similar traces are found in Messenia (Paus. iv. 33, § 2). Laconia (iii. 22, § 4), in Mysia (Strab. xiii. p. 589), at Cyzicus (i. p. 45, xii. p. 575). Under the name of Cybele, we find her worship on Mount Sipylos (Paus. v. 13, § 4), Mount Coddinus (iii. 22, § 4), in Phrygia, which had received its colonists from Thrace, and where she was regarded as the mother of Sabazius. There her worship was quite universal, for there is scarcely a town in Phrygia on the coins of which she does not appear. In Galatia she was chiefly worshiped at Pessinus, where her sacred image was believed to have fallen from heaven (Herod. i. 35). King Midas I. built a temple to her, and introduced festive solemnities, and subsequently a more magnificent one was erected by one of the Attalii. Her name at Pessinus was Agdistis (Strab. xii. p. 567). Her priests at Pessinus seem from the earliest times to have been, in some respects, the rulers of the place, and to have derived the greatest possible advantages from their priestly functions. Even after the image of the goddess was carried from Pessinus to Rome, Pessinus still continued to be looked upon as the metropolis of the great goddess, and as the principal seat of her worship. Under different names we might trace the worship of Rhea even much further east, as far as the Euphrates and even Bactriana. She was, in fact, the great goddess of the Eastern world, and we find her worshipped there in a variety of forms and under a variety of names. As regards the Romans, they had from the earliest times worshipped Jupiter and his mother Ops, the wife of Saturn. When, therefore, we read (Liv. xxix. 11, 14) that, during the Hannibal war, they fished the image of the mother of the gods from Pessinus, we must understand that the worship then introduced was quite foreign to them, and either maintained itself as distinct from the worship of Ops, or became united with it. A temple was built to her on the Palatine, and the Roman matrons honoured her with the festival of the Megalesia. The manner in which she was represented in works of art was the same as in Greece, and her castrated priests were called Galli.

The various names by which we find Rhea designated, are, "the great mother," "the mother of the gods," Cybele, Cybebe, Agdistis, Bercyntia, Brimo, Dindymene, "the great Idaean mother of the gods." Her children by Cronos are enumerated by Hesiod: under the name of Cybele she is also called the mother of Alce, of the Phrygian king Mida, and of Nicaea (Diod. iii. 57; Phot. Cod. 224). In all European countries Rhea was conceived to be accompanied by the Curetes, who are inseparably connected with the birth and bringing up of Zeus in Creta, and in Phrygia by the Corybantes, Atys, and Agdistis. The Corybantes were her enthusiastic priests, who with drums, cymbals, horns, and in full armour, performed their orgiastic dances in the forests and on the mountains of Phrygia. The lion was sacred to the mother of the gods, because she was the divinity of the earth, and because the lion is the strongest and most important of all animals on earth, in addition to which it was believed that the countries in which the goddess was worshipped, abounded in lions (comp. Ov. Met. x. 682). In Greece the oak was sacred to Rhea (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1124). The highest ideal of Rhea in works of art was produced by Pheidias; she was seldom represented in a standing posture, but generally seated on a throne, adorned with the mural crown, from which a veil hangs down. Lions usually appear crouching on the right and left of her throne, and sometimes she is seen riding in a chariot drawn by lions. (Comp. Curetes; Zeus; Cronos.)

RHEGINUS. [Reginus.]
RHEGINUS, physician. [Phoculus.]
RHE'EIO, which Silig inserts in his catalogue as a name of an engraver, is merely a false reading for TNAIOT. (R. Rolette, Lettre à M. Sokorn, p. 152, 2d ed.)
RHE'MANUS, FA'NNIUS. [Piscianus, p. 525, a.] RHEOMITHRES (Ρηομίθηρας), a Persian who joined in the general revolt of the western provinces from Artaxerxes Mnaemon, in b.c. 362, and was employed by his confederates to go to Tachos, king of Egypt, for aid. Having returned to Asia, with 500 talents and 50 ships of war, he sent for a number of the rebel chiefs to receive the subsidy, and, on their arrival, he arrested them, and despatched them in chains to Artaxerxes, thus making his own peace at court. It was perhaps the same Rheomithrae, whom we find in command of a body of 2000 cavalry, for Dareius III., at the battle of the Granicus, in b.c. 334, and who fell in the next year at the battle of Issus (Xen. Cyrop. viii. 3; Diod. xvi. 92, xvii. 19, 34; Arr. Anab. i. 12, ii. 11; Curt. iii. 8; comp. Wess. ad Diod. xvii. 19; Freinish. ad Curt. l. c.) RHESCU'PORIS (Ῥησκουπόρης), the name of several kings of Bosporus under the Roman empire, who are known to us almost exclusively from coins. The first king of this name may have been of Thracian origin, for the name is undoubtedly

RHESCUPORIS. 649
Rhesus.

The name of the Thracian kings appears under the form of Rhescuporis, both on coins and in the best writers, while on the coins of the kings of Bosporus we always have the form Rhescoporis. (Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 375—377.)

Rhescuporis I., was king in the reign of Tiberius, as is evident from the annexed coin, by which we learn that he assumed the name of Tiberius Julianus. He continued king at the accession of Caligula, as both the name and head of that emperor appears on his coins; but he must have died or been driven out of his kingdom soon afterwards, as Caligula made Polemon king both of Pontus and Bosporus in A.D. 39. [Polemon, p. 484, b.]

Coin of Rhescuporis I.

Rhescuporis II., a contemporary of Domitian, whose head appears on the annexed coin.

Coin of Rhescuporis II.

Rhescuporis III., a contemporary of Caracalla and Alexander Severus, whose heads appear on his coins.

Coin of Rhescuporis III.

There was also a Rhescuporis IV., who was a contemporary of Valerian, and a Rhescuporis V., a contemporary of Constantine the Great.

Rhesus (Ῥήσος). 1. A river-god in Bithynia, one of the sons of Oceanus and Thetys. (Hes. Theog. 340; Hom. II. xii. 21; comp. Strab. xiii. p. 590.)

2. A son of king Eioneus in Thrace, and an ally of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks. He possessed horses white as snow and swift as the wind, which were carried off by night by Odysseus and Diomedes, the latter of whom murdered Rhesus himself in his sleep (Hom. II. x. 435, 495, &c.; Virg. Aen. i. 469, with Serv. note).

In later writers Rhesus is described as a son of Strymon and Euterpe, or Calliope, or Terpsichore. (Apollod. i. 3. § 4; Conon, Narrat. 4; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 817; Eurip. Rhesus.) [L. S.]

Rhessus' (Ῥησσός), two mythical personages, one the father of Chalciope, and the second a son of Nausithous the king of the Thracians, and accordingly a brother of Alcmeon. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 6; Hom. Od. vii. 64, &c.) [L. S.]

Rhianus (Ῥιανός), of Crete, was a distinguished Alexandrian poet and grammarian, in the latter part of the third century B.C. According to Suidas (s. v.), he was a native of Zenoe, or, as some said, of Cretan, two obscure cities in Crete, while others made him a native of Ithome in Messenia, a statement easily explained by the supposition that Rhianus spent some time at Ithome, while collecting materials for his poem on the Messenian Wars. He was at first, as Suidas further tells us, a slave and keeper of the palaestra; but afterwards, having been instructed, he became a grammarian. The statement of Suidas, that he was contemporary with Eratosthenes, not only indicates the time at which he lived, but suggests the probability that he lived at Alexandria in personal and literary connection with Eratosthenes. On the ground of this statement, Clinton fixes the age of Rhianus at B.C. 222.

He wrote, according to the common text of Suidas, ἑῳετρα ποιήσα, Ἰακχέλεα ἐν βιβλίοις 8, where there can be little doubt that we should read ἑῳετρα ποιήσα, since the epic poems of Rhianus were certainly those of his works to which he chiefly owed his fame. Thus Athenaeus expressly designates him ἑτοσοῦς (xi. p. 499 d.). His poems are mentioned by Suetonius (Tib. 70), as among those productions of the Alexandrian school, which the emperor Tiberius admired and imitated.

The subject of the epic poems of Rhianus were taken either from the old mythology, or from the annals of particular states and countries. Of the former class were his Ἰακχέλεα (not Ἰακχέλεα, as Suidas has it), and of the latter his Ἀχαϊκά, Ἡλειακά, Θεσσαλικά, and Μεσσηνιακά. It is quite uncertain what was the subject of his poem entitled Φιλιμ, which is only known to us by a single line quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἀράκουνα). For a full account of the extant fragments of these poems, and for a discussion of their subjects, the reader is referred to Meineke's essay on Rhianus, in his Analecta Alexandrina. (See also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 784, 785; Clinton, F. H. iii. pp. 512, 513.)

Like most of the Alexandrian poets, Rhianus was also a writer of epigrams. Ten of his epigrams are preserved in the Palatine Anthology, and one by Atheneaus. They treat of amatory subjects with much freedom; but they all excel in elegance of language, cleverness of invention, and simplicity of expression. He had a place in the Garland of Meleager. (Brunce, Ancal. vol. i. p. 479, ii. p. 526; Jacob's Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 229, vol. xii. pp. 945—947; Meineke, pp. 206—212.)

Respecting the grammatical works of Rhianus, we only know that he is frequently quoted in the Scholion on Homer, as one of the commentators on the poet.

The fragments of Rhianus have been printed in most of the old collections of the Greek poets (see RHODE.

RHIONTOU ('Platho,' of Syracuse or Tarentum, a dramatic poet, of that species of burlesque tragedy, which was called phainographia or laurotragodia, flourished in the reign of Ptolemy I. King of Egypt (Suid. s. v.)) When he is placed by Suidas and others at the head of the composers of this burlesque drama, we are not to suppose that he actually invented it, but that he was the first to develop in a written form, and to introduce into Greek literature, a species of dramatic composition, which had already long existed as a popular amusement among the Greeks of southern Italy and Sicily, and especially at Tarentum. He was followed by other writers, such as SOPATHE, SEIRAS, and BLAEUS.

The species of drama which Rhionto cultivated may be described as an exhibition of the subjects of tragedy, in the spirit and style of comedy. It is plain, from the fragments of Rhionto, that the comic licence extended to the metres, which are sometimes even more irregular than in the Attic comedians (Hephnest. p. 9, Gaisf.). A poet of this description was called phainos. This name, and that of the drama itself, phainographia, seem to have been the genuine terms used at Tarentum.

Of the personal history of Rhionto we know nothing beyond the statement of Suidas, that he was the son of a potter. He is said to have written thirty-eight dramas (Suid. s. v.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Tápas), of which we still possess the following titles: Ambivōcr̃, Hryavl Kathryñ, Iosfévma hē Áthl̃, Iosfévma hē Tápas, Ορέστεια, Tάλαρ̃. He is several times quoted by Athenaeus, Hesychias, and other Greek writers, and by Cicero (ad Att. i. 20), and Varro (R. R. iii. 3 § 475).

One of the Greek grammarians tells us that Rhionto was the first who wrote comedy in hexameter verse; the meaning of which probably is, that in his dramas the dactylic hexameter was largely used, as well as the iambic trimeter (Io. Lydus, de Magistr. R. i. 41.). The same writer further asserts that the satire of Lucrinius sprung from an imitation of the comedy of Rhionto, just as that of the subsequent Roman satirists was derived from the Attic comedians; but to this statement little credit can be attached.

RHODE ('Pátho'), a daughter of Poseidon by Amphitrite, was married to Helios, and became by him the mother of Phaeton and his sisters (Apollo. i. 4 § 4). It should be observed that the names Rhodes and Rhode are often confounded (Diod. v. 55; comp. Rhodos). A second person bearing the name of Rhode, was one of the Danads. (Apollod. ii. 1 § 5.)

RHODEIA ('Páthia'), a daughter of Oceanus and Thetys, was one of the playmates of Persephone. (Hes. Theog. 351; Hom. Hymn. in Cor. 451.)

RHODOGUÊNE. [Arsac. VI. p. 355, a.]

RHODON ('Pátho'), called, in the Haemeron Indicicnta, extant under the name of Jerome, Coro-

don, a Christian writer of the second century. He was a native of Proconsular Asia, but appears to have removed to Rome, where he was instructed (μαθητηρευτης), perhaps converted to Christianity, by Tatian [Tatianus]. Nothing more is known of his history than that he took an active part against the heretics of his day; being certainly engaged against the Marcionites, with one of whom, Apelles [Aphelles], he had a personal discussion; and probably against the Montanists. Jerome places him in the time of Commodus and Severus, i. e. A. D. 180—211.

He wrote:—1. Adversus Marcionem Opus. From this work Eusebius, in his account of Rhodon, has given one or two brief citations. It was addressed to one Callistion, and contained Rhodon's account of his conference with Apelles, which is extracted by Eusebius. According to this account Rhodon silenced his antagonist, and held him up to ridicule. Certainly he appears to have possessed too much of that self-confidence and fondness for reviling which has characterized polemical writers.

Marcion is termed by him "the Pontic Wolf." The fragments of this work of Rhodon are valuable as showing the diversity of opinions which prevailed among the Marcionites. 2. Eis tēn ἐξαιρηθέν ὑπόμνημα, Commentarius in Hieroc., which Jerome characterizes as consisting of "elegant tractatus," 3. Adversum Purgas (sc. Cataphrygias s. Montanistas) insigne Opus. Jerome thus characterizes a production of Rhodon, perhaps ascribing to him (as some have judged, from a comparison of c. 37 and 39 of his de Virt. Ill.) the work against the Montanists in three books, addressed to Abercius or Aburcius Marcellus, from which Eusebius has given a long citation (H. E. v. 16). The work is, however, ascribed by Rufinus and Nicephorus Callisti, among the older writers, and by Baronius, Philalete, and Le Quien, among the moderns, to Claudius Apollinaris of Hierapolis [Apollinaris, no. 1; by others to the Apolloius, Apolloius, literam, no. 13] mentioned and cited by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 18), and to whom Tertullian [Tertullianus,] replied in his lost work de Ecclesi.; and by Va-le-sius (Not. ad Euseb. H. E. vi. 16). Tillemont, Ceillier, and others, to Asterius Urbanus [Urb- has the names. This is, likewise, a certain writer; and it is quite unaccount- able that he should have omitted to mention his name if he had known it; or that he should have omitted all mention of the work in his Historia ecclesiastica just before, if he had believed it to be his. That Jerome ascribed the work to Rhodon is only an inference: he says, in speaking of Miltiades (de Virt. Ill. ocr. 39), that he is mentioned by Rhodon; and as a notice of Miltiades occurs in the anonymous citation given by Eusebius, it is supposed that Jerome refers to that citation, and that he therefore supposed it to be from Rhodon.
RHODOPIS.

But it is surely not unlikely that a writer of consideration like Miltiades, who had been engaged in the Montanian controversy, would be mentioned both by the anonymous writer and by Rhodon, in writing on the same side of the dispute. At any rate, if Jerome identified the anonymous writer with Rhodon, it does not appear that such identification was more than a conjecture, which weighs little against the silence of the earlier, and probably better informed Eusebius.

The fragments of the work against M arcion are given in the second volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, p. 144, and in Routh's Reliquiae Sacrae, vol. i. p. 343, &c.; those from the work against the Montanists in the third volume of Galland, p. 273, under the name of Asterius Urbanus, to whom the editor ascribes them; and in the second volume of Routh, p. 73, &c., anonymously. Rhodon, in his work against the Marcionites, had promised to prepare a work in elucidation of the obscure passages of Scripture, the design of which had been formed by his instructor Tatian; but we have no evidence that Rhodon ever carried his purpose into effect. (Euseh. H. E. v. 16, 17; Hieron. de Viris Illust. cc. 37, 39, 40; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 183, 189, s. v. Asterius Urbanus and Rhodon, vol. i. p. 65, ed. Oxon. 1740—1743; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 161, 168; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. iii. p. 64; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. ii. p. 135; Lardner, Cred. part ii. book i. c. 28 § 14; Galland, Biblioth. Patrum, vol. ii. proleg. c. 5, vol. iii. proleg. c. 2.)

RHODOPE (Ῥοδόπη), the nymph of a Thracian well, was the wife of Haemos and mother of Herbas, and is mentioned among the playmates of Periphanes. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 423; Lucian, de Solitat. 51.)

RHODO'PHON (Ῥοδοφῶν), a Rhodian, was one of those who, when hostilities broke out between Perseus and the Romans, in B. C. 171, strove successfully to retain their countrymen in their alliance with Rome, and continued throughout the war to adhere firmly to the Roman cause. In B. C. 167, when the anger of the senate against the Rhodians had been with difficulty appeased by Astynedes and his fellow-ambassadors [comp. Philophron and Polyaratus], Rhodophon and Thenetetus were appointed to convey to Rome the present of a golden crown. (Polyb. xxvii. 6, xxviii. 2, xxx. 5; comp. Liv. iv. 20, &c.)

RH'ODO'PIS (Ῥοδόπης), a celebrated Greek courtesan, was of Thracian origin. She was a fellow-slave with the poet Aesop, both of them belonging to the Samian Iadon. She afterwards became the property of Xanthes, another Samian, who carried her to Naukratis in Egypt, in the reign of Amasis, and at this great sea-port, the Alexander of ancient times, she carried on the trade of an hetaera for the benefit of her master. While thus employed, Charaxus, the brother of the poetess Sappho, who had come to Naukratis in pursuit of gain as a merchant, fell desperately in love with the fair courtesan, and ransomed her from slavery for a large sum of money. She was in consequence attacked by Sappho in a poem, who accused her of robbing her brother of his property. She continued to live at Naukratis after her liberation from slavery, and with the tenth part of her gains she dedicated at Delphi ten iron spits, which were seen by Herodotus. She is called Rhodopis by Herodotus, but it appears clear that Sappho in her poem spoke of her under the name of Doricha. It is therefore very probable that Doricha was her real name, and that she received that of Rhodopis, which signifies the "rosy-cheeked," on account of her beauty. (Herod. ii. 134, 135; Athen. xii. p. 596 b; Suid. s. v. Ροδόπης ἄδονα; Strab. xvii. p. 803; comp. Ov. Her. xv. 63.)

There was a tale current in Greece that Rhodopis built the third pyramid. Herodotus takes great pains (i. e.) to show the absurdity of the story, but it still kept its ground, and is related by later writers as an unquestionable fact. (Plin. H. N. xxx. 30 § 17; comp. Strab. l. c.) The origin of this tale, which is unquestionably false, has been explained with great probability by Zoega and Bunsen. In consequence of the name Rhodopis, the "rosy-cheeked," she was confounded with Nitocris, the beautiful Egyptian queen, and the heroine of many an Egyptian legend, who is said by Julius Africanus and Eusebius to have built the third pyramid. [Comp. Nitocris, No. 2.]

Another tale about Rhodopis related by Strabo (l. c.) and Aelian (V. H. xii. 33), makes her a queen of Egypt, and thus renders the supposition of her being the same as Nitocris still more probable. It is said that as Rhodopis was one day bathing at Naukratis, an eagle took up one of her sandals, flew away with it, and dropped it in the lap of the Egyptian king, as he was administering justice at Memphis. Struck by the strange occurrence and the beauty of the sandal, he did not rest till he had found out the fair owner of the beautiful sandal, and as soon as he had discovered her made her his queen. Aelian calls the king Paumanitchus; but this deserves no attention, since Strabo relates the tale of the Rhodopis, who was loved by Charaxus, and Aelian probably inserted the name of Paumanitchus, simply because no name was given in Strabo or the writer from whom he copied. (Comp. Bunsen, Aegypt. Stelle in der Weltgesch. iii. pp. 236—238.)

RHODOS (Ῥώδος), was, according to Diodorus (v. 55), a daughter of Poseidon and Italia, and sometimes called Rhode. The island of Rhodes was believed to have derived its name from her. According to others, she was a daughter of Helios and Amphitrite, or of Poseidon and Aphrodite, or lastly of Oceanus (Pind. Olymp. vii. 24; Tzetz. ad Lyceph. 929). She was a sea-nymph, of whom the following legend is related. When the gods distributed among themselves the various countries of the earth, the island of Rhodes was yet covered by the waves of the sea. Helios was absent at the time; and as no one drew a lot for him, he was not to have any share in the distribution of the earth. But at that moment the island of Rhodes rose out of the sea, and with the consent of Zeus he took possession of it, and by the nymph of the isle he then became the father of seven sons. (Pind. Ol. vii. 100, &c.; Or. Met. iv. 204.)

RH'OECEUS (Ῥοῖκος), a centaur who, conjointly with Hylaeus, pursued Atalanta in Arcadia, but was killed by her with an arrow (Apollod. i. 9. § 2; Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 221; Aelian, V. H. xiii. 1). This centaur is perhaps the same as the one who is called Rheocetus by Latin poets, (Rhoeæts.)

RHOEUS (Ῥοῖς), the son of Phileus or Philaeus, of Samos, an architect and stonemast, RHOEMETALCES.

loong to the earliest period in the history of Greek art, is mentioned as the head of a family of Samian artists, the accounts respecting whom present considerable difficulties, the discussion of which belongs more properly to the articles TELECLES and THEODORUS. It is enough, in this place, to give as the most probable result of the inquiry, the genealogy by which Müller (Arch. d. Kunst. § 60) exhibits the succession and dates of these artists.

Rhoeus, about Ol. 35, B. C. 640.

Theodorus and Telecles, about Ol. 45, B. C. 600.

Theodorus, about Ol. 55, B. C. 560.

Respecting Rhoeus himself we are informed, that he was the first architect of the great temple of Hera at Samos (Herod. iii. 60), which Theodorus completed; and also, in conjunction with Smilia and Theodorus, of the labyrinth at Lemnos (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 13, s. 19. § 3); that he, and the members of his family who succeeded him, invented the art of casting statues in bronze and iron (Paus. viii. 14. § 5, s. 8; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12, s. 43), and that there still existed, at the time of Pausanias, in the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, a bronze statue of rude antique workmanship, which was said to represent night, and to have been the work of Rhoeus. (Paus. x. 33. § 3, s. 5.)

RHOEMETALCES I. (Ρωμῆταλκέας), king of Thrace, was the brother of Cotys [No. 4], of Rhascuporis [No. 2], and uncle and guardian of Rhascuporis [No. 3]. On his nephew's death, B. C. 13, Rhoemetalces was expelled from Thrace, and driven into the Chersonesus, by Vologeses, chief of the Thracian Bessi. About two years afterwards L. Piso, praetor of Pamphylia, drove the Bessi from the Chersonesus, and Rhoemetalces received from Augustus his nephew's dominions, with some additions, since Tacitus calls him king of all Thrace. On his death Augustus divided his kingdom between his son Cotys [No. 5], and his brother Rhascuporis [No. 2]. (Tac. Ann. ii. 64; Dion Cass. liv. 20, 34; comp. Veil. Pat. ii. 98.) On the obverse of the annexed coin is the head of Augustus, and on the reverse that of Rhoemetalces and his wife. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF RHOEMETALCES I, KING OF THRACE.

RHOEMETALCES II. (Ρωμῆταλκέας), king of Thrace, was the son of Rhascuporis [No. 2] and nephew of the preceding. On the deposition of his father, whose ambitious projects he had opposed, Rhoemetalces shared with the sons of Cotys [No. 5] the kingdom of Thrace. He remained faithful to Rome, and aided in putting down the Thracian malcontents in A. D. 26. Caligula, in A. D. 38, assigned the whole of Thrace to Rhoemetalces, and gave Armenia Minor to the son of Cotys. [COTYS, No. 6.] (Dion Cass. lix. 12; Tac. Ann. ii. 67, iii. 38, iv. 5, 47, xi. 9.) On the obverse of the annexed coin is the head of Caligula, and on the reverse that of Rhoemetalces. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF RHOEMETALCES II, KING OF THRACE.

RHOEMETALCES, king of Bosporus, in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, since the heads of both of these emperors appear on his coins. He is mentioned by Capitolinus in his life of Antoninus Pius (c. 9). It is the head of the same emperor which is on the obverse of the annexed coin. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 378.)

COIN OF RHOEMETALCES, KING OF BOSPORUS.

RHOPALUS. 653

RHOEUS (Ρωῦς). 1. A daughter of Staphylus and Chrysotheris, was beloved by Apollo. When her father discovered that she was with child, he put her in a chest, and exposed her to the waves of the sea. The chest floated to the coast of Euboea (or Delos), where Rhoeo gave birth to Anius (Diod. v. 62; Tzet. ad Lylocph. 570). Subsequently she was married to Zarex. (Tzet. ad Lylocph. 580.)

2. A daughter of the river-god Scambander, became by Laomedon the mother of Tithonus. (Tzet. ad Lylocph. 18.)

RHOTEIA (Ρθεία), a daughter of the Thracian king Sithon and Achiroe, a daughter of Neilos. She was a sister of Pallene, and the Trojan promontory of Rhoteium was believed to have derived its name from her. (Tzet. ad Lylocph. 583, 1161; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

RHOTEUM. 1. A centaur, probably the same whom Greek poets call Rhoeus. At the wedding of Peirithous he was wounded by Dryas and took to flight. (Ov. Met. xii. 300; comp. Virg. Georg. ii. 456.)

2. One of the giants who were slain by Bacchus (Horat. Carm. ii. 19, 23); he is usually called Eurystus. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2; comp. Virg. L. c.)

3. A companion of Phineas, was slain by Persians. (Ov. Met. v. 38.)

4. A mythical king of the Marrubians in Italy, who married a second wife Casperia, with whom his son Anchelomus committed incest. In order to escape from his father's vengeance, Anchelomus fled to king Daunus. (Serv. ad Aen. x. 383.) [L. S.]

RHOPALUS (Ρπαλος), a son of Heracleios and father of Phaestus (Ptolem. Heph. 3; Eustath.
RICIMER.

A second mythic personage of this name is mentioned by Pausanias (ii. 6. § 4.)

RICIMER, one of the most extraordinary characters in later Roman history, and worthy of being called the Roman "King-Maker," was the son of a Suevian chief who had married the daughter of Wallia, king of the West Goths. He spent his youth at the court of the emperor Valentinian, served with distinction under Aëtius, and was raised to the dignity ofcomes. His rare talent, boundless ambition, and daring courage urged him on to still higher eminence, and his treacherous disposition and systematic selfishness assisted him greatly in attaining his object. In A.D. 456, Ricimer gained a decisive naval victory off Corsica over a fleet of the Vandals, then at war with Avitus, and he defeated the land-forces of the Vandals near Agrigentum in Sicily. These victories made his name so popular that he resolved upon carrying out a scheme which he seems to have formed some time previously, namely, to dispose Avitus, who had, ever since his accession, ceased to display his former great qualities, and had incurred the hatred and contempt of his subjects. After his return to Italy, Ricimer kindled a rebellion at Ravenna, gained the assistance of the Roman senate, and then set out to encounter Avitus, who approached from Gaul. A bloody battle was fought at Placentia, on the 16th (17th) October, 456, in which Avitus lost his crown and liberty. Ricimer made him bishop of Placentia, but soon afterwards contrived his death. Marcian, and after him Leo, emperors of the East, now assumed the title of Western emperors also; but the power was with Ricimer, who might have seized the diadem, in spite of the law that no barbarian should be Roman emperor, but preferred to give it to Majorian. He had previously obtained the title of patrician from Leo, who also gave consent to the nomination of Majorian (475). A proof that the real power remained in Ricimer is given by Majorian himself, who, in a letter to the senate, preserved in the Codex Theodosianus, says that he and "his father Ricimer" would take proper care of military affairs. Majorian having displayed uncommon energy, and, to Ricimer, most unexpected wisdom, the latter was filled with jealousy, and contrived the sudden and famous plot, in consequence of which Majorian lost his life by Ricimer's order (461). Ricimer put Vibia Severus Serpentinius on the throne in his stead. The accession of the new emperor was not approved of by Leo, and was contested by Aegidius, in Gaul, a province where Ricimer had not succeeded in obtaining more than nominal power. The revolt of Aegidius, however, was absorbed by other intestine troubles in Gaul, and caused no danger to Italy. Severus died in 465, perhaps poisoned by Ricimer, and during eighteen months the empire was without an emperor, though not without a head, for that was always Ricimer's. The Romans, however, were displeased with his despotism, and requested Leo to give them an emperor. Anthemius was accordingly proposed and accepted, not only by the people, but also by Ricimer, who showed great diplomatic skill in this transaction: he made a sort of bargain with the successful candidate, and promised to lend him his assistance on condition that Anthemius should give him his daughter in marriage. This was accordingly com-of the Greeks. (Plut. Romul. I; Tzet. ad Lycoph. 921.)

3. A daughter of Italus and Lucania, or a daughter of Telephus. In some traditions she was said to have been the wife of Aeneas or Ascanius, and to have given her name to the city of Rome.
(Plut. Romul. 2.)

[ L. S.]

ROMANUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, to whom several of his letters are addressed (Ep.
iv. 29, vi. 15, 33, viii. 8, ix. 7). Pliny had two friends of this name, Romanus Firmus and Voco-
nius Romanus, and it is probable that some of the above letters are addressed to one of these persons, but it is impossible to say to which.

ROMANUS, FIRMUS, a friend and municeps of the younger Pliny, with whom the latter had been brought up, and to whom he addresses one of his letters, in which he offers to give him a sufficient sum of money to raise him to the equestrian rank. (Ep. i. 19.)

ROMANUS, FABIIUS, one of the friends of the poet Lucan, accused Mela, the father of the poet, after the death of the latter, because Nero was anxious to obtain his property. (Tac. Ann. xxvi. 17.)

ROMANUS HIISPO, a Roman rhetorician, who earned an infamous character by undertaking prosecutions to please the early emperors. He is first mentioned at the commencement of the reign of Tiberius, when he supported the accusation of Caepio Crispinus against Granius Marcellus. In A.D. 62, he accused Seneca as one of the associates of C. Piso, but the accusation was retorted upon by Seneca (Tac. Ann. i. 74, xvi. 17). Romanus Hispo constantly occurs as one of the declamers in the Controversiae of the elder Seneca.

ROMANUS, JULIUS, a Roman poet, whose name is prefixed to an epigram on Petronius Arbiter in the Latin Anthology (ii. 235, ed. Burmann, No. 1544, ed. Meyer). This Julius, however, as Niebuhr points out (Kleine Schriften,
p. 347), is not an ancient writer, but Julius Sabinus, otherwise called Julius Pomponius Laetus, who died in the year 1497. (Comp. Meyer, Annal. ad Antiq. Lat. vol. ii. p. 129.)

ROMANUS, VOCONIUS, a fellow-student and an intimate friend of the younger Pliny, was the son of an illustrious Roman eques, and his mother belonged to one of the most distinguished families in Nearer Spain (Plin. Ep. ii. 13). If we may trust the testimony of his friend, Voco-nius was a distinguished orator, and possessed great skill in composition. Several of Pliny's letters are addressed to him. (Ep. i. 5, ii. 1, ix.
26.)

ROMANUS I, LECAPE'NUS (Ρωμανος ὁ Λακαπνοῦς), Byzantine emperor from A.D. 919
—944, was the son of Theophylactus Abastactus, a brave warrior, who had once saved the life of the emperor Basil. Romanus served in the imperial fleet, distinguished himself on many occasions, and enjoyed the esteem of his fellow-soldiers on account of his rare bravery. One of his men having been attacked by a lion, Romanus, who was near, rushed to his assistance and killed the monster in single combat. When the young Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, ascended the throne, Romanus was high admiral, and commanded the fleet on the Danube in the war with the Bulgarians, but as he suddenly withdrew with his ship and made sail for Constantinople, he was accused of treachery by Leo Phocas. It must, however, be understood that both the accused and the accuser aimed at supreme power, and Romanus left the theatre of the war, probably for the purpose of being within reach of the throne, as well as of the man who wanted to place himself thereon.

A civil war ensued, and on condition of his going out, when Romanus, patronised and perhaps loved by the dowager empress, seized upon the chamberlain Constantine, one of the most influential adherents of Phocas, who avenged the captivity of his friend by taking up arms. Romanus, who had been appointed Magnus Hetaeriarcha, or commander in chief of the foreign body-guard of the emperor, worsted Phocas, and in reward was made Caesar in September, and crowned as Augustus and emperor on the 17th December, 919. He had previously given his daughter Helena in marriage to the young emperor Constantine, and shortly after his accession he conferred the rank of Augustus and Augusta on his son Christopher and his wife Theodora.
Romanus was now the legitimate colleague of Constantine VII., over whom he exercised such authority as to cause many plots against his life, and sometimes open rebellions, which he succeeded in quelling.

The following are the principal events of his reign. The great schism of the church, which had lasted ever since the deposition of the patriarch Euthymius and the famous fourth wedlock of the emperor Leo VI., was at last healed, in 920, through the intervention of Pope John X.; and by an edict of Constantine VII. of the same year, a fourth marriage was declared anti-canonical, and made punishable. In 921 another of these intermingled wars with the Bulgarians, or perhaps only a fresh and formidable invasion, drew the attention of Romanus towards the Danube, but the Bulgarians saved him the trouble of going so far away from Constantinople by advancing thither with all their force, and ravaging the country. This war began still more formidable when Simeon, the knight of the Bulgarians concluded, in 923, an alliance with the Arabs. But we purposely refrain from giving the details of these barbarous wars, presenting little more than an uninterrupted series of bloodshed and devastations without profit to either party. A remarkable interview between Romanus and Simeon, which took place in 926, under the walls of Constantinople, put a temporary end to these troubles. In the previous year the patrician John Radinus worsted and destroyed the fleet of the famous pirate chief Leo, of Tripolis, who had sacked Thessalonica twenty-two years previously. In 927 King Simeon died, after having ravaged Bulgaria through his very victories, and was succeeded by his son Peter, who was less warlike, though not less courageous than his father; for he entered the Byzantine territory at the head of a strong army, proposing to the emperor to choose between war and peace, on condition of giving giving him his grand-daughter in marriage, a proposal which Romanus the more eagerly accepted, as he wanted all his forces to check the progress of the Arabs. His possessions in Italy also required protection against the petty Lombard princes. In 961 Christopher died, the eldest son of Romanus and husbond of Sophia, the daughter of Nicetus magister palatii, who a short time previously had been sent into a convent for a conspiracy against the emperor, Romanus, so wise in many respects, compromised himself extremely in 933, by making his son Theophylactus, a lad of sixteen, patriarch of Constantinople, after first obtaining the approbation of Pope John X. Theophylactus proved a very miserable prelate. From 934 to 940 the empire enjoyed an almost universal peace, Italy excepted, where the petty warfare with the Lombard princes went on as before. But in 941 Constantinople was in terror at the sudden appearance of a Russian fleet of 10,000 boats, commanded by Prince Ingor, who cast anchor at the very entrance of the Bosporus, and whose troops ravaged the neighbouring country. Romanus, however, equipped in all haste a small number of galleys (15?) lying in the Golden Horn, with which Theophanes boldly attacked the Russians, destroyed a great number of their boats, and compelled Ingor to fly. Theophanes soon afterwards obtained a second victory over the rest of the fleet on the coast of Thrace, and of this formidable armada very little came back to Russia. Ingor died soon afterwards, and in 945 his wife Olga came to Constantinople to receive baptism: she was christened Helena, and is held in the utmost veneration in the Russian church.

Down to this period Constantine Porphyrogenitus, although the legitimate emperor by descent, had only enjoyed the title of his rank, and he now resolved upon having the power also. To this effect he excited the ambition of the two surviving sons of Romanus, Stephans and Constantine, both Augusti, who in their turn were tired of the autocracy of their aged father. A conspiracy was set on foot, headed by Stephanus, who had the assistance of several energetic and distinguished men. Sure of success, he suddenly seized upon the person of his father, and with secret despatch had him carried to the island of Proton, at the entrance of the Propontis, where Romanus was thrown into a convent and had his head shaved forthwith, as he was thus rendered incompetent to reign (20th of December, 944). The sons of Romanus, however, did not reap the fruits of their treachery, for Constantine VII. was proclaimed sole emperor, after the unnatural children of the deposed emperor had enjoyed the title of co-emperors during the short space of five weeks. They were then arrested and sent to Proton, where a touching interview took place between them and their unfortunate father. Stephanus died nineteen years afterwards in exile, and Constantine survived his captivity only two years, when he was massacred in an attempt at making his escape. Romanus lived a quiet monkish life in his convent, and died a natural death on the 15th of June, 948. ROMANUS II., or the Younger, Byzantine emperor from A.D. 939—963, the son and successor of Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, was born in 939, and succeeded his father on the fifteenth of November 939. His short reign offers a few events of note. Endowed with great personal beauty and bodily strength, he preferred gymnastics, hunting, and other pleasures to the duties of an emperor, which he left to his minister Bringas. His wretched wife Theophana, who had persuaded him to poison his father, was no sooner independent than she excited Romanus against his own family; his five sisters were compelled to leave the palace, and confined in the same convene where Sophia, the widow of Christophorus Augustus had then been during thirty years; but the empress dowager, Helena, possessed too much energy to yield to her daughter-in-law, and she accordingly remained in the palace, but she died soon afterwards of a broken heart. Although Romanus never showed himself in the field, he had two renowned generals by whom some glorious deeds were done, namely, the two brothers Nicephorus and Leo Phocas. Nicephorus recovered the flourishing island of Creta, after a long siege of its capital Candia, and after the Arabs had ruled there during 150 years (961); and Leo was successful against the Arabs in Asia. After the fall of Candia, and the splendid triumph of Nicephorus in Constantinople, the two brothers joined their forces against the Arabs, and obtained most signal victories over them. A rumour having spread of the death of Romanus, Nicephorus approached the capital through fear of Bringas; but the rumour was false, and Nicephorus remained in Asia, observing Constantinople. Events showed the prudence of this step; for Romanus, already exhausted by his mode of life, was despatched by poison administered to him by his own wife Theophano. He died on the 15th of March, 963, at the age of twenty-four. Ambition, and perhaps the secret advice of the enmity Bringas, urged Theophano to commit the foul deed. Romanus married first Bertha, afterwards called Eudoxia, the natural daughter of Hugo, king of Italy, who died a child before the marriage was consummated. By his second wife Anastasia, afterwards called Theophano, a woman of base extraction, he left two sons, Basil II. and Constantine VIII., who followed him on the throne, and two daughters, Theophano, who married Otho II. emperor of Germany, an excellent woman, who became the ancestress of most of the reigning houses in Europe, and Anna Posthuma, who married Wladimir, first Christian prince of Russia. ROMANUS III. ARGYRUS or ARGY-ROPULUS ('Ρωμανὸς ὁ Ἀργυρὸς ή ὁ Ἀργυρόρουπος), Byzantine emperor from A.d. 1029—1034, was the son of Leo Argurus Dux, and belonged to a distinguished family. Romanus obtained such military glory in the reign of Constantine VIII., that this prince appointed him his successor, and offered him the hand of one of his daughters, a few days before he died. Romanus was married to Helena, a virtuous woman, whom he tenderly loved, and declined both the crown and the bride. Constantine, however, left him the choice between his offer, or the loss of his eyes. Even then Romanus did not yield to the temptation, and would have declined it again but for the prayers of his own wife, who implored him to accept both, and rather sacrifice her than the empire. Their marriage was accordingly dissolved; and Romanus, now married to the princess Zoe, succeeded Constantine on the 12th of November, 1028. He was a brave, well-instructed man, perhaps learned; but he over-valued himself, and thought himself the best general and the best scholar of his time. Numerous acts of liberality and clemency gained him the hearts of his new subjects at the very beginning of his reign, but did not prevent some court conspiracies. At the same time his arms met with disgrace in Sicily and Syria, nor did he retrieve his fortune when he took the field in person. The Arabs worsted him near Azar in Syria, and he only escaped captivity by shooting himself up in Antioch (1030), whence he hastened to Constantinople. His lieutenant, Niceas, and Simeon, and especially Theoctistes, however, soon restored the honour of the Greek armies. Their success so mortified Argyrus that he became the prey of a deep melancholy, and only occupied himself with building churches and convents, his wife Zoë seizing the reins of the empire. Meanwhile the war with the Arabs was carried on with varying success, till at last the Greeks obtained great advantages in a decisive naval engagement, and by the conquest of Edessa, which was obliged to surrender in 1033. But the plague ravaged the provinces, and in the North the Patzinegues and other barbarians made destructive inroads. These disasters roused Romanus from his indolence. But it was too late: he had made himself unpopular for ever, and his own family had become strange to him. The more his generals were successful against the Arabs, the more the nation became convinced that without him still greater advantages might be obtained. Hence arose a criminal intrigue between Zoë, an ambitious and voluptuous wife, though past fifty, and the general Michael, surnamed Paphlagon. Zoë administered a slow poison to her husband, in consequence of which he died a lingering death (1034), which was accelerated by the cruel deed of Zoë's assistants, who held the enfeebled emperor, who was taking a bath, under water till life was nearly gone. Half dead, he was taken out and placed on a bed, when his wife despatched him by a dose of active poison. Romanus died at the age of sixty-six, and was succeeded by Michael IV. the Paphlagonian, who married Zoë. It is certain that Romanus left no issue by Zoë, and it is doubtful whether he had any by Helena; but his family continued to flourish in Constanti- nople down to its capture by the Turks, and more than 150 years afterwards. ROMANUS IV. DIOGENES (Ρωμανός ὁ Διογένης), Byzantine emperor from A.D. 1067—1071, was the son of one Constantine Diogenes, a rather extravagant character, who conspired against the emperor Romanus Argyrus, but escaped pursuit by leaping out of a high window. Romanus Diogenes was the grand-nephew of Romanus Argyrus, through his mother; and enjoying the patronage of the court notwithstanding his father's conduct, soon rose to the dignities of patrician and duke of Sardinia or Triaditia. In the reign of Constantine X. Ducas, he solicited the place of Magnus Vestiarius, and having received the answer: "Deserve it through your merits," forthwith returned to Sar- denia, sallied out with the garrison, and routed a party of Patzinegue marmads, of whose heads he sent a collection to Constantinople. The em- peror returned the compliment by granting him the desired appointment, adding: "You owe your preferment not to me, but to your sword." This piqued Romanus; and from that time he enter- tained schemes of rebellion and of raising himself to the throne. After the death of Constantine, and during the reign of his widow Eudoxia, he became bolder; but his manoeuvres were seen through, and he was arrested, tried, and sentenced to death. Previous to execution he was presented to the em- press; and as he had obtained great military re- nown, and was besides a remarkably handsome man, he made such a visible impression upon Eu- doxia, that his judges thought it convenient to annul their sentence, in consequence of which he was sent into nominal exile in his native country Cappadocia. Two days after his departure he was joined by some messengers of the empress, who or- dered him to return to Constantinople. At his arrival there he was immediately appointed com- mander-in-chief of the army. The end of this farce was his marriage with the empress, and his proclamation as emperor three days after their marriage. Constantine X., however, had left three sons, who considered themselves prejudiced through the accession of Romanus, and entered into a dan- gerous plot against his life; but their mother suc- ceeded in pacifying them, and submitting them to her authority. There remained, however, a strong party of malcontents at the court, composed of eminent and high-born men. Romanus, active and energetic, not only counteracted their plans, but intro- duced a remarkable reform into the derelict and disrupted administration, and freed himself from the authority of his wife, by leaving Constantinople and keeping his court on the Asiatic side of the Bosporus.

To these domestic quarrels the Turks put a sud- den end. Their sultan, Alp-Aralan, approached by rapid marches from the shores of the Caspian and the highlands of northern Persia, while one of his lieutenants attacked Syria. Romanus took the field against them with his usual energy and promptitude. His intention was to cover Syria; and he was already on its frontiers when he was informed of the progress of the Turkish arms in the North. He consequently left Syria to his generals, and marched to Pontus with such rapidity, that he surprised and routed several Turkish bodies sta- tioned on its frontier. This was sufficient to keep the main body of the Turks within Persia. Romanus therefore hastened to Syria. He made a successful campaign down to Antioch and up again along the Euphrates, and wherever he carried his arms the enemy was worsted. One of his gen- erals, less fortunate, or less skilful, was surprised by the Turks, and lost the day and half of his army. Romanus flew to his support; and in a nocturnal engagement, took the camp of the Turks, and routed them with great slaughter (20th of November, 1068). He then marched again up the Euphrates as far as Ara, constantly annoyed by the light troops of the enemy; but he placed his troops in good and safe winter-quarters, and returned to the capital. Eudoxia, reconciled to her husband, had meanwhile governed the state with wisdom; and, in acknowledgment of the vic- tories of the emperor, presented him with a sort of miscellaneous work, entitled "Ionia," which she had just finished. The campaign was renewed in 1069, and the imperial arms were again successful, though not uniformly so, as the Turks succeeded in taking and pilaging Iconium. The third cam- paign, in 1070, was carried on under the command- in-chief of Manuel Comnenus, the emperor requir- ing repose after so many fatigues. Ere long, news

ROMILIUS POLLIO. [POLLIO.]

ROMULIUS DENTER, is said to have been appointed prefectus urbi by Romulus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 11.)

ROMULUS, the founder of the city of Rome. It is unnecessary in the present work to prove that all the stories about Romulus are mythical, and merely represent the traditional belief of the Roman people respecting their origin. Romulus, which is only a lengthened form of Romus, is simply the Roman people represented as an individual, and must be placed in the same category as Aecus, Dorus, and Ion, the reputed ancestors of the Aeolians, Doriens, and Ionians, owing to the universal practice of antiquity to represent nations as springing from eponymous ancestors. But although none of the tales about Romulus can be received as an historical fact, yet it is of importance to know the general belief of the Roman people respecting the life of the founder of their city. It is, however, very difficult to ascertain the original form of the legend; since poets, on the one hand, embellished it with the crown of their own fancy, and historians, on the other hand, omitted many of its most marvellous incidents, in order to reduce it to the form of a probable history. The various tales related respecting the foundation of Rome may be reduced to two classes, one of Greek and the other of native origin. The former bring Romulus into close connection with Aeneas. A few Greek writers make Aeneas the founder of Rome, and speak of his wife under the name of Roma; others represent Romulus as his son or a remote descendant; but the greater part make him his grandson by his daughter Ila. In most of these accounts the twin brothers are spoken of, but they appear under the names of Romulus and Romus, not Remus (comp. Dionys. i. 72, 73; Plut. Rom. 2, 3; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. i. 274; Festus, s. v. Roma). These accounts, however, scarcely deserve the name of traditions, as Niebuhr has remarked; they are for the most part the inventions of Greek writers, who were ignorant of the native legend, but having heard of the fame of Rome, wished to assign to it an origin.

The old Roman legend was of a very different kind. It was preserved in popular poems, which were handed down from generation to generation, and some of which were in existence in the time of Dionysius (i. 79); and it seems to have been recorded in prose in its most genuine form by the annalist Q. Fabius Pictor, who lived during the second Punic War. This legend probably ran nearly as follows:—At Alba Longa there reigned a succession of kings, descended from Iulus, the son of Aeneas. One of the last of these kings left two sons, Numitor and Amulius. The latter, who was the younger, deprived Numitor of the kingdom, but allowed him to live in the enjoyment of his private fortune. Fearful, however, lest the heirs of Numitor might not submit so quietly to his usurpation, he caused his only son to be murdered, and made his daughter* Silvia

* Many writers call her Rhea or Rea Silvia. Nie-one of the Vestal virgins. As Silvia one day went into the sacred grove, to draw water for the service of the goddess, a wolf met her, and she fled into a cave for safety; thence, while a total eclipse obsured the sun, Mars himself appeared to her,
and then consoled her with the promise that she should be the mother of heroic children (Serv. ad Virg.
Aen. i. 274; Dionys. ii. 56; Plut. Rom. 27).

When her time came, she brought forth twins.
Amilius doomed the guilty Vestal and her babes to be drowned in the river. In the Anio Silvia exchanged her earthly life for that of a goddess, and became the wife of the river-god. The stream carried the cradle in which the children were lying into the Tiber, which had overflowed its banks far and wide. It was stranded at the foot of the Palatine, and overturned on the root of a wild fig-tree, which, under the name of the Ficus Runci-nalis, was preserved and held sacred for many ages after. A she-wolf, which had come to drink of the stream, carried them into her den hard by,
and suckled them; and there, when they wanted other food, the woodpecker, a bird sacred to Mars, 2
brought it to them (Ov. Fast. iii. 54). At length this marvellous spectacle was seen by Feustulus, the king's shepherd, who took the children to his own house, and gave them to the care of his wife, Aca Larentia. They were called Romulus and Remus, and grew up along with the twelve sons of their foster-parents, on the Palatine hill (Massarrius Sabinius, ap. Gall. vi. 7). They were, however, distinguished from their comrades by the beauty of their person and the bravery of their deeds, and became the acknowledged leaders of the other shepherd youths, with whom they fought boldly against wild beasts and robbers. The followers of Romulus were called Quintilli; those of Remus, Fibili. A quarrel arose between them and the herdsmen of Numitor, who staked their cattle on the neighbouring hill of the Aventine. Remus was taken by a stratagem, during the absence of his brother, and carried off to Numitor. His age and noble bearing made Numitor think of his grandsons; and he, (Ov. Fast. iii. 54). At length this marvellous nuptiae of the twin brothers.
Meanwhile Romulus hastened with his father-father to Numitor; suspicion was changed into certainty, and the old man recognised them as his grandsons. They now resolved to avenge the wrongs which their family had suffered.
With the help of their faithful comrades, who had flocked to Alba to rescue Remus, they slew Amilius, and placed Numitor on the throne.
Romulus and Remus loved their old abode, and therefore left Alba to found a city on the banks of the Tiber. They were accompanied only by their old comrades, the shepherds. The story which makes them joined by the Alban nobles, is no part of the old legend; since the Julii and similar families do not appear till after the destruction of Alba. As the brothers possessed equal authority and power, a strife arose between them where the city should be built, who should be its founder, and after whose name it should be called. Romulus wished to build it on the Palatine, Remus

on the Aventine, or, according to another tradition, on another hill three or four miles down lower the river, called Remuria or Remoria, which Niebuhr supposes to be the hill beyond S. Paolo (comp.
Dionys. i. 85; Plut. Rom. 9). It was agreed that the question should be decided by augury;
and each took his station on the top of his chosen hill. The night passed away, and as the day was dawning Remus saw six vultures; but at sun-rise,
when these tidings were brought to Romulus, twelve vultures flew by him. Each claimed the augury in his own favour; but most of the shepherds decided for Romulus, and Remus was therefore obliged to yield. Romulus now proceeded to mark out the pomorium of his city (see Dict. of Ant. s. c.). He yoked a bullock and a heifer to a plough with a copper ploughshare, and drew a deep furrow round the foot of the Palatine, so as to include a considerable compass below the hill; and men followed after who turned every clop to the inward side. Where the gates were to be made, the plough was carried over the space; since otherwise nothing unclean could have entered the city, as the track of the plough was holy. In the committium a vault was built underground, which was filled with the first-fruits of all the natural productions that support human life, and with earth which each of the settlers had brought with him from his home. This place was called Mundus, and was believed to be the entrance to the lower world (Festus, s. v. Mundus; Plut. Rom. 11).
Rome is said to have been founded on the 21st of April, and this day was celebrated as a yearly festival down to the latest times of Roman history.
It was the Palilia, or festival of Pales, the divinity of the shepherds, and was, therefore, a day well fitted for the foundation of a city by shepherds (see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Palilia). On the line of the later Roman boundary, on which the Romulus who still resolved the wrong he had suffered, leapt over it in scorn, whereupon Romulus slew him, saying, 'So die whosoever hereafter shall leap over my walls;' though, according to another account, he was killed by Celer, who had the charge of the building. Remorse now seized Romulus, and he rejected all food and comfort, till at length he aped the shade of Remus by instituting the festival of the Lemuria for the souls of the departed (Ov. Fast. v. 461, &c.). Afterwards an empty throne was set by the side of Romulus, with a sceptre and crown, that his brother might seem to reign with him (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. i. 270).
Thus in the earliest legends we find the supreme power divided between two persons; but it is not impossible that the belief in the double kingdom of Romulus and Remus, as well as subsequently in

* In his Lectures on Roman history (pp. 39, 40, ed. Schmitz, 1848) Niebuhr brings forward many reasons to prove what he had hinted at in his History (vol. i. note 618), that the latter hill was the one mentioned in the ancient tradition, and that the story relating to it was afterwards transferred to the Aventine, since this hill was the special abode of the plebeians, and there existed between it and the Palatine a perpetual feud.
that of Romulus and Titus Tatius, may have arisen simply from the circumstance of there being two magistrates at the head of the state in later times. Romulus now found his people too few in numbers. He therefore set apart, on the Capitoline hill, an asylum, or a sanctuary, in which homicides and runaway slaves might take refuge. The city thus became filled with men, but they wanted women. Romulus, therefore, tried to form treaties with the neighbouring tribes, in order to obtain connubium, or the right of legal marriage with their citizens; but his offers were treated with disdain, and he accordingly resolved to obtain by force what he could not gain by entreaty. In the fourth month after the foundation of the city, he proclaimed that games were to be celebrated in honour of the god Consus, and invited his neighbours, the Latins and Sabines, to the festival. Suspecting no treachery, they came in numbers, with their wives and children. But the Roman youths rushed upon their guests, and carried off the virgins. The old legend related that thirty Sabine virgins were thus seized, and that these, in the swampland of the smallness of the number seemed so incredible to a later age, which looked upon the legend as a genuine history, that it was increased to some hundreds by such writers as Valerius Antias and Juba (Plut. Rom. 14; comp. Liv. i. 13). The parents of the virgins returned home and prepared for vengeance. The inhabitants of three of the Latin towns, Caenina, Antemnae, and Crustumium, took up arms one after the other, and were successively defeated by the Romans. Romulus slew with his own hand Acron, king of Caenina, and dedicated his arms and armour, as spolia opima, to Jupiter. At last the Sabine king, Titus Tatius, advanced with a powerful army, against Rome. His forces were so great that Romulus, unable to resist him in the field, was obliged to retire into the city. He had previously fortified and garrisoned the top of the Sabine hill, afterwards called the Capitoline, which was divided from the area of the city by a swampland valley, the site of the forum. But Tarpelia, the daughter of the commander of the fortress, dazzled by the golden bracelets of the Sabines, promised to betray the hill to them, if they would give her the ornaments which they wore on their left arms. Her offer was accepted; in the night time she opened a gate and let in the enemy; but when she claimed her reward, they threw upon her the shields which they carried on their left arms, and thus crushed her to death. Her tomb was shown on the hill in later times, and her memory was preserved by the name of the Tarpelian rock, from which traitors were afterwards hurled down. On the next day the Romans endeavoured to recover the hill. A long and desperate battle was fought in the valley between the Palatine and the Capitoline. At one time the Romans were driven before the enemy, and the day seemed utterly lost, when Romulus vowed a temple to Jupiter Stator, the Stayer of Flight; whereupon the Romans took courage, and returned again to the combat. At length, when both parties were exhausted with the struggle, the Sabine women rushed in between them, and prayed their husbands and fathers to be reconciled. Their prayer was heard; the two people not only made peace, but agreed to form only one nation. The Romans continued to dwell on the Palatine under their king Romulus; the Sabines built a new town on the Capitoline and Quirinal hills, where they lived under their king Titus Tatius. The two kings and their senates met for deliberation in the valley between the Palatine and Capitoline hills, which was hence called comitium, or the place of meeting. But this union did not last long. Titus Tatius was slain at a festival at Laviniun, by some Laurentines to whom he had refused satisfaction for outrages which had been committed by his kinsmen. Henceforward Romulus ruled alone over both Romans and Sabines; but, as he neglected to pursue the murderers, both his people and those of Laurentum were visited by a pestilence, which did not cease until the murderers on both sides were given up.

After the death of Tatius the old legend appears to have passed on at once to the departure of Romulus from the world. Of the long period which intervened few particulars are recorded, and these Niebuhr supposes, with some justice, to be the inventions of a later age. Romulus is said to have attacked the Firilians, or Latins, and taken the city; and likewise to have carried on a successful war against the powerful city of Veii, which purchased a truce of a hundred years, on a surrender of a third of its territory. At length, after a reign of thirty-seven years, when the city had become strong and powerful, and Romulus had performed all his mortal works, the hour of his departure arrived. One day as he was reviewing his people in the Campus Martius, near the Goat's Pool, the sun was suddenly eclipsed, darkness overspread the earth, and a dreadful storm dispersed the people. When daylight returned, Romulus had disappeared, for his father Mars had carried him up to heaven in a fiery chariot ("Quirinus Martis equis Acheronta fugit," Hor. Carm. iii. 3; " Rex patriis astra petebat equis," Ov. Fast. ii. 496). The people mourned for their beloved king; but their mourning gave way to religious reverence, when he appeared again in more than mortal beauty to Proculus Julius, and bade him tell the Romans that they should become the lords of the world, and that he would watch over them as their guardian god Quirinus. The Romans therefore worshipped him under this name. The festival of the Quirinalia was celebrated in his honour on the 17th of February; but the Nones of Quintilis, or the seventh of July, was the day on which, according to tradition, he departed from the earth.

Such was the glorified end of Romulus in the genuine legend. But as it staggered the faith of a later age, a tale was invented to account for his mysterious disappearance. It was related that the senators, discontented with the tyrannical rule of their king, murdered him during the gloom of a tempest, cut up his body, and carried home the mangled pieces under their robes. But the forgers of this tale forgot that Romulus is nowhere represented in the ancient legend as a tyrant, but as a mild and beneficent monarch, whose rule became still more gentle after the death of Titius, whom it branded as a tyrant.

The genuine features of the old legend about Romulus may still be seen in the accounts of Livy (i. 3—16), Dionysius (i. 76—ii. 50), and Plutarch (Romul.), notwithstanding the numerous falsifications and interpolations by which it is obscured, especially in the two latter writers. It is given in its most perfect form in the Roman Histories of Niebuhr (vol. i. p. 220, &c.) and Malden (p. 6, &c.).

As Romulus was regarded as the founder of Rome, its most ancient political institutions and the organisation of the people were ascribed to him by the popular belief. Thus he is said to have divided the people into three tribes, which bore the names Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. The Ramnes were supposed to have derived their name from Romulus, the Tities from Titus Tatius the Sabine king, and the Luceres from Lucumo, an Etruscan chief who had assisted Romulus in the war against the Sabines. Each tribe contained ten curiae, which received their names from the thirty Sabine women who had brought about the peace between the Romans and their own people. Further, each curia contained ten gentes, and each gent a hundred men. Thus the people, according to the general belief, were divided originally into three tribes, thirty curiae, and three hundred gentes, which mustered 3000 men, who fought on foot, and were called a legio. Besides those there were three hundred horsemen, called celeres, the same body as the equites of a later time; but the legend neglects to tell us from what quarter these horsemen came. To assist him in the government of the people Romulus is said to have selected a number of the aged men in the state, who were called patres, or senators. The council itself, which was called the senatus, originally consisted of one hundred members; but this number was increased to two hundred when the Sabines were incorporated in the state. In addition to the senate, there was another assembly, consisting of the members of the gentes, which bore the name of comitia curiata, because they voted in it according to their division into curiae. To this assembly was committed the election of the kings in subsequent times.

That part of the legend of Romulus which relates to the political institutions which he is said to have founded, represents undoubted historical facts. For we have certain evidence of the existence of such institutions in the earliest times, and many traces endured to the imperial period: and the popular belief only attempted to explain the origin of existing phenomena by ascribing their first establishment to the heroic founder of the state. Thus, while no competent scholar would attempt in the present day to give a history of Romulus; because, even on the supposition that the legend still retained some real facts, we have no criteria to separate what is true from what is false; yet, on the other hand, it is no presumption to endeavour to form a conception of the political organisation of Rome in the earliest times, because we can take our start from actually existing institutions, and trace them back, in many cases step by step, to remote times. We are thus able to prove that the legend is for the most part only an explanation of facts which had a real existence. It would be out of place here to attempt an explanation of the early Roman constitution, but a few remarks are necessary in explanation of the legendary account of the constitution which has been given above.

The original site of Rome was on the Palatine hill. On this there was a Latin colony established at the earliest times, which formed an independent state. On the neighbouring hills there appear to have been also settlements of Sabines and Etruscans, the former probably on the Quirinal and Ca-poline hills, and the latter on the Caelian. In course of time these Sabine and Etruscan settlements coalesced with the Latin colony on the Palatine, and the three peoples became united into one state. At what time this union took place it is of course impossible to say; the legend referred it to the age of Romulus. There appears, however, sufficient evidence to prove that the Latins and Sabines were united first, and that it was probably long afterwards that the Etruscans became amalgamated with them. Of this we may mention, as one proof, the number of the senate, which is said to have been doubled on the union of the Sabines, but which remained two hundred till the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, who is reported to have increased it to three hundred (Liv. i. 35; Dionys. iii. 67). These three peoples, after their amalgamation, became three tribes; the Latins were called Ramnes or Ramnenses; the Sabines, Tities or Titenses; the Etruscans, Luceres or Lucerenses. The name of Ramnes undoubtedly comes from the same root as that of Romus or Romulus, and in like manner that of Tities is connected with Titus Tatius. The origin of the third name is more doubtful, and was a disputed point even in antiquity. Most ancient writers derived it from Lucumo, which etymology best agrees with the Etruscan origin of the tribe, as Lucumo was a title of honour common to the Etruscan chiefs. Others suppose it to come from Lucerus, a king of Ardea (Paul. Diac. s. t. Lucerenses, p. 119, ed. Müller), a statement on which Niebuhr principally relies for the proof of the Latin origin of the third tribe; but we think with the majority of the best modern writers, that the Luceres were of Etruscan, and not of Latin, descent. Each of these tribes was divided into ten curiae, as the legend states; but that they derived their names from the thirty Sabine women is of course fabulous. In like manner each curia was divided into ten gentes, which must be regarded as smaller political bodies, rather than as combinations of persons of the same kind. For further information the reader is referred to the several articles on these subjects in the Dictionary of Antiquities.

ROMULUS AUGUSTULUS. [AUGUSTULUS.]

ROMULUS SILVIUS. [SILVIUS.]

ROMULUS son of the emperor Maxentius. He was nominated colleague, in the consulsip, to his father, whom he predeceased, as we learn from medals of consecration still extant, upon which he is represented as a boy. [See below.] The coin which bears the legend M. AUR. ROMULUS. NOBLIS. CARS. is probably spurious. (Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 59.)

[W. R.]

COIN OF ROMULUS, SON OF MAXENTIUS.

ROMULUS, artists. 1. A sculptor of sarcophagi, whose name is found inscribed on one side of a splendid sarcophagus in the Villa Medici. (Guattani, Monum. Ined. vol. i. p. lvii.; R. Rotchette, Lettre à M. Schorns, p. 398, 2d ed.).
2. Petullius, one of those artists of Roman Gaul, whose names have become known to us by means of the inscriptions preserved in the Museum at Lyons. This artist is designated in the inscription Arts arg exclusion, which, there is little doubt, means a maker of silver vases, as R. Rochette has shown, following the Abbé Greppo, from the use of the word exclusion in this sense, in a passage of Augustine. (Ad Paul. Ixxv. 31 ; Du Cange, s. v. Exclusion; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Scorn, pp. 441, 442, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

2. The brother of Romulus, who is commonly called Remus. (Aelian, V. H. vii. 16.)

3. A son of Emathion. (Plut. Romul. 2 ; comp. Romulus.)

ROSCIUS GENs, plebeian, was of considerable antiquity, as we read of a L. Roscius as early as n. c. 438 [see Roscius, No. 1]; but the name does not occur again till the last century of the republic. None of its members obtained the consulship during the republic; but in the imperial period three persons of this name received this honour. The only surnames of the Roman Roscii under the republic are Fabratus and Orthon; the Roscii at Aemilia are distinguished by one or two other surnames, which are given below. [Roscius, No. 2.]

ROSCILLUS, a chief of the Allobroges, who deserted from Caesar to Pompey, along with Aegus, another chief of the same people. He is spoken of under Aegus.

ROSCIUS, 1. L. Roscius, a Roman ambassador sent to Fidenae in n. c. 438. He and his three colleagues were killed by the inhabitants of Fidenae, at the instigation of Lar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes. The statues of all four were erected in the Rostra at Rome. (Livy. iv. 17; Cic. Phil. ix. 2; Plin. II. N. xxxiv. 6. 11.)

2. Sex. Roscius, of Aemilia, a town in Umbria, now Amelia, was accused of the murder of his father in n. c. 80, and was defended by Cicero in an oration which is still extant, and which was the first that the orator delivered in a criminal cause. The following are the circumstances under which the prosecution arose. Sex. Roscius had a father of the same name, who was one of the most wealthy citizens of Aemilia. The father bore an unblemished character, but had for certain reasons incurred the enmity of two of his relations and fellow-townsmen, T. Roscius Magnus and T. Roscius Capito, who not only hated the person, but coveted the wealth of their neighbour. Sextus frequently visited Rome, where he lived on terms of intimacy with Metellus, Servilius, and other Roman nobles. On one of these visits to the capital he was assassinated near the Palatine baths, as he was returning in the evening from a banquet. His enemy, Magnus, who was at Rome at the time, and who had doubtless hired the assassins, immediately despatched a messenger with the news to Capito at Aemilia, but without informing the younger Sextus, who was likewise at Aemilia, of the death of his father. Four days afterwards Chrysogonus, the freedman and favourite of Sulla, who was at Volaterrae in Eturia, was likewise acquainted with the event. He learnt that the property which Roscius had left behind him was considerable, consisting of not less than thirteen farms, lying for the most part on the Tiber, as well as of ready money and other valuables. Fortwith a bargain was struck between Chrysogonus and the two Rosci; and the name of Sextus was placed on the subscription list, notwithstanding an edict of Sulla, that none of the proscribed should be pursued after the first of June, n. c. 81. But as the name of Sextus was now on the list, his property was confiscated; Capito obtained three of the farms, and the remaining ten were purchased by Chrysogonus for 2000 denarii, though they were worth in reality 250 talents; and Magnus was likewise well rewarded for his share in the business. Such a barefaced act of villany excited the utmost indignation at Aemilia. The decrees of the town accordingly sent ten of the principal citizens to Sulla to acquaint him with the real state of the case, and to beg that the name of Roscius might be erased from the subscription list, in order that his son might thus regain possession of his hereditary property. Alarmed at this return, but knowing they were taking, Chrysogonus had an interview with the deputation, and pledged his word that their request should be complied with; and they, probably more than half afraid of facing the dictator, were contented to receive the promise, and returned home without seeing Sulla. These half-measures, however, only exposed the younger Roscius to still greater peril. The robbers saw that they had no security for their property as long as he was alive. They therefore laid snares for his life, and he only escaped the fate of his father by flying to Rome and taking refuge in the house of Caecilia, the daughter of Metellus Balearicus. Here he was quite safe from private assassination. Disappointed of getting rid of him secretly, his enemies resolved to murder him judicially. They accordingly hired a certain C. Erculeius to accuse him of the murder of his father, and they paid a sufficient number of witnesses to swear to the fact. They felt sure of a verdict against the accused, as they did not believe that any person of influence would undertake his defence; and even if he could obtain an advocate, they were convinced that his counsel would not dare, by speaking of the sale of the property, to bring any accusation against the powerful freedman of Sulla. In this, however, they were disappointed. Cicero, who was burning for distinction, saw that this was a most favourable opportunity for gaining glory, and readily undertook the defence. He did not hesitate to attack Chrysogonus with the utmost severity, and so evident was the guilt of the accusers, and so clear the innocence of the accused, that the judges had no alternative left but the acquittal of Roscius. It was the first trial for murder that had come before the judges since the judicium had been taken from the equites and restored to the senators by Sulla, and they were unwilling to give to the popular party such a handle against them as the condemnation of Roscius would have supplied. Besides which Sulla allowed the court to exercise an unbiased judgment, and did not interfere for the sake of gratifying the wishes of his favourite. Cicero's speech was greatly admired at the time, and though at a later period he found fault with it himself, as bearing marks of youthful exaggeration, it displays abundant evidence of his great oratorical powers. (Comp. Cic. Orat. 30, de Off. ii. 14; Plut. Cic. 3; Drumm. Geschichte Romes, vol. v. pp. 234-244.)

3. Q. Roscius, the most celebrated comic actor at Rome, was a native of Solonium, a small place in the neighbourhood of Lanuvium. His sister was married to Quintius, whom Cicero defended in B.C. 81. (Cic. pro Quint. 24, 25.) A tale was told, that in his infancy he was found in the folds of a serpent, and that this foreshadowed his future eminence. His extraordinary skill in acting procured him the favour of many of the most distinguished Roman nobles, and, among others, of the dictator Sulla, who presented him with a gold ring, the symbol of equestrian rank. Like his celebrated contemporary, the tragic actor Aesopus, Roscius enjoyed the friendship of Cicero, who constantly speaks of him in terms both of admiration and affection, and on one occasion calls him his amores et derece. Roscius paid the greatest attention to his art, and obtained excellence in it by the most careful and elaborate study. It is to this that Horace alludes, when he says (Ep. ii. 1. 82):

"Quae gravis Aesopus, quae doctus Roscius egit."

So careful and assiduous was he in his preparations, that even in the height of his reputation, he did not venture upon a single gesture in public which he had not previously well considered and practised at home. But notwithstanding all this study, no mannerism or affectation appeared in his acting; every thing he did was perfectly natural to the character he represented; and he himself used to say that decorum was the highest excellence of the art. He was considered by the Romans to have reached such perfection in his own profession, that it became the fashion to call every one who became particularly distinguished in his own art, by the name of Roscius. In his younger years Cicero received his instruction, and a later time he and Roscius often used to try which of them could express a thought with the greatest effect, the orator by his eloquence, or the actor by his gestures. Macrobius, who relates this anecdote, goes on to say that these exercises gave Roscius so high an opinion of his art, that he wrote a work in which he compared eloquence and acting. Like Aesopus, Roscius realized an immense fortune by his profession. Macrobius says that he made a thousand denarii a day, and Pliny relates that his yearly profits were fifty millions of sestertii. He died in B.C. 62, as Cicero, in his oration for Archias (c. 3), which was delivered in that year, speaks of his death as a recent event. (Cic. de Div. i. 36, ii. 31, de Orat. i. 27—29, 59, 66, ii. 37, 59, ii. 26, 59, de Leg. i. 4, Brut. 84; Plut. Cic. 5; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 19; Val. Max. viii. 7. § 7; Plin. H. N. vii. 32, s. 40.) A scholar on Cicero gives the cognomen Gallius to Q. Roscius, but it does not occur elsewhere, as far as we know. (Schol. Bob. pro Arch. p. 357, ed. Orelli.)

In B.C. 68 Cicero pleaded the cause of his friend in a civil suit before the judge C. Piso. It appears that a certain C. Fannius Chorea had a slave of the name of Panurium, whom he entrusted to Roscius for instruction in his art, on the agreement that whatever profits the slave might acquire should be divided between them. Panurium was murdered by one Q. Flavius of Tarquinii, and accordingly an action was brought against him for damages, by Fannius and Roscius. Before the case came on for trial, Roscius received from Flavius a farm, which Fannius valued at 100,000 sestertii; Roscius maintained that this farm was simply a compensation for his own loss; but Fannius asserted that Roscius had no right to make terms for himself alone, and that according to the original agreement he was entitled to half of the compensation. The dispute was referred for arbitration to C. Piso, who did not give any formal decision, but at his recommendation Roscius consented to pay Fannius a certain sum of money for the trouble he had had, and Fannius, on the other hand, promised to give Roscius the half of whatever he might receive from Flavius. Fannius now sued Flavius; the case came on before the judge C. Cluvius, a Roman eques, who sentenced Flavius to pay 100,000 sestertii. According to the statement of Roscius he himself never received any part of this sum although he was entitled to half of it. Some years afterwards, when Flavius was dead, Fannius sued Roscius for 50,000 sestertii, as the half of the value of the estate given to Roscius on the death of Panurium, and appealed to the agreement made before C. Piso, in support of his claim. The case came on for trial before the same C. Piso, who now acted as judge, and Cicero defended his friend in an oration, which has come down to us, though with the loss of the opening part. The date of the oration is doubtful; we have adopted the one given by Drumann, who discusses the matter at length (Geschichte Roms, vol. v. pp. 346—348). The subject of the oration has afforded matter for considerable discussion to modern jurists and scholars. (See Unterholzer, Über die Rede des Cicero für den Schauspieler Q. Roscius, in Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. i. p. 248, &c.; München, Oriatto M. T. C. pro R. C. juridicos exposuit, Colomine, 1829; and Schmidt, in his edition of the oration, Lipsiae, 1839.)

4. 5. Roscius, two brothers, who accompanied Crassus on his Parthian expedition. (Plut. Crass. 31.)

6. Roscius, a legate of Q. Cornelius in Africa, perished along with his commander, in B.C. 43. (Appian, B. C. iv. 56.) [CORNIFICIIUS, No. 3.]

ROSCIANUS, L. AELI'ANUS. 1. Consul a. d. 100 (Fasti).
2. Consul a. d. 223, with L. Marius Maximus, in the reign of the emperor Severus (Fasti).

ROSCIU'S, CAELIIUS, the legatus of the twentieth legion, which was stationed in Britain at the time of Nero's death, a. d. 68. (Tac. Hist. i. 60.)

ROSCIUS REGULUS. [REGULUS.]

ROSIA'NUS GEMINUS, questor of the younger Pliny in his consulship, a. d. 100, is recommended by the latter in one of his letters to Trajan (Ep. x. 11. s. 16).

ROXANNA, daughter of Oxyartes, the Bactrian. According to Arrian, she fell into the hands of Alexander on his capture of the hill- fort in Sogdiana, named "the rock," where the wife and daughters of Oxyartes had been placed for security; and the conqueror was so captivated by the charms of Roxana (who appeared to the Macedonians the most beautiful of all the Asiatic women they had seen, except the wife of Dareius), that he resolved to marry her—a design which induced Oxyartes, when he heard of it, to come and submit himself to Alexander, B.C. 327 (Arr. Anab. iv. 18—20). The statements of Curtius (viii. 4), and of Plutarch (Alex. 47), differ in some points from the above account; but see Droysen, Alexander, p. 346. At the time of Alexander's death, in B.C. 323, Roxana was far ad-RUBRIUS, a Roman eques at Syracuse, when Verres was governor of Sicily. (Cic. Verr. i. 57.)

5. RUBRIUS, was propraeitor in Macedonia about B.C. 67, in which year M. Cato served under him as tribune of the soldiers. (Plut. Cat. min. 9.)

6. L. RUBRIUS, a senator, was taken prisoner by Caesar at the capture of Cornuflum, at the beginning of B.C. 49, and was dismissed by him uninjured. (C. B. C. 12. 23.)

7. M. RUBRIUS, was with M. Cato in Utica at the time of his death. (Plut. Cat. min. 62, 63.)

8. RUBRIUS RUGA, was one of Caesar's assassins, B.C. 44. (Appian, B. C. i. 113, with the note of Schweighäuser.) He may have been the same as either No. 6 or 7, both of whom belonged to the Pompeian party.

9. L. RUBRIUS, of Casium, made M. Antonius his husband. (Cic. Phil. ii. 16.)

10. RUBRIUS, a Roman eques, accused at the beginning of the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 73.)

RUBRIUS, a physician at Rome, who lived probably about the beginning or middle of the first century after Christ, and is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxix. 5) as having gained by his practice the annual income of two hundred and fifty thousand sesterces (about 19534. 2s. 6d.). As this is considered by Pliny to be a very large sum, it may give us some notion of the fortunes made by physicians at Rome about the beginning of the empire.

RUBRIUS FABATUS, was apprehended in attempting to fly to the Parthians in a. d. 32, but escaped punishment from the forgetfulness rather than the mercy of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. vi. 14.)

RUBRIUS GALLUS. (Gallus.)

RUBRIUS PULITO. (Pollio.)

RUBILLA, ANNIA, spoken of in the reign of Tiberius. (Juv. 318.)

RUFILLUS, a person ridiculed by Horace on account of the perfumes he carried about his person. (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 27, i. 4. 92.)

RUFINA, POMPONIA, (Pomponia.)

RUFINIA, JULIUS, a Latin rhetorician of uncertain date, the author of a treatise De Figuris Sententiarum et Eloctionibus, first published, along with several other pieces of a similar description, by Beatus Rhenanus, 4to. Basel, 1521. It will be found in the "Rhetares Antiqui Latinii" of Pitoresus, 4to. Paris, 1599, p. 24, in the collection of Capronerius, 4to. Argent. 1756, p. 29, and is generally included in the editions of the work by Rutillus Lupus [Lupus], which bears the same title.

RUF'INUS, prime minister of Theodosius the Great, one of the most able, but also most ingratiating, treacherous, and dangerous men of his time. He succeeded him beqroymaros xeronomos kai kripheus. He was a native of Elusium, the capital of Noveppopulana, a portion of Aquitania, in Gaul, now Euse in Gascony. Although of low birth, he succeeded in working his way up to the imperial court, and early attached himself to the fortune of Theodosius, with whom he became a great favourite. He employed his ascendancy over the emperor to abuse his confidence, and Theodosius seemed to have been struck with a blindness which prevented him from seeing the odious vices and public crimes of this dangerous man. At the time of the great troubles at Thessalonica, in A.D. 390, Rufinus held the important post of magister officiorum, and having great influence in the imperial cabinet, excited the vindictive Theodosius to those cruel measures which brought ruin upon that flourishing city. In 392 Rufinus was consul, and raised himself to the dignity of praefectus praetorio by depositing the then praefect Theodosius, sending him into exile, and putting to death his son Proculus, the praefect of Constantinople. In consequence of these proceedings, and his boundless rapacity through which the eastern provinces were nearly ruined, Rufinus incurred the general hatred; and the empire was surprised when, after the death of Theodosius in the same year, 392, he continued his former influence over the weak Arcadius. There were, however, men in the empire able to cope with him, and little dreading his power. Among these Stilicho and Eutropius were the principal, and they consequently became objects of fear and hatred to Rufinus. In order to divert the attention of these powerful men from his own person, and prevent them from joining in Constantinople for his destruction, Rufinus persuaded the Huns and the Goths to make an inroad into the empire. The former came from Scythia by sea, landed in Asia Minor, and carried destruction as far as Antioch, where their farther progress was arrested. The Goths were met by the brave Stilicho who, owing to the machinations of Rufinus, sustained more defects than he obtained victories in his war against the Chinese and barbarians as they deserved. They retrenched, however, and now Stilicho entered with Gainas, the Gothic ally of Arcadius, into a plan for ruining Rufinus. Gainas soon gained the assistance of his officers, and approached Constantinople under the pretext of having his troops reviewed by the emperor. Rufinus had meanwhile prevailed upon Arcadius to make him co-emperor, and they set out from Constantinople to meet the returning army, and have the proclamation made in presence of Gainas and his men, whom they thought devoted to the all-powerful minister. Rufinus was so sure of his nomination, that he had already money coined with his effigy, destined to be distributed among the soldiers. Arcadius and Rufinus arrived in the camp of Gainas on the 27th of November 395, and the solemnity was on the point of taking place, when suddenly one of Gainas' men rushed upon Rufinus, who stood close to the emperor, and plunged his sword in his breast. Others soon followed his example, and in a moment Rufinus fell a victim to their fury. His head was cut off, stuck upon a spear, and paraded through the camp. His right hand was likewise cut off, and a soldier carried it about among his comrades, crying in mockery, "Charity, charity to the hand that could never get enough!" Arcadius fled in consternation from the scene of murder, but his fears were soon removed, and he agreed to confiscate the immense property of Rufinus. Of this Eutropius, who was secretly privy to the murder, got the lion's share. Others, who had been robbed by Rufinus, tried to obtain an indemnity by seizing whatever they could find belonging to him, till at last Arcadius issued an edict, at the instigation of Eutropius, by which the whole residue of the property of Rufinus was declared to be imperial, or more properly speaking Eutropian, property. The wife and daughter of Rufinus were exiled to Jerusalem, and there died in peace many years after. Rufinus was the brother of Saint Sylvia. (Claudian. Rufinus; Sidus, s. e. Po!ou!vos; Sozom. vii. 24, &c.; Zosím. lib. iv. v.; Theodoret. v. 17, &c.; Philostorg. xi. 1, &c.)

RUFINUS, M. ANTONIUS, consul A.D. 131, with Ser. Octavius Laenas Pontianus. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, CAECILIUS, a man of quasitorean rank, was expelled by Domitian, when censor, from the senate because he danced. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 17; Suet. Dom. 8.)

RUFINUS, CORNELIUS. Rufinus was the name of an ancient family of the Cornelii gens, from which family the dictator Sulla was descended.

1. P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS, dictator B.C. 324, was obliged to lay down his office on account of a fault in the auspices at his election. (Liv. vii. 17.)

2. P. CORNELIUS P. F. RUFINUS, probably son of the preceding, was twice consul and once dictator. He was consul for the first time in B.C. 290, with M. Curius Dentatus, and in conjunction with his colleague brought the Samnite war to a conclusion, and obtained a triumph in consequence. (Dentatus.) He was consul a second time in B.C. 277, with C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus, and carried on the war against the Samnites and the Greeks in Southern Italy, who were now deprived of the powerful protection of Pyrrhus. The chief event of his second consulship was the capture of the important city of Cuma. Rufinus bore an avaricious and dishonest character on account of his avarice and dishonesty, but he was at the same time one of the most distinguished generals of his time; and accordingly C. Fabriicius, his personal enemy, is said to have supported his application for his second consulship in B.C. 277, because the Romans stood in need of a general of experience and skill on account of their war with Pyrrhus. But as Pyrrhus had left Italy in the middle of the preceding year, Niebuhr remarks (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. note 903) that the support of Fabriicius must refer to his first consulship, or perhaps with even more probability to his dictatorship, the year of which is not mentioned, but which Niebuhr refers to B.C. 260, after the defeat of the Romans at the Sirea. In B.C. 275, Rufinus was expelled from the senate by the censors C. Fabriicius and Q. Aemilius Papus, on account of his possessing ten pounds of silver plate. (Liv. Epit. 11; Eutropius. ii. 9; Cic. de orat. iii. 66; Quintil. xii. 4 § 43; Pall. iv. 8; Dion Cass. Progym. 37; Vell. Pat. ii. 17; Frontin. Strat. iii. 6 § 4; Zonar. viii. 6; Liv. Epit. 14; Gall. xvi. 21; Val. Max. ii. 9 § 44; Macrobr. Sot. i. 17; Plut. Sull. 1.) Rufinus is said to have lost his sight in sleep, while dreaming of this misfortune. (Plin. H. N. vii. 50, s. 51.) His grandson was the first of the family who assumed the surname of Sulla. (Sulla.)

RUFINUS, C. CUSPITIUS, consul A.D. 142, with L. Statius Quadratus. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, JUNIUS. 1. A. JUNIUS RUFINUS, consul A.D. 153 with C. Brutius Praesens. (Fasti.)

2. M. JUNIUS RUFUS SABINIANUS, consul A.D. 155 with C. Julius Severus. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, LICINIUS, a jurist, who lived.
under Alexander Severus, which appears from his consulting Paulus (Dig. 40. tit. 13. s. 4). There are in the Digest seventeen excerpts from twelve books of Regulae by Rufinus, according to the Florentine Index; but one excerpt (Dig. 42. tit. 1. s. 34) is superscribed Lib. XIII., which, however, proves nothing, as error easily occurs in such a numeral. The name of Licinius Rufinus appears in the Geneva edition of the Collatio Legum Mosiacarum et Romanarum, as the compiler; but this Rufinus cannot be the contemporary of Paulus, for the Collatio was compiled after the publication of the Code of Theodosius; not to mention other arguments. (Zimmerm, Geschichete des Röm. Privatrechts, vol. i.)

RUFINUS, MENN[NIUS, one of the generals of Vitellius, A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. iii. 12.)

RUFINUS, TREBONIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, had been decemvir, or one of the chief magistrates, of the Roman colony of Vienna in Gaul. (Plin. Ep. iv. 22.) He is probably the same person as the Rufinus to whom one of Pliny's letters is addressed. (Ep. viii. 18.)

RUFINUS, TRIA R IU S, consul in A. D. 210 with M. Aelius Faustinus. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, C. VI[BIUS, consul suffectus in A. D. 22. (Fasti.)

RUFINUS, literary. 1. TYRANNIUS OF TURANUS, or TURANUS, as the name is variously written, must have been born about the middle of the fourth century, but neither the precise date nor the place of his nativity can be determined with certainty, although some of his biographers have confidently fixed upon A. D. 345, for the former, and Concordia, near the head of the Adriatic, as the latter. After he had attained to manhood he became the inmate of the monastery at Aquileia, where, upon acquiring a knowledge of the principles and rites of Christianity, he received the sacrament of baptism, in 371 or 372, from the hands of the presbyter Chromatius. At this epoch also he formed that close intimacy with Hieronymus which was long maintained with great mutual warmth, but eventually most rudely dissolved. Having conceived an eager desire to visit Palestine, Rufinus set out, almost immediately after his admission into the Church, for Syria, in the train of Melania, a noble, wealthy, and devout Roman matron, and remained in the East for about twenty-six years, passing a portion of his time at Alexandria, where he enjoyed the instructions of Didymus and other learned fathers; and the rest at Jerusalem, where he took up his abode with the monks on the Mount of Olives, making frequent excursions, however, in different directions, in company with Melania, to whom he seems to have acted as spiritual adviser and almoner. During the earlier part of the above period he maintained a most affectionate correspondence with Jerome, who had retired to the desert between Antioch and the Euphrates, and although they met once only (in 385), their friendship continued uninterrupted up to 393, when bitter strife arose. Both had been warm admirers of Origen, and this admiration had been expressed in the most enthusiastic terms by Jerome, in the preface to his translation of the Homilies upon the Song of Solomon. But when the doubtful tendency of many of the theories involved in the imaginative orientalisms of Origen began by degrees to be more clearly discerned, and when the cry of heresy, first raised by Theophilus, became loud and strong, Jerome, eager to escape all suspicion of adherence to such errors, vehemently supported Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, in his attack upon John of Jerusalem, by whom Rufinus had been ordained a presbyter, and to whom he was warmly attached. The seeds of enmity planted by this controversy were cherished into vigour by the characteristic bent of Jerome, whose denouncements of his former companion became, by quick degrees, more and more fierce and unspARING; but before the quarrel had ripened into inextinguishable hatred, its progress was checked by the interposition and explanations of honest friends, and a solemn reconciliation took place at Jerusalem, on Easter day, A. D. 397.

In the autumn of the same year Rufinus embarked for Italy, along with Melania, and having been hospitably entertained by Paulinus [Paulinus], at Nola, betook himself from thence, without visiting the metropolis, to the monastery of Pietanum. Both multitudes flocked for the purpose of making inquiries with regard to the ceremonies and liturgies of the sister Churches of the East, the rules of the most celebrated coenobitical fraternities, the Greek ecclesiastical writers, and various other points upon which one who had been so long resident in Asia and Egypt would be capable of imparting information. The intelligence thus obtained proved so interesting that the learned traveller was earnestly solicited to gratify curiosity still further, by translating into Latin some of those productions to which he had been in the habit of referring most frequently. With this request, not foreseeing the storm he was about to excite, he willingly complied, and accordingly published translations of the Apology for Origen by Pamphilus, and of the books of Origen Nepi dpykein, together with an original tract De Abultratione Librorum Origenis, while in the preface to the De Principiis, either from a wish to avoid any misconception of his own views, or from some feeling of lurking malice, he quoted the panegyric pronounced by Jerome upon Origen, of which we have made mention above. The appearance of these works produced a violent ferment. Pammachius and Oceanus represented the transaction in the most unfavourable light to Jerome, whose wrath blazed forth more hotly than ever; all attempts to bring about a better understanding served only, from the bad faith of the negotiators, to feed the flame; a bitter correspondence followed, which was crowned by the Apologia of the one adversus Hieronymum, and the Apologia of the other adversus Rufinum.

Soon after the commencement of the dispute Rufinus retired to Aquileia, and during the life of Siricius, was steadily supported by the pontifical court. But, upon the elevation of Anastasius, he was summoned by the new pope to repair to Rome, for the purpose of answering the charges preferred against his orthodoxy: this mandate, however, he evaded, and, instead of appearing in person, transmitted an Apologia, in which he explains his real views, and altogether disavows any participation in the dangerous doctrines imputed to him by his enemies. Anastasius replied by an epistle, in which he condemned, most unequivocally, the tenets of Origen, and censured indirectly the rashness of his translator, without, however, seeking further to disturb him in his retreat. After the death of Anastasius in 492, the flames which had raged furiously for upwards of three years, gradually became more faint, and at length expired altogether, Rufi-

II. Basilii Magni Homilie VIII. These will be found in the edition of St. Basil, published at Paris by Garnier, in 1722, vol. ii. p. 713.

III. Pamphili Apologia pro Origene, to be found in all the best editions of Origen and Jerome.

IV. Origines de Principiis Libri IV. V. Originis Homilie, XVII. in Genesis, XIII. in Exodus, XVI. in Leviticus, XXVIII. in Numeros, XXVI. in Josue, IX. in Judices, I. in Liber Regum, IV. in Cantica Cantorum, X. Libri in Joseph. The whole of the above translations will be found in all the editions of Origen.

VI. Gregorii Nazianzeni Opera S. X. first published by Johannes Adelphus, at Strasburg, 4to., 1508, and included in the Latin translation of the whole works of Gregory, by Mosellanus and Pirckheimer, printed at Leipzig, 8vo. 1522.

VII. Sii Sententiae s. Eucheridhii s. Annuell, a series of moral Apophthegms, the author of which was altogether uncertain, even in the age of Rufinus, since by some they were supposed to be the production of Sextius the Stoic, named by Seneca, by others of a Pythagorean, by others of Sixtus II., who was bishop of Rome, and suffered martyrdom in A.D. 258. A collection of this nature is peculiarly open to interpolation, and hence it is little surprising that the MSS. should present variations quite irreconcilable. It is not improbable that the reflections of some heathen philosopher may have formed the groundwork, that these were modified and adapted to Christianity by Rufinus and others, and that transcribers from time to time made such alterations and additions as suited their own views and tastes. The best edition is that of Urbanus Godofredus Siberus, 4to. Lips. 1725.

VIII. Evagrii Sententiae ad Monachos, Evagrii Sententiae de Apatia, Evagrii Liber ad Virgines. These three tracts, which will be found in the appendix to the Codex Regulæm, &c., of Holstenius, 4to. Rom. 1661, are generally believed to be the "opuscula" of Evagrius which Jerome, in his letter to Ctesiphon, mentions as having been translated by Rufinus, and to which Gennadius also makes allusions (cc. xi. and xvii.), although doubtfully and indistinctly.

IX. Clementis Romani Recognitiones, of which the original was attributed to Clemens Romanus.

X. Anathelii Alexandrini Canon Paschalis, first published, from a MSS., by Aegidius Bucherius, in his Doctricia Temporum, fol. Antv. 1634.

The following translations from Origen frequently ascribed to Rufinus, are of doubtful authenticity:

—Homiitie VII. in Matthesum, Homilia in Johannem; De Maria Magdalena; De Epiphania Domini.

The following works have been erroneously ascribed to Rufinus:—Versio Origens Homiliearum in Lucam, which belongs to Jerome; Versio Josephi Operum, which belongs to Ambrose; Commentarii in LXXV. priores Davidis Psalmos; in Oseeum, Joachelm, Amos; Vita S. Eugenii; Libelli de Fide breviores; Libellus de Fide fiorior. The following works by Rufinus have been lost: Epistola ad Hieronymum, in reply to the first part of Jerome's Apologia; Epistulae ad Avicianum Falconnium Proba: some translations from Latin into Greek.

The style of Rufinus is remarkably perspicuous, and, although tinged with the corruptions of his age, is far removed from barbarism. His original works do not indicate commanding genius, nor indeed are the subjects such as to admit of much display, while his merits as a translator rank very low, since all his efforts in this department are characterised by extreme inaccuracy. Indeed his object seems to have been rather to convey a general idea of the meaning of an author than faithfully to represent his words, and he does not hesitate to expand, condense, correct, or omit such passages as seemed to him obscure, diffuse, inaccurate or unnecessary, although we cannot with justice accuse him of wilful distortion or suppression. Into the merits of the controversy with Jerome, to which perhaps he owes his chief celebrity, it is unnecessary to enter. It redounded to the praise of Rufinus, and the laity was undoubtedly the aggressor, the motives of the attack were probably unworthy, and the coarse invective in which it was couched excites no feeling except disgust, especially when contrasted with the hyperbolical praises lavished by him not long before upon the same individual.

No complete impression of the works of Rufinus having ever been published, we have noticed the best edition of each piece separately.

(1) The events connected with the life of Rufinus have been investigated, with great industry and learning, by Giusto Fontanini, archbishop of Ancyr, in his Historia Literaria Aegypti, 4to. Rom. 1742, and by J. F. B. Maria de Rubeis, in his Dissertationes Ducas, 4to., Venet. 1745; to which we may add the notices prefixed to the edition by Caccitti of the Historia Ecclesiastica, and the recent dissertation by J. H. Marzutiti, entitled De Turanit Rufus Protracted Aegypti Fide et Religione, 4to., Bologna, 1790.

2. Rufinus, the name attached to a little poem in twenty-two lines, Pasiphae Fabula ex omniis Metris Horatianis, which, as the name imports, contains an example of each of the different metres employed by Horace. It was first published by Cruqui (1579), by whom it was found in the Bandini MSS. attached to an ancient exposition of the Horatian metres. It has been printed by Burmann, in his Anthol. Lat. iii. 232, or No. 997, ed. Meyer, by Weinsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. 393, comp. p. 339, and is usually appended to the larger editions of Horace. The author is altogether unknown, and even the name is uncertain, but he may be the same person with

3. Rufinus, a grammarian of Antioch, whose treatise De Metris Caesaris, or rather extracts from it, composed partly in prose and partly in verse, is contained in the "Grammaticae Latinae Anc. tores Antiqui" of Putschies, 4to., Hannov. 1605, pp. 2706-2727. He was probably not earlier than Theodosius, since he quotes Firmianus, Victorinus, Albinus, and Donatus. [W.R.]

4. Rufinus, the author of thirty-eight epigrams in the Greek Anthology, and probably of one more, which is ascribed in the Planudean Anthology to an otherwise unknown Rufus Do-

*It is not quite certain that Menius Rufus was a physician at all, as Asclepiades does not say that

2. Rufus Ephesiensis, so called from the place of his birth, is said by Abu-l-fara (Hist. Dynast. p. 59) to have lived in the time of Plato; and called by John Tzetzes (Chit. vi. Hist. 44, 300, p. 104) physician to Cleopatra. Suidas places him in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 98—117, which date is adopted by most men, and is probably correct, as Rufus quotes Zeuxis (ap. Gal. Comment. in Hippocr. & Prior. L. ii. 55, vol. xvi. p. 636) and Dioscorides (ap. Mai. Collect. et Vita. Codic. aditi, vol. iv. p. 11), and is himself quoted by Galen. He wrote several medical works, some of which are still extant. The principal of these is entitled Ἐρυμασάτως τῶν τοῦ Ἀνδρόμαχου Ἰσπίων, "De Appellationibus Partium Corporis Humanis," which consists of two unequal parts, viz. the original treatise, and an extract from it: but whether both parts belong to Rufus, is doubtful. The first and fourth books together form the original work; and the second and third books, the extract, by help of which several passages might be corrected. They are generally reckoned as only three books, as the second is merely the alter primus. The work itself is chiefly interesting for the information it contains regarding the state of anatomical science at Alexandria, and before the time of Galen. Rufus considers the spleen to be absolutely useless (p. 59, ed. Clinch). He intimates that the nerves now called recurrent, were then recently discovered. "The ancients," says he (p. 42), "called the arteries of the neck καρποθήκες or καρπω-τικοί, because they believed, that, when they were pressed hard, the animal became sleepy and lost its voice; but in our age it has been discovered that this accident does not proceed from pressing upon these arteries, but upon the nerves contiguous to them." He shows that the nerves proceed from the brain, and he divides them into two classes, those of sensibility and those of motion (p. 36). He considers the heart to be the seat of life, and notices that the left ventricle is smaller and thicker than the right (p. 37). This work was first published in a Latin translation by J. P. Crassus, together with Aristeus, Venet. 1552, 4to. The other extant works of Rufus are: an incomplete treatise, Ἐρυμασάτως έν Ναῷ καί Κόστοι Παππῷ, "De Resum et Vescine Morbis;" and A Fragment, Ἐρυμασάτως Φαρμάκων Καθημενων, "De Medicamentis Purgantibus." These three works were first published in Greek by J. Goupy, Paris, 8vo. 1554; and there is an edition (which is not of much critical value,) by J. Clinch, Greek and Latin, Lond. 1726, 4to. The last two were published in Greek, by C. F. de Mathaie, Mosq. 1806, 8vo., who supplied, from a MS. at Moscow, several passages that had never before been published: this edition is now become excessively scarce. The Latin translation by J. P. Crassus of these three works is inserted in the " Medicææ Artis Principes," by H. Stephens, 1567, fol. Paris.

Besides these three works, an old Latin version of a treatise on the Gout, consisting of thirty-seven short chapters, has lately been published under the name of Rufus from a MS. in the Royal Library at Paris, by M. E. Littre, in the " Revue de Philologie," vol. i. (1845). The work appears to be quite genuine, as it contains two chapters (30, 31) which agree very closely with a passage attributed to Rufus by Aetius (iii. 4, 24, p. 593). A short treatise on the Pulse, Ζωνόφως ἔρυμα, has been lately published in Greek, with a French translation, by M. Ch. Daremberg, 1846, 8vo. Paris, from a MS. in the Royal Library, which attributes it to Rufus, but probably without sufficient reason. It seems to be the same work which has appeared in an old Latin translation, among Galen's writings, and is called "Compendium Pulsorum Scriptum" [Galen, p. 214. § 69], and which Ackermann attributes to one of the Arabidæ (Hist. Liter. Gal. p. clxvi). The real author's name is unknown, and with respect to his date it can only be stated that he lived certainly after Herophilus, and probably before Galen (see M. Daremberg's "Introduct."

Some Greek fragments of the lost works of Rufus are to be found in Angelo Mai's collection of "Classici Auctores e Vaticana Codicibus editi" (vol. iv. Rom. 1831), one of the most interesting of which is a passage respecting the plague, which appears to prove, beyond all doubt, that the glandular (or true) plague was known to the ancients some centuries earlier than was commonly supposed (see Littre, Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. iii. p. 4). There are also several fragments of his lost works preserved by Galen, Orrisius, Aetius, Rhazes, Ibn Baitar, &c. There is a dissertation by C. G. Kühn, containing "Rufi Ephesii, De Medicamentis Purgantibus Fragmentorum et Codice Parisiensi descrip- tum," 1831, 4to. Lips.; and another by F. Osann, De Loco Rufii Ephesii Medicis apud Orisiam servato, sive de Peste Libyca, 1833, 4to. Giess. A new and improved edition of (it is believed) all the extant works of Rufus, is at this present time (1848) being prepared by Dr. C. Daremberg of Paris.

Hallcr is inclined (Biblioth. Botan. vol. i. p. 108) to attribute to Rufus an anonymous fragment of one hundred and ninety Greek hexameter verses, Πελ Βοτανίων, De Viribus Herbærum, which was first published in the Aldine edition of Dioscorides, Venet. 1516, 4to. 231, &c., and which is inserted by Fabricius in his Bibliotheca Graeca (vol. ii. p. 629, ed. vel.), with Greek scholia, and a Latin translation and notes by J. Rentorff. Fabricius and others have been of the same opinion. Heumann (Orphica, Lips. 1805, 8vo. pp. 717, 750, 761, &c.), on metrical grounds, determines the writer to have lived some time between Manetho, the author of the Αστέρεσκατακι, and Nonnus, the author of the Dionysacæ; a date sufficiently indeterminate. Rufus certainly wrote a Greek hexameter poem, in four books, Πελ Βοτανίων, which is mentioned by Galen (De Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. vi. præf. vol. xi. p. 796), who quotes a few verses (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. i. 1, vol. xii. p. 425); but this is supposed by Choulant to have been quite a different work from the fragment in question, chiefly on the ground that so scientific and sensible a physician as
